him through his books. Nevertheless, the two volumes of letters, published here in extensive form, have had a great sale. The first edition was all gone before it was out. Even the circulating libraries had to wait for full supplies till the second was issued, ten days ago.

"As for the new American notes in these letters, now first printed for general circulation, the feeling they excite may almost be called disgust. Any editors of less pious sentiments than Mr. Dickens's daughter and sister-in-law, would, it is felt, have suppressed them. To what purpose did Dickens utter his famous palinode and append his apology as a perpetual postscript to all future editions of that foolish book on America, if fresh expressions of his contempt and dislike are thus to be poured out after his death? On nothing have I heard harsher criticism passed than on his cynical remark that the United States is a good campaigning-ground—a good place to fill his own pockets—but an odious place otherwise. The time when such things would please the English, as a people, is gone by, and in Dickens's own interest it is a pity that some editorial discretion could not have been invoked in his behalf."

It may be, as Mr. Smalley suggests, that many—possibly a majority—of those who admire the work of Dickens the writer may turn with disgust from the life and opinions of Dickens the man; and, in so doing, overturn their idol from its lofty literary pedestal. The present writer does not like either the works or the character of Charles Dickens, but he protests against the uncritical tendency of the average reader to judge one by the other—the man by his writings. It is for this reason, chiefly, that contemporary literary and artistic judgment is so generally at fault. Posterity, in the mass, cares little for personal details, and compels each tub to stand on its own bottom. If we, as readers, cared less for gossip and more for good work, the printing of trash would have less moral countenance and posterity would have less to do with the reversal of our opinions.

R. S. S.

One of the wisest of existing corporation regulations is that obtaining with the management of the California Street Hill Railroad, which provides that all employes shall have one day of rest in each seven. By this rule every employe has a fair chance to preserve his health and present to the traveling public a respectable, well fed, well housed appearance. As a consequence of this beneficent rule, the conductors and engineers of this road are among the best looking railroad employes in the United States, and present an appearance in splendid contrast to the kindred muster of one or two other street railroad lines in this city.

"Phew-e-w! Laura, what have you been eating?" exclaimed a Hoboken mother, as her daughter sailed into the parlor, leaving an odor in her wake that would have made a Limberger cheese factory feel envious. "Why, ma, our pastor has promised to call this evening, and I have thoughtfully guarded against any—any—you know what—by eating a piece of garlic and a few onions."

JOSEPH A. EVANS, at Clifton, N. B., thus writes to Mr. Fellows:—"I believe, under a kind Providence, that Mr. Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites has been the means of restoring both my wife and daughter. The latter from Tubercular Consumption, and I hope the afflicted will avail themselves of its use."

The Life and Letters of Henry Thomas Buckle, author of The History of Civilization, by Alfred Henry Huth, was so much in demand in England that the first edition was sold on the day of publication.

GOOD ADVICE.—When you have taken all the vile stuff sold for medicines, and get no better, then take simple, pure Hop Bitters; that we know will cure you.

They say that Swinton, late professor of English literature in the University of California, has become so religious that he now spells his name with a cross in the middle.

French, Spanish, and Italian Conversational Lessons, practical method. Post-office box 1574.

Dr. Francis Lieber's Miscellaneous Writings are nearly ready for publication.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

To those who wish to have removed permanently superfluous Hair, Freckles, Liver Spots, Black Worms, Moles, etc., I will send you a recipe that will cure you, free of charge. This great remedy was discovered by PROF. E. HINNA, the great Chemist and East India Plant Discoverer. This great discovery is guaranteed not to injure the skin in any way whatever. Send a self-addressed envelope to V. POPPER (General Agent for the United States and Canada), 127 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

Hackett & Dean, Dentists, No. 126 Kearny Street, Thurlow Block.

MORSE'S PALACE OF ART, 417 Montgomery St.

WANTED.

A YOUNG LADY, OF STRICTLY moral character, and of ability as a dressmaker, desires work by the day or week in a private family. Understands fancy work. Can furnish the best of references. Address DRESSMAKER, this office.

THE COPARTNERSHIP HERETO- fore existing between J. V. Hart and W. W. Phelps, under the firm name of Hart & Phelps, is hereby dissolved by mutual consent.

J. V. HART, W. W. PHELPS.
Mr. J. V. Hart can be found at No. 27 Second Street, San Francisco, Feb. 10, 1880.

OFFICE OF THE BODIE CONSOLIDATED Mining Company, Room 62, Nevada Block, San Francisco, February 17, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, a dividend (No. 8) of Twenty-five (25) Cents per share was declared on the capital stock of the Company, payable MONDAY, March 1, 1880, at the office of Messrs. Laidlaw & Co., New York, only on stock issued from the Transfer Agency in that city, and at the San Francisco office only on stock issued here. Transfer books will close on Thursday, February 19, 1880, at 3 o'clock P. M.

WM. H. LENT, Secretary.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE, PROPRIETOR AND MANAGER.

Monday night, Feb. 23d, reappearance in San Francisco (after a protracted absence) of the world-renowned Comedian,

MR. SOTHERN,

Who will be accompanied by his entire Company of Comedians.

Mr. Sothern will begin his series of incomparable representations with the performance (first time here) of his powerful characterization of

DE LACY FITZTALMONT,

Tragedian of the Snaggletoe Circuit, which, for the past three years, has been admitted in America and England to be one of

HIS GREATEST AND MOST PHENOMENAL SUCCESSES.

Will be presented the Original Domestic Comedy, in 5 Acts, by Henry J. Byron, entitled

THE CRUSHED TRAGEDIAN.

Reserved Seats now on sale.

THE BALDWIN THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE, MANAGER.
R. M. EBERLE, STAGE MANAGER.

LAST NIGHTS OF

THE QUEEN'S SHILLING

...AND...

TOODLES,

This (Saturday) evening, Feb. 21st, and to-morrow (Sunday) Feb. 22d.

Monday, Feb. 23d, reappearance of

CLARA MORRIS,

And first production on any stage of

THE SOUL OF AN ACTRESS.

ARCHERY.

EDWARD T. MARTIN has just received a fine Stock of HORSMAN'S CELEBRATED ARCHERY GOODS, comprising Ladies' and Gentlemen's BEST BACK BOWS, first-class SELF-BOWS, CLUB ARROWS, TARGETS, and Miscellaneous Archery Equipments, which will be sold at Manufacturers' prices.

EDWARD T. MARTIN,

5 Montgomery Street.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS, REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 325 Montgomery Street,

Odd Fellows' Hall.

WM. F. SMITH, M. D.,

OCULIST, 313 BUSH STREET.

Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.

J. A. HUNTER, M. D.,

No. 321 Sutter Street, devotes Special Attention to

Catarrh, Deafness,

Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, and all ailments of the Throat, Lungs, and Heart.

$72 a week. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & CO., Augusta, Maine.

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH, COAL DEALERS.

Office and Yard, 14 Post Street.

Store Yard, 718 Sansome Street.

BRANCH OFFICE.

J. Middleton & Son, 419 Pine Street,

Opposite California Market.

All kinds of coal at lowest rates. Orders may be sent by telephone through any of the company's offices free.

C. BEACH

BOOKSELLER AND STATIONER

107 MONTGOMERY ST., OPP. THE

Occidental. Special Notice—Engraved Plate, with 100 cards, $5.00; 100 Cards from Plate, $1.50; only the best Imported Cards used. In the Store is established the Agency of D. APPLETON & CO., of New York, with a full line of their publications. Catalogues furnished on application.

NEW BOOKS.

Autobiography of Prince Metternich. Edited by his son. 2 vols. 8vo. Cloth. $5 00
Hawthorne. By Henry James, Jr. 1 vol. Cloth. 1 00
England. By T. H. S. Escott. 1 vol. 8vo. (Uniform with Wallace's Russia.) 4 00
Great Lights in Sculpture and Painting. By S. D. Doremus. 1 vol. 12mo. Cloth. 1 00
Great Singers. By G. T. Ferris. 1 vol. Paper. 30
Progress and Poverty. By Henry George. 1 vol. Cloth. 2 00
Queen of the Meadow. A Novel. By C. Gibbon. (Franklin Square Library.) 15
Sebastian Strome. A Novel. By Julian Hawthorne. 1 vol. Paper. 75
Brazil; the Amazon and the Coast. By Herbert H. Smith. 1 vol. 8vo. Ill. 5 00
Camps in the Caribbees. By Fred. A. Ober. 1 vol. 8vo. Ill. 2 50
Four Months in a Sneak Box. By N. H. Bishop. 1 vol. 8vo. Ill. 2 50
Haworth's. By Mrs. Burnett, author of That Lass o' Lowries. 1 vol. 12mo. 1 50
The Army of Virginia; from Cedar Mountain to Alexandria. By Geo. H. Gordon. 1 vol. 8vo. 4 00

FOR SALE BY

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

No. 3 Montgomery Street,

(MASONIC TEMPLE.)

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.,

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

218 California St., San Francisco, Cal.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt.

C. P. SHEPHERD, N. W. SPAULDING, J. PATTERSON

PACIFIC

SAW MANUFACTURING CO.

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

SAWS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

on hand and made to order. Agents for C. B. Paul's Files.

Repairing of all kinds done at short notice.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

TABER, HARKER & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

GROCERS, 208 and 210 California St., San Francisco.

H. L. DODGE, L. H. SWEENEY, J. E. RUGGLES

DODGE, SWEENEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS,

Wholesale Provision Dealers,

...AND...

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Nos. 114 and 116 Market, and 11 and 13 California Sts.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.,

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR

Street.

Liberal advances made on consignments.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET

LINES.

204 and 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - - San Francisco

Etchings and Rare Engravings.

W. K. VICKERY INVITES ATTENtion to his large collection of the above, which includes fine original Engravings from the great Engravers of Europe. Rare Portraits, either in collection or single. A large number of fine Etchings in stock.

125 KEARNY ST. (Thurlow Block), S.

PRECAUTION.

My sweetheart's eyes two robbers are,
And boldly play their part;
Defying law, they bid me stand
And give them up my heart.

So, to defeat their wicked scheme,
And hide it from their quest,
I've placed my heart secure within
The prison of her breast.

But since I fear its safety still,
Though in this dungeon rare,
I'll ask appointment of her soul
To be its warden there.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1880.

SIGNA.

"NO, 122."

A New Year's Day Idyl.

It was three by the French time-piece in Mrs. Ver Planck's reception-room on the first of January, 1880, and Miss Plumtree was weary. She was only a sort of aid-de-camp to the field officers of this pretty society review, but she had two things to sustain her: she believed in her leaders, and she had no special acquaintance whom she knew would call on her—so there was no possible chance for a disappointment. With her companions it was different. The laws of meum et tuum in the matter of New Year's callers can never be very clearly defined, and in this instance the self-constituted general of the day swept them to the winds, securing to herself the bravest of the brave soldiers who came and went in interminable procession through Mrs. Ver Planck's spacious rooms, and turning over to the rest of the staff the awkward squads remaining—to be defied into the dining-room or directed to their hostess. That lady was so gracefully gracious to the graduates of the goose-step that they almost forgot themselves and became brilliant—which was certainly the acme of result. But it did not quell the agrarian spirit in the rebellious staff.

Miss Plumtree was as verdant in this sort of business as was the day they were celebrating, but she smiled and bowed when she was introduced, fished up some idiotic platitude from her scant stock of small-talk, and, at the first hiatus, nervously proceeded to ask Mr. Mm—m—m—m if he wouldn't "come out and have a cup of coffee." The getting Mr. Mm—m—m—m settled and provisioned took up some time (Miss Plumtree was noble in the role of victualer), and at last she was rewarded by the welcome speech: "Well, I have a good many calls to make, and I won't get round at this rate." And Miss Plumtree would exclaim with earnest inwardness: "Thank heaven!"—and with polite outwardness, "What, not going so soon? Pray don't hurry."

She envied the absorption of some of the staff in the gentle, thin-necked youths who were handed round, as it were, for conversation and coffee. She envied the greetings, evidently hearty and sincere, between so many old friends.

Sometimes a wandering refugee from the reception-room would fix her with his eye, and in sheer pity for his helplessness, she would guide him to the person he was seeking, or, for a dernier ressort, show him "the view," or the "tropics" as pictured by the conservatory.

But the remarkable likeness of the young tuberoses and smilaxes one to another was so bewildering to her not over-swift mental eye, that at last it refused to assist her at all. The pageant was like a human kaleidoscope; you could not swear that this figure had ever been seen before, but bless us! how like the last.

"Was it Jones who was here a moment ago? I thought he came at noon, and his name was Brown," soliloquized Miss Plumtree, who felt paralysis creeping over her powers of identification.

The hum of conversation went on; plates rattled, callers bowed themselves in and bowed themselves out. The young lady who acted as commander-in-chief was languishing over a plate of chicken salad, and assuring her neighbor that it was the first morsel she had tasted that day. The army with its shoulder-straps, the bar, the bench, and even plebeian trade were meeting and mingling in amicable interchange of the season's compliments. Outside, the sun and a vicious north wind were doing the same. Everybody entered with blue noses and said: "What a charming day it is!"

The beauty of Mrs. Ver Planck's staff was drinking unreasonable cups of coffee to keep warm, and wrapping her graceful bare arms in a lace shawl to keep cool. The witty Athene was croaking with a cold, and even Mrs. Ver Planck acknowledged herself a victim to neuralgia. But they all talked and laughed, and vowed they had never enjoyed anything so much in all their lives.

About this time Miss Plumtree was seized by a bright idea. An inquisitive young lady undertook to count the cards of the callers, and announced the sum total as 120. A gleam of hope penetrated Miss Plumtree's softening brain—she would number her newly found acquaintances. Those gone before were lost to her—unknown quantities; but the rest should live forever. The plan worked to a charm. When the next lavendered young man was presented, she murmured sweetly, "Pleased to meet you, Mr. 121." The gentleman was too much occupied with himself to notice the change of name, and Miss Plumtree found an innocent pleasure in being able at once to keep tally for the staff and label her friends. But at precisely three o'clock there was nobody in particular who seemed to need Miss Plumtree—no wandering refugee, no quondam acquaintance to divert, so she dropped into a seat at Mrs. Ver Planck's side, helplessly wondering, for the nine hundredth time, at that lady's easy friendliness, alike toward old bores and young beaux, simpletons and savants.

The gentleman who was enjoying his hostess' attention at that moment was a rather distinguished looking man, faultlessly attired, save that he wore a brave diamond-pin in his shirt-front. Miss Plumtree's eyes rested on the pin and condemned the owner.

Mrs. Ver Planck leaned back in her chair. "Mr.—(name inaudible)—my friend Miss Plumtree. Mr.—" ("122," muttered Miss Plumtree mechanically)—"was just telling me, Amelia, of the contrast this scene presented to some entertainments he recently attended in Arizona."

"122?" said Miss Plumtree, languidly. She was too tired to take a trip to Arizona in search of conversation, but she said to herself, triumphantly: "I knew he was a miner by the diamonds." At first she only listened; then she pricked up her ears—metaphorically, of course—for this grave gentleman talked wisely and well. He ate his sandwiches, too, with a self-possessed deliberation which Miss Plumtree noticed and admired. She grew interested in spite of herself. Here was somebody whom she could not possibly mistake for any one else. She dipped into the conversation animatedly; and when Mrs. Ver Planck went away to greet some fresh arrivals, and begged "Amelia" to take her place, the latter slipped into the vacant chair and lent herself to the fascination of studying this strange animal—who dared talk something besides commonplaces on New Year's Day.

A few deft questions opened a fresh world. To hear of camp-life and careless adventure in the midst of this hot-house atmosphere, to plunge into a discussion of personal likes and dislikes with a complete stranger, was the kind of sharp antithesis which Miss Plumtree especially enjoyed. She liked the way her nameless acquaintance talked to her. It made her feel as if she belonged somewhere, as if she were a sane being. After a while they went back into the drawing-room, where gay little knots of talkers were bivouacked on the satin tête-à-tête sofas. I am here bound to confess that a part of Miss Plumtree's indifference to her youthful surroundings lay in the fact that she was herself no longer young. To be passée, and know it, is paralyzing in a greater or less degree to every woman. Luckily, few women realize when youth goes from them; in fact, they refuse to say goodbye to it at all.

"It must be delightful to get away from all this sham gentility," sighed Miss Plumtree; "I have always imagined that I should like those semi-barbarous border lands."

"It is hard to come back into sham gentility after one has tried a semi-barbarous life," said her companion, who seemed in no hurry to leave the genteel circle in which he found himself.

"Do you return soon to Arizona?" asked Miss Plumtree, relapsing into conventionality.

"I am living at Bodie now, and shall be for some time. But I am a bird of passage. I live nowhere long."

Miss Plumtree was not geographical, and had not the slightest notion whether Bodie was a town or a mine; whether it was in Mexico or Montana; but she was ashamed of her ignorance, and only tried to look wise.

"Such a roving life must make one discontented," she said, carelessly.

Mr. 122 looked at her with an amused expression, and shrugged his shoulders. "Well, yes, it does," he admitted; and, without any egotism, proceeded to tell of some of his misadventures.

"It is like the Arabian Nights," thought Miss Plumtree, ecstatically; "and this is Sindbad the Sailor and nobody else;" for the man from Bodie related how he had fought under three flags—or perhaps it was four; how he had run away from home at a phenomenal youth to go to sea; and how he had sailed and sailed—like Captain Kidd—into strange lands. He hinted at a fortune lost; and, in telling how he retrieved it, happened to mention that a lamented banker was his good friend.

"He came to me," said Mr. 122, impressively, "and said, 'Vent'—everybody called me Vent—I am going to send this company'—"

But Miss Plumtree was so absorbed in wondering what his real name was that she lost the rest of the story. Perhaps she showed her abstraction, for "Vent" told no more adventures, and they jumped at once into literature, where he won Miss Plumtree's heart by liking a certain obscure author, who was a protégé of hers.

At last he rose to go. Mrs. Ver Planck happened to be coming in just then, and he bade her good-bye in a dignified way, which was also very restful after the jerky adieux of the Smilaxes et al. If Miss Plumtree had followed her instinct she would have said, "You have done me a great deal of good, and I like you immensely, and what's your name?" But, instead, she shook hands with him and murmured, demurely:

"Very glad to have met you"—which meant just nothing at all.

But she felt for the rest of the day as if she had taken a tonic. She even roused herself to have some show of interest in her tally-list, which she had kept faithfully. It was rather discouraging to find, on comparing notes at the close of the parade, that she had been bored by a millionaire, and amused by a petty stock clerk; that she had cut a sensitive friend dead, and had been especially confidential with a man who was very "bad form;" and she was ready to swear by all the society gods that ignorance was not bliss. Howbeit she consoled herself with the fact that her blunders were as tracks on the sand, and would be washed away by the next incoming wave.

"Who's your adventurous friend?" she said, curiously, to Mrs. Ver Planck.

"I don't know him—never saw him before," answered that lady, amused and interested.

"But his name—surely you remember his name?"

Mrs. Ver Planck knotted her forehead trying to think. "He said he knew Mr. Ver Planck very well, and wanted to know me. No, I can't remember."

And Miss Plumtree had to go away with unsatisfied curiosity. But her little adventure rolled itself up in her somewhat imaginative mind to Brobdingnagian proportions.

Miss Plumtree was always surcharged with some profound emotion, which lasted till another came to take its place. After she had told her romance to several of her friends, with thrilling effect, it began to pall. Then her protégé, the author, got into trouble, and the image of No. 122 began to look like a faded photographic negative. The third week it was an outline, the fourth a shadow, the fifth a memory. Sometimes Miss Plumtree wonders vaguely whether "Vent" was not testing her credulity with his Captain Kidd voyages and his protean uniforms. But all the same, when she gets distrustful and cynical, and after she has taken part in some of the social jousts which she so heartily dislikes, or after she has been laboring to graft some of Mrs. Ver Planck's amiable sacrifices on her own selfishness, she goes into her memory-closet and takes out, for refreshment and romance, her little drawing-room drama of "No. 122, or the man from Bodie."

BEALMONT, Cal., February 1, 1880.

THE PRIEST ON HIS ROCK.

Cashel is one of the interesting places in Ireland. It is in the County of Tipperary, and is famous for the Rock of Cashel, crowned with the finest ruins of the Emerald Isle. It has one of those curious old round towers, the origin of which is unknown, a splendid Catholic cathedral of the twelfth century, a monastery and castle of the same date. Here lived Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, and here the ancient sovereigns of Munster dwelt. Cashel is now the seat of a Catholic archbishop. His name is Croke, and it is the absurd and wicked conduct of "His Grace Archbishop Croke" that inspires this article. Irish people are starving, and the appeal goes out to all the world for alms—to the Protestant and the Catholic Christian, and to sinners of all denominations. There is printed in the city of Paris the most ultra Ultramontane journal in all Europe. It is the Univers, edited by Louis Veuillot. It claims that the Pope is the Vicegerent of God, and as such has authority to control all lands and all governments and all peoples from the Vatican. His spiritual authority dominates all civil government; his ecclesiastical power controls all nations. This journal is at war with liberty, freedom of conscience, and freedom of opinion. It is at variance with all liberal Catholics. It opposes republican government in France. It would give to the Hierarchy of Rome authority over education, religion, and arts. It would make the people of the United States of America acknowledge the authority of the Bishop of Rome, and take their laws from the palace across the Tiber. This editor has contributed two hundred dollars to the suffering, starving poor of Ireland, and the Archbishop of Cashel says: "I am more proud to receive this sum from France, through Monsieur Veuillot, than to receive twenty times that amount from any other country or through any other medium." We hope this is a Protestant lie, and that Archbishop Croke has not displayed such narrow-minded bigotry, such cold inhumanity as is properly attributable to him if this remark is truly reported.

What They Know About Everything.

Tho' losses and crosses
Be lessons right severe,
There's wit there, ye'll get there,
Ye'll find nae other where.

—Burns.

If Nature should one day be pleased to reveal her secrets to us, oh, heavens! what errors, what mistakes shall we find in our paltry sciences!—Montaigne.

The secret of being happy yourself lies in the capacity of being intensely disagreeable to other people.—Outida.

Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works.—Shakespeare.

Error is worse than ignorance.—Bailey.

They who doom to hell, themselves are on the way;
Unless these bullies of eternal pains
Are pardoned their bad hearts for their worse brains.

—Byron.

Morality is the basis of society.—Chateaubriand.

To read without reflecting is like eating without digesting.—Burke.

Ambition is a lust that is never quenched, but grows more inflamed and madder by enjoyment.—Olway.

Gravity is the twin brother of stupidity.—Bovee.

Charity is man's true touchstone.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

I own that nothing like good cheer succeeds;
A man's a god whose hogshead freely bleeds;
Champagne can consecrate the damndest evil,
A hungry parasite adores a devil.

—Dr. Wolcot.

Of all wild beasts, preserve me from a tyrant; and of all tame, a flatterer.—Jonson.

Men's evil manners live in brass; their virtues we write in water.—Shakespeare.

A generous soul is sunshine to the mind.—Sir Robert Howard.

They truly mourn who mourn without a witness.—Byron.

Fashion! a word which knaves and fools may use,
Their knavery and folly to excuse.

—Churchill.

The friendships of the world are oft but confederacies in vice, or leagues of pleasure.—Addison.

True happiness consists not in the multitude of friends, but in the worth and choice.—Jonson.

The purely moral virtues are essentially frigid; it is the absence of vice, rather than the presence of virtue.—Chateaubriand.

The heart is the best logician.—Wendell Phillips.

Oh, flattery! how soon thy smooth insinuating oil supples the toughest fool!—Fenton.

I do pity unlearned gentlemen on a rainy day.—Lord Falkland.

N. B. S.

SACRAMENTO, February 2, 1880.

The following telegraphic correspondence explains itself:

NEW YORK, February 13th.
LELAND STANFORD:—Won't you give us something for the Irish relief fund? The interest on the loan is deferred, but the security is good.
DION BOUCAULT.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 13th.
DION BOUCAULT, New York City:—For the suffering poor of Ireland I have the sympathy of common humanity, but there is an ample field nearer home for all that I have to give.
LELAND STANFORD.

The rule governing American native-born citizens ought to be, "Charity begins at home." Hence when we see good Christian men and women wasting their lives among heathen in foreign lands, or in the attempt to evangelize Indians in Alaska, we think they had better go out into the byways and hedges of their own neighborhood; and when they would give alms, they should not overlook their own suffering poor.

If a sweet, blushing thing gets down on her knees and implores you to be hers, saying she has seen only five birthdays since she was sixteen, remember it is leap year, and send her a birthday present on the twenty-ninth inst.

"DOMESTIC" THE LIGHT RUNNING SEWING MACHINE.

It is PERFECT in every feature, and COMPLETE in all its details. It embodies all of the MODERN improvements that are of PROVED VALUE.

J. W. EVANS,

No. 29 POST STREET (MECHANICS' INSTITUTE BUILDING).

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan. WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co. 12 Post Street San Francisco.

CHICKERING PIANOS AT COST.

P I A N O S

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

WANTED!

Nos. 1 (March 25), 4 (April 15), of Vol. I of the ARGONAUT for 1877. Twenty-five cents will be paid for each of the above numbers at the ARGONAUT office, 522 California Street.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 20th day of January, 1880, an assessment (No. 21) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the third day of March, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the twenty-fifth day of March, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
JNO. CROCKETT, Secretary.
Office—Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

EXCHEQUER MINING COMPANY.
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill Mining District, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the thirteenth (13th) day of January, 1880, an assessment (No. 13) of Fifty (50) Cents per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 4, No. 327 Pine Street, Stock Exchange Building, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventeenth (17th) day of February, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the ninth day of March, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
CHAS. E. ELLIOT, Secretary.
Office—Room 4, No. 327 Pine Street, Stock Exchange Building, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF
the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room No. 37, San Francisco, Feb. 14, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 52) of Thirty Cents per share was declared, payable on FRIDAY, February 20, 1880. Transfer books closed until the 21st inst.
P. JACOBUS, Ass't Secretary.

OFFER EXTRAORDINARY! THE Automatic

THE ONLY LIGHT RUNNING AND NOISELESS SEWING MACHINE made. It has no Bobbins, no Shuttle, no Tension. It is sold wholly upon its merits.

We hereby offer to parties who have owned an Automatic for Six Months and are dissatisfied, a New Machine of any other make, on even exchange. No other Company dare make such an offer.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.

124 Post Street, San Francisco, and 361 Twelfth Street, Oakland.

CHICKERING PIANOS

Perfect in tone, durability, and finish. Over 55,000 in use. Legitimately the Standard Piano of the world. Our new Patent Upright pronounced the very best in use. Sold on easy terms. Exclusive and only agency, No. 23 Dupont St., San Francisco.

L. K. HAMMER, AGENT.

The ARGONAUT is Printed with Ink Manufactured by SHATTUCK & FLETCHER, 520 Commercial Street, San Francisco.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

— THE —

NEW WESTERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

A SPLENDID NUMBER FOR MARCH.

The Californian.	March Number.
The Californian.	March Number.
The Californian.	March Number.
The Californian.	March Number.
The Californian.	March Number.

CONTENTS:

SAND. Chapter III.....J. W. GALLY.
OUR RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.....HENRY S. BROOKS.
IN THE SHADE.....S. E. ANDERSON.
SHEPHERDS AND SHEEP-HERDING.....ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.
FIRST LOVE AND LAST.....KATE HEATH.
CERTAIN PHASES OF THE CHINESE QUESTION.....JOHN F. MILLER.
NINE DAYS ON THE SUMMIT OF SHASTA.....B. A. COLONNA.
LEX SCRIPTA.....NATHAN C. KOUNS.
IRELAND—HER PAST AND PRESENT CONDITION.....T. H. HIGHLAND.
"ON WITH THE DANCE!" NO. 2.....BASHI BAZOUK.
ONE-POEM POETS.....EDWARD BELCHER.
CLOUDED CRYSTALS.....KATE M. BISHOP.
MOSE, THE BLACK PIONEER.....JOHN VANCE CHENEY.
THE WILD-FLOWER SEASON.....R. V. BOUDET.

One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.

BE SURE AND SEE THE MARCH NUMBER OF THE CALIFORNIAN!

FOR SALE BY NEWSDEALERS AND THE TRADE GENERALLY.

SCHOOL AT DRESDEN.

MRS. AURELIA BURRAGE, LATE
Principal of the School at 850 Van Ness Avenue, has opened a School for American Girls in Dresden. Terms $50 per month for board and tuition. For particulars apply to Miss West, 1000 Sutter Street, or address Mrs. Burrage, care of Dresden Bank, Dresden, Saxony.

DANIEL GIOVANNINI,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
dealer in Wood, Coal, Charcoal and Coke, 816 Pacific Street, between Stockton and Powell.
Charcoal Depot.—Charcoal for sale in lots to suit, from 1 to 10,000 sacks.

LADIES

All know how unsatisfactory Foreign Black Silks are in both cutting and wearing shiny. We give you a reliable test below that will give you a perfect guide in selecting silk material for actual wear.

JOHN D. CUTTER & CO.'S

RAVEN BLACK AMERICAN SILKS are now being retailed by the following established firms:

Doane & Henshelwood, San Francisco.
M. W. Henderson, Portland, Oregon.
O. A. Hale & Co., San Jose.
H. C. Taft & Co., Oakland.

THE TEST.

Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulteration, and will either cut or wear shiny.

Cutter's Samples for the trade.
ALLEN C. REID & CO.

POTOSI MINING COMPANY.
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth day of February, 1880, an assessment (No. 3) of fifty cents (50c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of March, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on THURSDAY, the first (1st) day of April, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.
By order of the Board of Directors.
W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CHOLLAR MINING COMPANY.
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth day of February, 1880, an assessment (No. 3) of fifty cents (50c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of March, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the thirty-first (31st) day of March, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

J. DOHERTY,
PRACTICAL
Plumber, Gas and Steam Fitter,
345 KEARNY STREET, COR. PINE,
San Francisco, Cal.

The Argonaut.

VOL. VI. NO. 9.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 28, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 7th, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—I take the liberty of sending you enclosed here-with a translation of "Erlkönig," by Goethe. It is a liberty, for I am a German, and you don't like Germans; at least when they have the audacity to make this country their second home. Still, I risk introducing myself to you with the confession of my nativity, as I have reason to believe that you are a lover of truthfulness and of a generous disposition (unlike the rest of your race that followed Jason many thousands of years ago, and have their places now "among the stars"), and that the openness of my introduction may diminish the odium of my birth in your eyes. I hope you will excuse me for the time I make you lose, and with the expression of my profound respect, remain
Yours,

Why so intelligent a person as the German gentleman who writes this note—and accompanies it with a charming translation from Goethe—should think the Argonaut does not like Germans, we can not understand, except upon the hypothesis that he has not read the Argonaut, or, being unfamiliar with our language, has failed to catch the spirit of our reflections upon his countrymen. If there is anything we have ever written—if there is a line or sentiment which, with its context and properly interpreted, carries with it the idea that we have intentionally cast odium upon men of German birth—we are unconscious of it. If there is a line or thought that is illiberal or narrow, or seems to reflect upon the birth-place of any one, we are unaware of its existence. That we have reflected most severely upon certain classes, and in our indignation have denounced foreign interference in our political affairs, we admit. That we have, with all the ability and earnestness that we possess, denounced those foreign demagogues and political agitators who have taken advantage of the political privileges with which the generosity of our laws has clothed them, we admit and justify. That we are earnest in our desire to maintain those republican institutions that our forefathers gave to us for an inheritance, we admit. That we have ever made any difference, or sought to deprive the intelligent emigrants of foreign European lands of any of the privileges and benefits that may come to them, or that we have denied to them an equal participation with the native-born in their enjoyment, we deny. No one more fully than we recognizes brotherhood and cousinship with the German family; no one appreciates more fully their claims to our good fellowship or our obligations for their part in aiding us to make the United States the home of a great nationality that shall give us all the strength, intelligence, and virtue that may be the outcome of cosmopolitan intermingling. But this very anxiety to secure to ourselves, our society and our country, an intelligent and moral class, makes us jealous of the introduction to our land of the vicious element of German society. We are not unmindful of the fact that from Germany there have come to our shores splendid specimens of men—men of education, genius, and high moral principle—men of patriotism, broad-minded, just, and generous. We are not forgetful of their patriotism; we are not ungrateful for their aid and service to us in our wars, nor indifferent to their exertions and achievements in all departments of science, literature, and statesmanship. We know, too, that from the lower and common classes of Germans we have had a vast immigration of industrious, law-abiding, worthy men and women, who, by economy, prudence, and toil, have aided in the physical development of our country, while at the same time they have grown prosperous and rich. All these things we consider, and, if it is any satisfaction to our German fellow-citizens, we are prepared to admit that from German land we receive the best material, and that we can more easily assimilate, in the formation of our national character, with the German immigrant than with most other foreigners. But all this being admitted, it does not follow that, from the hundreds of thousands of Germans who have crowded to our shores, there are not very many that are undesirable in every sense. We think we are not in error when we charge that it has become a part of the policy of Bismarck and his associates in the statecraft of the Fatherland to send to us his or their political malcontents and agitators; that within the last decade there has been emptied upon our eastern coast unprincipled political adventurers, socialists, and criminals, that are all hurtful to us; that these men, crowding together in cities, banding themselves in political societies, are a disturbing and dangerous element. The cities of New York, Cincinnati, and Chicago illustrate this fact, and we as Americans have a right to be justly indignant thereat. The spectacle of a German society organizing in Chicago for a political purpose, and that purpose the avowed one of robbery under the guise of socialism, arming itself with guns and parading the streets to overawe their show of arms, is a disgraceful one, and one which every respectable and law-abiding German citizen should condemn—should not only condemn, but should arm against. It would be more becoming for honest men of German birth to put down this exhibition of alien ingratitude and shameful audacity than to illustrate their thin-skinned sensitiveness over journalistic writing that expresses its contempt for such devilish ingratitude.

If from America there went to Berlin a band of criminals, imbued with the idea that the accumulated property of Germany was theft, and claim that to them—equally with those who had toiled, or through inheritance acquired property—belonged the property of the country, and if the laws of the empire had clothed them—equally with the native-born—with political privileges: if, congregating in low cellars, they should make of their bellies a god, and to this god, daily and nightly and on the Sabbath, sacrifice beer and blood pudding, and the smoke of the incense continually burning before this altar was the smoke of a stinking pipe; and if, in these underground temples, they should plot the overthrow of government and the destruction of social order, and from them emerge in armed bands to drill and parade and menace, would the good people of Germany think they had been blessed with this kind of American immigration? What if to some other German city a similar band of American-born criminals had gone, to whom the Government had said: "We welcome you to all the privileges of the citizen of the German Empire; we will give you land from our public domain; we will educate your children; you may take and transmit property by inheritance; you may have liberty of thought and action under our laws; you shall enjoy freedom of conscience; you shall be eligible to our highest offices; all emoluments of place shall be within your reach; your children shall be equal in all privileges with our children." What, then, would be thought, if this band of criminal Americans should, under the leadership of some herculean Yankee, gather upon some German sand-lot, from which they should daily parade, and, staggering under schooners of beer, smoking Chinese cigars, demand with blazing banners "labor or bread," labor for eight hours at two dollars per day, and should insolently say to the burghers of this German town: "If you have not labor for us you must make it; if you do not make it we will rob you, burn your property, and riot in your streets." This is the attitude of a small German element in this city to-day. It is small as yet, but evil things grow fast. This element is a disgrace and a reproach to every respectable German in California. It ought to be put down, and by Germans. It ought not to be the duty of Americans to treat with it. There should be, and that without delay, a counter German organization, who should say to the broad-shouldered Hans Steinman, and all other idle and vagabond Germans of the sand-lot, "Mind your business and go to work. You have no right to shame us and our nationality by your disgraceful actions. You lie when you say you can not get work; we will give you work—every honest man among you; we Germans will provide work for all willing Germans who desire labor; we have mills and factories, stores, warehouses and banks, farms, forests and vineyards, mines, ships and quarries, and you shall not be idle if you desire to labor, and if you do not desire to labor you shall not imperil the peace of this American city, that has been so generous to all of our nationality; we advise you to become and remain law-abiding citizens, and if you take up arms to fight, you shall first thrash us, your fellow countrymen."

When we reflect upon the broad opportunities presented for fortunes in this illimitable empire of unoccupied land, boundless forests, free mines, fisheries, and quarries, this climate, this land of fruit and grain and wine and gold, we become indignant to think that any broad-shouldered, herculean German should parade our streets with a lying banner, the inscription upon which proclaims his own mendacity, his own idle, worthless, disgraceful incompetence to make a living in this land of God's plenty. This is the "kind of German," my young friend, fresh from the German university, that we do not like; and because we believe that you and your kind do not like them any better than we do, we make this long explanation. In order that our apology may do for all nationalities, we recommend that each and every foreigner who thinks he has had cause to feel aggrieved may re-read this article, substituting similar and fitting terms for his own low and miserable countrymen. The Irishman—we mean the gentleman and good citizen—may find our apology to him by substituting Irish for German; whiskey, duceen, and shillalah for lager, pipe, and blood-pudding; and our Irish fellow-citizens may take the same advice to themselves that we extend to our German citizens. In seriousness and in good faith we say to the respectable portion of our Irish society that it is their duty to relieve the American part of their fellow-citizens from further apprehension by devising some means to suppress these criminal and disgraceful exhibitions of their ignorant and vicious fellow-countrymen. If they are starving, feed them. If they want work, give it to them, so that when they do resort to violence they shall have enough of gratitude to remember your generosity, and enough of decency to exempt your property and your homes from the destruction with which they threaten ours. One word of advice to our strong-minded women, and we conclude. Go for Mrs. Smith; go for the Amazons of the sand-lot. If Mrs. Smith is an honest, virtuous, poor woman, seeking employment, furnish it to her, and to all that are willing to work, and need bread. Deserving poverty must not go without remunerative labor in San Francisco; and when you have found out what is the matter with Mrs. Smith and her fellow female tramps, then look further, among the by-places, for modest, deserving poor women, who have too much pride to tramp the streets, and too little cheek to proclaim their necessities from the platform of the sand-lot.

There is a comical as well as a serious side to all this sand-lot agitation business. When our digestion is good we are disposed to consider the humorous side, and when our digestion is not good we are apt to consider it through blue glass. Only think of it—here we are, an hundred thousand stout males. We have crossed the plains and endured the perilous passage of stormy cape and sickly isthmus. We have fed on mule meat, lived on beans, swung the pick, and rocked the cradle for gold-dust. We have created a State and made laws for it. We have built up a great commercial city. We have passed through flames and floods and earthquakes, and always with stout hearts. When suddenly from off a passing dray steps a small Irishman, gathers a few of his and our countrymen around him, frightens us with his blasphemies and his foul language, and lays the foundation of a party. He preaches reform, and announces himself as sent to teach an American people in an American State the principles of republican government. He gives us a new Constitution and a scare—and one other blessing we have omitted to name, a Mayor. Nobody has been hurt or hung, though ropes with villainous nooses have been dangled in our whitened faces, and the gallows, if not erected, has been threatened. True, there are not a thousand followers of this hero of the sand-lot, and they unarmed, while we have three hundred and fifty well-drilled and efficient policemen—ever so many hundreds of well-armed soldiers, under the leadership of such intrepid warriors as General McComb and General Barnes. We have the law and the State militia, and back of us the Government of the United States, capable of calling into the field a million of experienced veterans, and yet we are scared; property declines in value, money withdraws itself, and enterprise and business are arrested. If fat and honest Jack Falstaff, with his ragged regiment of drinkers of sack, had ever passed through our city, we should have been frightened to death.

Denis does not mean business—he never did; and if he did, he has been bought off. Look at him now: well-dressed and fat; well fed, and with a clean shirt. He toils not, neither does he drive a dray. He visits the East in palace cars. He looks sleek and oily, and has increased twenty pounds in weight. Contrast him to-day with one year ago. He was then poor. Now he can afford to drive his tandem in the Park. Within five years Denis will set up his establishment—coach with footman and tiger in livery, and will be one of our most conservative citizens. And then let us regard the meek and lowly man of Jesus—the pious, the devout, the unctuous Mr. Kalloch, with his ten or twelve thousand a year—his son in office, his darkey in office—living at the Palace Hotel; and ask ourselves the question, whether agitation for the benefit of the poor is not good business.

Certain principles must be kept steadily in view. The supremacy of the law must be maintained. The courts must be upheld; nothing but the existence, or immediate danger of violence, justifies the subversion or even temporary suspension of civil authority. No community can long survive the popular disregard of the rights of persons and property. In event of collision between lawful authority and criminal classes, the law always prevails. We have had riots in all the prominent cities of America and the world, and there is only one instance that we have in memory where the people triumphed over the administration of the law, and that was in San Francisco. This was a revolt in aid of the law and to strengthen the arm of justice. A riot in San Francisco against the Chinese would antagonize all who have occupation, who have property, who have families, who have hopes of the future. It would be an illegal war, not only against the obnoxious Chinese, but it would demand in their aid the assistance of all good citizens, of the municipal police, the military of the State, and, if necessary, the General Government. The result of such a conflict would not be doubtful: organized violence and criminal disorder bring nothing but disaster to all who thus unlawfully band together.

However, we are glad of one thing: There will occur now in a few months the simultaneous perihelion of four malific planets, and it is quite probable that this planet will be knocked into pi. One of the evidences that the disturbing elements are beginning to exercise their power is in the fact that Kalloch and Denis Kearney are possible, and that anybody is such an infernal fool as to be frightened by them.

Deposits in banks on the first of March will be taxed, and the depositor must pay the tax. They are assessed against the banker, too, indirectly. This provision of our new Constitution is an admirable one for the national credit; for in every bank in the city there is a steady flow of depositors, and a proportionate ebb of subscribers for United States bonds—untaxable. If it was the intention of the framers of the new Constitution to increase the State's revenue, they have missed their mark. It is safe to say that at the present rate of conversion the first day of March will dawn upon a State in which there will be not one cent on deposit in any bank. The question of the relative benefit to the State of many millions in bank available for investment and part of the permanent wages fund, and an equal amount locked up in United States bonds, is one of engaging simplicity and obvious solution. As such we commend it to the consideration of the statesmen, political economists, and financiers of the sand-lot.

Progress in spite of poverty is good. Progress without poverty is better. But poverty without progress is the worst this State has ever known.

AGAMEMNON.

From Rossiter W. Raymond's "Camp and Cabin."

I.—YOUNG BULLION.

"Hot? You bet it's hot! A cool one hundred and fifteen in the shade!" So Stephen Moore, the stage-driver, paradoxically described the weather, while he watered his horses from a rather slimy-looking spring by a solitary cabin among the foot-hills. Before him were barren reaches of dusty white ascending road, their ridges dotted with black spots of scrub-oak; then, beyond, all the blue line of the high Sierra. Behind him, the great plain of California, or rather that portion of it which lies around and south of Tulare Lake, shimmered in the heat, and sent up little dust whirlwinds that traveled hither and thither over its glowing surface like slender pillars of cloud. In a few years the desert would blossom, and miles upon miles of golden harvest would wave where now the wild oats and grasses, early browned by sultry summer, only mimicked the husbandry of man. A little later the locomotive would shoot and toot through these spacious solitudes. But that time was not yet; and, as it is said to be darkest just before daybreak, so it seemed most lonely in the land just before it was going to become most "lively."

"Yes, sir," said Stephen, "one hundred and fifteen, if it's an inch! But you don't feel the heat here as you do in the States. Why, ninety on Broadway just knocks the people over right and left with sunstrokes. But there's Young Bullion there, a-sleeping on the coach, with his hat off, and his face to the sun, and not taking any harm, either."

Stephen's remarks were addressed to the passenger who shared with him the driver's seat—a young man, of whose personal appearance at that moment little can be said, since, like everybody else who had traveled that day along the valley road, with the wind dead in the rear, he was so covered with dust as to be all of one color from head to foot, except where his eyes peeped out under their dusty lashes, like clean children at the window of an adobe cabin. It is not necessary to say much concerning this young man. He has little to do with the story, except to tell it—for the truth must out. It was the present narrator who sat as aforesaid, on the day above mentioned, while Stephen watered the horses, and Young Bullion slept sprawling on the top of the coach. Having confessed so much, it is hardly worth while to keep the traveler who tells this story in the chilly and unconfidential position of a third person any longer; and he will, therefore, with the reader's permission, speak of himself, as folks usually do, in the first person.

I was going up into the mountains to visit a newly discovered mining-district when Stephen first called my attention to Young Bullion, as narrated above. I had not noticed him before; but this was easily explained by the fact that I had only just got a chance to ride outside, the seat having been occupied from Stockton by an exasperating old cattle-breeder, who never wanted to change places with an inside passenger. Heat, dust, night, sleep, wind—whatever usually disposes the outsider to make such a temporary exchange—had no effect upon him. But at last we came to a ranch where the cattle-breeder alighted for good, leaving my friend Stephen free to offer the seat by his side to me, whom he called "Professor," because I was going up to inspect mines. In the Middle West it is "Judge" or "Kernel;" in the far West "Professor" has been added to the list of handy titles for strangers.

Stephen and I were not strangers, however. We had made many a trip together on the Wells-Fargo coaches in California, Oregon, and Nevada; and once we had started for a real vacation-spree, gone through the Yosemite, the Hetch-Hetchy, up to the head-waters of the Tuolumne, and so on through the high Sierra, away to the mighty cañons of Kern and King Rivers, camping on the bare ground at night, wherever we could find water and grass for our horses. So we had plenty to talk about now that we had met again; and, when I climbed to my place by his side, I paid no attention to the form that lay stretched on the still higher seat, behind the driver's.

But at the next stopping-place, as I have already remarked, Stephen mentioned the sleeping passenger as "Young Bullion;" and this caused me to turn and inspect him. He was so short that he lay at full-length upon the seat, without hanging over his feet or doubling up his legs, as experience had taught me I must needs do when I tried to sleep in that situation. The freckled face, light yellow hair, and brown stubby hand presented nothing extraordinary. It was evidently a mere boy, exposing his complexion in a way which his mother would have disapproved, had she known he was so emphatically "out."

"What makes you call him 'Young Bullion'?" I asked, surveying his coarse, patched clothes, and failing to see any special indications of the precious metal about him.

"Well," replied Stephen, as he swished the horses' legs with the water they had left in the pail, "it's a name the boys gave him, over at Pactolus District. He discovered the district; and he owns the best claim on the best mine there—the biggest on the coast, they say, next to the Comstock."

As this was a statement which I had heard concerning a score of mines at different times, I was not as deeply thrilled by it as a tyro might have been; and it was with some indifference that I said: "Ah! what's the name of the mine?"

"The Agamemnon," said Stephen. "It's named after him. Agamemnon's his real name."

That did give me a little start, for the Agamemnon mine, in Pactolus District was the very property I had been sent from San Francisco to examine. But I reflected that many claims might be located side by side on the same lode, and doubtless some other part than that which belonged to this boy had attracted the notice of my clients. At all events, I preserved a due professional reticence as to my own business, and remarked only: "Agamemnon is a queer name. Agamemnon what?"

By this time the driver was mounting again, and, before he could answer my question, he had to unwind the reins from the brake-bar, arrange them properly in the gloved fingers of his left hand, pick up his long-lashed whip from the top of the coach, then take off the brake, and tell the horses pithily to "Git!" These operations were scarcely completed, when Young Bullion suddenly sat upright and replied in person to my inquiry, which he must have overheard.

"Agamemnon Atrides O'Ballyhan," said he, with a twinkle in his shrewd gray eyes. "The boys call it Bullion when the old man ain't around. 'Twouldn't suit the old man, you bet!"

"Who is the old man—your father?" I said.

"Oh, no!" he replied, gravely; "my son."

Seeing my look of blank amazement, Stephen interposed the explanation that this was the jocose way in which the camp chose to consider the relationship.

"Well," said Agamemnon, "how's a feller to know, except by what folks say? And think I'd let the old man play father around my place? He couldn't run the machine a day."

I was somewhat displeased by this disrespectful tone, but I let it pass without comment, partly because the atmosphere was not favorable to lectures on filial piety, and partly because I was following in my mind a suggested coincidence. To make myself certain, I took out my note-book and sought the address of the party to whom I was to apply for permission to inspect the Agamemnon mine. It was, as I had supposed, Mr. O'Ballyhan. Turning to the boy, who had watched my movements keenly, I said: "I think it must be your father with whom I have some business."

"Who? The old man? Business? Not much! If you've got any business, it's with me; you just rest easy on that! Come up from the bay to look at the Agamemnon ledge, now, hain't you? Well, I'm your man? Oh, you needn't go for to doubt my word. I'm the only first-class, responsible, business O'Ballyhan on the Pacific Coast. Bet ye what ye like. Put up yer money, 'n leave it to Steve. No, I won't! Don't bet; swore off. Never did, very heavy, anyhow. But Steve there, he'll tell yer it's all right. Go in, Steve! If he won't believe yer, bet with him yerself, 'n leave it to the first bull-wacker ye meet."

But I was ready to accept Steve's assurance that this premature young adventurer was actually the mine-owner with whom my clients were negotiating. A very little further conversation soon put this point beyond the shadow of a doubt.

"You've been pretty lively," said he. "Thought I'd be one coach ahead o' ye, and git a chance to open up the mine a little. But I had to stop over at Stockton to buy some powder and steel. Got a new kind o' powder—this yer giant powder; made the feller show me how to use it. We went out o' town half a mile, an' couldn't find no rocks, so we blowed a scrub-oak all to sawdust. That's how I lost a day."

"Have you been in San Francisco?" I inquired. "It is strange that my friends did not mention it."

"Think I'd let 'em know I was there?" he replied, with a wink. "I'll tell ye just what I did: went down to Stockton with twelve mules an' a big load o' first-class Agamemnon ore—this yer black sulphuret, free gold sprinkled all through it, an' put it in the fire an' the silver sweats out to boot; sent it down from Stockton by boat, an' sot on the bags myself, you bet, all the way, with a six-shooter in my pocket. Soon's I'd got it down that all safe, 'n locked up in a warehouse, I went off to git some dinner. When the waiter fetched the pork 'n beans, I kind o' liked his looks, 'n says I: 'I want a agent for a little bit o' business here in town, 'n I guess you're my man.' He laughed at fust; thought I was fool'n him, or else was a fool myself. But I fixed that quick enough. Says I: 'Now, don't go for to think you can take me in because I'm small. Ye can't come no tricks over me. I've got fifteen tons o' first-class Agamemnon ore to sell, all picked and sacked. Here's a fair sample, 'n there's plenty more whar that came from. If you want to sell it for me, 'n earn a hundred dollars easy, say so.'

"Well, his eyes stuck out so when he see my sample that he looked half scared to death. But he was glad enough to be my agent. He was a big swell when he was dressed up, 'n he could make a powerful impression, only not on me. 'I ain't what I was,' says he, while we was a-talkin; 'I've seen better days.' 'Now, you jest come down,' says I; 'I don't want no more o' that! Git enough f'm 'n old man. As for you, ye're putty nigh what ye always was 'n always will be, 'n y' hain't seen no better day 'n this one'll be, if ye behave yerself.'

"'Young man,' says he, 'you ought to be respectful to yer elders.'

"'Elders!' says I, hollerin' like mad; 'who d'ye call elders? I was born in the year one, 'n I'm eighteen hundred 'n sixty-five years old, A.D., U.S.; d'ye hear that?' Then I laid my six-shooter alongside o' my plate, 'n says I: 'I'll be obliged to you if you'll call me Mr. O'Ballyhan.'

"Well, that's the way I got my agent. He was the politest feller, after that, you ever see. When he went round to a big house in Market Street, whar they was a-buyn' ores to send to Europe, me 'n my six shooter just went along. 'No she-nannigan, James,' says I. 'We'll just wait on the doorstep, 'n protect ye when ye come out.' Well, after a few minutes he comes out 'n says: 'If the rest o' the lot is like the sample, they'll give a thousand dollars a ton for it.' 'Not much,' says I; 'they'll have it assayed, and they'll make a bid accordin'; that's what they'll do.' An' that's what they did do, 'n gimme twenty thousand dollars for that lot of ore, rather 'n lemme go. Wouldn't a' sold it for that, either, only they began to talk about the mine, 'n said they'd probably like to buy her. When my agent told me that, I says: 'Well, I hain't no partic'lar objection. She's a good mine, 'n I wouldn't retire from her for less 'n a hundred thousand dollars. If they want her at that price, they can take her—or they can leave her. An' if you sell her, James,' says I, 'you'll get a thousand on top o' your hundred.' Well, there was big talk an' lots of it for a couple o' days; but I kept quiet 'n out o' sight, 'n James he negotiated till you couldn't rest. Fust thing they wanted was a report. Sent 'em one that the old man wrote and printed in the Pactolus Weekly Nozzle. The old man is hefty on a report; he jist slings the ink, now, I tell ye! About all he kin do."

I remarked that I had seen the report. It was indeed an extraordinary sample, even of that extraordinary kind of literature. It abounded in gorgeous descriptions of the beauty of the natural scenery, the immense display of geological phenomena, the unlimited amount of "yet undiscovered" treasure slumbering beneath the rocky surface, the salubrious climate, the exactly central geographical position (proved by drawing a circle round it on any map), and the metropolitan future, of Pactolus District. I remembered particularly the glowing conclusion: "The Gulch, to the golden sands of which this marvelous region owes its name, has long ceased to yield a suitable auriferous return to the honest hand of labor. [Note by the editor of the Weekly Nozzle: "But it will pay big to hydraulic."] But in the gold and silver veins which lie along certain magnetic lines in the rocks there are treasures surpassing those of the Lydian River, and which will be, in the words of the great Thucydides, Ktema es aei—a thing forever."

Agamemnon continued: "They said that report wa'n't enough; so I sent word to 'em to send up their own man, 'n I expect you're the feller."

I replied that I was the feller.

"Thought so the minute I laid eyes on yer. Well, now, we'll jest hev a few plain words about this business, 'n perhaps they'll save you the trouble o' goin' any farther. S'pose yer know I've got to pay yer fee? Left the money in bank down 't the bay."

I nodded assent.

"S'pose y' expect I'll give something extry if you make a good report, 'n the mine gets sold—hey?"

"Well," I said, gravely, "it would be reasonable, wouldn't it?"

"Reasonable?" said he, with a steady light in his gray eyes, as he turned and looked me full in the face. "I don't know about that. But it's jest impossible—d'ye hear that? You can go back to Frisco, unless yer want to examine somebody else's mine: yer can't git into the Agamemnon. There's goin' to be fair play with her, or nothin'!" And with that he turned his back to me.

After an embarrassing silence, I said: "But, Mr. O'Ballyhan, you made the offer, didn't you?"

"Wanted to find ye out, 'n I found ye out," he replied, without deigning to look at me.

"Well," I rejoined, "I wanted to find you out, and I've found you out. I'm very glad you regard it as dishonorable to give a bribe. If you had really tendered me one I should have reported it to my clients, and advised them to drop the business."

"Too thin!" was Agamemnon's sole reply; and I saw on Steve's face a grin of intense amusement at my discomfiture.

"Look here!" said I, as a last resort, "I'll leave it to Steve. He knows me, and he'll tell you that I am an honest man."

Steve could hardly resist the temptation to make matters worse by a dubious answer; but, seeing in my face that the trouble might be serious, he changed his tone, and gave to his remarks a satisfactory end:

"Well," he said, slowly, "I don't know; it's my impression that he stole my last pipeful of Lone Jack, and smoked it himself in camp on the Tuolumne; and a man that would do that—hey, boys? No, he's all right, Young Bullion; he'll do the square thing by you. I know him."

Young Bullion turned and held out his hand. "Put it there!" he said. And I "put it there," shaking hands with him in token of good faith. "Yer see," he continued presently, "th' ole man'll try it on. He's a disgrace to the family, he is. Don't you take nothin', I mean no promises—he hain't got nothin' else to give you—from th' ole man. I'm tryin' to reform him, I am; swore off lots o' things on his account—'n for some other partic'lar reasons. But soon's any stranger comes around, th' ole man slumps back agin into th' ole ways—goes to gamblin' an' drinkin'. Ever play poker?"

I said I had no knowledge of that accomplishment.

"Well, I can play it with any man in Pactolus, or anywhere else. Th' ole man taught me himself. But I swore off f'm gamblin'; I n' got all the boys to say they won't play with th' ole man; so he had to shut up. They wa'n't very sorry to promise—he used to clean 'em out every time. But it wa'n't the square thing, 'n I—I—the name o' the O'Ballyhans is goin' to be kept clean after this, by—!" Was I mistaken, or did I see this premature young person dash a tear from his eye? Instantly I heard him mutter: "Thar, now, I've sworn off swearin', 'n jist been 'n almost done it again!"

I need hardly say that by this time I was much interested in the strange character here presented for study. With mingled curiosity and respect I set myself to win his confidence, and extract an outline of his history. In spite of all his preternatural shrewdness and coolness, I found that he was at heart a boy, and required only the touch of sympathy and appreciation to make him talk freely. For more than an hour he ran on, with a queer mixture of simplicity and acuteness, narrating the experiences of an uneventful and yet heroic life, while Stephen and I listened without comment, except that the stage-driver nodded occasionally in confirmation of some statements that came within his own knowledge, or touched up his leaders with crackling emphasis when his feelings were particularly aroused.

II.—FURTHER ACQUAINTANCE.

I learned that Agamemnon Atrides O'Ballyhan owed his classical name to the fancy of his father—a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, and a careless, jolly spendthrift, who, after running through his own inheritance and a small fortune brought him by his wife, had taken sudden leave of his creditors and come to California in the early days, after the discovery of gold. His scraps of classical and mathematical learning found no market here. He had no solid attainments, no capacity for work, and no conscience; so, without much resistance, he yielded to the downward current, and became a gambler, perhaps worse. He was not fit to be an honest gambler, if I may use the paradox; that is to say, he could not rely upon skill and coolness to guarantee him a living in that profession without resort to cheating; for he speedily became a drunkard also, and no successful gambler can afford to indulge that vice. The result was inevitable—a vagabond life, interspersed with scenes of exposure and disgrace. From one mining-camp to another he dragged his wife and the young Agamemnon, who, born in the midst of these debasing associations, grew up to a premature knowledge of evil, and an utter ignorance of any higher code of ethics than the rude life of the miners illustrated.

Young Bullion was not explicit concerning these darker features of his experience. He seemed to avoid details with a sense of shame; and I fancied that the shame was of recent origin, that something had lately aroused him to a perception of the disgrace, and to an odd resolution, not at all like the usual repentance of awakened sinners, to clean the name of the O'Ballyhans. What this cause was I could not gather. He was silent on that point. But, whatever it was, it had made a man of him before his time. He was sixteen years old, though he looked both older and younger. He showed no trace of Irish origin in his talk, which differed from the mixed lingo of the Pacific Coast only in a freedom from coarseness and profanity which evidently cost him some effort. I inferred that this also was a recent change, dating from the time when he had "swore off" from gambling and drinking, and had put his father in the strait-jacket of filial discipline. Of his mother he spoke with a queer, kindly indifference, saying that she "wasn't much account," had no "savey," but "th' ole man's goin's-on had been rough on her." He regarded his father as an enfant terrible, an unwelcome responsibility, the management of whom, nevertheless, gave him a certain sense of pleasure in his own skill. "Th' ole man's sharp," he said; "but he ain't no match for me!"

A year before this, the O'Ballyhans, with slender stock of household goods, had emigrated to Pactolus Gulch. It was not a promising field. The placer diggings were nearly exhausted, and the population had nearly all departed. But there was business enough still (there always is) for one liquor saloon; and in this establishment the elder O'Ballyhan became bar-keeper. His taste for whisky would have made him an unprofitable servant; but his dexterity with cards made him useful to the proprietor, who pitted him against all comers in the fashionable operation of "playing for the drinks." Now that the claims in the Gulch paid so poorly, and dust was not plenty, the gambling of the Pactolus people seldom went beyond these modest stakes; and, as O'Ballyhan was allowed to drink only what he could earn in this way, why, the more he drank, the better for the business.

Meanwhile, the boy, so far as I could make out, had turned his hand to whatever he could find in the way of occasional occupation. He had been a supernumerary hostler to the stage; he had worked a while in a played-out placer claim; he had caught trout in the North Fork, above the place where the tailings made it too muddy even for a sucker or an eel; he had hunted quail, rabbits, and gophers, and sometimes deer; once he had shot a grizzly bear.

When he mentioned that experience, I interrupted him to ask for further particulars. "How did I do it?" said he. "I just walked up within twenty yards of him, 'n shot him in the mouth. He rolled over quiet enough. Yer see, I had Jim Knowles's repeatin' rifle. A grizzly ain't nothin' if yer have a repeatin' rifle, 'n keep cool. 'F that shot hadn't fetched him, there was seven more ready for him; 'n there never was a grizzly that could swaller seven ounce-balls at one mouthful."

With the precarious proceeds of these industries he had—as I managed to make him own—kept his mother from starvation, and his quick wits and ready helpfulness had evidently moved all the Pactolians to admiration and friendship. He had never taken much to book-learning, having rebelled entirely at a languid attempt of the old man to educate him. "Educate!" said he, contemptuously, as he told us about it; "didn't want none o' his kind. Two fellers in one family slingin' Latin, 'n puttin' on the heavy genteel, 'd 'a' been too much gravy for the meat." But I gathered that there was a school now at Pactolus of which he had a very high opinion.

"Do you go?" I asked, forgetting, for the moment, that he was a capitalist and man of business.

"No," he replied, gloomily; "hain't got time. But I walk over there afternoons to see the teacher."

"Is he a very good teacher?"

"It's a lady," he said, shortly, and changed the subject, proceeding to tell of the great discovery which had in six months brought fresh life to Pactolus District, and changed the fate of more than one of its inhabitants, namely, the discovery of the Agamemnon lode, and the inauguration thereby of a new era of prosperous activity.

It was the old story, repeated in so many districts on the Pacific Coast in early days. Young Bullion had found the outcrop of the lode far above the head of the gulch, and had pounded up a sack-full of the strange, dark ore, and "panned" it in vain for gold. Disappointed, but curious, he had carried a specimen of it to the saloon, and passed it around among the loungers who sat sociably about the red-hot stove. They could make nothing of it. But O'Ballyhan, senior, who was mellow with a day's professional work, had got possession of it, and, with drunken eloquence, pronounced it to be lapis philosophorum—the philosopher's stone ("with a lot of other Latin," added Agamemnon); and, finally, seizing the poker for a wand, had opened the door of the stove, tossed the specimen into the blazing fire, and declared himself to be an alchemist engaged in the manufacture of aurum potable. This, at least, is my version of it, based on Young Bullion's attempt to repeat the jargon of his drunken dad. True, the ancient alchemist did not make aurum potable in the fire, but over it; not by fusion, but by solution; but O'Ballyhan was drunk, and so may have departed from the prescription. Nobody cared for his vagaries. Only his son, when the others had departed, raked over the embers to recover his specimen, and found it studded with globules of exuded silver.

He was too shrewd to make immediate outcry over the discovery. For several days he kept it to himself, while he meditated thoroughly his plan of procedure. Then, taking into his counsel a miner who had had some experience in "quartz," he arranged a programme, which was carried out to the letter. A meeting of citizens was held, the startling announcement of the existence of silver veins in the neighborhood was proclaimed, and a code of laws was proposed. The assembly, being fiercely eager to adjourn and go "prospecting," passed the laws in a hurry; and the first location recorded was the Agamemnon. A week later, every chunk or boulder of rock, in place or out of place, streaked, spotted, black, or white, that showed itself on that mountain slope, had been "discovered," named, and recorded. A fine crop of litigation and pistol-shooting about disputed titles had been planted. But the title to the Agamemnon no one disputed; its discoverer was the benefactor of the district. The saloon-keeper, deeply impressed by the incident of the stove, advanced five hundred dollars for a fractional interest in the claim; and with this money Young Bullion began operations. But, foreseeing that it would not last long, he called the miners together, and proposed that, instead of wasting their labor each on his own mine, they should unite to open the Agamemnon to a considerable depth, extract a lot of ore, send it to the bay, and sell it for the benefit of all parties. This they had done with unexpected success, and Young Bullion had been able to send by express from San Francisco a good round sum for each of them, besides opening the negotiation for the sale of his mine. Meanwhile, the news had spread, and the tide of population had turned again to flood. Empty houses were inhabited once more; the hotel was reopened; the Weekly Nozzle (christened in honor of a now defunct hydraulic scheme) began to play again, and talked of expanding into a daily under the title of the Morning Blast; and the school-house had once more a teacher.

Listening to Agamemnon's story made the time pass rapidly, and, before we were aware, we were at the next station, where the horses were to be changed and the passengers fed.

I do not know why I have omitted to mention that the stage was well filled inside, but that the passengers were not a particularly interesting company, with the exception of one—a singularly intelligent and refined-looking young woman, who had joined us at the last station before that at which I went outside. A new-comer always has a great advantage in such circumstances. Even an ordinary woman, if neatly dressed, and spotless as to collar and cuffs, seems almost a saint or an angel by comparison with a thoroughly dusty load of travel-worn sufferers. But this lady was not an ordinary person. There was a—what's the use of trying to describe her? I will at least postpone the desperate task, and perhaps the progress of my story may make it unnecessary. Suffice it to say here, that an hour's sitting opposite her in the stage had quite filled my mind with a sort of tender curiosity as to her character, her history, and her errand into the rude society of the Sierra. But Young Bullion, with his quaint and vigorous narrative, had driven out her image.

It returned, however, with fresh force when we all alighted for dinner, and I hastened gallantly to help her out of the coach—on which occasion, let me say, I observed that her foot and hand were small, while her step and clasp were firm. (There's so much of my description unconsciously done for me, thank goodness!)

But surely it was not at sight of me that she blushed and looked confused? No; it was at some one behind me, to wit, Young Bullion; and, upon my word, he was blushing too, unless his complexion deceived me. The next instant my fair unknown (yes, she was fair—put that down in the description) walked straight up to him, and said, in her peculiarly sweet, clear voice (another item): "How do you do, Mr. O'Ballyhan? Have you had a pleasant journey? It is quite an unexpected pleasure to meet you here. I have been spending a day or two visiting some friends in the valley." [This with a graceful but indefinite gesture, which might indicate anything from Los Angeles to Chico.] "We have had a little vacation, to get a new floor put in the school-house."

It struck me that she seemed a trifle anxious to answer his possible questions before he asked them. If so, she need not have feared embarrassment from any inquisitiveness on his part. In her presence Young Bullion the capitalist, Agamemnon the ruler of men, was merely an awkward boy. It was all he could do to introduce me, at my request. But style was not important under the circumstances, and I was satisfied when I found myself on a footing of agreeable acquaintance with Miss Mary Carleton, the Pactolus school-teacher.

At the table I managed to improve a good many opportunities in the way of "passing" the potatoes, and such delicacies; and, as Young Bullion closely watched and eagerly imitated these courtesies, I fancy Miss Mary was waited upon as never before.

All the company resumed their places at the accustomed signal, and the rest of the journey passed quietly enough. Agamemnon apparently did not wish to talk, and, as evening approached, rolled himself up and went to sleep again on the upper seat. The shadows deepened in the cañons, and the red evening-glow slipped upward on the hills, and faded out at last from their summits into the sky, where it lingered yet a while before giving place entirely to the starlight.

Stephen and I chatted sedately and at intervals, until the spirit of the time charmed us to silence, and we smoked our pipes in placid reverie. At midnight everybody was aroused, for, with cracking of whip and barking of dogs and clattering of boofs and rattling of wheels, we drove up to the Pactolus hotel, and nobody was going any further. I lodged at the hotel, and saw no more of Young Bullion that night. Tired as I was, I noted, with a slight touch of envy, that he reentered the stage, for the purpose, as I inferred, of "seeing Miss Mary home."

Next morning, after breakfast, Agamemnon appeared, to "talk business." We walked through the single street of the town, along the edge of the irregular excavation which had been Nature's "gulch," and had become man's "diggins," until the last house was reached. It was the school-house; and Miss Mary, standing in the doorway, just about to ring the "second bell," waved us a greeting as we passed. (She had a pretty arm, too!) On a little height beyond we paused, and turned to enjoy the very picturesque prospect of houses and pine-covered hills, great red excavations, busy miners, and rolling foot-hills piled behind and below all.

"That's whar the O'Ballyhans live," said my companion, pointing to the house nearest the school-house—a low, large log-cabin.

"And whar does Miss Carleton live?" I asked.

"She boards with us," he replied, curtly, and faced about to resume the march.

The miners of the West have a notion that the richest mines are to be sought in the most inaccessible places. How far this might be recognized, if otherwise stated, as a fact with a scientific reason, I will not stop to explain. At all events, it was true of the Agamemnon, which occupied a very high and very bare mountain-spur of porphyritic rock, belonging properly to a more eastern belt than the granite and slate of the gulch proper. A lower summit and a heavy belt of pine timber separated this height from the settlement. One might say that the characteristic scenery of two States was here brought close together. Nevada peeped over a gap in the edge of the Sierra into California.

I began my examination at once, and soon became satisfied that it was indeed a mine of extraordinary value. How this conclusion was reached I do not need to describe here. But it was only after several visits, and many careful samplings and measurements, that my opinion became definite as well as positive.

III.—THE PRODIGAL FATHER.

On this first day we spent but a couple of hours in and about the mine, and then returned to town, where I had accepted an invitation to call on the O'Ballyhans. It was long past the dinner-hour. We had shared the miners' meal at their "boarding-house" on the mountain. As we passed the school-house, the hum of reciting voices told that Miss Mary was at work. Presently we entered the rude mansion of Agamemnon's family,

The door opened directly into a large sitting-room; and, as Young Bullion pushed it open without ceremony, we surprised the paternal O'Ballyhan, sitting before a pine table, and lazily engaged, pipe in mouth, in some sort of solitary game of cards.

"At it again?" said Agamemnon, angrily; "n you hain't copied them papers, neither!"

"Remacu teligisti; bedad! ye've touched the thing acutely, Aggy, me boy; et nihit teligisti quod non ornavisti, an' ye niver touched anything that ye didn't adorn. Come, now, that's rather nate, av' ye only understood it." This airy reply was thrown off like a soap-bubble from a pipe, with a wave of the hand and an affectation of easy unconcern. Nevertheless, the speaker managed with the same gesture to sweep the cards into a drawer, and it was not difficult to see that the theatrical side was really in awe of his practical son.

The latter paid no attention to the classical effusion with which he had been greeted, but continued, sternly: "Been drinkin', too. Look here, ole man, this has got to stop. You hear me!"

"Vultus est index animi," responded the awful dad; "sure it's me physiognomy betrays me sowl. In vino veritas; I couldn't tell ye a lie, me boy. Ecce signum! there's the bottle; ehue! quantum mutatus ab illo! an' divil a bit left in it!"

Agamemnon might have proceeded to further inquiry and rebuke, but suddenly recollecting my presence, he dropped, for the time, the process of family discipline, and introduced me as "the quartz-sharp from San Francisco."

The O'Ballyhan rose with exuberant cordiality, and skipped toward me as if I were his partner in a contra-dance. I despair of depicting him. Imagine a grizzly, rummy, bleared visage, surmounted by a shock of bristling gray hair; a short, fat figure, clad in a most dilapidated, but once gorgeous, large-figured, flowing dressing-gown, which did not pretend to conceal a very dirty shirt; tight pantaloons, of the cut and the pattern that were the rage a score of years ago; and a pair of slippers that flapped the floor at every step; in short, a person without the slightest remaining trace of dandyism. Imagine this being to talk and move with immense affectation of gentlemanly style, and you may gain some conception of the O'Ballyhan. I ought to add that his hands would have been white if they had been clean, and that his pipe was a common, short, black "cuddy." His profuse quotations of trite scraps of Latin, usually accompanied by free translations into English with a brogue, added to the bizarre and incongruous effect of his whole appearance.

"Salve!" he exclaimed; "ye're welcome to the castle o' the O'Ballyhans. Non sumus quales eramus; we're not ourselves at all since we left our swate anicstral hall, natale solum, so to spake. But calum non animum mutant; it's the climate, and not the character, they change—"

"Qui trans mare currunt, who come to Castle Garden," said I, finishing his quotation in his own style.

"Dies faustus, creta notandus!" exclaimed the old scapegrace, with a gesture as if he would embrace me; "it's a blessed day it is, an' we'll mark it wid chalk—that is to say, wid something better. Sure, Aggy, me boy, ye won't grudge yer old father a glass to mark the day. Dote obolum Belisario; there's no use translatin' that to ye, ye hard-hearted spalpeen."

The last part of this speech was delivered in an altered tone, caused by a frown and shake of the head from Agamemnon, who at this point turned to leave the room. "Where's mother?" said he.

"In partis inferioribus; it's the back yard I mane, sittin' in the rockin'-chair wid her otium cum dignitate an' a favorite author."

True enough, as Agamemnon opened a door opposite to that by which we had entered, I caught a glimpse of the matron, enjoying the pleasant afternoon air in the manner described. Her rocking-chair was the genuine article, city made, and doubtless hauled, with other household belongings, many a weary mile through one family pilgrimage after another. It bore the scars of age and trouble; but it was still able to rock, though in a somewhat rickety way. Mrs. O'Ballyhan was maintaining this motion by timely application of her toes to the ground, while her eyes were riveted upon a pamphlet, of which I could only see that the cover was yellow. Then the door closed behind Agamemnon, and I was left with the sinful sire.

"It's a foine boy," he began, "but clane spoilt wid consate, an' disrespect o' payrints. Sequitur patrem haud passibus equis—he takes after his father, but he can't kape up; and it irritates him. Non tam Minerva quam Mercurio; it's business he manes, an' not learnin'. But he wasn't born wid a rale jaynius for business, non nascitur fit—faith, that's a nate one, too—an' it's meself 'il show him a thing. Business is it? Negotium? Si negotium queris circumspice. Siste viator! Av' ye're travellin' on business, talk wid the O'Ballyhan."

Here he assumed a significant air, which convinced me that he intended some confidential communication. Suspecting at the same time that the tawdry adornments of Latin quotations and misquotations in his discourse were deliberately affected, I said: "Well, Mr. O'Ballyhan, if you have anything to say about the business on which I am traveling, it is my business to hear you. But we shall save time if we confine ourselves to English."

"Lex loci," said the incorrigible scamp, in a final effort to impose upon me; "it's the custom o' the country. These barbarians, damnati ad metalla, condemned to work in the mines, so to spake, pretend to talk nothin' but English, an' a voile mess they make o' that, too. But facta est alea in mediis res; I'll begin wid the business immitajly, an' it's dumb in the dead languages I'll be to plaze ye, till I have the honor to resave ye in Ballyhan Castle, County Clare, wid me complete edition o' the Auctores Classici ad Usum Delphini in the bookcase behind our two selves, an' the amphora, wid the sugar and the hot wather, on the table afore us."

After all, he seemed to take so much squalid comfort in his Latin, that I was half sorry I had tried to cut it short. But the voice of Agamemnon was heard outside, and the old man had only time to say: "Whisht! I'll mate ye sub rosa—beggin' your pardon—to-night in the little grane-room at the back o' the International Saloon, and tell ye whar's important, if true—an' true it is; an' in the best of English I'll tell it, on the wurd of an Irish jintleman!" The door opened, and Agamemnon ushered in his mother.

[CONCLUDED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

THE HISTORY OF SPRING VALLEY.

An Interesting Statement by Mr. Howard.

Mr. Charles Webb Howard, as President of the Spring Valley Water Company—administering an institution of the value of thirteen and a half millions of money, in stock scattered over the world, a business connected with the supply of so indispensable an article as water, having relations with every family, house, and manufactory in San Francisco.—has done what he ought to have done years ago. He has communicated to the Supervisors, and through them to the people, an intelligent statement of the history, financial condition, management, and general relation of this property to its consumers. It ought to, and we think it will, contribute to a better understanding of the water question. There should be no difficulty in arranging water rates, and in providing for their collection, if the Board of Supervisors and the officers and directors of the Spring Valley Water Company come together in the spirit of fair dealing. The sense of fairness and good faith on the part of the general public demands only what is honest and reasonable. The company is fairly entitled to a fair rate of interest, a fair and reasonable operating and sinking fund. More it ought not to demand. Mr. Schuessler, the engineer, has also presented the Board of Supervisors a paper embodying facts and figures for its consideration.

To the Honorable the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco:

GENTLEMEN: I am glad to avail myself of the opportunity which your open sessions offer, not only to give you full information of the resources of the Spring Valley Water Company, its sources of supply, ability to meet the wants of the city, the value and cost of its works, the income which it receives, and the principle upon which its rates are adjusted; but also to correct many misapprehensions which exist in the public mind with reference to the above matters, and which a thorough investigation of the water question will, I think, largely remove.

The Spring Valley Water Company was incorporated under the laws of 1853 and 1858 with reference to water companies, and was the assignee of the privileges enjoyed by George H. Ensign and his associates, under an act passed April 23, 1858, which authorized George H. Ensign and others (owners of the Spring Valley Water Works) to lay down water-pipes in the City and County of San Francisco.

This act provided that the rates to be charged for water should be fixed by five commissioners, two of whom should be appointed by the Board of Supervisors, two by the water company, and the four to choose a fifth. The act also provided that the rates so established should not be so low as to yield less than twenty per cent. per annum on the cost of the works. It is true that this act was afterward declared unconstitutional, but I refer to its provisions to show what was then considered a reasonable reward to owners of water works for expenditures made and risks incurred in the construction of such works.

This act having been adjudged unconstitutional in 1874, the Spring Valley Company was obliged to look to the General Laws of 1853 and 1858 as the measure of its rights and duties. The law of 1858 also provided that the rates to be charged for water should be determined by a board of commissioners, to be selected, two by the city, two by the water company, and in case of disagreement, the fifth commissioner to be selected by the four. This provision was a fair one, for it left the rates to be fixed by arbitration between the city and the company. No action was taken, either by the city or company, to appoint commissioners until 1877, when a board of commissioners was appointed, as provided by law, which reduced the water rates ten per cent. Their action caused a reduction of the dividends of this company on its capital stock of eight millions, from nine per cent. to eight per cent., and resulted in giving to the company an income barely sufficient to pay its running expenses, the interest on its indebtedness, and dividends to its stockholders, leaving little or nothing for a surplus fund for future improvements, and nothing for a sinking fund to meet its indebtedness.

It was hoped that this action would meet the approval of the community, quiet agitation on the water question, and give the company an opportunity to borrow money at low rates of interest, and thereby enable it to reduce its rates to the consumer. But the subject was too fruitful of agitation, and the result is that by the provisions of the new Constitution the power to fix the reward to be given to this company for the expenditures made and risks incurred in its enterprise has been given absolutely to the very parties interested in making that reward as small as possible, viz: the consumers themselves, through the Board of Supervisors, who are their political representatives. The extent of this power is perhaps little understood. It practically makes the will of the buyer supreme as to the price to be paid. It would be regarded as an anomaly in business life if the man who buys should have the power to fix the price which he is to pay—that the purchaser of iron should have the power to fix arbitrarily its price per pound; that the laborer should furnish his labor and receive only that which his employer is willing to give—in other words, that the price of the commodity, in the one case, and the labor, in the other, should be absolutely in the control of but one party to the transaction, and that party not the one that furnishes the desired commodity or labor, but the one that requires it. Yet this is the extraordinary power vested in your honorable body over the compensation of this company—a power which involves the control of all the other powers of this corporation, which has existed for years, and which has expended millions of dollars in its enterprise; for as this company was formed for gain, the power to limit its income necessarily includes the control of all its other powers, just as the greater includes the less.

The new Constitution puts the rates entirely under the control of the consumers, and the effect of this was, that at the last municipal election each of the three political parties then in the field offered the property of this company to the lowest bidder. By reference to the platforms of the various parties, it will be seen that their representatives were directly or inferentially pledged to a reduction of from twenty-five to twenty per cent. upon the present rates. It would be regarded as a shameful thing to pledge a judge to render a certain judgment. I refrain from comment upon the action of these political parties, which call upon their representatives, who act in this matter judicially, to render a preordained judgment in relation to the value and income of this company, without any knowledge of the facts, the amount of money expended in the enterprise, or the risk incurred.

The Supervisors, then, stand as the representatives, not only of the consumers, but of the city, and they are to determine the income of the Spring Valley Water Works.

If the pledges set out in the political platforms of various parties are to be observed, the net income of this company will be reduced nearly one-half; and the effect on the stock will be a reduction from nearly par to forty or forty-five dollars per share. In a word, by a stroke of the pen, between three and four million dollars of values, held by citizens of this community, will be stricken out.

But I will do more than make a general assertion. I understand that the Republican platform favors a reduction of twenty per cent. on the existing rates. Mr. Stetson has introduced a resolution which is in excess of the demands of either party, and if it prevails, disaster will necessarily follow. The income of the company, for the year ending June 1, 1879, was $1,258,000. This sum was almost entirely expended as follows:

Operating expenses.....	$300,000
Interest on debt of about $4,000,000.....	287,000
Dividend on capital stock, $8,000,000 at 8 per cent. per annum.....	640,000
Total.....	$1,227,000

If the income of the company should be reduced twenty per cent., its total income would be about $1,000,000.

Assuming that the operating expenses and interest during the coming year will be the same as during the last, this sum would be expended as follows:

Operating expenses.....	$300,000
Interest on debt of about $4,000,000.....	287,000
Dividend on capital stock, $8,000,000 at 5 per cent. per annum.....	400,000
Total.....	$987,000

In other words, this would leave almost nothing for future improvements, or for a sinking fund to meet the indebtedness, and would reduce the dividends from eight to five per cent.

The value of the stock would instantly fall from its present value to forty or forty-five dollars per share. Such a sweeping reduction this year would be regarded as a prophecy of a further reduction in the future, and would produce a feeling of great insecurity among stockholders. I call these facts to your attention for the reason that I assume that they were not known when the political platform in question was adopted. I feel assured that you will not deem yourselves bound to do a great and lasting injustice in order to comply with the provision of a platform which was probably inserted as a mere device to catch votes, without any responsibility on the part of those who framed it, and without knowledge upon which to base it. Taking it for granted that you intend to act justly as between this company and the consumers, and that you are not disposed to take away from the company its just dues in order to be liberal to the rate-payers, I will not dwell longer upon this matter. Permit me to add a few words, however, as to the nature and extent of this enterprise, its cost, the income that is required to meet its demands and contemplated improvements.

The Spring Valley Water Company has been in existence for more than twenty years. The moneys expended in the construction and maintenance of its works are far in excess of the sum upon which it at present receives an income. It has not received a dollar of subsidy. No gift whatever has been made to it by the public. It owns, by an absolute title, 18,000 acres of land in connection with its works, and a large amount of real estate in San Francisco, used for reservoirs and other purposes. The property which it holds is vested in it by a fee-simple title, with the exception of a few acres in San Mateo County, which it obtained by judgment in condemnation proceedings.

It is true the right has been given it to lay its pipes in the streets of San Francisco, but this is as much for the benefit of the consumers as the company. It was no exclusive privilege for any other water company has had and could have exercised the same right. It involved the city in no expense, for wherever the water company laid down its pipes it was obliged to repair the streets at its own cost.

Previous to the adoption of the new Constitution, the system of collecting the income of water companies was unequal, under the law, for whilst the larger portion of the outlay was for the purpose of supplying the city with water for protection against fires, cleansing sewers, and watering streets, yet this company was obliged, by its charter, to collect its entire income from the householders and rate-payers only. This has occasioned the controversy between the city and the company, and has been the cause of the excessive rates.

In other cities, the water works are generally owned and controlled by the municipalities, and the income necessary to pay the interest on the indebtedness incurred in the construction and the running expenses, and to form a fund for future improvements, is, in the main, collected by taxes on the general property, and by licenses on general occupations and business. Thus the burden falls very lightly on the rate-payers. Here, however, the whole income of the company has been collected from rate-payers. The fault of the system was in the law itself, yet the public has been impressed with the idea that the excessive rates arose from the extortion of the company.

The Spring Valley Water Company is content with a fair income upon its investment. It has never sought more. It seeks no more now. So long as that income was secure, and the public were contented with the system of distribution of rates, the company had no reason to complain, but when the cry is raised that the rates are excessive, that the Spring Valley Company discriminates as between rate-payers, then it becomes the privilege of the company to call the attention of the public to the real cause of the excessive rates, and to the greatest discrimination and inequality of all, namely, that between the great consumer, the city, on the one side, and the 18,000 rate-payers on the other.

The value of the Spring Valley Water Works can only be ascertained by comparison with the cost of other schemes. As there are no other water works in existence capable of supplying San Francisco, the only mode of determining the value of the Spring Valley Water Works is by ascertaining for what sum an equal supply can be obtained from some other source. This whole matter has been thoroughly investigated by the Water Commissioners, and by the able engineers appointed by them during the last few years; and it is safe to say that no water works can be obtained, or constructed, of a capacity equal to that of the Spring Valley scheme, for a less expenditure than twice its cost. But the objection is made to this mode of computation, that Spring Valley has prevented all competition, by obtaining all the available sources of supply within a reasonable distance of San Francisco. In reply, I would say that the company would have met with deserved criticism had it failed, in the exercise of an intelligent foresight as to the future wants of this city, to have purchased property necessary to its scheme.

It is a singular proposition that all other property in San Francisco should increase in value with the growth of the population, whilst the Spring Valley property is denied any increase whatever. The promoters of this scheme invested their money just as other people in San Francisco did in real estate, upon the faith of a large city being built up on this peninsula. They risked their money upon the enterprise, and had the city failed to develop, as it was once feared it would (during the Fraser River excitement), the property of the company would have been almost valueless. All property is valuable only in connection with the uses to which it is put. A lot may be valueless as a residence and yet valuable for business purposes. A lot which affords accommodations for a wharf may be more valuable than one which immediately adjoins it without any water facilities. So the property of the Spring Valley Company has an increased value in connection with the uses to which it is put. It consists of immense tracts of real estate upon which artificial lakes have been constructed, in which are stored waters collected upon the lands of the company. To say that these lands and artificial lakes have not a value commensurate with the enterprise displayed in their purchase and construction, their adaptability to the end desired, the growth of the city and the future wants of the community, is to strike out all the elements which constitute value in any business community, and to do away with all business-like modes of computing values.

As to the cost of the Spring Valley Water Works, I have to say that it has been estimated by experts and competent book-keepers, and has been fixed at a sum far in excess of the amount upon which the company at present realizes an income.

Permit me to say a few words with reference to the resolutions recently introduced by Mr. Schottler. They contain a recital to the effect that the Spring Valley Water Works were offered to the Water Commissioners for $11,800,000, and conclude with a resolution to the effect that the income of the company should be limited to seven per cent. upon this valuation.

As to the assertion that "Spring Valley Water Works were offered to the Water Commissioners for $11,800,000," I have to say that the lowest offer ever made or authorized by this company was $13,500,000, and no lower valuation has ever been placed by the company on its works.

As to the income, Mr. Schottler doubtless lost view entirely of the operating expenses of the company, for an ordinance passed in accordance with his resolutions would give the company only seven per cent. on $11,800,000, or an income of $826,000 a year. This would not much more than suffice to pay the running expenses of the company and the interest on its indebtedness. But even were operating expenses to the extent of $300,000 a year provided for in the ordinance that income would not be sufficient.

If the principle is to be adopted that this company is to be limited to an income on the cost of its works plus the running expenses, then I have to say that a fair rate of interest upon the cost of the works should not be less than nine per cent. Money is worth what it will bring in the market. The Spring Valley Company is at present paying upon a portion of its indebtedness nine per cent., upon another portion seven per cent., and upon another portion six per cent. The bonds which have been sold bearing six per cent. interest run for a period of twenty-five years from their sale, and were sold at a discount of twelve and one-half per cent. Scattering this over a period of twenty-five years, and bearing in mind the fact that it is paid in advance, makes the real interest on this portion of the indebtedness over seven per cent. per annum. The bondholders have the first mortgage upon the property. Their claims to the extent of $4,000,000 are to be satisfied before the stockholders receive anything. They take, therefore, much less risk, and can afford to let their money at a less rate of interest than the stockholder. It would be the height of injustice to allow the stockholder, who stands all the risk of the enterprise, to receive only a rate of interest equal to that of the bondholder, and I claim that two per cent. advance is only a fair and reasonable allowance.

Let me add here that the agitation of this water question during the past four or five years is producing an injury to the community as well as to the company. The city is interested in the extension of the Spring Valley Water Works to meet its growing wants. In order to make the improvements that have been required, the company has been obliged to borrow money. It recently, with the view of taking up indebtedness about to become due, negotiated its bonds to the extent of $4,000,000, upon which it was obliged to submit to a discount of twelve and one-half per cent. This was due entirely to the feeling of insecurity occasioned by the agitation of the water question. Capitalists were unwilling to loan their money to a corporation whose rates were at any time likely to be regulated to the point of confiscation. The bonds could not be negotiated in San Francisco at all, and were finally put upon the market in New York with the above result.

Agitation makes it difficult for the company to obtain money with which to meet the needed improvements. It increases rates of interest, and subjects the company to loss in many ways. Such loss must eventually fall upon the consumer. For the cost of water to the consumer must increase just in proportion as the extension, improvement, and operation of the water works are made more expensive to the company. If matters were entirely settled between the community and this company, money could be procured for a much less rate of interest, and thus the rates to consumers be gradually diminished.

This agitation produces another injury to the company and to the community, and that is, that it forces the company into comparative inactivity with reference to needed improvements. For instance, the company has gone to great expense in constructing an immense artificial lake, called the "Crystal Springs Reservoir." It is now full, and contains 4,000,000,000 gallons of water. None of the water from this lake is at present used, for the reason that it is not connected with the city by a pipe-line. An expenditure of seven or eight hundred thousand dollars would conduct the water to this city, it would bring into employment a large number of men, and thus, for a comparatively trifling cost, amounting annually to between sixty and seventy thousand dollars, in the way of interest, the supply of the city would be almost doubled.

How can this company be expected to mortgage its property for an additional sum of seven or eight hundred thousand dollars, paying an interest thereon of six per cent. per annum, and submit even then to a discount in advance, which really raises the rate of interest to over seven per cent., when the interest on its investment is in danger of being so regulated that the company will receive less than it pays? What stimulus is there for enterprise, if the company is to receive only that rate of interest which it pays? The stockholders of private corporations do not conduct public works as public benefactors. Their object is to make money; and if they are deprived of profit, all stimulus to exertion falls to the ground.

In conclusion, permit me to say, that it is time that this agitation was ended. It is for the interest of both the company and the community that there should be peace. The company has been obliged, in years past, to oppose many oppressive bills in the Legislature, which looked to an undue regulation and the confiscation of its property. The company owns its lands and property by as absolute a title as can be held, and has been, and is determined to maintain and protect its rights of property as fully as any individual might do under similar circumstances. It is desirous, however, of meeting the community upon some just basis, and is glad of the opportunity now offered to correct, by a public investigation, many misapprehensions which exist in the public mind. All the company asks is a just valuation of its works, the allowance of a fair and reasonable rate of interest thereon—not less than eight or nine per cent.—its operating expenses, and a reasonable rate of interest on moneys expended in the future for construction. If the company is guaranteed just treatment, it will go on with improvements, which are necessary to the future growth of the city; and, as the company will be compelled to expend but a comparatively small sum of money within the next ten years for construction, the increase in the number of consumers, and a more equal apportionment of rates, as between the city and the consumers, will gradually bring about diminished rates to the rate-payer. Yours very respectfully,

CHARLES WEBB HOWARD,
Pres't S. V. W. W.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 25, 1880.

Concerning "Sir George B. Green Bridges, Bart.," the distinguished English visitor who was for some weeks the social sensation of San Francisco, the World made inquiry a little while ago, being desirous of correcting its books of reference, which were as provokingly silent on the subject of this distinguished baronet as they are about a certain Lord Clifford of Lea, who recently married a Nebraska belle. Alarmed by the statistical suggestions of the World, the "society leaders" of San Francisco, it appears, have gone into the business themselves. They find that Sir George B. Green Bridges, Bart., is not a Sir, nor a Bart., nor a George B. Green Bridges, nor even an Englishman, but plain George Green, a music-teacher from Canada. The redeeming feature in the case is that this plebeian pianist did not assume a title, like Lord Clifford of Lea, to delude a credulous young woman, nor yet, like the Lord Gordon who took several hundred thousand dollars out of Jay Gould, to bamboozle a confiding railroad magnate, but merely to get better accommodations at a hotel. He had observed and pondered upon the deference shown by American hotel clerks and waiters to titled Britons, and so had been moved to perfect a plan as effectual as it was both simple and beautiful. But, oh, what ecstasies of rage must possess the mind of the splendid hotel clerk who for weeks past has been veiling his diamond breast-pin with his drooping chin when the Bart. condescended to nod to him, and who, with obsequious accents, has said, "Yes, Sir Jawge," and "No, Sir Jawge," whenever the great man addressed him, to learn that the occupant of the parlor suite was, after all, only a Canuck music-teacher!—New York World.

Why does the Kern County Californian think a journal, otherwise honest and independent, may not be both independent and unpurchased when it expresses opinions differing with it? The railroad questions as presented to the people of Kern County are necessarily somewhat different as interpreted by their application to San Francisco. Let us ask of our usually polite Kern County Californian whether the population and wealth of that county has not increased since the construction of the road; whether it is not now easier to reach, and whether freight and passage are not cheaper? Have not lands advanced in value? Have not the comforts of life increased and the cost diminished? Has not the taxable property of the railroad, and the increased taxable values it has created, contributed largely to the maintenance of its county government? Has the railroad ever cost the citizens of Kern any money? Has the county given it any subsidy? If these questions are answerable, as we suppose they are, may not we who live at the terminal point of this road be at least presumably honest when we think the road is a special and particular benefit to our city and not an evil to any part of the State? If the Kern County editor will change pulpits with us for one week we shall be pleased to sit under his teaching. Try it.

SOCIAL SACRAMENTO.

SACRAMENTO, February 22, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—You've seen those hangers-on of society's skirts; those smarties who stand on street corners, well dressed, with canes, and studs, and "all them things," who make dainty complimentary remarks about ladies passing, and that guffaw like their baboon ancestors; you've seen these kind of people, I suppose? Sacramento has a few of them. They're here to see that the legislators attend to their business properly. Well, I heard one of these missing-links remark the other day: "Say, Johnnie, the five fair female F's—his fling the festive foot to-night; I've got a bid to the feed, in the basement with the hackmen; want to go along?" Now, that mouthing fool had probably studied an hour and a half on the seven "F's," and imagined he had got off something very creditable. And do you suppose these "five fair" ladies can help their good names being banded about the street corners by such would-be gentlemen as these? Not if they had ten fathers and brothers apiece, as big as a house, could they help it! Free country, you know!—free speech, free press, free action, free fools!

The Misses Felter sent us their "R. S. V. P.'s"—and by the way, one sweet little miss, the blonded hair style, says to me: "What does 'R. S. V. P.' mean?" And she's a graduate of boarding-school, and papa is a banker. If we were not so mortally afraid of offending "Paul and Virgie" we'd tell you, for the benefit of some of these sweet graduated innocents, what "R. S. V. P." does mean. This party was a very pleasant affair. It happened last Thursday night, and they had decorated the house so prettily. Church & Jones discoursed their usual sweet strains of Pinafore. (Isn't it queer that people never—no, never—tire of that jingle-jangle? The miniature ship has been here this week, and people flocked to the theatre as if it were the newest thing under the sun!) We don't know which one of the gods it was that bestowed the rare good gift of entertaining upon this Felter family. They do entertain charmingly and perfectly. We think, however, this greedy god was insufferably unfair, and we feel like declaring a divvy with these favored Felters. For at no place in town do we enjoy more perfect evenings than there.

It was entirely a young folk's party—no married martyrs admitted. There were so many pretty faces, dimpling and laughing! We are sure no prettier class of girls exist than are to be found in Sacramento. We'd like to see you show us any one prettier than the Misses Susie —, Nellie —, Alice —, Annie —, Lucy —, Jennie —, Belle —, Florence —, and dozens of others there that night. And it's genuine beauty, too! The most prominent gentleman guest was Senator Baker. They tell us he is the brightest mind in the Senate. He ought to be. He has had every opportunity, has traveled abroad, and had all those advantages that go to make a man smart. I think we would all be illimitable idiots if we could not turn out something fair had we all the opportunity. Wilhelmj sets Sacramento by the ears this week, of which more anon. After which, I guess, Sacramento will be a little quiet, until, perhaps, the young gentleman New York bound returns, and bridal festivities follow.

BETSY AND I.

As far back as the writer of this paragraph—who is growing uncomfortably though picturesquely bald—can remember anything, he can remember Government expeditions and appropriations for the survey of a ship-canal route across some part of Central America. The whole country has had faith always in the practicability and eventual accomplishment of the scheme, but as it was not a faith that could remove mountains without pick, shovel, or blasting powder, nothing has come of it. It is entirely clear that nothing ever would have been likely to come of it if a famous French engineer and his backers, without so much as a preliminary flourish of trumpets, had not, in a business-like way, taken hold of the matter and gone to work without any assistance from any government. Then we began to howl them down; then we began to push—with our tongues—a rival scheme; then we drew forth from our scabbard that dull, rusty, and disreputable blade, "the Monroe doctrine," and brandished it bravely in the eyes of those who were seeking to do for us what we never had had the pluck to do for ourselves. The thing is disgraceful, and we stand in the sight of all civilized nations to-day in the attitude of yapping curs snatching at the heels of our benefactors. We have an army of twenty-five thousand men, a navy that will not float, and a bad cause. This journal had the honor to remark, the other day, that what we need is a good, wholesome licking. We are now inviting it, and will apparently get it.

Speaking of New York's renewed prosperity, as indicated by the advance in real estate values and rents, the Tribune, of that city, says:

"Among purchasers of houses are said to be a number of capitalists from California, who have concluded to transfer themselves and their possessions to a place where the Kearneys and Kallochs of the Pacific Coast can not apply their communistic experiments."

We have not a doubt that this is true; indeed, we know it is true. Capital is going out of this State like sand from a tilted dump-cart, and with every thousand dollars that leaves us goes some working man's hope of wages—some woman's and some child's hope of bread. It is a good game to play for those who like it, but it is the New York bystander who gets the stakes.

The remedy for all the uneasiness that arises from sand-lot and Kallochism rests with the daily press. If the Alta, Call, Bulletin, Chronicle, and Post would for thirty days pay no attention to the agitators, print none of their speeches, give publicity to none of their acts, the agitation would die of its own weight. It would be smothered in its own smoke, and expire for want of ventilation. It is not the three hundred and fifty loafers in procession that terrifies the people who see them—it is the extravagant exaggerations of a sensational press that alarms the people who do not see them.

Making light of the horseshoe—"A mule's head is not as light as his heels."—Edison.

WHAT THEY KNOW ABOUT EVERYTHING.

Oh cursed love of gold! when for thy sake
The fool throws up his interest in both worlds:
First starved in this, then damned in that to come.—Blair.

There's a deal of goodness that the world never sees, as there's a deal of viciousness it never guesses.—Ouida.

A room hung with pictures is a room hung with thoughts.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Death is the privilege of human nature, and life without it were not worth our taking.—Rowe.

Experience wounded is the school where man learns wisdom out of smart.—Lord Brook.

But human bodies are sic fools
For a' their colleges an' schools,
That when nae real ills perplex them,
They make enow themselves to vex them.—Burns.

How sad a sight is human happiness to those whose thoughts can pierce beyond an hour!—Young.

Matrimony is the axis upon which the whole social economy revolves.—Chateaubriand.

Hope is such a bait—it covers any hook.—Ben Jonson.

Extreme love breeds satiety, as well as extreme hatred; and too violent rigor tempts chastity as much as too much license.—Chapman.

'Tis pleasant purchasing our fellow-creatures;
And all are to be sold if you consider
Their passions, and are dextrous.
Most are bought by ready cash—but all have prices,
From crowns to kicks—according to their vices!—Byron.

Whole years of joy glide unperceived away, while sorrow counts the minutes as they pass.—Havard.

Half of the ills within our hearts are ills because we hoard them.—Proctor.

The horn of plenty is ever held fast in the hands of vice.—Ouida.

Some falls are means the happier to rise.—Shakespeare.

Life is arid and terrible; repose is a chimera; reason itself serves only to dry up the heart; there is but one virtue, the eternal sacrifice of self!—Georges Sand.

The highest grade of ecstasy is silence.—Spielhagen.

The effect of religion upon the world has been less to make men love their equals, than to excite the various sects to a hatred against one another.—Countess Guiccioli.

We never speak our deepest feelings,
Our holiest hopes have no revealings.—Mrs. Hale.

So things seem right, no matter what they are.—Churchill.

With fame in just proportions, envy grows,
The man that makes a character, makes foes.—Young.

SACRAMENTO, February 22, 1880. N. B. S.

"There's something about your daughter," said old Mr. Wanhop, who had called to ask her in marriage for his son, "there's something about your daughter—" "Yes," said old Mr. Thistlepod, "there is; I have noticed it myself. It comes every evening about eight o'clock, and it doesn't get away usually till about two. And some of these nights I am going to lift it all the way from the front parlor to the gate, and see what there is in it."

Obscure Intimations.

P. AND V.—The great case of "Paul and Virgie" vs. "Betsy and I" is closed. Prosecution and Defense will please unbend in a quadrangular kiss of peace, pending the decision.

M., San José.—Pardon, but a public journal is not the place for idle compliments to anybody's personal friends. For mere curiosity we should like to know, however, the name of the "distinguished visitor to our State" who said of this young lady: "The strength and originality of her mind and the polished beauty of her language, united to the charms of a bright, sweet face and a perfectly natural, graceful manner, place her favorably beside the celebrated Lady Blessington, the most brilliant conversationalist of her day." We do not question the correctness of the judgment.

CRITICS OF "AJAX."—You all reply: no one answers. If "Ajax" intended to disturb the mental equipoise of the "thinking classes" this office is as yet without evidence of his success. It was hardly worth his while to flutter the doves of sentiment or bait the bears of abuse.

PEDESTRIANS.—Strange that of so many names one could not have been signed to the manuscript.

N., Bodie.—We do not know which is "the best history of California." None, we think, are very good.

MISSUS DORPY.—He is unfortunately dead. Gone to meet "Towler, that's the dog died."

LOOKOUT.—You are not warranted in your conclusions by any facts within our knowledge. So far as we have been able to learn, Archbishop Alemany and all his clergy are on the side of good government and have counseled moderation. The result is that no good Catholic has taken a prominent part in this agitation.

L., Oakland.—If in our notice of the March Californian we were in error in attributing to Mr. James F. Bowman the authorship of the article "On with the Dance!" we are glad to be corrected. But if you know we were in error, you probably know who is the author. By mentioning his name you would have given your correction greater weight. The writer of our notice is not in the confidence of the magazine's editors, but thinks he discerned Mr. Bowman's ear-marks in the article. It is significant that the denial did not come from Mr. Bowman.

CXVIII.—Sunday, February 29.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Soup—Purée of White Beans.
Stewed Terrapin. Hominy.
Larded Sweetbreads, with Green Peas.
Roast Beef. Baked Mashed Potatoes.
Vegetable Salad.
Italian Cream. Wine Jelly.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Pears, Oranges, and Bananas.

TO MAKE A PURÉE OF WHITE BEANS.—Wash a quart of beans, and put them in a stew-pot, with half a pound of salt pork (previously washed, and soaked for an hour), a bunch of parsley, an onion with its roots in it, two leeks, a head of celery, two quarts of water, and a quart of milk. Skim, add salt, pepper, and two ounces of butter; cook for three hours; remove the pork and vegetables, press the beans and milk back into the stew-pot; if too thick, add more milk; if too long, skim again, finish with a little sugar, two small square fried croutons.

ERLKING.

From the German of Goethe.

Who rides so late through the forest wild?
It is the father with his child;
He has the boy well in his arm,
He holds him tight, he keeps him warm.

"My son, why hidest thy face in fear?"
"Seest Erlking not, O father dear?"
"Erlking, my father, with crown and crook?"
"My son, 'tis the mist hanging over the brook."

"Thou lovely child, oh! come with me!
I've many a plaything in store for thee;
My mother has beautiful garments of gold,
By the river grow flowers manifold."

"My father, my father, and dost thou not hear What Erlking whispers in my ear?"
"Be still, keep quiet, dear child of mine;
The whispering winds through the forest whine."

"Wilt thou, little one, go with me?
My beautiful daughters shall wait on thee.
They lead the dance in the forest deep,
And kiss you and sing you and rock you to sleep."

"My father, my father, and seest thou not His daughters there in the dusky spot?"
"My son, my son, thy mind's astray:
The ancient willows look so gray."

"I love thee, thy beauty has captured my heart,
And force I will use, if unwilling thou art."
"Help, father, dear father, he tears me away!
Erlking has hurt me—oh! save me, I pray!"

And fear strikes the father; he travels fast;
In his arms the boy is breathing his last;
He reaches the house in trouble and dread;
In his arms his child was cold and dead.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1880.

Y. E. S. G.

A COUNTRY BOY.

I must have been about ten years old when I made the acquaintance of Mr. Cicero Scoots, principal of the Mount Joy Academy, and the thorn of my boyhood. Of his personal appearance I have but a dim recollection, although, if the numerous monochromatic portraits of him we were in the habit of executing upon our slates could be relied upon as correct, he was indeed a remarkable man, being invariably represented without joints in either his legs or arms, and as the proprietor of a mouth which would have been an ornament to a threshing-machine.

These peculiarities, with the addition of a pair of spectacles and the explanatory inscription, "This is ole Scoots," completed a striking and easily recognizable portrait. Up to this time I had never shown any symptoms of the artistic tendency, and astonished myself by producing a portrait which far surpassed any previous efforts in that direction by simply adding a luxuriant tail to an otherwise orthodox portrait. This evidence of latent genius fell under the quick eye of Mr. Scoots, whose admiration of my artistic effort was so enthusiastic that I sat down with considerable difficulty after receiving his congratulations. My naturally desperate resolution upon this unfortunate termination to my career as an artist was to run away and turn pirate, but after talking the project over with my chum—who rejoiced in the sobriquet of "Coppery Joe"—I reluctantly abandoned the idea in consequence of his refusal to join me, and his threats to "tell on me" if I persisted.

Joe was a good-hearted little fellow, a few months younger than myself, and remarkable for nothing except his good-nature and his nick-name—this latter being acquired by the morbid tendency of "his folks" to flavor their food with strong charges of garlic; in consequence of which Joe always seemed to me to be surrounded by an odoriferous blue cloud. This peculiarity was in some respects a benefit to him, as he could leave his dinner-basket in the most exposed situations without danger of an attack upon it—an immunity possessed by no other boy in the school.

In spite of Joe's little weakness in this respect I was strongly attached to him, and we were associated in several important enterprises. The most important of these was a circus, which held matinees every Saturday in a vacant barn back of his father's home. The private entrance to this place of amusement was over a high board-fence and through a hen-coop. Admission, ten pence. Being rent free, and the performers not very clamorous on the salary question, this enterprise had a long and successful career, although the actors usually outnumbered the spectators. But a brilliant idea of mine finally terminated the existence of the association. This project was to tie my wrists to a rope which we had stretched across the barn, some six feet from the floor, and then to swing around after the style of a gigantic pin-wheel. Something of the sort I had seen at an actual circus, and the thing seemed so easy that I determined to practice it in private, and then astonish the neighborhood by my proficiency. To my surprise, after I had cast myself off the meal-bags upon which I had climbed to tie my wrists to the rope, I sagged heavily, and found the nearest approach I could make to the desired act was a series of painful squirms, which I finally varied by kicking up my heels and howling like a young panther, until Joe's father cut me down, kindly remarking that he wouldn't whip me that time, but that the circus would have to stop.

Joe met me at the end of the lane, and sympathizingly heard the story of my disaster, in which I carefully explained that I had at the very least broken my back-bone in two places, as I could plainly hear the bones grate when I walked. This appalling diagnosis staggered Joe for a few seconds, but, remembering he still had a surplus fish-ball from his lunch, he offered me the odoriferous bolus as being likely to assist in healing the fracture. This unusual prescription must have worked an almost immediate cure, as I was so far recovered as to be able to go for the cows with Joe, a few minutes after having assimilated the compound. Like all powerful drugs, however, it left some disagreeable traces, as I was convinced at supper by my mother saying, after a preliminary sniff, "John, you will have to take up your room again," from which I inferred the "scent of the fish-bone" round me still.

The cows took their meals in what we called "the far about half a mile from the farmhouse, and when we had decided to bob for eels or go sucker-spearing we could make the trip in less than half an hour, but usually it took us about two hours, as, after attending to our musk-rat traps and stoning such frogs as seemed to be in need of our attentions, we took turns in riding "Skagaractacus" home. "Skag" was a young lady cow, of that particular pattern known to us boys as a sharp cow—anatomically, not mentally—being constructed upon the sun-fish principle as to her back-bone, and otherwise apparently modeled after a hat-rack. These disadvantages were balanced, however, by the numerous knobs and projections her scraggy frame offered as holding-on places. "Skag" was quite a fast trotter for a cow, and after having her tail thoroughly twisted a few times, would start off at a four-minute gait of the most complicated description. Unfortunately these bursts of speed rarely extended over a hundred yards, at the end of which she usually ran into a convenient bank, or rubbed us off against the fence; after which she invariably ran away, and we "tossed up" to see who would go back after the other cows, or doctored Joe's sore toe until they came up.

When the long winter closed in upon us, though, country life was quite another thing; and I remember that part of my boyhood as a very disagreeable experience—that is, after I was promoted to the responsible position of first chambermaid of the cow-stables. The light and gentlemanly duties of this situation vexed my spirit sore, and Saturday always brought with it visions of such relief as I imagined a pirate's life might bring. This piratical inclination must have been a natural impulse, as at that time my library was limited to Jayne's Almanac, and a fragment (I think about seven-eighths) of the Three Spaniards. To the best of my recollection, neither of these works was especially devoted to piracy as a profession. But Sunday always brought with it a partial rest, with the more soothing balm of a chicken dinner, as our minister made a point of calling on that day, and this sacrifice was offered in his honor.

But whatever relief the seventh day brought was in a great measure neutralized by the hardships of the following Monday, that being composition day, and one of suffering. Naturally, the boy who could invent any means of escaping from the infliction was regarded as a public benefactor, but old Scoots was thoroughly "up" in all such pieces of strategy, and such transparent excuses as being without paper, etc., only brought swift punishment upon the unfortunate who offered them. Then, too, in addition to the regular flagellation, he would add the terrible penalty of making the culprit write a composition upon the spot—which was something like being required to lift ourselves by our bootstraps.

Joe, through unusual good fortune, had escaped for the first three Mondays of the regular school term, and was valiant enough upon the fourth Monday to claim immunity upon the ground of the total destruction of his entire literary "outfit," through some terrible domestic convulsion. Up to this time no boy had ever been found brave enough to lose more than his paper or his pen, but to lose paper, pen, and ink, and to be completely vacuous as to a subject, was something new, and for a moment we hoped the situation was too much for Mr. Scoots. Joe stood uneasily on one foot, apparently bracing himself by holding on to the solitary suspender which supported his baggy pants, and then, after a sickly smile at me, broke into the customary hansee-like howl we were in the habit of indulging in when upon the verge of a "licking." Whether Mr. Scoots was in an unusually good humor, or the preliminary howls of my chum had decided him not to inflict the extreme penalty of the law, I cannot say. He simply said: "Very well, Master Peiser; you will stay in school until you have written something." Joe meekly answered, "Yeth, thir," and climbed on the high stool in the corner where we usually writhed during such enforced literary efforts. This was just after dinner, or about one o'clock, and he did not finish that composition until half-past four, when school was dismissed.

I think I see him yet, perched on the high stool, composing that essay. If appearances could be trusted, he might have been writing the history of England—when Scoots looked at him—from the scratching he made; but as he did not put his pen in the ink the result was not very startling, and when the old gentleman was not looking Joe had about all he could attend to in dodging spit-balls. His red head seemed to grow more lurid as the long afternoon dragged out its weary length, and even the spit-ball battery ceased firing, from sheer exhaustion. Scoots, too, was evidently becoming impatient, as at rapidly lessening intervals he would galvanize Joe into activity by calling out, "Peiser, haven't you completed that essay yet?"

"Be through in a minute, thir," Joe would promptly answer, and then his inkless pen would almost paralyze us by the rapidity and ease with which it noted down what was apparently the great literary effort of Joe's life.

At last, after he had been in the agonies of composition for over three hours, Mr. Scoots said: "Peiser, just sign your name to that composition, and read it aloud. It certainly ought to be a credit to this academy from the time you have devoted to it."

"All right, thir," promptly answered Joe, scratching down something which looked like the tracks of a pigeon-toed caterpillar.

"Are you ready?" said Mr. Scoots.

"Yeth, thir."

"Very well, then; stand on the platform, and read your essay aloud."

Joe left his stool, mounted the platform, made a kind of scrape with one foot, and jerked his head after the style of a goat about to engage in battle. Then in a perfectly clear voice he said: "Chickenth ith ittle henth," and then stopped short.

"Go on, sir," said Mr. Scoots, sharply.

Joe cleared his throat and repeated:

"Chickenth ith ittle henth."

"Why don't you proceed, sir," said Mr. Scoots.

"Thath all, thir," answered Joe, "cept my name, Joe Peither."

"Have you been three hours collecting this valuable piece of information?" asked Mr. Scoots, gravely.

Joe, elated over his success as an essayist, beamed on Mr. Scoots, and promptly answered, "Yeth, thir."

At which Mr. Scoots groaned, and then said, "School is dismissed."

SANFORD BENNETT.

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1880.

THE OPPOSING SEX.

A discussion has sprung up in regard to the best methods for constructing ladies' riding habits, which seems likely to end in the usual fashion, in the discovery that the fair sex will do pretty much as they please, just as in other matters.

At a leap-year ball in Washington some of the gentlemen wore lace ruffles, and were too sweet for anything. Others, we grieve to say, did not seem to fully understand that the "ladylike" conduct required of them is not the same thing as "ungentlemanly" conduct.

In the cloak-room of a handsome mansion, on the occasion of a party given in honor of a bride, the husband was discovered with his feet on the fender, and in a state of brown study. He had married late in life, and was much older than his wife. When asked if he was "having a good time," he laconically replied, lifting his lack-lustre eyes to the inquirer's face: "Depends upon what you call a good time."

Queen Isabella has given Mrs. Mackay a fan of pearl and lace, regardless of the fact that there are hundreds of pretty American girls who have not half so many fans as Mrs. Mackay.

A Zulu princess named Amazulu has arrived in London, attended by three South African ladies and four men. She wears a kind of coronet, said to be of gold, as a head-dress, and a bodice even lower than the prevailing fashion in English circles authorizes. She has been mobbed in the streets by a ruffianly crowd, whose main object appeared to be to gratify their curiosity, and here this indignity with great composure, thinking it an "ovation."

A beautiful blonde is trying to bring "in" sapphire earrings by having the large single stones set like solitaire diamonds. The heavenly blue is most becoming to her golden hair and fair skin. Besides, it matches her favorite stockings.

There was a young damsel, oh, bless her!
It cost very little to dress her;
She was sweet as a rose
In her every-day clothes,
But she had no young man to caress her.

He who doth not smoke (wrote the late Lord Lytton) hath either known no great griefs or refuseth himself the softest consolation, next to that which comes from heaven. "What, softer than woman?" whispers the young reader. Young reader, woman teases as well as consoles. Woman makes half the sorrows which she boasts the privileges to soothe. Woman consoles us, it is true, while we are young and handsome; when we are old and ugly, woman scolds and snubs us. On the whole, then, woman in this scale, the weed in that; Jupiter, hang out thy balance, and weigh them both; and if you give the preference to woman, all I can say is, the next time Juno ruffles these, O Jupiter! try the weed.

The Cincinnati Gazette asserts that it is favoritism that makes it difficult for a sewing-girl who earns her living by piece-work to get along, and says that the girls who make presents to the forewoman obtain all the good work. Yet Jones informs us that he used to make presents to a forewoman, but never got any sewing to do.

A bride may wear a very plainly made dress at her wedding, but she wants to have it puffed in the papers.

Somehow, the ladies don't seem to grasp the leap-year as they should. They ought to fly around and spend their time and money on the boys, who have to do that sort of thing three years on the stretch. Leap year was designed expressly to give the boys a financial rest, as it were, and they need it, too.

A young woman of DeLand, Ga., was walking through the woods near her father's house, the other day. She held a copy of Longfellow's poems between her clasped hands, and was in a meditating mood. Suddenly a squirrel ran up a tree in front of her. Longfellow went up after the little animal like a bolt, and down dropped he.

It is said that the thirsty souls who attend the dinners of Mrs. Hayes in Washington welcome the Roman punch by the name of "the life-boat."

Queen pink of the feminine pinks in there,
Come out in the garden to me
In the velvet basque silk-lined you wear,
Queen pink and tulip you be;
Bob out little face running over with hair,
And let the hollyhocks see.

A distressing incident recently occurred in London, upon one of the skating ponds of that metropolis. A lady who was renowned for her charming figure, her elegance of dress, and her skill upon skates, was performing, in a Canadian dress, the most graceful feats at her command, when she suddenly stumbled and fell. Before assistance arrived, however, she regained her feet, but unfortunately the point of her skate had torn her stocking, though of the fact she was unaware. As she sped along again, however, a ripple of laughter ran in her wake, for her course was marked by a steady stream of sawdust from the shapely limb to which the wounded stocking belonged.

Maggie Mitchell writes to a Western paper: "I see by your paper, and others in Peoria, that my age is being discussed quite freely. I am in no way ashamed of my age—it is forty-four years." If Maggie don't care how old she is, we certainly do not.

"We old maids," remarked Miss Stebbins, "love cats because we have no husbands, and cats are almost as treacherous as men."

She was really charming, and seemed greatly to enjoy the quail on toast, until her pearly teeth struck a couple of snot; then her countenance changed, and she said: "It's too mean to leave those nasty shot in the birds." "Why," said he, "they are good for digestion." "Yes, that may be, but I don't want to die just that way." And the pun withered the budding charm.

A Higham woman had all her teeth extracted a few weeks ago, preparatory to an artificial set. Since then, a new set commenced growing, and a part are already through. The reader must apply his (or her) moral.

THE GRAVE.

During my walks in a strange place, while in search of new sights as well as exercise, I have frequently passed a grave-yard—the old-fashioned term describes it exactly. There is a difference between this and the city cemetery, with its imposing entrances, its long roads, and when you have reached the abode of the dead, its dazzling monuments and heaven-aspiring shafts, all surrounded by that profusion of the rarest flowers that makes it seem more like a gorgeous, blooming garden of the living than the silent city of the dead.

There is a difference between that and the country grave-yard, enclosed, as this one was, by a rough fence; the entrance a little gate, peculiarly constructed in order to keep out the cows, that wandered all around, with their clanging bells sounding now near and now far away. Inside the gate the rows of neglected graves were not pleasant to look upon, for, instead of being covered with grass, and disguised with starry daisies and lovely pansy faces, until one might almost forget they were graves, they were bare and brown, with sometimes two rough boards to mark head and foot. No monuments were there, except the stately pines that lifted their heads toward heaven, whispering, "The dead sleep here alone." There were no eulogies to tire the eye and disgust the heart. For aught the stranger might know, one tiny grave I noticed might have had for its neighbor the bones of a murderer. Some innocent girl, who went so soon and so unwillingly from out her happy world, might be lying next the woman who waited long for the death she desired to snatch her from her miseries. And over all the pine trees waved and the birds sang, while all around the everlasting hills kept watch, and in the distance the blue mountains, with their white tops, stood like sentinels.

It is a dreary place, and it is not strange that the country people hasten by when compelled to pass it at night. I was passing one evening at dark, and in spite of the old stories that came to my mind, of ghosts and ghouls appearing at such a place and hour, I stopped to look over the fence, and while thinking how weird and strange the place looked in the half moonlight, half twilight, that struggled through its dark trees, I was startled by the opening of the little gate near me, and saw three young girls entering the dismal enclosure. As I watched them, wondering what had given them courage to venture there at such an hour, I noticed for the first time that they carried in their arms rough wreaths, made of such evergreens and hardy flowers as grew around. They stopped beside a grave near the fence, and, unobserved, I saw them carefully arrange their offerings upon the grave, which, from its size, I judged to be of a person near their own age.

"Some companion or school-mate," thought I, "whose young friends remember her, and show their love by these rude decorations." And as they again passed out of the gate and walked away, talking in subdued voices, I fell to wondering and conjecturing about the quiet sleeper who was not disturbed by the flowers upon her breast. Was she a careless, happy girl, snatched away from her pleasures before she had begun to tire of them?—one who went sadly looking back toward the earth she loved, thinking more of the joys left behind than of those beyond? But how far away are her joys of earth now! how stilled are all her heart-beats of pain or pleasure!

But perhaps—and by this time the moon had driven away the last faint light of day, and was shining alone—perhaps she went gladly; perhaps the heart, which is the life, was tired, was broken, was dead; for in spite of the great poet's saying, that "men have died and worms have eaten them—but not for love," there are broken hearts, and for what else do they break except for love? It is well written men have died; the gifted reader of hearts says nothing of women; he knew better.

As I had wandered thus far from the grave, in my thoughts, I went still further, and recalled that beautiful sketch of "The Broken Heart," and though I never cried over it, as a certain weak-minded poet is said to have done, I have often read it, and always believed it. And as I walked away from the place of graves, and looked back to see the now bright moon lighting up the grand old pines, and sending its rays over the desolate graves, I thought: "Are our hearts sad or gay when they cease to beat?"

"Every plan that hath been crossed,
And every hope that hath been lost,
In heaven shall be fulfilled."

If that be true, what a joyful awakening some souls will have.

JACKSON, January 27, 1880.

The Baffled Suicide.

Gentlemen about to commit suicide should acquaint themselves with the history of Mr. Phillips, of Centreville, Wis., and resolve to respect the feelings and rights of other people.

Mr. Phillips was a young man of a very gentle and inoffensive disposition, who always manifested the most delicate consideration for the feelings of others. Some time ago he became warmly attached to a young lady, who failed to return his affection. Not only was she passively obdurate, but she was aggressively unkind. She openly said that Mr. Phillips was "weakerndishwater," and that she could not stand a man who had no sort of spirit about him. Moreover, she denied that he had sufficient ability to earn a living, and as she was an eminently practical young person, she said that no woman with any common sense could think of marrying so valueless a young man. These remarks, together with much other language of a cold, practical, and painful nature, were daily reported by officious friends to Mr. Phillips, who thereupon felt that he was a blighted being, and resolved to die.

It seemed to him, after mature consideration, that to blow out his brains in his bedroom, leaving a reproachful note for the young lady, would be the correct thing for him to do. Accordingly, he bought a pistol, and one evening, after solemnly saying good-bye to his fellow-boarders, went up stairs to write his farewell note. Mrs. Brown, the landlady, noticed his demeanor, and suspected that he intended to commit suicide. She went to his room, and, under pretense of ascertaining if his pillow-case had been changed, led the conversation to the subject of a landlady's feelings and the respect which was due to them. She spoke of a rude and heartless man who had once shot himself in one of her rooms, during her former residence in Chicago. "He spoiled," said the indignant woman, "a whole set of bedding and stained the carpet with blood, so that it was good for nothing. It cost me fifty dollars to repair damages, and I've always said ever since that no boarder as is a gentleman will dream of killing himself in his room and doing damage which he is too mean to pay for." These remarks sank deep into Mr. Phillips's heart, and he felt grateful to Mrs. Brown for having saved him from the commission of an ungentlemanly act.

He next resolved to buy a bottle of poison and to take it in the young lady's parlor, and in her presence. There would be no blood spilled over the furniture, and the young lady could not fail to be touched by the sight of her dying lover. Congratulating himself on having hit on a brilliant idea, he hastened to the druggist's, bought his poison, and called on the young lady. In her presence he made a moving farewell address, and then, drinking a large dose of poison, sat down on the sofa and prepared to die. But it so happened that the young lady's father was a physician, and that she knew the proper antidote for the poison. She ran to her father's medicine case, procured the antidote, and requested Mr. Phillips to take it. "I am sure," she remarked, "that you have acted hastily. You must see that to come and die all over my carpet, and perhaps break the furniture with your rude convulsions, is inconsiderate and ungentlemanly. If you wish to die, I have no objections, but you shall not die here. Drink this antidote, and then go to some bar-room and take the rest of your poison an hour later. No one can object to your killing yourself in a public place, but I am not going to have people dying in my parlor, if I know myself."

Overwhelmed with remorse for his thoughtless want of consideration for the young lady's feelings, Mr. Phillips swallowed the antidote and promised to follow her advice. He walked about the streets for nearly two hours, and then entered the "Sherman saloon" and called for a glass of whisky. He emptied his poison into the whisky and swallowed it, when, to his great surprise, he was seized by the bar-keeper, who wished to know what he meant by coming into a saloon, among a lot of high-toned gentlemen, and insulting them by dying. "We don't allow none of that here," pursued the bar-keeper, "and I'm going to pump you out first and put a head on you afterward." The nearest doctor was sent for, and the stomach-pump was applied with much success, to the great interest of the spectators who crowded the saloon. In consideration of the fact that an impulse had been given to the liquor business by the attractive spectacle of the pumping-out of Mr. Phillips, the bar-keeper refrained from presenting him with a gratuitous and superfluous head, and after abusing him with great wealth of language for his ungentlemanly conduct, turned him into the street.

It was in consequence of these repeated failures that Mr. Phillips came to the conclusion that suicide is ordinarily an ungentlemanly act. No matter whether he should shoot, bang, or poison himself, he would in any event inflict upon other people the burden of disposing of his corpse. He finally made up his mind that to jump overboard at night from an ocean steamer is the only way in which a person with the instincts of a gentleman can kill himself, and he thereupon left Centreville for New York, with the intention of embarking on a Liverpool steamer, and surreptitiously disembarking when about a thousand miles from land.

This narrative, which is true in all its leading features, ought to do a great deal of good. The thoughtlessness, to give it no worse name, of men who have committed suicide has made an immense amount of trouble. To die in another man's house, or to leave one's corpse for other people to take care of, is to take a most unwarrantable liberty, and the example of Mr. Phillips, who is about to drown himself in mid-ocean, should be affectionately commended to all persons who have resolved upon suicide.—N. Y. Times.

The Clergy's Reward—An Epistle.

"In all your gettings, get money." Now, therefore, when you go forth on your ministerial journey, go where there are silver and gold, and where each man will pay according to his measure. For verily I say, you must get your reward. Go you not forth as those that have been sent, "without two coats; without gold or silver or brass in their purses; without scrip for their journeys, or shoes, or staves;" but go you forth in the good things of this world. And when you shall hear of a church that is vacant, and has no one to preach therein, then be that a call to you, and be you mindful of the call, and take you charge of the flock thereof, and of the fleece thereof, even of the golden fleece.

And when you shall have fleeced your flock, and shall know of another call, and if the flock be greater, or rather if the fleece be greater, then greater be also to you the call. Then shall you leave your old flock, and of the new flock shall you take the charge.

Those that have "freely received" let them "freely give," and let not men have your words "without money nor without price," but bargain you for hundreds and bargain for thousands, even for thousands of silver and gold shall you bargain.

And over and above the price for which you have sold your service take you also gifts, and be you mindful to refuse none, saying "Lo, I have enough!" but receive gifts from them that go in chariots, and from them that feed flocks, and from them that earn their morsel by the sweat of their brow. Yes, take you gifts from all, and take them in gold and silver, and in bread, in wine and in oil, in raiment and in fine linen.

And the more that the people give you the more will they honor you; for they shall believe that "in giving to you they are giving to the Lord;" for behold their sight shall be taken from them, and they shall be blind as bats, and "shall know not what they do."

And you shall wax richer and richer, and grow greater and greater, and you shall be lifted up in your own sight, and exalted in the eyes of the multitude, and lucre shall be no longer filthy in your sight. And verily you shall have your reward.

Selected by J. C. P.

PORTLAND, Oregon, December, 1879.

MINOR FAVORITES.

My Rose.

Over my mantel hangs a rose—
Such a great red-hearted and dewy thing
That, though on the wild air drive the snows,
In my room dwells Summer with folded wing.

Some painter painted it in a dream
Of a haunted dill and a spicy night,
His pencil lit by the flying gleam
Of bloom and fragrance and all delight.
—Harriet Prescott Spofford.

Meeting at Midnight.

The gray sea and the long, black land,
And the yellow half-moon, large and low,
And the startled little waves that leap
In fiery ringlets from their sleep,
As I gain the cove with pushing prow,
And quench its speed in the slushy sand.

Then a mile of warm, sea-scented beach,
Three fields to cross, till a farm appears;
A tap at the pane—the quick, sharp scratch
And blue spurt of a lighted match—
And a voice less loud, through its joys and fears,
Than the two hearts beating each to each.
—Robert Browning.

Then.

And when you are old and lonely,
In memory's magic shine
You will see on your thin and wasting hands,
Like gems, these kisses of mine.
And when you muse at evening,
At the sound of some vanished name,
The ghost of my kisses shall touch your lips,
And kindle your heart to flame.
—John Hay.

Plucking Daisies.

On the grass my little love soft lingers,
On the dewy grass,
Plucking daisies with her dimpled fingers,
Smiling as I pass.

Ah! I would I were a simple flower
In her fingers prest,
If but for one brief and bappy hour
Folded to her breast.

Or if from me to the world so mazy
Hies this maiden sweet,
I would still be but a simple daisy
Near her dainty feet.
—Marie S. Ladd.

Fate.

These withered hands are weak,
But they shall do my bidding, though so frail;
These lips are thin and white, but shall not fail
The appointed words to speak.

Thy sneer I can forgive,
Because I know the strength of destiny;
Until my task is done I can not die,
And then I would not live.
—John A. Dorgan.

Seeing Through Tears.

Ah me! look not too fair!
If love could be a story, ending
At our two graves, out in the dark somewhere;
If, dying, I could know myself descending
Forever from myself, no cry
For wings would smite the sky.

No high reproach and fond
That souls and angels were frail human fancies,
That nothing sweet or bitter, was beyond
The Bible saints and their divine romances;
Al! I could feel were this, I fear:
That dust to dust is dear.
—Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt.

Major and Minor.

A bird sang sweet and strong
In the top of the highest tree;
He sang: "I pour out my soul in song
For the summer that soon shall be."

But deep in the shady wood
Another bird sang: "I pour
My soul on the solemn solitude
For the springs that return no more."
—George William Curtis.

A New Year's Greeting.

Come wealth or want, come good or ill,
Let young and old accept their part,
And bow before the sovereign will,
And bear it with an honest heart.
Who misses or who wins the prize,
Go, lose or conquer, as you can;
But if you fall, or if you rise,
Be each, pray God, a gentleman.
—Thackeray.

The Coming.

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting:
The soul that rises with our life's star,
Has had elsewhere its setting
And cometh from afar,
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God who is our home.
—Wordsworth.

To the Desponding.

Take this for granted, once for all—
There is neither chance nor fate,
And to sit and wait for the sky to fall,
Is to wait as the foolish wait.

The laurel longed for you must earn—
It is not of the things men lend;
And though the lesson be hard to learn,
The sooner the better my friend.

That another's head can have your crown
Is a judgment all untrue,
And to drag this man, or the other down,
Will not in the least raise you!
—A. A.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served at 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1880.

The Rev. Mr. Kallloch, by operation of causes both accidental and anomalous, has become the Mayor of San Francisco; hence it is that his utterances become significant, when they would otherwise be unworthy of serious attention. His speech of Saturday night challenges this remark. His assault upon individuals, provoked by personal grievances, his versatile and eloquent blackguardism, we will not stop to discuss, lest it should be presumed that we were not altogether indifferent to such an attack from such a source. With the personal character or individual life of Mr. Kallloch we have no concern; concerning his antecedents, good or bad, we make no inquiry. Whether he be sincere in his religious belief or pure in his private life we are not investigating. It is his official and political career alone that we will willingly be induced to consider.

California has a profound grievance in the presence among us of the Chinese, and in the existence of an international treaty that lies beyond the power of our people lawfully to redress. Chinese are among us by our consent and our invitation. When San Francisco was young and California was sparsely settled—when labor was dear and opportunities for profitable work seemingly inexhaustible—we gave a welcome to Chinese immigration. When California was admitted to the National Union the Chinese were a feature of our parade in celebration of the joyful event. An international treaty, subsequently entered into by the two great powers, granting the Chinese a domicile among us with all the privileges of the most favored European nations, received the popular ratification of our city, expressed in a grand civic banquet to the author of the treaty—a banquet presided over by the Governor of our State and countenanced by the presence of our representative men. No journal, no party, no class gave expression to any dissent. The progress of events in a short time demonstrated that we had made a mistake—that Chinese immigration was an embarrassment to our working people; and they, the first to feel the contact, were the first to express inquietude. The writer of this article was among the first to catch the echo of this complaint; among the first to consider the consequences of this invasion; among the first to proclaim his sympathy with white labor; among the first to devise legislative remedies, and the first to seek for legal redress in the courts; among the first to feel the strong pressure of public indignation against his then unpopular opinions; among the first and stoutest to resist the plea of wealth and incorporated organizations that Chinese were indispensable; among the few that visited Washington to make our complaints known; among the first to write and speak and think for peaceful remedy of what in time came to be regarded by all Californians, men of all classes, parties, and sects, and all white citizens, as a great national evil and a threatening national calamity. It had been a steady, peaceful, triumphal march of public opinion from a small beginning. The hasty expression of a burning thought had so challenged and arrested public attention that a remedy for Chinese immigration had become a national sentiment. In California we had secured the press, the pulpit, the forum; we had stirred to rivalry the two great parties. We had secured the passage of an anti-Chinese immigration law through the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and more recently, as an expression of popular opinion, we had at the ballot-box cast an almost unanimous vote in favor of restraining the importation of Chinese.

During all this time we had maintained order, had kept up the demand for labor, had sustained its prices; our city was progressive and prosperous; real estate values were high, property was in demand, manufactures were increasing; the rates of interest on money had declined, money had become abundant, was flowing to the country, was being expended in reclamation and irrigation of lands, in extending the area of cultivation. A railroad had been built, others were building; steam lines to China, India, and Australia were advancing our commerce and increasing our wealth. The great silver mines were pouring their treasures into our lap; railroad and bonanza kings were rivaling each other in the building of palaces; our population had swelled to three hundred thousand people. While all this was being accomplished, the tide of Chinese immigration had been turned backward, or had been at least arrested.

Then came an almost rainless winter, and with it there came a period of pressure upon a small fraction of our unemployed laborers; out of this came the sand-lot, and out of the sand-lot came Kallloch. An adventurous Irish drayman had the gift to agitate, and toward him gravitated all the discontented, jealous, reckless, unprincipled, and malicious idlers of the State. Demagogues in politics, men of desperate fortunes, men of dull intellects and slow comprehension, crystallized into a political power. The stupidity of Democrats, the cowardice of Republicans, the desire for change, the avarice and jealousy of a vicious press, the murderous hate of a deeply insulted man, the reckless attempt at assassination—all had resulted in the change of a State Constitution and in the election of an unprincipled political adventurer, of empty head and brazen cheek and long tongue, to the mayoralty of our city. He had never preached nor prayed to restrain Chinese immigration. He had raised no hand in favor of labor. He found a ready-made constituency of foreign and native-born discontented people, and, with shrewd bargaining, and the loss of accidental blood, he stumbled into the chair of our municipal magistracy, and is now endeavoring to poise himself upon the top of this combing, angry, anti-Chinese wave. He is endeavoring to so stir popular passion, and so keep alive the fires of this class prejudice, that his short official term may grow into a longer one.

If the Argonaut could be read by other than "snoos" we should counsel the followers of our reverend Mayor to ask themselves what they have accomplished and what they propose. We should ask them to contrast the prosperous era that preceded the sand-lot with that which followed it; to-day with three years ago; the Chinese question then, with reference to a speedy and peaceful settlement by the National Congress, with its condition of to-day. Then labor was abundant, now hard to get; then two dollars was the value of a day's work, now it is one; then property values were high, now they are depressed. Money is difficult to obtain because of want of confidence. New enterprises are arrested, and the blood courses slowly through the veins of our longest established industries. Laboring men were the first to feel this blow; to the mechanics and manufacturers it has been most injurious; to the middle class of traders it has been depressing.

It would be amusing, if it were not a serious trifling with the general welfare, to listen to the farcical suggestions of revolutionary uprising, and the mock sentiment of our incendiary chief magistrate, pretending that he is holding the throttle-valve of this explosive popular engine. We know of but one peaceful means to arrest Chinese immigration; there is none other, and the Mayor of San Francisco knows it full well, and that is through Congress, the law, and the courts. Any other attempted measure will be futile, any other effort will be vain; any further agitation will continue to distress our laboring poor, depress our industries, and arrest our progress. The holding out of the hope of any other relief is dishonest, unmanly, and contemptible. It is either subtle knavery or dense ignorance. If the Mayor is honest in his opinions concerning a possible uprising, and really means that our city shall not be disgraced by riotous proceedings, he is at least prudent. While we are not indifferent to the calamities likely to result from a collision of forces between authority and violence, we are not doubtful of the result, nor do we question the good that would arise from such a collision. We mean, of course, if it must come. But it will not come. We know this people to its very heart, and there is no riot element worth fearing in our city. God, with his bountiful rains giving promise of rich harvests, is beating the sand-lot. The sober second thought, recalling the past grand history of our city, will he felt when the excitement and passion of the hour have passed. Mayor Kallloch will, if ever again he comes before the electors for office, be measured not by his promises, but by his achievements. He is making history for himself and for the city, and out of the three hundred thousand people who compose its population, who own its property, and who are interested in its welfare, a majority of the thinking, earnest, honest ones will not forget the valuable services of those who have done duty in this Chinese controversy, and will not be carried away by the empty declaration of this bran-stuffed figure of reform that the sand-lot has set up for our worship.

Mr. Kallloch is a man of confessed ability; his birth, education, association, and profession make him the natural antagonist of the class with which he is now associating, and the natural friend and ally of the class he is antagonizing. His birth is American, his religion Protestant, his party Republican, his choice to associate with gentlemen, his instinct to uphold the law. Hence, we inquire, how is it that this man has so placed himself at variance with every honest sentiment of his surroundings? The answer is embraced in one word—it is "Demagogism." Over his life hangs a dark shadow. He may have made an honest exertion to rehabilitate himself and restore himself to the position from which he may have accidentally fallen, or from which he may have been unkindly driven. He came to our coast an adventurer, at war with society. He found this agitation, he welcomed it as his opportunity; he embraced it as his only chance for political advancement. Dirty as were the waters, he plunged in. His was the cheap and showy talent that caught the gaping, open-mouthed crowd. He out-bid Kearney; he out-agitated the agitator; he out-blarneyed him with his own countrymen; he out-played him with his own shillalah in the contest of political single-stick. Kallloch gets office, and leaves the drayman in the cold. Kallloch hates the Catholic, despises the Irish, contemns the mob, and down in his boots laughs at the poor fools who are the victims of his political manœuvring, and on whose necks he has planted his foot as the first step to further advancement. Kallloch knows that he is playing with fire—making promises that he dares not endeavor to keep; knows that any violence is his destruction, any émute his ruin. He knows that all his suggestions of a conflict are dreams, the awaking from which would be to him and his followers a calamity. He knows that any overt act brings him first in conflict with the police, next the people, next the State authority, and lastly the power of the Federal Government; and that a victory over any one of these would be to him a barren and fruitless one. He knows that this new Constitution has been a boomerang to his party. He knows that it has so tied the hands of municipal and State legislation that no debts can be created, no employment in aid of working men can be legally furnished. He knows that it has driven sixty millions of wealth from the State; that it has arrested street improvements in San Francisco, by reason of which thousands of laborers are turned out of employment. He knows that the provision to prevent corporations from employing Chinese is unconstitutional, or if not, that it practically makes certain industries unprofitable, by means of which white men must be discharged.

There is in this city a great, intelligent labor class, a class owning in the aggregate a large property. It is anchored here by every tie of family and interest. It can not get away; it must live and toil and die here. This class is reflective and honest. It may be temporarily imposed upon by this reverend artful dodger; but it will begin to think, and when it does, all the flippant rhetoric, all the eloquent blackguardism, and all the ingenious sophistries of this political mountebank and prestidigitator will be canvassed and considered. These thoughtful men and their wives and their grown-up children will take counsel together, and ask themselves: What advantage has all this party business been to us? what good are we reaping from this new Constitution? what benefit from this much promising Mayor? They will contrast the olden and the better time with this. They will ask whether the peaceful and legal solution of the labor problem is not better than violence, bloodshed, arson, riot, and a great future municipal debt to burden them and their children. They will consider whether the law does not promise a more speedy and peaceful solution of the Chinese problem than to declare as a nuisance a territory which embraces the Catholic Cathedral and Portsmouth Square; and it is not improbable that this intelligent, property-holding, and law-abiding element may hold in grateful contrast the unselfish efforts of old friends with the questionable practices of this ambitious political demagogue who is but a late comer among us.

The selection of Cincionati is a significant triumph over Tilden, in favor of Thurman. Mr. Thurman would be a strong Democratic candidate, and, in event of Grant's nomination, will give the General and his Republican party friends a very warm contest.

We are not at all apprehensive of trouble in San Francisco. We are mortified beyond expression that half a thousand tramping idiots should have been able to alarm our citizens. We are impatient at the existence of so serious a condition of things in the presence of so simple, speedy, and efficacious a remedy as exists. If Messrs. Fitch, MacCrellish, Pickering, De Young, and Colonel Jackson will abstain from printing any speeches, or the account of any incendiary utterances, the speeches and utterances will not be made. Leave the sand-lot to the police to watch, call off the reporters, and the whole agitation will end in thirty days and never again be heard of.

The New York Republican Convention has, by a vote of 217 to 180, expressed its preference for the candidacy of General Grant, Senator Conkling occupying a seat in the Convention, and leading his forces. Of this Convention, more than two-thirds of the Grant delegates were the direct result of official manipulation—the machine. The unthoughtful sentiment of the non-office-seeking element was overwhelmingly for Blaine. We are still of the opinion that General Grant will not be nominated at Chicago.

AFTERMATH.

Colonel Bee, in his open letter to Doctor Meares of the Health Office, makes it appear—till answered—that the Doctor is not altogether consistent, trustworthy, sensible, or honest; that he has misrepresented the condition of the Chinese quarter; that a law of his own, giving him absolute power to remedy the evils of which he complains, has remained unenforced; that he has removed Mr. Coe, an American deputy, to give the place to a relative of the alien Wellock, under pressure of the preacher Kalloch. And, by the way, this is a good time to remark that Kearney seems clean-handed so far as concerns asking for office or pitchforking his relatives into official positions. The Colonel also charges that Doctor Meares and his colleagues ended up their official labors at a Chinese restaurant, where they partook of Chinese delicacies prepared by leprous fingers, smoked Chinese cigars, and had a good time as guests of these moon-eyed barbarians, listening, doubtless, to the fiddle and the tom-tom, touched by the delicate fingers of the almond-eyed Asian maid. It won't do, gentlemen of the Health Board: anti-Chinese demagogues should be made of sterner stuff.

We commend to Senator Traylor and his associates in the Senate a very careful analysis of Mr. McClure's proposed charter. It looks to us very much as though some of the best of the Horace Hawes limitations of power and checks upon expenditure had been carefully eliminated from the proposed law. The community will look to Senators Baker, Hittell, Neumann, Dickinson, and other lawyers of good standing, that no accidents happen to this charter. They do not need to be reminded that Mr. McClure is more of a politician than a lawyer. Let the Republican majority in the Legislature remember that they are responsible for this and all other measures of a political character, and that the best policy of the party—we borrow the language of Brother Pickering—is that which is for the best interest of the people.

During the last week we have received from Mr. J. C. Duncan a very pathetic letter, saying that he had been placed in a cell seven-by-ten feet, with six other persons, and that he could neither sleep nor eat by reason of foul air and foul smells. The writer called on Sheriff Desmond with reference to this condition of things; the Sheriff treated him with great frankness, and admitted that it was true as stated by Mr. Duncan, but averred that it was not the Sheriff's fault; that Mr. Duncan was treated as were others in similar condition; that the jail was overcrowded. We are not in sympathy with the association of depositors who demand the punishment of Duncan before he is convicted of crime; our law presumes innocence till the accused is found guilty. But whether Mr. Duncan be innocent or guilty, it is inhuman and cruel that seven men should be thus incarcerated. Duncan's bail is excessive; it ought to be reduced, and would be if courts did not stand in awe of the sand-lot. Duncan has had two trials, juries disagreeing. It demands something of moral and physical bravery to-day to be just and humane in San Francisco.

"No"? Why not, an 't please you?
The sooner the better, I say.
Let it come, if it must, to-morrow;
Let it come, if it will, to-day.

"Out-vote us, and can out-fight us?"
Who uttered the cowardly lie?
We have man for man, and you know it,
And who is afraid to die?

Are you? Is your brother? Who is, then?
Who is a debtor to death—
That frees the world of his presence,
And purges the air of his breath.

For the bitter disgrace of dying
With back to the charging foe
Is better than living the craven life
Of the coward whom all men know.

But you are no coward; why start then
At the menace which lights the night
Like a tinge of fire on the edge of a cloud,
And means "surrender or fight"?

"Surrender!" "To hell" with surrender—
Fling back to them words they know,
And answer each alien's menace
With the logic that follows the blow.

The newly appointed Turnkey of the State Prison has stabbed himself. Delirium, they say, but we think not; he probably had not the heart to contemplate himself in the act of turning his keys upon mere felons while the sand-lot gang roam unmolested by the law. We should feel that way about it ourselves; and if respect for official tradition did not permit us to resign, should either commit suicide or pay some broken-hearted lover or disappointed candidate to commit it in our stead.

"To dare, and again to dare, and always to dare!" cried brawny Danton. To blow, and again to brag, and always to bluster, is the motto of pigmy Denis. And all the faithful flock to the standard of this red-faced witling—and we stand by and let them offend our nostrils as they will. "This sea-green incorruptible!" said Carlyle of Robespierre. "This red-mouthed mutton-head!" say we of Kearney. But the French craven, who hid in the cellars while the mob swept Paris like a whirlwind, helped drag half the intellect of France to the guillotine before his own head lay in the wastebasket. And the Irish-American coward, who has been flung from platforms, cowed in the streets, kicked in the ante-chambers, snubbed from the rostrum, no end, is in a fair way to push his reckless following to the worst excesses to which ignorance and malice and organized lust for power can make men go. Perhaps, when the reckless, blinded fools before whom Kearney raves and to whom Kalloch preaches, shall have actually carried into execution some of the threats which their leaders have taught them to utter, we shall seek out this rat Kearney from some one of his myriad hiding-places and spit him like a pinned roach to the nearest wall—as we ought to have done eighteen months ago.

He was a disciple of Kearney,
His raiment was sad to behold;
He was fresh from the Land of Blarney,
And new to the Land of Gold.

He had a most famished expression,
With never a hat to his head,
When a "workmen's" procession
Came by, demanding bread.

They carried a banner emblazoned—
On each side a threat and a prayer;
The wrongs that the rich had occasioned
Were freely recorded there.

This statesman had never been troublin'
His head with readin' and such;
Thy University, Dublin,
Had never instructed him much.

He picked up and flung then a drown-ded
Cat in their faces, hurrahin':
"Down wid aristocrats! Down wid
Their purple and linen toine!"

The following society personals are out of the Call: Mr. Swivelneck Hellyeller, the eminent statesman, will go East as soon as he gets ready. Mr. John Smith is out of town. Mr. John Smith is in town. There was a party last week on Slinker Street. Vere ish dot barty now? Captain Slosbucker, U. S. A., is at the Haasch House. Miss Sweetie Gumchu is quite a belle at Jackous Gappe, and sets all hearts ablaze. The Rev. Doctor Whackbible sailed yesterday for Fresno County. Mr. Cribcrac Fakewipe is still confined to his room. Cards of invitation are out for a hanging in San Luis Smith. The hero of the occasion is to be selected by ballot. A sad accident befel Mr. Jared Ginswiler's liver-and-white slut last week. It was a thoroughly enjoyable occasion. The untimely death of Mrs. Jemima Bladeface was an elegantly appointed affair. Dancing was indulged in. On Wednesday last the funereal obsequies of Joel James Grypes, Jr., came off at Laurel Hill. Great credit is due to the undertaker. The coffin was real wood. Lenten gayeties don't eventuate much.

Upon the authority of the Chinese Consulate, it is stated that there were only twenty-two thousand five hundred Chinamen in the City and County of San Francisco, embracing fishermen and vegetable gardeners, at the time of the last enumeration. That since then two thousand have left. From the same source we learn that many Chinese are going East, and more are returning to China than are coming. The Chinese problem is in process of speedy and peaceful solution; all that is demanded is patience.

So long as General Grant's candidacy seemed to rest with the people we used our best exertion to mould public opinion against him. Now that it has got out of the domain of public opinion, and got within the manipulation of machine politics, we feel ourselves powerless to influence a result. If Don Cameron, Roscoe Conkling, Senator Logan, and the class they represent, desire the nomination of General Grant, they can secure it. His election rests with the people.

About the cheekiest suggestion comes from the Atlantic and Pacific Railway Company. Its road is as yet some fifteen hundred miles from San Francisco. It telegraphs our Chamber of Commerce that if our city will give it a donation of land for terminal facilities and right of way, it "will consider whether the road will come here or not." This proposition exceeds, for its glacial coolness, any we have ever had presented to us. We advise our Chamber of Commerce to let the road terminate at Milpitas, or San Andreas, or Downieville, or some other of our great commercial rivals.

Forty-odd thousand Russ nobles and peasantry
All carried off by the dreadful Diptheria!
Soldiers will carry the rest all off presently,
Burying them in the mines of Siberia.
All Russian subjects are listed as Nihilists—
Death can alone get them off of the trial-lists.

The condemnation of Chinatown as a nuisance Mr. Pickering, of the Call, considers "one of the most important events that ever occurred on this coast." We might be disposed to dispute this, but when Mr. Pickering fortifies his estimate by relating how the condemnation enabled him to sell a large additional number of Calls, the ready "tain't so" expires upon the pen, and its melancholy remains flow off upon the astonished paper in lines of unprofessional assent.

The new Constitution requires that before becoming a law every bill introduced in the Legislature shall be read at length six times, three times in each House. Owing to this freezing-order provision—for a majority of all members elected are required to "sit it out" and vote—of four hundred and eleven bills introduced during the first fifty days, only sixty-nine have gone through the Senate and fifty-five through the Assembly. Of these but four have actually become laws. And now hasty legislation will perhaps receive another wholesome check by the admission to a seat in the Senate of Citizen Robert Daillebout d'Estimauville de Beau Mouchel—which will interminably prolong the daily roll-call.

Father Larkin, a Catholic clergyman, says "that he hopes those who prefer to act in opposition to the constituted authority and get up a street parade on St. Patrick's day may not be interfered with, and if Mr. Gilmore and his followers desire to make monkeys of themselves they should be granted that privilege." We demand to know if monkeys have no rights which this class of parading Patricks are bound to respect?

Dr. Meares, the Health Officer, says: "It becomes my imperative duty as executive officer of the Board to carry into effect the order they have promulgated." Considering the manner in which Dr. Meares has preferred to "carry into effect" the laws and ordinances, to his neglect to enforce which for the last few years the present condition of Chinatown is due, it seems pertinent to ask what are his ideas with regard to his "imperative duty," generally. Dr. Meares has had, all along, the same duty and authority he has now. He seems to us willfully to have shirked the one and failed to exercise the other. The order of the Board has not strengthened his hands, but it will have done some good if it change his heart.

The Call proves that this is a community blessed with a knowledge of, and sympathy with, artistic excellence by saying of Mr. Henrj Ketten, the pianist, that, "apart from his artistic triumphs, his social success has been almost unprecedented." Almost, but not quite: "Sir George" Brjdgges shone with a social lustre to which the radiance of Mr. Ketten was as the sickly glimmer of a dead fish by moonlight to the fierce and insufferable effulgence of a new tin pan with a southern exposure. But perhaps even the success of "Sir George" was due to his "artistic excellence;" certainly he carried the art of lying to a richer and riper development than it had ever reached before.

True grace in lying comes from art—not chance,
As those glide smoothest who have learned to dance.

The Board of Supervisors is clothed with judicial power to arbitrate between seller and purchaser the value of water. No jurist in a civil case has any higher obligation of impartiality. The Supervisor that permits the interest of his constituency to influence his judgment to fix a rate that will not compensate the company, or the Supervisor that aids to fix too high a rate, will act unjustly. It will be both good morals and good politics to do as nearly right as possible.

Said he: "I will sit if elected,
Although I have never perfected
My papers." But when the committee
Decided he never should sit, he Made certain remarks that were testy—
This Robert Daillebout d'Estimauville de Beau Mouchel.

Some Canadian dilettanti in political economy have organized a club to agitate, by means of pamphlet and lyceum essay, for Canadian independence of the crown. If the people of Canada have half the sense they are credited with, they will cling to the crown as long as it will permit their clinging. Better to endure the ills of low-necked dress and vice-regal fol-de-rol than fly to the evils of sand-lot-ism, and all the other dirty isms that free republicanism knows too well of.

Over at San Rafael the other evening a member of a young ladies' club hit upon a particularly happy subject for discussion: "Is a young unmarried female justified in taking a drive with a young man to whom she is not engaged?" Many contradictory and angry opinions were evolved in this debate, when an interesting spinster brought all doubts to a focus by inquiring: "How is a girl to get engaged?" Silence and general gloom followed this outburst of engaging candor, and the members of the club, saddened and subdued, meekly withdrew to their respective homes.

Says George Francis Train, writing to a New York paper: If three hundred thousand Irish were actually starving, as he stated two weeks ago, why did not Bennett cable his one-hundred-thousand-dollar donation and remain in Ireland to distribute it, instead of holding to Tunis? With nine hundred vessels seeking cargoes in port, why keep two hundred thousand dollars locked up in the Herald treasury? How long can starvation wait before it dies?

And yet they say that George Francis Train is demented, because he feeds the sparrows all day in Union Square.

Sourly the sand-lotter screeches its screeed,
Rampant of riot and greswome of greed.
Say, little Dennis, pray what does it need?

"Gold we wud have, wid no moolin' nor toilin';
Grub we wud h'ave, an' no broilin' nor soilin';
An' whisky galore—for that we are spoilin'."

A poddy pup, intelligently nourished, will take on increase of beauty and utility. Grant's mana judicious cultivation, have made his boom a boome

MEMORIES OF EASTERN SCHOOL-DAYS.

Once more I see that troop of little girls
With shining hair, all innocent of curls,
Imprisoned close in little silken nets,
Barefooted, and with calico pantalets,
All wending schoolwards on the summer's day—
Now stopping to pick berries by the way—
Now standing all a-row, with glances shy,
To "make their manners" to the passer-by!

The school-ma'am sits there as of old she did—
Her watch ticks loudly, in her bosom hid,
As to the little pupil at her knee
She points the letters out, from A to Z,
With that sharp penknife which she always had
To cut off children's ears when they were bad.

Once more through open windows comes the tone
Of murmuring bees—the harvest-bug's long drone—
The hammer's sound comes from the distant shop—
The swallows twitter in the chimney-top,
And children read, with many a drowsy nod,
That "No man may put off the law of God."

What house could hold that crew of boisterous boys
Whose sex and presence were made known by noise,
As of a winter morning they rushed in,
With caps of fur and dinner-pails of tin,
With trousers legs tied down with bits of twine,
With rosy cheeks that evermore did shine
With health's own lustre; with the melting tracks
Of snow-balls sticking still upon their backs,
And stood, in coats that their own mothers wove,
To thaw their aching fingers at the stove?

There stands the youngster, with a quivering lip,
Who was the "snapper" when they "snapped the whip,"
And whose short length end over end did go
And stuck head-foremost in a drift of snow.
Here stand the big boys, who for morning's play
Have taken a run a good half-mile away
And slid down hill—there was no "coasting" then—
And drawn their sleds with patience back again.

Soon order came; each racked his little pate
O'er dire subtractions on his tiny slate,
And learned that maxim, dear to many men,
"When you are short, you always borrow ten."

Some playful wight, perchance, was doomed to sit
Between two girls, as retribution fit
For his great crimes; and so he learned e'en then
The truth that comes in time to all young men—
"Tis more than twice as hard for Adam's son
To sit with two girls as to sit with one!"

NORMAN C. PERKINS.

A Few Things as "Some of Us" Would Have Them.

It may be (says a writer in Progress) that you have never thought about it, but if you should you will realize the fact that in every one's world there is a small coterie of social and congenial spirits who call themselves "some of us." These would like to reform the world, and in their mad efforts to do so, they plunge about hopelessly from year to year, trying one little scheme after another, until finally they can only indulge in serious dreams of what they would do if they could; bewail the perversity of human nature generally, yet run in the very rut themselves for which they profess such wholesome horror. I have often wondered if every member of society belonged to a "some of us" club, and considered himself in striking though favorable contrast with other people, or whether it has only been my good or bad fortune, as the case may be, to have come in contact with just such individuals. At any rate we must all acknowledge that it is the way of one-half the world to find fault with the other half, and our "some of us" club is no different in this respect from other opinionated cliques, and as I am not bound to secrecy, you shall have the privilege of learning some of the secrets of our prison-house. Please remember they are mostly ambitious aspirations, some of them might be termed monomanias—all, indeed, but the visionary imaginings of an Arcadia yet to come. Like the precautionary card in several of our well-known magazines, I disclaim all responsibility for the opinions of contributors. Rather a cowardly piece of business maybe, but in these days of continual innovations it is safer to think one's own thoughts and allow others the risk of expressing them.

They say it takes all kinds of people to make a world, and I suppose it does, but I never could see the wisdom of this indiscriminate mixing of the kinds; "the line must be drawn somewhere," as Dickens's barber said when he shaved the coal-heaver and declined to shave the sloopman. What I mean, however, is not that any one class should look down upon another, only that as a class they should be more distinctive. Milk is good and water is refreshing, but we spoil both the milk and the water when we mix them; so when wise men marry foolish virgins, and splendid women marry stupid dolts because they may be rich perchance, what happiness can be expected from such unions? Like the mixing of milk and water, they are joined forever, only to be separated by the total destruction of either. And the wise men tire of their foolish wives, brighter minds beguile their leisure hours, broader souls capture their vacant hearts, and here commences the curse of society. No one is to be blamed for it; we are none of us saints—only a life struggle indeed prevents us all from being wretched sinners. Why can it not be that the best husbands should have the best wives, and the worst men have the worst women? Then one family at least would be supremely happy, instead of two eking out a miserable existence. Concentrated happiness is the one boon we all long for, and who would not rather crowd into a few hours his ideal content than drone through years of commonplace humdrum days, changeless in routine and void of all beauty? Why can we not have beautiful roses without thorns? The thistles could carry more thorns; they do not know the softness of down.

Another Utopian idea of ours is, the total extermination of jealous husbands and pouting wives; of women who condemn each other; of men who fight against "equal rights"; of moneyed kings with soulless bodies; of wretched poverty with brainless heads. In short, we aim at the semblance of perfection. Things set at half and half give to the many an imperfect life, whereas "some of us" might be supremely happy if the order of division were revised. Philosophers decide, eyes to see, ears to hear, and senses to feel, we are bound to feed these hungry appetites. We do not ask that the stupid people of the world should become greater or less in number, or that the choicest spirits should be obliged to temper them; only that each should reign over his own kingdom, and stay there.

So does one dream, and fancy, and almost hope for what universal nature seems to deny. The law of attraction does not ask for reasons, particularly with youth and youth. Maturity of thought and the lessening of that attraction may bring a wiser judgment; only, alas, too late! The "some of us" club to which we owe allegiance—for we are all more or less members, either consciously or unconsciously—may expel one who gives us such truant thoughts; so I must be careful; but common sense will assert itself sometimes, and I suppose it is wiser for us, when we are told that "what can not be cured must be endured," to sift that sensible warning, and see if out of such muddy consolations a few golden seeds may not be sown, from which better results may be expected. We do not throw away a dull axe, but grind it; or a dull mirror, but polish it; or neglect a worthless soil, but enrich it. With comatose husbands and insipid wives, who would require the immolation of long lives to realize the true harmony of congeniality, the trial might in the end succeed; but I would fain whisper (to our coterie only) would it pay? After all, "some of us" are right. Let us pick out, as far as we can, the pearls from the dross, and make as much melody out of discord as the law allows.

The Humor of the Damboy.

To-day I sat in a car-seat on the Lake Shore Road, behind a pale, care-worn lady who was taking a little boy from Cleveland to Ashtabula. As the little boy was of a very inquiring mind, and as everything seemed to attract his attention, I could not help listening to some of his questions.

After remaining quiet a moment, little Freddy broke out:

"Where do stars come from, auntie?"

"I don't know; nobody knows."

"Did the moon lay 'em?"

"Yes, I guess so," replied the wicked lady.

"Can the moon lay eggs, too?"

"I suppose so. Don't bother me!"

A short silence, when Freddy broke out again:

"Fanny Mason says oxen is a owl, auntie; is they?"

"Oh, perhaps so!"

"I think a whale could lay eggs—don't you, auntie?"

"Oh, yes—I guess so!" said the shameless woman.

"Did you ever see a whale on his nest?"

"Oh, I guess so!"

"Where?"

"Oh, I don't know! Do keep still, Freddy!" And the lady gave a sigh and looked out of the window.

A moment afterward Freddy looked out of the window and saw a man milking a cow.

"What is he doing to the cow, auntie?"

"Milking her, dear."

"Where do they put the milk in, auntie?"

"Oh! in her mouth!"

"Did you ever see them put the milk in, auntie?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Where?"

"I mean no. Freddy, you must be quiet—I'm getting crazy!"

"What makes you crazy, auntie?"

"Oh, dear! you ask so many questions."

The little boy seemed to be puzzled and thoughtful a moment; but soon his curiosity got the better of him, and, as the cars passed a pasture in which were a sheep and a lamb, he asked:

"Where do the lambs come from, auntie?"

"Oh! The old sheep has them."

"Can little boys have lambs?"

"Certainly. I'll let you have a lamb, Freddy, when you get home."

"Will it hurt me, auntie?"

"O Freddy, do stop. You ask such foolish questions."

"Did you ever have a lamb, auntie?"

"Freddy, stop! Don't you speak again for half an hour!"

Then the poor, worn-out woman sighed and leaned her aching head on the back of the forward seat, while Freddy busied himself placing his mouth against the window, and soliloquized in a sing-song tone:

"Mary had a little lamb! Sheep had a little lamb! Auntie had a little lamb!"

The lady pointed her finger sharply at the little boy, as if she was going to stick it through him. If she had been a wicked man she would have sworn; and still, notwithstanding we have eight million little boys like Freddy in the United States, each one causing more or less profanity, the Y. M. C. A.'s throughout the country denounce Herod as a biased man, when he ordered all the children killed except his own.

ELI PERKINS.

Mr. Minot Judson Savage, a Boston Unitarian minister, had instructed his little girl with the idea that a portion of God was perceptible in everything that was noble and beautiful. The child, as children do, had got this idea very ingeniously fitted into her own mind ready for application at a moment's warning. One day, as the door-bell rang, she presented herself in the hall just in season to receive one of Dr. Bartol's benignant smiles, and to fully observe that gracious, benignant figure. Immediately she sped to her father with this exclamation: "Oh, papa! papa! The whole of God has come now!" Dr. Bartol declared that he had never been so flattered in his life.

The English legation residence (says the Capital) is the most perfect in its plan of any in the city; not one detail has been sacrificed for another; the location has become the most desirable in town, the highest, coolest, the healthiest, and it must indeed be a triumph to Senator Stewart that his predictions about the situation are more than fulfilled. When he built his castle, wisecracks sneered, and tauntingly named it "Stewart's Folly;" but now on every side is the march of improvement, elegant houses have sprung up, and each day adds one more to the picturesque homes.

Somebody has called Mr. Charles Dudley Warner "Irving's Successor." This he may safely do; Irving is dead.

CURRENT COMMENT.

The young Archduchess of Austria took over the Pyrenees, to marry Alfonso of Spain, twelve dozen of the most lovely chemises ever seen. This reminds some one that the royal annals of France record that the wife of King Charles VII. was the only woman of her day who had more than two at a time of these minor garments of linen. The batiste pocket-handkerchief went over the Pyrenees in piles. And here again one is reminded that at the splendid fêtes given at Warsaw by the King of Poland, in 1785, not a member of the very highest family could boast of the possession of a single pocket-handkerchief.

Visitors to this country are greatly surprised at the long period during which people wear mourning and remain in seclusion. The custom must be purely American, for it does not obtain elsewhere. In England, a widow or widower may, with perfect propriety, divest themselves of mourning attire at the end of twelve months, although, in most cases, they retain it in some degree a while longer. Mourning is worn for parents for one year, but changed to lighter mourning after six months, and the same as regards the mourning of parents for children. Except in the case of widows and widowers, it is not deemed at all obligatory to abstain from society for more than six months, although in the case of parents who have lost children it would be unusual to go to large entertainments before the expiration of a year. Where a parent has died well stricken in years, and quite in the ordinary course of nature, it would excite no remark were the children to go to quiet dinner-parties after three months. A two-years' mourning and seclusion would, in such case, be deemed affectation. Mourning is here carried to such lengths that some people really pass a large part of their lives in weeping and seclusion, the death of a father, mother, and sister or brother, making an aggregate of five years. It is a question whether we are not carrying the thing too far. Life was surely not made to be spent in permanent seclusion on account of bereavement, more especially for those who, in the ordinary course of nature, must predecease us. Thousands of persons would gladly cut short their mourning but for the tyranny of fashion, which arbitrarily rules in this as in so much besides.—New York Times.

A recent novelty for weddings is French in its origin. Small, velvet-clad boys, as pages, follow in the bride's wake, arrange her train, open the carriage door, and offer the scent-bottle at the critical moment. A certain drilling, similar to that given to altar-boys in churches, is required for these arduous duties; but it is feared that the custom, however pretty, may lead to celibacy. A child of tender years, initiated thus early into the mysteries of weddings, identified with a part of importance equal to that of the chief performer, but of far greater cheerfulness, would never of his own free will consent to an exchange of roles, and his well-known experience in such matters would effectually preclude the possibility of converting him into an unwilling victim. In lieu of the traditional bouquet, baskets of white flowers mingled with ivy and holly have been carried by the bridesmaids at some of the noted weddings in England.

The following is from the Terre Haute Saturday Evening Mail:

"She neither sins nor forgives." This is from Henry Esmond, and contains a bit of philosophy worth noting. There are cold natures, that feel not the force of temptations that overcome others, and such are the severest in their judgment concerning those who do sin, and in their dealings with them. The man to whom liquor is so repulsive that he can not taste it is often the fiercest in his denunciation of those who give way. He may give himself to every other vicious indulgence, but with the drinker he has no patience. The woman whose education and surroundings and temperament preclude all appeals of passion is the severest judge of a fallen sister.

'Ye high, exalted, virtuous dames,
Tied up in goodly laces,
Before ye gibe poor Frailty names
Suppose a change o' cases.'

"The generous one—generous because he is too careless to take care of his money—is the one who has the least patience with a stingy man; and the stingy man has the least patience with the spendthrift. Each never sins in the way the other does, and never forgives. It is well for people of cold virtue to remember that there are temptations of which they know little or nothing, and to temper their judgment and dealings with those who err by this memory. Burns gives the advice in better form:

'Then gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler sister woman,
Though they may gang a kennin' wrang,
To step aside is human;
One point must still be greatly dark,
The moving why they do it;
And just as lamely can you mark
How far perhaps they rue it.

'What's done we partly may compute,
But know not what's resisted.'

There is no reason (says the Hour) why Miss X., whose purple nose and lachrymose eyes tell of the miseries belonging only to a cold, should stay away from Mrs. Z's ball, and strive to console herself with Nana and the camphor bottle. Catching cold is an expression of voluntary weakness, and the shivering and sneezing, incident to a commencing cold, are but efforts of the nervous system to shake off the impending disorder. The Lancet says that if we make a strong volitional effort to resist the early bad feelings, we may repel the enemy. Surely this is a hint that should not be sneezed at.

One of the novel customs prevailing among the Apache Indians is the rigid maintenance of a system of non-intercourse between a husband and his mother-in-law. Except in very extreme cases they are never to see or speak to each other, and when by chance they involuntarily approach the same spot, it is the duty of one or both to change front and move off in an opposite direction.

A THEATRICAL SUGGESTION FOR CHARITY.

In the past quarter of a century the American stage, lyric and dramatic, has undergone radical changes. We used to depend upon foreign supply for our Italian singers; now we export the article. Our actors must have the "accent and the gait of Christians," or they meet with little favor. The morale of the stage has improved. That abomination, the "third tier," once a prominent feature even of the aristocratic Park Theatre of New York, is practically abolished. Actors have now a different social status. They stand upon their individual merits, and the profession does not ostracise. Much of this recognition of their rights is due to the action of the "little church around the corner."

What more could be done for the advancement of the art—the writer humbly suggests—might be effected by a new charity. Let some millionaire invest in a grand Shakspearean temple, whereof the appointments should be of the best, and the company such as Edwin Booth, himself a life-long manager, should be empowered to procure, for the proper casting of the legitimate drama. Under such auspices fancy the play of Hamlet, with every character fully represented—"Marcellus," "Bernardo," "Francisco," adequately supporting "Horatio" in the first act, the keynote of the tragedy. Would not such a charitable enterprise pay? Would it not be an attraction to the whole world?

In the management of a theatrical enterprise like this the "star" system would find no favor; there would be no one man or woman to monopolize; nor would any talented actor be tempted, for lucre's sake, to waste his energies upon a single character, and absolutely merge in it his whole being. This is what Sothern and Jefferson have done—and to the injury of the best interests of the drama. Thirty years ago, Sothern was one of the most fascinating of light comedians—a more thorough stage gentleman I never saw, Charles Mathews not excepted. At the same time Jefferson was the best representative of the "down-easter." It was in the play of the American Cousin that he acted the Yankee so well as to make him the feature of the piece. Afterwards, Sothern remodeled the play, creating "Lord Dundreary;" Jefferson resolved himself into "Rip Van Winkle," and these two accomplished and versatile actors were lost to the world—outside of "Rip" and "Dundreary." Who of our rich men will come forward to make this dream possible?

JOHN MURRAY.

BERKELEY, Cal., February 20, 1880.

The Fascinating Woman.

The Home Journal sketches her as follows: "The fascinating woman is, as a rule, heartless, but she has a thousand pretty ways. She is very good-tempered, and always intensely feminine; winsome in manner, having an unstudied grace, exquisite in little things, and skilled in all the trifles of conversation and conduct. She is always absolutely natural, yet the longer you linger by her side the stronger grows the sense that you do not understand her. She puzzles, enchants, throws a glamour over you, and the wilder grows the wish to comprehend and win her; still she ever eludes and perplexes you. Hers is an endless variety of moods, a chameleon-like power of changeableness. She may be very quiet, but in the repose of her manner there is no apathy; it is the calm of concentration, the magnetic stillness of the serpent that draws, but does not pursue, its victim. The calm is sometimes broken by unexpected brusqueries, by bright raillery that does not hurt; or the delightful reticence of her demeanor may be suddenly exchanged for a confidential mood, a gentle familiarity. She is selfish, and from this selfish soil springs a host of tantalizing ways. She always lets you feel you are near, or it is possible, but you are never successful enough to know you have at last grasped her. The pursuit is endless; she beckons, but you can never seize her. "The fascinating woman may not talk much; she seldom gives birth to jeux d'esprit; her sayings are seldom on record; but what she says is suggestive or original. She can amuse and interest with materials that in other hands would be crude and bald, but which thrown into her alembic come out bright and delightful. She turns dry leaves into pearls and gold. She is a sort of Circe, without, perhaps, the palace. Cleopatra, as painted by Shakspeare, had the gift of fascination—gorgeous, capricious, jealous, selfish, clinging, secret, yet confiding. She wound her nets about the strong man who, had he understood her aright, must have cast her aside in scorn as a toy. The glamour of fascination blinded him. Mary Queen of Scots was the beau-ideal, the type of the fascinating woman. None, probably, had greater attractive powers, delighted more in putting them forth, and was more heartily indifferent to the fate of her victims. Of her personal charms it is difficult to judge critically. The portraits we have give anything but a lofty idea of her beauty; perhaps this is due in part to there having been no superlative artist to paint her. About forty portraits of her were brought together at South Kensington some years back, all widely varying, but none in any degree beautiful. Her fascinations must have lain in her consummate tact, her wit, and the glamour which she knew how to throw about her."

Society and Dress.

In all other cities, the stranger, if a "proper person," is kindly called upon and welcomed. In Washington, she must tie on her bonnet at once, and proceed with her card to the ladies who stand above her on the official ladder. No matter who her grandfather was, or if her attic at home be stuffed with ancestral relics from the Mayflower; the blood of the Knickerbockers may turn to phlegm in her veins; the lovely brune of Pocahontas may tinge her cheeks; the pride of the Randolphs dilate her plumage: all the same, she must take her card and proceed to call on "Mrs. Secretary" Smithers, who had no ancestors, but runs rampant in her vernacular. Otherwise, the lady with a pedigree can never enter the Cabinet circle. By etiquette, the wife of the President never calls upon any one; though Mrs. Hayes sometimes, of evenings, quietly finds her way to the houses of her friends. The families of Senators always call first on the families of the Judges of the Supreme Court; both make the first call on the members of the families of the Diplomatic Corps; while the wives of Representatives must pay the first call on all above them (officially), up to the wife of the President. The only social precedence the member's wife can claim is that every "new member's wife" must call first upon her. Many a member's wife leaves a delightful home and a circle of cherished friends, to come and spend her first Congressional season, alone and lonely, in a Washington boarding-house.

Now that silk kerchiefs are growing rather common for neckwear, the thrifty woman begins planning ways to utilize them when they become cheap, and she says to herself that she will make a table-cover of four of them. This does not mean, as the benighted salesman of whom she buys them will suppose, that she will stitch four of them into a big square, like a bit of plain patchwork. She will use one for the centre, and cut two into halves to make a border, and use the fourth to fill up the corners, and the result will be one of the prettiest of covers, provided she chooses her kerchiefs judiciously.

Embroidery in artistic designs is seen on some of the richest imported dresses. The front of the entire dress is the objective point usually for elaborate needlework, but sometimes there are two long straight pieces wrought in such a way that they may be used for panels on the sides, for scarfs, sashes, a tablier, or as borders. This work is so costly it can never become common, hence it is the first choice as trimming with wealthy women.

The magnificence of color and rich effects, which have distinguished handsome dress fabrics thus far during the present season, continue to be a prominent feature; and while new varieties are not offered, standard ones, such as satins, silks, damasks, brocades, velvets, and the like, have, perhaps, never before been of more elegant design than at the present time.

Ladies who have for amusement painted plates, tiles, and everything, in short, save sign-boards, may now ornament the long kid gloves for evening wear with wreaths of flowers of any design of equal appropriateness. When gloves cease to offer a field boundless as their talents, a similar adornment of shoes may open to them an alluring vista in the way of occupation.

Our girls' private parlors are coming to be perfect museums of trophies. Favors for the german, cards for Christmas and Easter, valentines, and birth-day cards are scattered about or arranged conspicuously everywhere, with perhaps an archery prize or two, an alpenstock, or a whip coaxed from some Tallyho driver, and even their work-bags are little satin drums, that once were sugar-plum boxes. The old rule of not receiving gifts from gentlemen has been modified into something like this formula: Thou shalt not take large gifts, but small gifts thou shalt extort in some way.

Now Cardinal McCloskey has his costumes described in the newspapers. His Christmas vestments were of white satin and gold, and cost ten thousand dollars.

The Origin of Short Whist.

As to the origin of short whist the authorities are not agreed. According to Clay (who says he had the story from Mr. Hoare, of Bath, one of the party), "Lord Peterborough having one night lost a large sum of money, the friends with whom he was playing proposed to make the game five points instead of ten, in order to give the loser a chance, at a quicker game, of recovering his loss." According to "Major A.": "This revolution was occasioned by a worthy Welsh baronet preferring his lobster for supper hot. Four first-rate whist players—consequently four great men—adjourned from the House of Commons to Brookes's, and proposed a rubber while the cook was busy. 'The lobster must be hot,' said the baronet. 'A rubber may last an hour,' said another, 'and the lobster be cold again or spoiled before we have finished.' 'It is too long,' said a third. 'Let us cut it shorter,' said a fourth. Carried nem. con. Down they sat, and found it very lively to win or lose so much quicker. Besides furnishing conversation at supper, the thing was new—they were legislators, and had a fine opportunity to exercise their calling."

Whichever of these versions be true, the game certainly owed its creation to an accident, but nevertheless it would infallibly have been discovered before long, even if Lord Peterborough had not had a run of luck against him, or a Welsh baronet had not preferred his lobster hot. The game was attracting a great deal of attention and high stakes were the rule, and the tendency under such conditions is toward the quickest possible decision of the contest. But more than this—as the rapid progress of short whist showed—the old game was too long. Until the players got within sight of ten and "playing to the score" began, long whist was apt to be slow, and concentration of attention was not so necessary. It was a good family game, but not the thing required by a gambler or a fine player who played whist for the sake of playing whist. At some very near time the innovation would have been made by a consensus of players in some particular club or circle, if some one had not been forced upon it by accident. "The truth is," says Hayward, "the new game is the better of the two as requiring more sustained attention, more rapidity of conception, more dash, more elan, and giving more scope to genius than the old. It is the Napoleonic strategy of tactics against the Austrian."

When (says the Capital) Mrs. Sprague tendered Mrs. Conkling a dinner party, and Mrs. C. gracefully accepted, we had proof of what angels women are—under certain circumstances. It converted us to an advocacy of the extension of suffrage to the gentler sex. If two ladies can thus put the political machine of New York again in healthy working order, what a potent element would be the female mind in the political arena. But then again, all women are not Spragues and Conklings. We can hope, however, to educate the sex to that high standard.

French history in the past hundred years exhibits three women who have experienced more splendor and more bitter grief and mortification than any other three women in the world—Marie Antoinette, Josephine, and Eugénie.

LA CRÈME DES CHRONIQUES.

The kind uncle has taken his young nephew with him to the theatre, having secured seats in the orchestra stalls.

"Do not lean over the balustrade so recklessly," says the good old gentleman, "or the first thing you know you'll tumble into one of the orchestra chairs, and I'll be charged three francs extra."

A French statesman and littérateur having granted an hour and a half to an interviewer, the gentleman of the press said at the conclusion of his visit: "Thank you for your courtesy, and may I call again to see you?"

"Certainly; I shall be pleased to have you."

"Thanks, and oh, would you mind leaving word that if you are not at home I may go through your library in case I want to verify any statement from your books or papers?"

"Wh—why, of course—no, I'll do better than that: I'll have a latch-key made for you, only when you have to come at night make as little noise as possible, so as to avoid waking any one!"

At the last opera ball. A young man du meilleur monde is seated in a corner, and does not appear much more amused than does the domino who accompanies him. A boisterous brawler of gigantic height begins to poke fun at the ennuied couple.

"Go away, you bother me," said the gentleman, "you are tipsy—go and mind your own business."

"Topsy!" screamed the brawler, "go to grass, dandy! You would not dare to say that to me in the street!"

A crowd gathered around.

"See here," said the young man, without moving, "you are pretty tall, you believe yourself mighty strong. Very well; there is one thing you can't do!"

"What! I'll bet you a hundred francs!"

The young man drew off his boot, then a silk stocking, and rested a white foot on the marble.

At this unexpected action the brawler became furiously red, and then tried to escape in the crowd.

"Pig!" thundered the young man du meilleur monde, "you have dirty feet!"

And the brawler disappeared, followed by derisive laughter.

In Bourgogne there is a small commune whose curé is adored by his parishioners. On New Year's day they agreed among themselves to delight him with a magnificent present—a barrel of wine. One of them furnished the barrel, then each parishioner was to go to the cellar of the curé and turn into the barrel the very best bottle of wine produced from his vineyard.

Several days later, being a fête, the good curé invited fifteen or twenty of his parishioners to dine with him and taste of the famous wine of so many vineyards. The guests being all at table, the old servant of the curé descended to the cellar.

Five minutes later she entered the room, pale, terrified, with a bottle of water in her hand.

"Eh bien! what is the matter? Why have you that bottle of water?"

"Monsieur le curé, it is the barrel of wine!"

General stupefaction.

The good curé marveled, for it was the miracle of the supper at Cana over again—reversed. As to the guests, they looked at each other and laughed feebly. It seems that each had had the same idea; only nobody had dreamed that his idea would be also his neighbor's.

Before the judge:

"I confess that I scratched my wife's eyes, but I had gloves on!"

At the dinner parties of Madame X. one meets many literary dyspeptics. Said Madame X. the other day to a new servant:

"You must always have on the table Seltzer water and Apollinaris water. And be sure there is also some pure water, for there is one friend of my husband who has excessively vulgar tastes."

At the shop where returning hunters buy their game, a sportsman is offered a bird of a snowy region.

"What!" says the sportsman, "nobody will believe I have killed a Siberian bird in the Forest of Fontainebleau."

"Why not! Those Siberian birds fly very fast in these days of railways."

The donkey of a peasant died. The peasant, inconsolable at losing such a faithful servant, took an idea into his head of burying the donkey with honor. As he was lowering it into the grave a Calvinist passed.

"What!" said the latter, "a man so pious as you, bury one of your family without prayers, without tolling the bell?"

"Ah, monsieur," responded the peasant, "he was a Protestant!"

Monsieur X. recounts an accident that has befallen him.

"I fell into the mud up to here," and he shows his ankles. "Well, that's not a serious mishap."

"No, only that I fell in head first!"

At the last footmen's ball two valets talked together between the quadrilles.

"Then you are no longer with your vicomte?"

"No. I was a long time undecided. It was not that his service was hard, but his cigars did not suit my taste!"

A French "obscure intimation:"

One of our subscribers demands of us how he must comport himself to take the Lions of the Desert.

Nothing is more facile, truly.

The Desert composes himself of the Sand and of the Lions.

Take with you a sieve, through the meshes of which will sift the Desert. The Sands will evade them. Lions will remain, which you will then deposit in a place which you will have primarily provided yourself.

Rather a neat test of the quality, and at the same time measure of the force of Miss Morris's "Clairon," in The Soul of an Actress, may be got by answering the question: What other actresses do we know who also could have saved the play? Miss Morris did more than merely save the play—she held the audiences to sit it out. What other actresses are we prepared to name who also could have held the same audiences to see it out? It will easily appear that this question admits of only a doubtful answer. And then it must be granted that, while the "Clairon" itself may have been neither a gracious nor pleasing thing, the handcraft that went to the moulding of it was singularly deft and capable. For all that Miss Morris was adequately supported, it was still she who carried the play. It would take long to detail all the artifice by aid of which that feat was brought within powers merely finite. The resources of her art were, however, so adjusted and tempered by the lady's excellent sense, that the utmost was probably made out of the part, and thus the prime quality of this performance was its judiciousness.

The same thing can not be said of her dressing for the first act in the costume of "Pbedre." She is understood as having been brought from the theatre by her admirers, but this costume superfluously suggests that she has been rapt from off the stage without having an opportunity of visiting her dressing-room. The more substantial objection is, however, that the dress does not become Miss Morris. Her support was really very creditable. They all had impossibilities to achieve, and wrestled with them right valiantly. Mr. Max Freeman made of "Walewski" a success that requires mention. Mr. Morrison, as a malign ecclesiastic of courtly address ("De Moncreiff"), gleamed with all his teeth, and spun his webs about the victim flies with expressionable fingers. Mr. Morrison is always strong as the agreeable fiend.

The temptation is naturally strong to lay violent hands on the writer of this play and rend him: to scatter his fragments upon the blast of criticism, and cry, "Aba! behold the puny playwright! bow his substance is sbredded by the Intellectual Athlete which quaffeth his gore!" But the truth is, there are in The Soul of an Actress the elements of a real play; its structure gives proofs of faculty—none the less sure for that they are overlaid by 'prentice-work of a very artless sort, for in its last analysis the play is essentially dramatic. Most bad plays—i. e., most original plays by living authors who write in English—are not. This play develops itself; it tells its own story—we have not to listen to the recital of it; its progress is one of growth from within; hence it is of the quick, not of the dead. The dialogue is piteous and pitiful, but dialogue is no more than the technique of the playwright's art, and is compassable by mere practice. A writer who should set himself doggedly to do stageable dialogue—if only for practice's sake—would usually be surprised to discover the control over it he will have obtained in a few months. The element of mere trick is a large one—in the same sense that much stage business is trick. By itself, the trick is naught—yet it is the main stock in trade of the professional playwright who "adapts from the French," as it is of some of the other professionals who appear in his adaptation; but to the dramatist a skilful command of this same technique is no less essential than his stage business is to the actor. These remarks would lack apposite-ness were The Soul of an Actress a piece of mere puppet-play, but there are signs of life in the hantling—albeit imperfectly articulate as yet, and babbling. The Baldwin has upholstered the piece regally, and the people dress it in keeping.

Some illustration of the above principles of play-building is furnished by The Crushed Tragedian—which, in its earlier form a bit of mere dramatic brick-laying, is now stuccoed into a five-storied temple to the Genius of Farce. And the force of fun can hardly farther go. Indeed, as a piece of sustained farce, it is perhaps unique. The wit of its dialogue may be of a sort neither rich nor rare, but we are not granted pause to try its quality. The surging tide of Fun bears us helplessly upon its roaring crests—for the wit of its situations is supreme. Anything else as droll as Mr. Sothern, as comic as Mr. Sothern, as grotesque as Mr. Sothern, it is hard to fancy. The pure farce of the performance is tempered by some humor that falls to the part of the old prompter (excellently done by Mr. Blakely)—for Humor bath ever in the eyes of it a pathetic look, and in its voice an over-tone of appeal. "De Lacy Fitzaltamont" had been meant to have a share of the same; but it would be incongruous with the wildly ridiculous aspects now developed by that Crushed One, and Mr. Sothern is quite right in suppressing any attempt to make us cry with him between the gusts and storms of laughter that sweep our rocking souls.

Mr. Sothern's make-up as "Fitzaltamont" is a triumph of caricature; and so of his play—it is caricature of infinite variety and fancy, comparable with Cruikshank's work or Cham's, yet avoiding the monstroid grotesque of Cumberland. It is not delicate, like Doyle's, or as "Rip Van Winkle" is delicate: the exigencies of the part as it now stands would not admit the finer touches of that kind of work, and of which Mr. Sothern shows elsewhere a sufficient mastery. To some of his admirers, it has appeared that in "Fitzaltamont" he steps down on a lower plane of art, and debases it. This notion would only be valid if it were true that Mr. Sothern lowered the grade of his performance to that of the plane performed on. But it is not true.

Something of the same kind has been said of that wonderful performance, Mr. Edwin Booth's "Rigoletto" (we fail to recall the "Fool's" name in that play). The notion is a mistaken one. Dignity of subject does not of itself exalt the quality of art, nor does sordidness of subject degrade it. The result may be more pleasing in the one case, and less so in the other—or even positively offensive; but this result has no bearing as a test of the powers engaged in producing it. Beggars and hoors have been the subjects of some of art's most masterful achievements. The parallel is here not very close with Mr. Sothern's "Fitzaltamont," but that performance falls under the same principle, and is to be assayed by the same tests. It will then appear to be masterly in its way, and not least so because, with all its erratic eccentricity, it is not allowed to skip beyond due bounds of caricature.

On the whole, his "Fitz" is a real tour de force, an achievement, a feat. Single scenes or single acts equally ludicrous all may have witnessed, but the like riotous frolic sustained through five acts, and unflagging at any point, will be hard to match. The end only, the last few lines on which the curtain falls, are out of taste and bad. The farce part had really played itself out a few lines back—preceding the half-dozen phrases in which the small love story of the play tells itself out—and Mr. Sothern should let it end there. The subsequent obtrusion of "Mr. Fitzaltamont" is resented. Mr. Lamh's "Captain Racket" was very finished. "Captain Racket" is deaf, and Mr. Lamh looked deaf. Mr. Sothern makes his characteristic and diverting little speeches before the curtain, and we laugh and tip a sign to the memory of poor Dan Setchell. Mr. Sothern completely fills the Bush Street Theatre each night. His engagement proves an effulgent one.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

The termination of the Wilhelmj season—taking it for granted, as I suppose we may, that after the third positively last concert the season has at last come to an end—leads naturally to some inquiry as to the advantage derived from the visits of mere virtuosi by a community of the musical status of this one in which we live, and inclines me to feel more strongly than ever that we should in the end be largely the gainers, musically, if we could be spared the somewhat expensive, and most utterly valueless, distinction. Counted in the rubric of amusements as a mere sensation, virtuosi (of the Wilhelmj order at least) are very well; from the managerial standpoint they have the value of drawing stars—and their influence at the box-office. That, however, is where they properly belong; musically they have no influence or value whatever. They do no good; they come to us, not as artists, but in their capacity of speculators; they come for what they can make; in the case of Mr. Wilhelmj, for what he could get out of us with the least trouble. They have—naturally, as speculators, but not at all creditably as artists—no interest in our musical development or advancement; so long as we have good critics—i. e., critics who fully appreciate and sufficiently praise them—and a large enough paying public; so long as we will give them good houses for their habitual répertoire and plenty of applause for their tours de force, we are a "delightful" and "appreciative public." They give us plenty of pleasant words and make our hearts glad by permitting us some little of that familiar social intercourse with a celebrity of whom we may say afterward, "When Wilhelmj dined with me," or "That nice little story that Wilhelmj told me." They come, play, carry off our dollars, and leave us—what?

In the case of Mr. Wilhelmj, scarcely anything whatever. If we consider his calihre as a violinist, and the quality of Mr. Vogrich as a pianist, the season has been particularly barren of musical results; he has (with a miserable accompaniment) given us one—and portions of two other—new Concertos, and two or three minor novelties with piano-forte. In the direction of ensemble music there has been no effort whatever; the few things at the German Hospital concert can not be estimated, since they had all been frequently played here before, and quite as well as they were then given. He brought with him, for a long season, a pianist who certainly has admirable qualities as a musician and artist, and who accompanies beautifully, but who has no répertoire to speak of, and who, after he had played his two or three Liszt Fantaisies, one Sonata of Beethoven, and two concerto movements, had to fall back on things which were evidently very much out of practice, and a singer who is—as far as any artistic quality is concerned—simply no singer at all, but only a woman with a voice.

With this support, and an orchestra that varied between a scrub hand and a farce, Mr. Wilhelmj gave us nine or ten concerts in which the printed programmes were rarely a guide to what was performed, and in which he rode his few parade pieces until they had literally not a leg left under them, so that even the boys in the gallery began to know that the response to the first encore was to be the Air of Bach, and to the second a Nocturne of Chopin. Outside of the mere virtuosodom there was, as I said before, really nothing at all. Wieniawski, when here, played a larger and more varied répertoire; he gave some ensemble music, and when he had a band it was generally a good one. Madame Urso, on her last visit, let us bear two Sonatas of Beethoven and one of Mozart, besides the Concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn with a full orchestra. Mr. Ketten, who is still with us, has in his recitals made our audience acquainted with a number of new things, and varied his programmes constantly, so that they were at once interesting and instructive. And this, if anything, is the useful work that virtuosi can do for us; if they can not instruct us, if they can not help us to know and be interested in more music than we have known before, they are simply so much of the "amusement" of the hour—they count with the saltimbanks and other shows.

I have said that we should be better off without the traveling virtuoso who comes merely to make money out of us. I am convinced that this is so. Our local pianists, chamber concerts, orchestra performances (even if they are not of the best), and the kind of work done by such clubs as the Loring, Kelleher, and other singing societies, all serve the cause of music in their way, and do something for its advancement; the show people do nothing. Nothing, at least, compared with the cost of them, and the false, unhealthy excitement they produce in the musical atmosphere. There is no growth for us in a Paganini Concerto or a Caprice with a marvelous hit of piano-forte dexterity in it; nor shall we ever be any the happier for no end of repetitions of the Otello Fantaisie or Liszt's Wedding March, no matter how well soever they may be played for us. But out of real music—out of the work of the masters and music-makers—we can get something of permanent value, if we will but listen to it; and out of it, too, we can learn to care for something better and higher than the mere display of technique and agility by one who has nothing else to offer. WEIL.

A Den of Wild Beasts.

A lady who has traveled all over the world writes the following brief but graphic description of the "workingmen's" mass meeting last Saturday evening, at Union Hall.

"At half-past six o'clock I took my place on the outside of the crowd assembled at the hall. The number of people then waiting would probably have filled the hall. Rapidly the throng increased; the tramway was blockaded, and the street cars stopped. Expecting the door to open momentarily, I strove to be indifferent to my surroundings, and was unconscious of the magnitude of the cordon that was drawing around me like a boa constrictor. A dense phalanx of people closed in on every side. Soon came the cry, 'Open the door!' and the vast multitude surged backward and forward in fruitless attempts to burst it in. Men smoked offensive tobacco, and the air was tainted with the fumes of beer and garlic. To endure the suffocation and crowding was impossible; to extricate myself from the living ocean that overwhelmed and crushed me seemed equally impossible. The door at last being opened, the scene that followed baffles description. The wall that went up from that great stream of human life that rushed with impetuous speed up the broad stairways was so unlike human voices that I was reminded, by way of comparison, of the great slaughter-house at Cincinnati, where one pig after another goes in at one door with a squeal, and in twenty minutes is passed out at another as salted pork, harreled and ready for shipment. I advanced to view the ground over which the multitude had poured; I went up stairs. The scene opened with a song—'Castles in the Air.' Prolonged and uproarious cheering then announced that the lion of the evening was on the platform. The great multitude then hung in rapt admiration on the words that fell from the lips of their demi-god. They were told what should be done with the 'Chinese dogs,' and how a scaffold should be erected on the sand-lots for De Young. Then followed a rabid and violent attack upon the Argonaut.

"Long will my memory revert to the scene at Union Hall. I have seen much of the world, but was never before in such a crowd as that. I was at the funeral of James Fisk, Jr., when the crowd broke in the door of the New York Opera House; I have been at the Crystal Palace, near London, in the midst of sixty thousand people; I have stood by St. Paul's Cathedral when the great procession passed on Lord Mayor's day, and the police were said to be powerless over the London populace; but there was no such crowding as there was at Union Hall; I was in Paris at the time of the siege; I was at the International Exposition at Vienna; was at Venice when the Emperor of Austria visited the King of Italy, and was in the crowd that pushed by the guards into the dining-room where the table was set for the imperial guests; I was at Delhi at the time of the Imperial Assemblage, where there were one million people, one hundred thousand soldiers, one hundred native kings and their retinues, and one thousand elephants; I was at Melbourne in time of the spring races, and at Lima in time of war, revolutions, and earthquakes; but from nothing has my mind ever so recoiled as from the idea of being crushed in the crowd at Union Hall. Rather let me, as I have been, be a captive of the wild Arabs on the plains of Basban—men as fierce as leopards and as fleet as gazelles."

Messrs. Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York, publish a neat little volume entitled Camp and Cabin, by Professor Rossiter W. Raymond. The sub-title, "Sketches of Life and Travel in the West," sufficiently indicates the scope of the work, but the admirable quality of its contents can be known or suspected only by reading it. Professor Raymond is the editor of the Engineering and Mining Journal, New York, the best paper of its class in the country. He was recently United States Commissioner of Mining Statistics, and it was in that capacity, we believe, that he published his valuable work, Mines of the West. Those who have known him only in his character of scientist and engineer will be pleased to make acquaintance with a less severe and more enjoyable side of his mind, in this charming little book, from which we republish this week the first part of "Agamemnon," a story of rare, but as compared with Professor Raymond's other literary work, not exceptional merit.

"What do you want, sand-lotter?"
 "Bread for my wife and babies."
 "Good! Must you also have beer?"
 "Yes, for it gives me heart."
 "Is tobacco also necessary to your happiness?"
 "Certainly."
 "And white shirts, and sbiny bats, and high-heeled boots for Sundays?"
 "Yes."
 "We hope you may have all these; but bow do you hope to get them?"
 "The rich men must divide."
 "Suppose they refuse?"
 "We will take what we need."
 "How will you begin?"
 "We will burn the warehouses, in which are bread, beer, and tobacco. Then we will bang the men who make them. Then we will sow the fields with salt. Then we will live on air."
 "And listen to the music of your orators?"
 "And listen to the music of our orators."

One wonders why it is that any ass should be allowed to masquerade in the skin of a lion. One sees readily how it is, but the seeing does not help one's belief in an overruling Censor of things mundane. Yet, if one can not help protesting against these too common pictures, what should not be one's pity for the lion who struts in the skin of an ass?

CHIPS FROM OTHER BLOCKHEADS.

They are having a warm time just now in Kansas Sunday-schools, and the question under discussion is, Whether the boy who has fairly won the prize Bible by learning three thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven verses in three months can be ruled off the track for putting furniture tacks and a wad of shoemaker's wax in the superintendent's chair.

I see him in the starlight's gleam,
His soft glance answers mine;
With melting look and tender beam
I see his blue eyes shine.
My garden wall I see him scale—
Still, heart! he will not fall;
I hear his voice, his tuneful wail—
The cat upon the wall.

Romulus was brought up by a wolf, in a much more tender and humane manner than if he had been brought up in the "Shepherd's Fold," New York.

The monkey climbed toward the raging sky,
And twisted his tail round a lofty limb,
While the flood beneath went thundering by,
For he was a monkey that couldn't swim.
But the man was caught in the torrents mad,
And his dying speech in these words ran:
"If I had a tail, as my forefathers had,
I'd be a live monkey and not a drowned man."

John C. Freund, editor of the New York Musical and Dramatic Times, is still missing. When "last heard from" he was in Colorado, Chicago, Hoboken, Kansas, Boston, St. Louis, Oskosh, Saratoga, and St. John, New Brunswick. The recent snow storm may have prevented him from being in several other States and cities at the same time.

He trod on the plug of Irish soap
That the girl had left on the topmost stair—
And what to him was love or hope?
And what to him was joy or care?
For his feet flew out like wild, fierce things,
And he struck every step with a noise like a drum;
And the girl below, with the scrubbing things,
Laughed like a fiend to see him come.

"My dear," she said, as they sat at breakfast, "who is Hilo Pedro?" When he asked an explanation, and she told him that he had talked in his sleep so much about him, he tried to swallow some imaginary object in his throat and murmured something about reading Brazilian history and being deeply interested in the emperor, whose name was Hilo Pedro; and, bless her soul, she believed it.

Whoever heard	Whoever drank	Whoever heard
A bull sigh?	A ship's ale?	A mill d—n?
Whoever saw	Whoever heard	Whoever ate
A horse fly?	A fence rail?	A door jamb?

Before he became a Radical (says the Parisian) Victor Hugo used to have his face cleanly shaven. His barber was a great talker. In 1839 a report was spread to the effect that the world was coming to an end. The barber announced this terrible news to Victor Hugo while he was shaving him: "Ah! mon Dieu, people say that the world is coming to an end next year. Le 2 Janvier les betes mourront, et le 4, les hommes." "Vous m'effrayez," replied Hugo, "qui donc me raser le 3?"

There was an old fellow named Weston,
Who said, "I'm the greatest pedestrian,"
If he could but have walked
As fast as he talked,
He'd have been of all walkers the best 'un.

Aha, that kiss—that low, languishing, limpid, liquid, lingering kiss! 'Twas not a tender kiss, nor a studied kiss, nor an artistic kiss, nor a fervent kiss, nor a boisterous kiss, nor a paroxysmal kiss, nor a nervous kiss, nor a fraternal kiss, nor a gingerly kiss, nor a diffuse kiss, nor a concentrated kiss, nor a diffident kiss, nor a poggun kiss—'twas a calm, holy, ecstatic outbreathing of two gentle souls sanctified by love, a communion with the intangible by tangible means, a blending of earth with heaven, in which the latter had a manifold preponderance. 'Twas such a kiss as Troilus, stealing by night into the Trojan camp, might fain have breathed on Cressida's maiden lips to the melody of the joyful nightingale that sang of love, and in the sheen of the round red moon and the stars that see but never tell.

Pray, gentle being, give me heed,
As, kneeling humbly by thy side,
With lacerated heart I plead
That I may be thy blushing bride.
I long, I wildly long, to press
Thee to my heart—I know 'tis rash!
I pine to print a fond caress
Upon thy meek and mild mustache.
Why, tell me why thine eyelids drop?
Why turn away so pettishly?
Say, why with fierce, tumultuous flog
Thy bosom heaves coquettishly?
I know that thou art young and fair
As tiny buds in early spring—
But thou shalt be my constant care,
Thou frail and fragile little thing?
I'll sew thy shirts and darn thy hose,
Thy victuals cook, thy fires will light—
I'll grease thy gracious Grecian nose
Each snowy, croupy, wintry night.
So, surely thou'lt not tell me nay
And bid me dying quit thy side—
Brace up, pull down thy vest and say
That I may be thy blushing bride.

A young Bostonian announced that he was going to Leadville to engage in hydraulic mining. "Yes," remarked a friend, "you are going to seek the bubble reputation at the cañon's mouth."

STRANGER.
O Lady! may I ask without intrusion,
Sing hey! the frantic lady that you are,
The reason of your fluster and confusion?
Sing hey! the frantic lady and the car,
Sing hey! the frantic lady and the car.

LADY.
O sir! you see that car so swiftly flying,
Sing hey! the gallant stranger that you are,
To catch up with it I've been vainly trying,
Sing hey! the frantic lady and the car.

STRANGER.
But when you shout and wave your um-ber-ella
Sing hey! the frantic lady that you are,
The conductor stops or he's a silly fellow,
Sing hey! the frantic lady and the car.

LADY.
I see you're much in need of an instructor—
Sing hey! the silly stranger that you are,
Upon this line of cars there's no conductor,
Sing hey! the frantic lady and the car.

A Card from Messrs. August Wilhelmj and Max Vogrich.

PALACE HOTEL,
SAN FRANCISCO, February 22, 1880.
MR. ERNST REINKING:—Dear Sir—Before leaving this city to fulfill other engagements, permit us to thank you sincerely for all the kindness and courtesy extended to us during our stay in this city; but also, and above all, for the magnificent Messrs. Steinway & Sons' Concert Grand, which once more have done full justice to their world-wide reputation; and we remain, with our kindest regards,
Yours very respectfully,
AUGUST WILHELMJ.
MAXIMILIAN VOGRICH.

Yes, this country is filled with men, women, and children who never see a well day, that in one month can be made well and sound with Hop Bitters. Will they believe and use them?

"Vassar girls like to play seven-up." They prefer it to poker, because it does not require the presence of their aunts.

ATROPHY ARRESTED.—FELLOWS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF HYPOPHOSPHITES.—Wasting of the tissues of the body is arrested, the muscles made firm, and the nerves regain their power by using Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites.

CONSUMPTION CURED.
An old physician, retired from practice, had having placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

French, Spanish, and Italian Conversational Lessons, practical method. Post-office box 1574.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

To those who wish to have removed permanently superfluous Hair, Freckles, Liver Spots, Black Worms, Moles, etc., I will send you a recipe that will cure you, free of charge. This great remedy was discovered by PROF. E. HINNA, the great Chemist and East India Plant Discoverer. This great discovery is guaranteed not to injure the skin in any way whatever. Send a self-addressed envelope to V. POPPER (General Agent for the United States and Canada), 127 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery St.

Hackett & Dean, Dentists, No. 126 Kearny Street, Thurlow Block.

MORSE'S PALACE OF ART, 417 Montgomery St.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR AND MANAGER.

Monday, March 1, every night, and Saturday matinee.

Second week of

MR. SOTHERN

And his COMPANY OF COMEDIANS, in

OUR AMERICAN COUSIN,

In which Mr. Sothern will appear in his world famous character of

LORD DUNDREARY,

In which he has appeared upward of 5,000 times in America, England, Ireland, Scotland, and France.

Monday, March 2, an entire change of programme.

Reserved Seats in the Box Office one week in advance.

THE BALDWIN THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.

R. M. EBERLE.....STAGE MANAGER.

REAPPEARANCE OF

CLARA MORRIS.

BRILLIANT SUCCESS!

The new his original play,

THE SOUL OF AN ACTRESS,

With a most powerful cast, including Messrs. James O'Neill, Lewis Morrison, Max Freeman and John Wilson, Misses Eleanor Carey, Jean Clara Walters, Louise Beaudet and Mollie Revel, etc., etc.

FIRST "SOUL OF AN ACTRESS" MATINEE SATURDAY, AT TWO O'CLOCK.

Saturday evening, February 28, Benefit of

MR. MAX FREEMAN.

DIPLOMACY.

MR. HENRY KETTEN, the celebrated Pianist has kindly volunteered.

THE COPARTNERSHIP HERETOfore existing between J. V. Hart and W. W. Phelps, under the firm name of Hart & Phelps, is hereby dissolved by mutual consent.

J. V. HART.

W. W. PHELPS.

Mr. J. V. Hart can be found at No. 27 Second Street, SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 19, 1880.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free.

Address H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine.

ARCHERY.

EDWARD T. MARTIN has just received a fine Stock of HORSMAN'S CELEBRATED ARCHERY GOODS, comprising Ladies' and Gentlemen's BEST BACK BOWS, first-class SELF-BOWS, CLUB ARROWS, TARGETS, and Miscellaneous Archery Equipments, which will be sold at Manufacturers' prices.

EDWARD T. MARTIN,
5 Montgomery Street.

SPRING STYLE HATS

NOW INTRODUCED BY

HERRMANN

THE HATTER,

336 KEARNY STREET,

Between Bush and Pine Streets.

BRANCH, 910 MARKET ST., ABOVE STOCKTON.

As regards beauty and number of styles, Herrmann still leads.

Spring Catalogues will be ready in one week. Send for copy.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS, REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 325 Montgomery Street,

Odd Fellows' Hall.

WM. F. SMITH, M. D.,

OCULIST, 313 BUSH STREET.

Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.

J. A. HUNTER, M. D.,

No. 321 Sutter Street, devotes Special Attention to

Catarrh, Deafness,
Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, and all ailments of the Throat, Lungs, and Heart.

$72 a week. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & CO., Augusta, Maine.

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH, COAL DEALERS.

Office and Yard, 14 Post Street.

Store Yard, 718 Sansome Street.

BRANCH OFFICE.

J. Middleton & Son, 419 Pine Street,

Opposite California Market.

All kinds of coal at lowest rates. Orders may be sent by telephone through any of the company's offices free.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRENCH, GERMAN & ENGLISH INSTITUTE

FOR YOUNG LADIES AND CHILDREN 922 POST ST., between Hyde and Larkin.

This well known Day and Boarding School, with Kindergarten, will reopen for the term on MONDAY, January 5, 1880. MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

C. BEACH BOOKSELLER AND STATIONER

107 MONTGOMERY ST., OPP. THE

Occidental. Special Notice—Engraved Plate, with 100 cards, $3.00; 100 Cards from Plate, $1.50; only the best Imported Cards used. In the Store is established the Agency of D. APPLETON & CO., of New York, with a full line of their publications. Catalogues furnished on application.

NEW BOOKS.

Autobiography of Prince Metternich. Edited by his son. 2 vols., 8vo. Cloth.....	$5 00
Hawthorne. By Henry James, Jr. 1 vol. Cloth.....	1 00
England. By T. H. S. Scott. 1 vol., 8vo. (Uniform with Wallace's Russia.).....	4 00
Great Lights in Sculpture and Painting. By S. D. Drémus. 1 vol., 12mo. Cloth.....	1 00
Great Singers. By G. T. Ferris. 1 vol. Paper.....	30
Progress and Poverty. By Henry George. 1 vol. Cloth.....	2 00
Queen of the Meadow. A Novel. By C. Gibbon. (Franklin Square Library.).....	15
Sebastian Strome. A Novel. By Julian Hawthorne. 1 vol. Paper.....	75
Brazil; the Amazon and the Coast. By Herbert H. Smith. 1 vol., 8vo. Ill.....	5 00
Camps in the Caribbees. By Fred. A. Ober. 1 vol., 8vo. Ill.....	2 50
Four Months in a Sneak Box. By N. H. Bishop. 1 vol., 8vo. Ill.....	2 50
Haworth's. By Mrs. Burnett, author of That Lass o' Lowries. 1 vol., 12mo.....	1 50
The Army of Virginia; from Cedar Mountain to Alexandria. By Geo. H. Gordon. 1 vol., 8vo.....	4 00

FOR SALE BY

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

No. 3 Montgomery Street,

(MASONIC TEMPLE.)

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.,

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

218 California St., San Francisco, Cal.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co. Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt.

C. F. SHEFFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

PACIFIC

SAW MANUFACTURING CO.

17 AND 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

SAWS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

on hand and made to order. Agents for C. B. Paul's Files.

Repairing of all kinds done at short notice.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,

J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

TABER, HARKER & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco.

H. L. DODGE.....L. H. SWEENEY.....J. E. RUGGLES

DODGE, SWEENEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS,

Wholesale Provision Dealers,

AND....

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Nos. 114 and 116 Market, and 11 and 13 California Sts.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.,

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR

Street.

Liberal advances made on consignments.

J. C. MERRILL & CO

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET

LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - - San Francisco

PACIFIC

Business College,

320 POST ST.

SAN FRANCISCO.

Etchings and Rare Engravings.

W. K. VICKERY INVITES ATTENtion to his large collection of the above, which includes fine original Engravings from the great Paintings of Europe. Rare Portraits, either in collection or procured.

A large number of fine Etchings in stock.

156 KEARNY ST. (Thurlow Block)

MEMNON: OR HUMAN WISDOM.

From the French of Voltaire.

Memnon conceived, one day, the foolish project of being perfectly wise. There are scarcely any men through whose brains this folly has not some time passed. Memnon said to himself: "To be very wise, and in consequence very happy, it is only necessary to be without passions; and nothing is more easy, as any one knows."

"In the first place, I will never love any woman; because when I see a perfect beauty, I shall say to myself: 'Some day these cheeks will become hollow; these beautiful eyes will be bordered with red; this round throat will become flat and hanging; this lovely head will be bald. I have only to gaze at present with the eyes with which I should then regard it; and assuredly this head will not be able to turn mine.'

"In the second place, I will always be sober. In vain shall I be tempted by good fare, by delicious wines, by the seduction of society. I have but to think of the effects of excess—an aching head, an overloaded stomach, the loss of reason, of health, and of time. I will only eat, therefore, what is needful; my health will always be equal, my ideas always pure and clear. All this is so easy that there is really no merit in carrying it out."

"Afterward," said Memnon, "it is necessary to consider my fortune. My desires are moderate; my fortune is securely placed under the Receveur-Général of Finances at Ninive. I have that which will enable me to live independently; that is the greatest of blessings. I shall never be brought to the cruel necessity of earning my living; I shall envy no one, and no one will envy me. This is also very simple."

"I have friends," continued he; "I shall keep them, because they will have nothing to dispute with me. I shall never quarrel with them, nor they with me. This will not be difficult."

Having thus made his little plan in regard to wisdom, in his chamber, Memnon looked out of his window. He saw two women who were walking along under the maples opposite his dwelling. One was old, and did not appear to be thinking of anything; the other was young, pretty, and seemed very much occupied. She sighed, she wept, and only appeared the more lovely. Our sage was touched, not by the beauty of the lady (he was quite sure of being free from such weakness), but by the affliction in which he saw her. He descended. He addressed the young Ninivienne, with the design of consoling her with his wisdom. This fair personage told him, with the most touching and confiding air, all the evil which an uncle (whom she had not) had brought upon her; with what artifices he had taken from her a fortune (which she had never possessed), and all that she had to fear from his violence.

"You appear to me a man of such good counsel," said she to him, "that, if you would condescend to come home with me and examine into my affairs, I am sure that you could help me out of my embarrassment."

Memnon did not hesitate to follow her, for the purpose of looking into her affairs, and of giving her good advice.

The afflicted dame led him into a perfumed chamber, and politely seated him by her side on a large sofa, where they sat opposite one another. The lady spoke, drooping her lids, from which the tears fell from time to time. Whenever she raised them they always encountered the gaze of the wise Memnon.

Their converse was full of a tenderness which redoubled each time they looked at each other. Memnon took her affairs very much to heart, and felt each moment greater joy at being able to assist so innocent and so unhappy a being. In the ardor of their conversation, they ceased insensibly to sit opposite one another. Memnon counseled her nearer, and gave to her advice so tender that, neither one nor the other spoke of business, and neither knew any longer where they were.

While they were in this position the "uncle" arrived, as one might have expected. He was armed from his beard to his feet; and the first thing he said was, that he was going to kill (he had reason) the wise Memnon and his niece; the last words which escaped from him, however, were to the effect that he would pardon Memnon for the consideration of a large sum of money.

Memnon was obliged to give all that he had with him. America had not then been discovered, and afflicted dames were not nearly so dangerous as they are to-day. Memnon, ashamed and disgusted, returned to his home. He there found an invitation to dine with one of his intimate friends.

"If I remain at home," said he, "my mind will be occupied with my sad adventure; I shall eat nothing, and shall be ill. It will be much better to go and enjoy a frugal repast with my friends. In the enjoyment of their society I shall forget my stupidity of this morning."

He went. They saw that he was sorrowful. They insisted upon his drinking to raise his spirits. A little wine taken moderately is good for the mind and body. It was thus that the sage Memnon thought, and he became intoxicated.

After dinner they proposed to play. A game with one's friends is an honest pastime. He played. They gained all that was in his purse, and four times as much. A dispute arose regarding the play; they became heated. One of his intimate friends threw a dice-box at his head and injured one eye. They carried the wise Memnon home, intoxicated, without money, and having one eye the less.

He recovered a little from his drinking, and, when his head was clearer, he sent his valet to the Receveur-Général of Finances at Ninive for the money to pay his friends. They told him that his debtor had that morning made a fraudulent bankruptcy, which had alarmed a hundred families.

Memnon, outraged, went to court with a plaster on his eye and a petition in his hand, to demand justice of the king regarding the bankrupt. He met, in a salon, many ladies, who supported with great ease hoops twenty-four feet in circumference. One of them, who knew him a little, said, looking at him from one side:

"Ah, how horrible!"

"But, who knew him better, said to him:

"Today, Monsieur Memnon. Indeed, Monsieur Memnon, I am glad to see you. By the way, how have you lost an eye?" and she passed without waiting for a reply.

Memnon hid himself in a corner, and awaited the moment when he could throw himself at the feet of the monarch. This moment arrived. He kissed the earth three times, and presented his petition. His gracious majesty received it very favorably, and gave the memorandum to one of his satraps to keep. The satrap took Memnon aside, and said to him, with a haughty air and a mocking laugh: "You are a far-seeing blind man, to address yourself to the king rather than to me, and still more far-sighted to demand justice against an honest bankrupt whom I honor with my protection, and who is the nephew of a maid of my mistress. Ah! abandon this affair, my friend, if you wish to preserve the eye which remains to you."

Memnon having thus in the morning renounced women, excess at table, play, all quarreling, and above all, the court, had been before night deceived and robbed by a fair dame, had been drunk, had played, had had a quarrel, had lost an eye, and had been at court, where they laughed at him.

Petrified with astonishment, and overcome with grief, he returned, death in his heart. He wished to enter his house; he found there the sheriffs, who were dismantling his rooms by order of his creditors. He sat down, almost fainting, under a maple; the fair dame of the morning passed by, leaning on the arm of her dear uncle; she laughed aloud upon seeing Memnon with his plaster.

Night came on; Memnon slept on the straw outside the walls of his house.

Fever came upon him; in excess of weariness he fell asleep, and a celestial spirit appeared to him in a dream.

The apparition was resplendent with light. He had six beautiful wings, but no feet, nor head, nor queue, and resembled nothing human.

"Who art thou?" said Memnon.

"Thy good genius," replied the spirit.

"Give me, then, my eye, my health, my fortune, my wisdom," said Memnon. And then he recounted how he had lost all these things in one day.

"Those are adventures which never happen in the world which we inhabit," said the spirit.

"And what world do you inhabit?" inquired the afflicted man.

"My country," was the reply, "is five hundred million leagues from the sun, in a little star near Sirius, that you see here."

"The delightful country!" exclaimed Memnon. "What! you have not coquettes who deceive a poor man; no intimate friends who win away his money and who ruin his eyes; no bankrupts, no satraps who mock you while refusing you justice?"

"No," said the inhabitant of the stars, "nothing of all that. We are never deceived by women, because there we have none; there is no excess at table, because we do not eat; we have no bankrupts, because we have neither gold nor silver; our eyes cannot be injured, because our bodies are not fashioned like yours; and satraps never do us injustice, because in our little star all are equal."

Then Memnon said to him: "Monseigneur, without woman, and without dining, how do you pass your time?"

"In watching," replied the spirit, "over other globes which are confided to us. I come to console thee."

"Alas!" sighed Memnon, "why did you not come the night before, to spare me all these follies?"

"I was with Assan, thy elder brother," replied the celestial being. "He has more to complain of than thou. His gracious majesty, the King of the Indies, at whose court he has the honor to be, has blinded both his eyes for a slight indiscretion, and he is actually in prison—irons on his feet and hands."

"It is far from lucky, then," said Memnon, "to have a good genius in the family, for of two brothers, one is blind of one eye, and the other of both—one couched on straw, the other in prison."

"Thy fate will change," replied the inhabitant of the star. "It is true that you will always be blind in one eye; but in spite of that you will be happy, because you will never conceive the insane project of being perfectly wise."

"Is it, then, a thing impossible to carry out?" cried Memnon, sighing.

"As impossible as to be perfectly beautiful, perfectly strong, perfectly bappy. Even we ourselves are far from it. There is a globe where it is found; but in the hundred thousand millions of worlds which are scattered in space, all this comes by degrees. One has less of wisdom and of pleasure in the second than in the first, less in the third than in the second, and so on until the last, where every one is entirely idiotic."

"I greatly fear," said Memnon, "lest our little globe may be precisely the madhouse of the universe, of which you speak."

"Not altogether," said the spirit, "but it approaches near to being; it is necessary that each should have its place."

"Ah," said Memnon, "but certain poets, certain philosophers have taken great pains to say that all is well?"

"They have great reason," said the philosopher from on high, "in considering the arrangement of the entire universe."

"Ah! I will not believe that," replied poor Memnon, "until the time when I shall no longer be blind."

ADELAIDE CUSHING.
BERKELEY, Cal., February 15, 1880.

The following composition was written by a Japanese boy at school in New York: "Frogs are not lovely creatures in their appearances, they appear in the spring but cannot like clear springs or fair gardens or high fields; all times they lie in a dirty marshes or a pools. They have very pleasant sounds, short and soft sounds; that is first sound in the spring, and when approached Summer they became contented frogs; their noise is long and violent sound; now they all day wake in a woods or wild flowers and all night noised in pleasant sounds. They are very strange creatures. What does frogs when is winter come, they perhaps then may not have retired places. I will learn by ask teacher and I will have intimately described in answer to the subject."

A new waste basket is in the form of a tall hat, and, strange to say, it is very pretty.

A THEATRICAL FIRST-NIGHT.

A convenient place to study human nature (says the Hour) is a theatre on the night of a first performance. It is always a brilliant occasion, whether in Paris, London, or New York; though in our own city it lacks some of the striking features which distinguish it in the two great European capitals. The London or Paris audience gives itself up freely to the expression of its likes or dislikes; but a New York audience is proverbially mild and amiable. There was a first-night in Paris, some years ago, which was eminently characteristic of Gallic custom. The play was a drama of a social cast by Arsène Houssaye. Its audacious immorality was too much for even the most liberal Parisian digestion. The people in the theatre howled, hissed, and stamped, and the drama was damned outright. It is needless to add that, if M. Houssaye's play had been represented before an American audience, it would have been received with frigid silence: no hissing, no howling, no stamping—only polite contempt. London first-nighters are demonstrative, too, when they feel that their sensibilities have been shocked or their good taste imposed upon. Whether the transatlantic method of popular criticism is the most effectual is a matter of opinion; but it is undeniable that an excited auditory is more picturesque than one whose prominent traits are suppressed disgust and deceitful courtesy.

Let one imagine himself a spectator at a first representation in one of our leading theatres. The play is a new work by an American author. The audience is large, and, in the main, fashionable. Most of them arrive late. The scintillating splendor of the chandelier overhead, the sparkle of the gas-jets, the sharp glare of the foot-lights, the handsome decorations of the theatre, the crowded audience, the bright costumes of the women, the general look of expectation, and the magnetism which seems to pervade this picturesque confusion of humanity thrill the spectator. The orchestra is now midway in a gallop. The heads of most orchestra leaders are bald, strange to say—a fact which most people learn in early childhood. While the music is in progress, one looks about in search of familiar faces. Many of the choicest seats are occupied by representatives of "our best society," who are present to be seen, rather than to see. But fashion is not the most interesting element of the audience; for here are men distinguished in various walks of life, who would rather miss three good meals than a first night. The critics of the leading newspapers adorn the middle aisle. They sit smileless and owl-like, as though each were an Atlas supporting a little world of his own. Three or four of these gentlemen have made names for themselves, and their opinions are respected. Representatives of small-fry sheets and out-of-town journals abound; there are few of them who have not an axe to grind, and most of them know as much about the drama and acting as the Boeotians, according to an ancient tradition, knew about the root of wisdom. This mob of writers is made up of singular and antagonistic elements. Further down is a doctor of divinity, who, belonging as he does to an advanced sect of Christianity, combats the notion that the theatre and the devil are synonymous. There is no trade or profession which is not represented. The professional blackguard and the scholar, the rival manager and the callow playwright, the leading man of a neighboring house and the conceited amateur, the wealthy banker and the broken-down financier, the famous author and the literary duffer—all are here, and all glory in the title, which has been invented to describe them as a body, "first-nighters."

The overture is at an end, and up goes the curtain to music pianissimo. One is soon absorbed in the play; for he has made up his mind, of course, to give the author the full benefit of his honest opinion. He is patriotic and sympathetic, and has read somewhere that Rome was not built in a day. The American drama, it seems, is subject to the same wise generalization. Well, the first act pleases him, and he is enthusiastic in a peaceful way. When the curtain drops he saunters out into the lobby. There are little knots of intellectual gentlemen, most of whom are writers of plays, though the world is quite ignorant of that important fact. Desirous to bear their opinions, he joins one of the groups. These well-informed persons say that the first act of the play is a failure. Where he had found artistic perception, they discovered nothing but dullness long drawn out. He expresses his conviction forcibly, and is answered with a storm of "pooh-poohs," "pshaws" and other suggestive noises. One fellow, who it is said has written a score of plays, all of which have been rejected, tells him confidentially that the act which has pleased him is "Rubbish, my dear boy—rubbish." His mental reservation is, that the speaker is an ass. Of course, he doesn't say so; he holds to his first opinion, and gazes with renewed curiosity at these unappreciated playwrights. As he looks at them, it appears that their complexions are yellow with envy. The author's success is, in their eyes, an impertinence, and they do their best to belittle it.

However, one forgets these lobbyists and returns to his seat. The play goes on, the interest increases with each act, and the curtain finally falls upon the last tableau. The author, to whom the evening has been a long agony, is then called out, and is obliged to stammer his acknowledgments. The play has proved to be a work stamping the writer as a man of taste and artistic promise. Its blemishes and its many shortcomings are noticed; but the general impression has been favorable, and one has the supreme satisfaction of knowing that he has enjoyed himself. The least sophisticated spectators agree. But a sneering friend, who is always at your elbow, assures you that the piece will be damned, because nine American critics out of ten argue a priori that no American play can be good. And now the lights are turned out, the last note of the orchestra dies away into the gray hollows of the theatre, one howls to his pretty female acquaintances as he passes out into the street, and a gust of cold wind blowing into his face confirms his pet shibboleth—that romance and reality are but the profile and the full face of life.

The Manliness of Christ, by Mr. Thomas Hughes, will be published in this country by Houghton, Osgood & Co.

Without saying which one does the hugging, Miss Muiock says bear and forbear are the two great bears of matrimony.

"DOMESTIC" THE LIGHT RUNNING SEWING MACHINE.

It is PERFECT in every feature, and COMPLETE in all its details. It embodies all of the MODERN improvements that are of PROVED VALUE.

J. W. EVANS,
No. 29 POST STREET (MECHANICS' INSTITUTE BUILDING).

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

CHICKERING
PIANOS AT COST.

WANTED!

Nos. 1 (March 25), 4 (April 15), of Vol. I of the ARGONAUT for 1877. Twenty-five cents will be paid for each of the above numbers at the ARGONAUT office, 522 California Street.

OFFICE HEALTH DEPARTMENT

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., FEB. 24, 1880.

NOTICE.

THE BOARD OF HEALTH HAVING declared certain territory within the limits of San Francisco "A Public Nuisance," I hereby notify all persons, of every nationality, living in and surrounded by the conditions which have caused this action to be taken by the Hon. Board of Health, that, after the expiration of thirty (30) days from the publication of this notice, all the power of the law will be invoked (and we believe it is sufficient) to empty this great reservoir of moral, social, and physical pollution, which is constantly extending its area, and threatens to engulf with its filthiness and immorality the fairest portion of our city. The consequences that must result from a continuance of this moral, social, and physical evil are simply too fearful to contemplate, and must be averted at all hazards.

J. L. MEARES, M. D.,

Health Officer City and County of San Francisco.

English and American BICYCLES.

KEPT IN STOCK

And imported to order. Prices only $5 over those in Boston.

G. LORING CUNNINGHAM

No. 206 Sansome Street, office of Macondray & Co., S. F.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 29th day of January, 1880, an assessment (No. 21) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the third day of March, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the twenty-fifth day of March, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JNO. CROCKETT, Secretary.

Office—Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room No. 37, San Francisco, Feb. 14, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 52) of Thirty Cents per share was declared, payable on FRIDAY, February 20, 1880, at the office of Messrs. Laidlaw & Co., New York, only on stock issued from the Transfer Agency in that city, and at the San Francisco office only on stock issued here. Transfer books will close on Thursday, February 19, 1880, at 3 o'clock P. M.

P. JACOBUS, Ass't Secretary.

OFFER EXTRAORDINARY!

THE Automatic

THE ONLY LIGHT RUNNING AND NOISELESS SEWING MACHINE made. It has no Bobbins, no Shuttle, no Tension. It is sold wholly upon its merits.

We hereby offer to parties who have owned an Automatic for Six Months and are dissatisfied, a New Machine of any other make, on even exchange. No other Company dare make such an offer.

WILCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.

124 Post Street, San Francisco, and 361 Twelfth Street, Oakland.

CHICKERING PIANOS

Perfect in tone, durability, and finish. Over 55,000 in use. Legitimately the Standard Piano of the world. Our new Patent Upright pronounced the very best in use. Sold on easy terms. Exclusive and only agency, No. 23 Dupont St., San Francisco.

L. K. HAMMER, AGENT.

The ARGONAUT is Printed with Ink Manufactured by

SHATTUCK & FLETCHER,

520 Commercial Street, San Francisco.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

— THE —

NEW WESTERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

A SPLENDID NUMBER FOR MARCH.

The Californian.	March Number.
The Californian.	March Number.
The Californian.	March Number.
The Californian.	March Number.
The Californian.	March Number.
The Californian.	March Number.

CONTENTS:

SAND. Chapter III.....	J. W. GALLY.
OUR RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.....	HENRY S. BROOKS.
IN THE SHADE.....	S. E. ANDERSON.
SHEPHERDS AND SHEEP-HERDING.....	ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.
FIRST LOVE AND LAST.....	KATE HEATH.
CERTAIN PHASES OF THE CHINESE QUESTION.....	JOHN F. MILLER.
NINE DAYS ON THE SUMMIT OF SHASTA.....	B. A. COLONNA.
LEX SCRIPTA.....	NATHAN C. KOUNS.
IRELAND—HER PAST AND PRESENT CONDITION.....	T. H. HIGHLAND.
"ON WITH THE DANCE!" NO. 2.....	BASHI BAZOUK.
ONE-POEM POETS.....	EDWARD BELCHER.
CLOUDED CRYSTALS.....	KATE M. BISHOP.
MOSE, THE BLACK PIONEER.....	JOHN VANCE CHENEY.
THE WILD-FLOWER SEASON.....	R. V. BOUDET.

One Hundred Pages.

Twenty-five Cents.

One Hundred Pages.

Twenty-five Cents.

One Hundred Pages.

Twenty-five Cents.

One Hundred Pages.

Twenty-five Cents.

One Hundred Pages.

Twenty-five Cents.

BE SURE AND SEE THE MARCH NUMBER OF THE CALIFORNIAN!

FOR SALE BY NEWSDEALERS AND THE TRADE GENERALLY.

SCHOOL AT DRESDEN.

MRS. AURELIA BURRAGE, LATE

Principal of the School at 530 Van Ness Avenue, has opened a School for American Girls in Dresden. Terms $50 per month for board and tuition. For particulars apply to Miss West, 1001 Sutter Street, or address Mrs. Burrage, care of Dresden Bank, Dresden, Saxony.

DANIEL GIOVANNINI,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

dealer in Wood, Coal, Charcoal, and Coke, 816

Pacific Street, between Stockton and Powell.

Charcoal Depot.—Charcoal for sale in lots to suit, from 1 to 10,000 sacks.

LADIES

All know how unsatisfactory Foreign Black Silks are in both cutting and wearing shiny. We give you a reliable test below that will give you a perfect guide in selecting silk material for actual wear.

JOHN D. CUTTER & CO.'S

RAVEN BLACK AMERICAN SILKS are now being retailed by the following established firms:

Doane & Heushelwood, San Francisco.

M. W. Henderson, Portland, Oregon.

O. A. Hale & Co., San Jose.

H. C. Taft & Co., Oakland.

THE TEST.

Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulteration, and will either cut or wear shiny.

Cutter's Samples for the trade.

ALLEN C. REID & CO.

POTOSI MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth day of February, 1880, an assessment (No. 3) of fifty cents (50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of March, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on THURSDAY, the first (1st) day of April, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.

Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CHOLLAR MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth day of February, 1880, an assessment (No. 3) of fifty cents (50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of March, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the thirty-first (31st) day of March, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.

Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

OFFICE OF THE BODIE CONSOLIDATED

Mining Company, Room 62, Nevada Block, San Francisco, February 17, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, a dividend (No. 8) of Twenty-five (25) Cents per share was declared on the capital stock of the Company, payable Monday, March 1, 1880, at the office of Messrs. Laidlaw & Co., New York, only on stock issued from the Transfer Agency in that city, and at the San Francisco office only on stock issued here. Transfer books will close on Thursday, February 19, 1880, at 3 o'clock P. M.

WM. H. LENT, Secretary.

The Argonaut.

VOL. VI. NO. 10.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 6, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE QUEEN OF SPADES.

Translated for the "Argonaut" from the French of Louis Clodion.

I.

A fortnight ago I escorted Mina to a ball. Olympia was there. Could I have foreseen it? Olympia looked unusually beautiful. Tall, dark, excited with pleasure, she was positively radiant; her dark eyes were more brilliant than diamonds, her cheeks redder than the coral beads twined in her raven locks, her skin whiter than the satin of her robe. Mina was jealous of her. She forbade my looking at Olympia—I did not look at her; to reply to her, should she address a remark to me—she spoke to me, I abruptly broke off the conversation. What was more, I had been positively rude; for, as she passed me, whether by accident or design, she dropped her fan, and I did not so much as stoop to pick it up.

That was simply heroic. Even Mina appeared to be perfectly satisfied with my conduct. The following day she was charmingly gracious to me. In the evening, we gaily drew the card table near the fire and sat down to play. That was a caprice of Mina's. Unfortunate caprice! Suddenly she became distraught, preoccupied; her eyes were riveted upon a card—upon one particular card. She was actually deliberating how she would force me to say (I appeal to you, reader, was it reasonable?) that Olympia bore an exact resemblance to the Queen of Spades.

She affirmed it. I denied it. She became impatient, and justly, for I was wrong to contradict her. Suddenly she threw down the cards and pouted! How bewitching is a pretty woman when she pouts! She bit her lips, which only made them a deeper carnation; her thin nostrils dilated, her eyes sparkled, and with her nail she tore all that came within her reach.

In the first place, Mina's angry little nail—a long, rose-tinted, tapering little nail, an instrument made for the express purpose of scratching into the heart of man—relentlessly pierced through the lace on her handkerchief. Nor did its ravages cease there. By the side of the lovely boudeuse lay a portrait—my portrait; it was considered to be a very excellent likeness. For an instant her nail played about this picture. Her trembling touch betrayed impatience, nervousness, hesitation. Indeed, it was sufficient to make me tremble. Nevertheless, I smiled. Did she perceive that smile? I think she did. Meanwhile, her gaze was intently fixed upon her foot.

II.

She was reclining upon a broad lounge—a soft, luxurious lounge, covered with Turkish stuff, embroidered with gold. A simple morning dress of white cashmere enveloped her figure, leaving exposed the delicate throat. I had a side view of her, and the exquisite profile stood out clearly and distinctly, in its pink and white loveliness, against the blue draperies which formed a background.

Her brow was certainly a model of grace and beauty—low and broad, set in a framework of soft, wavy hair! Truly, I never saw anything more beautiful than Mina's brow, unless it was her nose—delicately veined, clearly cut, the pink nostrils rounded, mobile, provoking; or her mouth, or her ear, each of as perfect, as fine a design, as were the features stamped upon a louis d'or. There was likewise a chin—a pretty, plump, coquettish chin; moreover, a double chin.

I confess that never, until this moment, had I been so particularly struck with Mina's beauty; whilst she was beating a tattoo with her foot—that foot which she was so studiously contemplating while I was smiling. It was posed upon a tapestry cushion, representing a little Cupid shooting an arrow and piercing a heart, which, on its azure field, positively looked like the Ace of Spades, if Olympia did bear no resemblance to the Queen.

I doubt not all this is silly, tiresome, to those who are not in love—but not to Mina. For love is the Phoenix which rises from its ashes; old as the world—although born yesterday, come to light to-day. And those who cage this beautiful bird do not stop to inform themselves, before admiring its plumage, before listening to its song, whether it were the same song which it sung to Adam and Eve under the shades of Paradise.

Mina loves me. You smile? To say the least, I am agreeable to her. I assure you, in spite of my modesty, it is absolutely impossible for me to doubt this fact. From fancy to passion there is but a step—if, on the other hand, there is oftentimes an abyss; and when I think of the tremendous sacrifices which she has made for my sake, I am forced to believe that she adores me. Yes, such as I am—as you see me—she sacrificed for me, successively, a ball, two dinners, three matinées musicales, and four soirées littéraires! But at this moment she would not have denied herself, on my account, the infinitesimal portion of a waltz, or the reading of a quatrain. Her foot trampled with savage glee upon the innocent little Cupid, and her finger-nail flew with steadily increasing rapidity around my portrait. Suddenly, horror! both eyes lost, annihilated, irreparably destroyed! I was blind—in the picture.

My friends, pretend that I am blind in reality, so far as Mina is concerned. No such thing. I swear it. But, after all, where would be the harm even if it were so? Yes, assuredly they are unjust; for is it not gross injustice to say that Mina—who is absolutely perfect—is capricious, irasci-ble, lazy, and self-willed, a vain, gossiping coquette? A gossip? Mina? That is to say she is possessed of wit, gaiety, animation! She possibly likes to give full play to the effervescent spirit within her; but is not that rather to her credit than otherwise? She occasionally wounds certain people—some people are so ridiculously sensitive! Vain? Yes, if it is vanity to be conscious of one's worth, and not affect ignorance of a fact that is patent to all. Coquettish? I have seldom known her to perform her toilet more than three times in one day, and then merely to conform to the exigencies of the world. During the opera season she makes four; could she do otherwise? She rarely goes so far as to dress five times in a day. And yet, they dare call her lazy!

And thus she is judged—poor Mina!—the exact reverse of what she really is. Let them say what they will to the contrary, I do affirm that she has the combined gentleness of the dove and the lamb; only, there is a limit to her docility. Knowing her, it is only necessary to be on the alert for certain indications, to take the necessary precautions. Mon Dieu! doubtless she has her gloomy hours—who has not? But, if she flies into a rage occasionally, she has such a graceful way of stamping her tiny foot, even of scratching out your eyes—on paper—that one could wish this transient mood were her normal condition. I never love her better than at such a moment—too rare to suit my fancy. We both get angry and sulk. Who is wrong? It is hard to decide. The cream of the affair is the reconciliation.

III.

I saw well enough that Mina regretted her imprudence. But she would not give up; she would rather die than make me the slightest concession. Had she not conceived a notion that thus she was upholding her dignity? On my part, I was obstinate; indeed, to such a degree that I internally made a solemn vow never to yield.

See to what a pass we had come. And our dispute had arisen in a jest. We had laughingly exchanged shots; we played with words as with a battledore and shuttlecock; insensibly mirth changed to gloom—the game was poisoned. We had trifled with words without perceiving their drift, and blood had flowed.

In America there is a plant the leaves of which are endowed with a keen sensibility, which fact becomes obvious through a strange phenomenon. It is divided into two movable lobes, which remain partially open, provided some careless insect does not, by an unfortunate touch, irritate this sensibility. But should a little, sporting, buzzing, adventure-some fly have the temerity to alight upon the extreme point of one of these leaves, it instantly closes, and the captive fly tries in vain to recover its liberty, to escape from the prison in which it confined itself.

Our pride—Mina's and mine—at this moment bore a striking similitude to these leaves; and our love, which in its blind confidence had been wounded and made prisoner, could not burst the bonds which enthralled it. It was evident that some unexpected incident, some happy chance, must intervene before the ice could be broken. I was perfectly aware that a single word from me would restore to the sky its limpid clearness; but to submit to Mina's unjust, extravagant caprice—never! never!

Suddenly a piece of coal fell upon the hearth and rolled to the edge of the rug. Mina sprang forward; I did likewise; but soon I came to a stand-still, struck by an idea; and she, too, stopped, seeing that I had done so.

She had not changed her posture—her body slightly inclined, her right hand extended before her. That hand, placed between me and the candelabra, pink, transparent, bathed in a flood of light, recalled to my mind another hand I had admired in the fresco that adorns a ceiling in the Rospigliosi palace at Rome: the Aurora of the great master, Guido Reni—Aurora driving the Chariot of the Sun, surrounded by the Hours.

Yes, Mina's was certainly that very hand, and I waited, momentarily expecting to see fall from it the shower of flowers which glides through the fingers of the goddess. I naturally told Mina my thoughts. She smiled. That was a good sign. I took her hand and kissed it. She quickly withdrew it. The compliment was cunning; speech had returned, and already I could see my way to reconciliation, and that without having to make any humiliating concessions—a concession at thought of which my pride revolted. My plan of action was instantly formed; it was a good one, and, beyond the question of a doubt, it would have been crowned with glorious success if—

Did you ever hunt larks?

IV.

For some time have the fields been despoiled of their riches. The mornings are cold. On the yellow leaves and mosses, on shrub and hedge, are suspended the first quaint arabesques, the first sparkling festoons of the skillful designer, Jack Frost. In the midst of this field, whence you have a view of the surrounding country, place your mirror. The rising sun has already kissed away the thousand little icicles. Meanwhile, the morning lark sings as it soars through the blue sky. Suddenly it perceives the scintillations of the mirror. At this challenge to its coquetry, it stops; insensibly it lowers its flight, it descends, and wheels around the brilliant spot; soon it enters within the circle of the fascinating rays; again it descends, lower, lower; finally it remains passive, immovable. Nothing now rests for you but to draw fast the cords of your net.

'Twas thus I resolved to do—'twas thus I did with Mina. I offered to her coquetry, which, after all, was legitimate, the mirror of sweetest flattery. She lent a complacent ear to my words; by degrees she softened. She looked into my face with tenderness; still, more prudent than the lark, she kept at a distance. I saw instantly what it was she was waiting for. Do not think it was obstinacy! It was that unfortunate question of mistaken dignity which made her hold back. But she would have yielded, I am positive, for it is rare indeed that she does not end by doing as I wish. I was at her feet, ravished, bewildered, fascinated by her look. I vowed to myself, for the hundredth time, not to say that Olympia—when, suddenly, it was too much for me (she had not, in the meantime, asked me again); my lips parted, an unknown power caused my tongue to tremble, and I heard myself, in spite of me—whilst, indeed, I was thinking to the contrary—say in a clear, distinct voice, in a tone of conviction, even: "Olympia does resemble the Queen of Spades!"

SALLIE R. HEATH.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 1, 1880.

A conversation with Senator Traylor during the last week relieved us of any misapprehension concerning the charter of San Francisco introduced by him, and now pending in that branch of the Legislature. The bill prepared by Mr. Swift and the one prepared by Mr. McClure are both being examined and carefully considered by Senators Traylor, Neumann, Dickinson, and Hittell. These gentlemen are in entire accord, and will preserve, in the bill reported by them, all the wise restrictions, checks, and guards that distinguished the original Consolidation Act as prepared by Horace Hawes. If Mr. McClure, whom we designated in our last issue as a better politician than lawyer, has hidden any cat in the meal-tub, it will be discovered and driven out. Some features as recommended by Mr. Swift will be modified, especially those that gave unusual power to the Mayor—a Republican Legislature will naturally prefer to entrust power to a Republican Governor who is known to be honest rather than to a sand-lot Mayor known to be not honest. The charter, as reported by the four Senators named, will pass the body to which they belong, and will go to the House with every prospect of passing that body. We would not be understood as intimating that Senators Enos, Conger, Kane, and others of the opposition will not unite with Republican Senators in supporting the bill, as we know nothing of their views or proposed action. Senator Traylor impressed upon us the assurance that the community need feel no apprehension of any seriously bad legislation. The revenue bill will, in his opinion, contain some provisions unjust to mining and other corporations in reference to double taxation; will affect banks other than the commercial banks, i. e., savings banks, unfavorably; but, as a whole, is not a bad measure, and will have a tendency to reduce taxation upon real estate in the city of San Francisco and upon small farms throughout the State. The great mass of bills resulting from ignorance, passion, and class prejudice will not become laws, but will be defeated.

It is true that Mr. J. C. Flood has sold to Mr. John W. Mackay all his interests in stocks, mines, mills, reduction works, railroads, water, lumber, and flume companies in Nevada, retiring absolutely and entirely from mines and mining. Mr. Mackay will press the business with renewed energy, giving it his personal attention, as heretofore. The relation of Mr. Fair remains unchanged. Mr. Flood has not sold his interest in the Nevada Bank, nor parted with any of his real property. He does not contemplate leaving the State, except for such excursions of pleasure as may allure him in the future. The Menlo mansion, now nearly three years under construction, will be completed in one year. It is now ready for the fresco painters, and it is not improbable that Mr. and Mrs. Flood may, during the year, visit the East and Europe with a view to furnishing the new home and providing for its embellishment such marbles, pictures, bronzes, and other furniture as such a residence must necessarily demand. Mr. Flood has not yet abandoned his intention of building an elegant town house upon the block at the corner of Mason and California Streets.

One point about the projected canal of M. De Lesseps appears to us to have been inadequately considered. M. De Lesseps proposes to make a short "sea-level" canal without locks. If we are not misinformed, the Atlantic mean sea-level at the isthmus of Darien is some twenty odd feet higher than the Pacific sea-level. When it is high tide on the Atlantic, it is, we presume, not always high tide on the Pacific. This would make the difference still greater. What would be the consequence: a pretty strong western current?—or a gradual equalization of the two levels? If the latter hypothesis is absurd, has not the former an important bearing on the question of a lockless canal? We write without profession of knowledge, but as one desiring light.

If there is to be an election for fifteen free-holders to form a charter, there should be but two tickets—one representing the sand-lot, and the other uniting and consolidating all parties, creeds, classes, colors, and nationalities—in favor thereto. As there should be no politics in making it, there should be no politics in making it.

KISS ME TO-NIGHT.

Kiss me to-night, love, kiss me!
A warm and a passionate kiss,
For the sake of the days that are bygone
And the joy we may know in this.
These moments we have, and no one
The bliss of our hearts can blight,
If close in my arms I hold you,
And you kiss me, dear one, to-night.

Kiss me to-night, love, kiss me!
Let your arms round my neck entwine;
The touch of your lips will thrill me
And run through my veins like wine.
The cares of my life will vanish,
Its darkness be changed to light;
The world will be filled with music
If you kiss me, dear love, to-night.

Kiss me to-night, love, kiss me!
We never again may meet—
Alone we may walk life's pathway
With weary and wounded feet;
We vainly may list for each other,
We may look with a tear-dimmed sight.
For love's sake, my darling, my angel,
Kiss me, oh, kiss me, to-night!

SACRAMENTO, February 21, 1880.

JOSIAH.

FOUR CONSPIRING PLANETS.

The Probable Effect of their Simultaneous Perihelia.

From a lecture delivered in this city by Mrs. Emma Harding Britten we extract the following disquieting predictions, without, however, being ourselves very much disquieted, for a reason which Mrs. Britten states, in a part of the lecture here omitted, in these words: "The more intellectual and spiritual, who have faithfully endeavored to live as far as possible in harmony with the dictates of law, will greatly benefit in their physical health by the etherization of the air, and consequent improvement of climate which must follow"—the astronomical event which is to be so fatal to the wicked. Seriously, the remarks of Mrs. Britten seem to us worthy of attention:

"The coincident perihelia of four planets is a remarkable event, and marks an astronomical era on the clock of our globe. Such epochs bring new light to the observing eyes of astronomers, who already conjecture that our entire solar system is being drawn by some invisible or unknown force toward an undetermined point in the direction of 'star twelve' of the constellation Hercules. No part of infinite space is unoccupied, and no finite horizon exists amid the mighty march of creation, except man's ignorance. What logical results may now be lawfully traced from the simultaneous perihelia of four great planets? And how will such a mere drop as Earth bear the crisis of united attraction from four such mighty masses, whose influence will draw from every available source within our system?

"The effects will develop slowly, in the regular order of sequence which marks the natural history of Earth. No sudden cataclysm will inaugurate its comparatively short duration, and many will fail to realize the changes it will effect until its period of maximum exertion is past. A minute eccentricity, only apparent to the exact mathematics of astronomy, will slightly disturb the polar axis. Already we are experiencing some of its effects. The greatest disturbances will occur in the air and water, or movable envelope of our planet. These will act upon all forms of animal and plant life; and the more perfectly developed types of each will be best able to meet and survive the trying changes. The fittest will survive. During these perihelia Earth's climate will be especially irregular: unusual cold, alternating with unseasonable heat, throughout the agitation already commenced. Great agitation will occur among different races of men. Many forms of malarial disease will appear. Not only fever and pestilence may rage in some localities, but atmospheric disturbances will affect many forms of vegetable as well as animal life. Local floods are likely to occur.

"The reaction of atmospheric waves and extraordinary electric tension will inevitably succeed such concentrated planetary attraction, and render possible many developments of latent spores, awaiting less atmospheric pressure and new electrical conditions to evolve new forms of life. Crops will be unequal and scanty in some localities, but especially flourishing in others—depending on their immediate surroundings. As all mental conditions of man are intimately connected with the physical condition of the earth he inhabits, social, intellectual, and national disputes will arise, with local famines and physical pestilence. Strife will be manifest in the warfare of contending nations.

"The coming changes, although not wholly gradual, will be no more sudden than the apparent sunrise of a steadily advancing orb. In 1881½ the star Alpha, in the Dragon, passes the shaft of the Great Pyramid, where the prophecy of this perihelion was unmistakably recorded over five thousand years ago, clearly engraved in solid marble."

A Study of Umbrellas.

Essentially a bird of sunshine, I am driven by such days as this, with its gloomy, drizzling, dripping clouds and be-draggled pedestrians, to my perch, to meditate and cogitate; and, exciting topics of thought being few, I fall to reading histories in the umbrellas as they pass. This is the hour for "mass," and the sheltering cloth has an aggressive, arrogant bearing which scents Kearneyism in the wind. They are plebeian umbrellas these, with cotton tops and too flexible whalebone ribs. How they ebb and flow, rise and fall, with the changing tide of enthusiasm in their bearers! There goes one, pell-mell, through all obstacles of wind or rain. That owner evidently intends to carry heaven, at least, by storm, if not the world. This one has a coquettish air; peep beneath, and see a Celtic flirt, in green shawl and purple bonnet, prepared to capture Denis and all his followers. That one has a meek and subjected look, which only long-continued snubbing could impart, and it reveals a hen-pecked husband. The next has a defiant bearing, and the glimpses of dabbled petticoats beneath speak plainly of the presence of the early better-half of the unfortunate Benedick. About another there is a melancholy droop which speaks of better days; its frayed covering was once rich silk; its discolored handle rested in carved racks in frescoed halls, or was borne in daintily gloved hands. It has passed, with its owner, through all gradations, from luxurious wealth through shabby gentility to struggling respectability, and now it shelters abject poverty. Could it speak, it might relate a tale so harrowing as to melt the coldest heart. That one might tell the vicissitudes of a felon's life; this one of a gambler; that of a nice old doctor; that of a learned professor.

Do you see that dainty umbrella just down the street? The reverse of that picture would be two laughing, happy school-girl faces, plotting mischief—future raids on a teacher's patience, or ambuscades for school-boy hearts. There, under that one, is a pair of happy lovers; she never dreams that, owing to his masculine selfishness, her best bonnet is being deluged—that trickling streams chase each other over the pretty wrap which cost her time and pains and tired fingers; her heart is on fire with his passionate words, and her finery, for once, is forgotten. See that tip-tilted cotton 'tent that shelters—or rather aims, but fails, to shelter—a true countryman. His hat is pushed back, his eyes and mouth are wide open to take in the sights, and he never heeds the rain-drops which drip from the point above upon his inquiring nose. There is a solid, heavy umbrella, which tells of bonds and bank accounts and good credit. Another one dodges quickly round the corner—for it owes a bill, and can't pay it, to that angry-looking one crossing the street to intercept the meditated flight. This one has been to the war, for its ribs are broken and its battle with the world are nearly over; like the poor, tired gray head beneath it, it will be laid away with a heavy heart, and its survivors will tell of a life well spent and rest well earned.

There goes a careless school-boy; his umbrella is carried under-arm; pokes unhappy toads, or assists in sailing dangerously frail craft on stormy, road-side seas. The rain, he thinks, is better than undesired shelter. There is the traditional green gingham veteran, protecting the faded charms of an antiquated belle. No danger of those tight curls subsiding into unlovely humidity when beneath the ample folds of this stanch survivor of a past generation. That nobby umbrella and well-cut ulster are the accessories of the girl, or boy, of the period, but look closer and you'll see the banged hair. But the clouds are lifting, the rain is at an end, and the umbrella-bearers "fold their tents like the Arabs, and silently steal away."

BUTTERCUP I.

Funny Fifth Column of the New York Times gives us an elaborate and interesting editorial treatise upon the modes of exterminating flies, a dissertation founded upon a fact. A new method of exterminating flies had been invented. It was simply this: Put molasses on the floor, in lines or circles, and, in parallel lines or concentric circles, place a train of gunpowder; when the unconscious flies are feeding, fire the train, and up go the flies. Two boys tried it upon the bald head of their sleeping father, a good deacon in Connecticut. We quote:

This deacon resides in a Connecticut village, and is in the possession of a bald head of a very devout and venerable appearance. Naturally, he suffers a great deal from flies, who, with the malicious and irreverent habit of their kind, take pleasure in holding balls and parties on his head. His two sons—boys of tender years, but of remarkable enterprise—heard the deacon read aloud, some time since, from his favorite country paper, the gunpowder device for the extermination of flies. He soon forgot all about it, but his boys remembered it. They hated flies, and they loved their father. They could not bear to see his beloved scalp danced over by wicked flies, and they resolved to try the gunpowder experiment, merely as an expression of their filial affection. The deacon is in the habit of sleeping soundly in his chair every Sunday afternoon, and last Sunday the boys seized the opportunity thus offered to them, and softly dropped a little molasses on the exact top of his head. Around this bait they heaped up a little circle of gunpowder. They could not afford to buy much powder, but they made a quarter of a pound go as far as it would, and there is no doubt that they would have willingly lavished an entire pound in the sacred cause of filial devotion, if they had been able to procure it. In a short time the deacon's head was black with flies. The youngest boy said that there was "mornamillion" of them, but perhaps he exaggerated. At any rate, when the match was deliberately applied to the powder, not a fly escaped, and had there been double the quantity of flies they would all have been exterminated.

Of course the boys meant well, and we should blame, not them, but the writer of the lying letter which suggested to them their kindly intended but disastrous scheme. They are still expiating their errors in dark rooms, lying exclusively on their faces, and wondering how their mother ever developed so much strength of arm. The deacon will probably recover during the course of the winter, provided erysipelas does not set in, but his left ear vanished with the flies, and it is doubtful if he will ever regain the use of his eyes. In case he should recover, he intends to find out the man who wrote the letter concerning gunpowder and flies, and to hold a short interview with him. He is a large and muscular deacon, and he will infallibly keep his word.

Some time ago a rather prominent lawyer in one of the upper counties of this State was fined $25 for contempt of court. The lawyer didn't think that he would ever be called upon for the fine, and he pursued his usual course, without giving himself any uneasiness. One day a deputy sheriff approached him, and stated that he had instructions to collect the fine.

"I won't pay it," said the lawyer. "I can't afford it."

"And you won't pay it?"

"No, sir."

The deputy reported accordingly, and an order for the arrest of the lawyer was issued; and accordingly he was arrested and committed to jail. It is rather unprofitable to send a man to jail for refusing to pay a fine, for the mere fact of his lying in jail would only involve additional expense. A short time after the lawyer's incarceration a man applied at the jail and wanted to hire a convict. Under a recent act of the Legislature you can employ jail men at fifty cents per day. The jail was rather scarce of laborers, and the man finally agreed to take the lawyer, who followed his master home. It happened that the latter had considerable law business on hand, which he assigned to the lawyer, telling him to work or he would send him out to plow. Several cases came up in court, and the lawyer conducted them. The court could not enter a constitutional objection to the course of the lawyer, for his legal tongue had not been silenced when the fine was imposed. The man, of course, had a lawful right to assign such work as he chose to his man. By the time the fine was worked out, the lawyer had gained four suits and attended to $300 worth of other business, all for a kind of nominal fifty cents per day.

REMINISCENCES OF AN ATOM.

Suggested by Figuer's "To-morrow of Death."

Slowly but surely I felt the time drawing near when soul and body should part forever, and the mysteries of the future stand revealed. More and more I felt convinced of the folly of any mortal power attempting to determine the destination of that Force which is generally conceded to be immortal. My death-bed was harrowed by conflicting emotions and discussions. One friend was endeavoring to prove, with all the eloquence of faith and revelation, the, to him, undeniable existence of heaven and hell. One friend tried to console me for my exit by the assurance that all the pains and pleasures of this life would be re-experienced in another, higher, though still material sphere. Another insisted that I should give no thought to the future, as it existed no more for the soul than for the body.

As for myself, I clung to the deductions which to a disciple of modern philosophy are irresistible. If it has been proven that the physical part of us never dies, but merely "suffers a change into something rich and strange," how utterly improbable that the psychical and infinitely superior part of our being should undergo annihilation. Besides, all Force persists forever, and I could not make up my mind to relinquish the idea that the future held something that mortal eyes and mortal science could not grasp. Therefore I eagerly awaited the moment of dissolution, when all doubts would be at an end and all disputes forever settled. At last it came, and with a sigh of relief I freed myself from my earthly habitation, and—after one last glance at the lifeless clay, which was so like, and yet so horribly unlike, the breathing man of a moment ago—guided by an invisible hand, I soared into the Unknown.

With lightning-like rapidity I flew onward, but always upward, past all material objects which had heretofore come under my daily observation, but of which my spiritual eyes now took but little notice; up, up, into that luminiferous ether which bounds the vision of mortal man. Then a voice bade me pause and look below.

A shadowy hand pointed downward to an object which, from my height, seemed a small, dark ball, circling upon its axis with dazzling rapidity, and pursuing its course around the great central body, with apparently nothing to prevent a breath from launching it into space. It was the Earth, the planet on which lay the dust that had so lately been animated by my restless spirit. As I hung above it, watching with wonder its solitary, uniform course upon a path from which there seemed no turning, I realized how completely at the mercy of some great, absolute Power were the millions of human beings whom I had left upon its surface. Nothingness above, around, below—a mere ball suspended in air, which the slightest change of nature's laws would hurl from its orbit into eternity.

But I had little time for reflection, and was again hurried onward. Soon all thoughts of, all care for, my former place of habitation left me, and I only longed for the revelations about to be afforded.

At last we paused once more, and the voice of my invisible guide informed me that we had reached the inner boundary of that rare, pure ether where I would leave behind me the last remnant of mortality and doubt. Through the vibrating, quivering, jelly-like mass, which for one instant longer held my spirit, I marked out the long tracks of light that once enabled me to perceive the planets which I had lately almost touched. Then, with a sigh of relief, I turned my back upon all earthly things and plunged into the Beyond.

For a moment the darkness was so intense that I knew not which way to turn; but, as my guide had deserted me, I was convinced that at last I had reached that abyss which receives all liberated Force; that there was nothing to prevent me from roaming whither I would, until perchance I should be called to exist once more in human form.

After a time I became accustomed to the darkness, and with my spiritual eyes was enabled to explore the "hereafter" of the religionists.

All was chaos; all was blackness. There was no sound at first to break the awful stillness. The volume of Force, each atom of which had preceded me, was inanimate for the time, still persisting, it is true, until the moment of its re-utilization; but for the present without purpose and without thought.

Around me, as I passed them, I saw that dark suns were burning, but there was nothing to conduct their light, and they shed no radiance upon the horrors of their world. I still hovered upon the brink of the abyss, for I knew that by one plunge therein all individuality would be lost—all power of thought, and perhaps of memory, would be at an end forever. So I circled around the edge, hesitating to make the plunge which I knew was inevitable, if from no other cause, as a relief from the horrors of which I was the only apparent observer. Countless souls had doubtless been freed since my emancipation, but they were as invisible to me as I to them. I sped onward through the darkness, with no settled purpose. The stillness was at first deathlike, and more horrible than the wildest oaths and blasphemies of the Bible's hell. Soon, however, I became aware of a dull, hissing noise, such as is produced upon our planet by the fusion of metals, but intensified a thousand times. The invisible furnaces were lost in the intense darkness, but the heat was terrific—more powerful than the wildest imagination could picture the internal fires of Earth. It was stifling, suffocating—for "the loss of heat being simply the abstraction of molecular motion by the ether which encircles our world, where this medium is absent no cooling can take place." Now and again a planet—which, obeying nature's laws even here, revolved around its mockery of a sun—molten by the intense heat, fell at my feet, a river of fire. There was stillness no longer. The roaring and explosion of the fusing metals increased every moment, until, to my excited imagination, the air seemed filled with the hoarse cries of innumerable wild beasts and the hissing of countless angry serpents. The horrors of the place, added to the intense heat and impenetrable darkness, I could endure no longer, and with one wild cry I plunged into the abyss at my feet. FAG, M. P.

Philadelphia has a fashionable cookery club, with a Boston teacher, of course.

DIVORCED.

They had been man and wife for fifteen years; for fifteen years had known and borne joy and sorrow together; had experienced the rich blessing of fatherhood and motherhood; had wept over a dead child's face together; through sun and shadow had walked together—and now they could no longer find peace under the same roof; they were to be divorced. Neither knew how they had come to this. In the beginning there had been affection and delight; but, after a time, the husband compared his wife with other women, and found that this one possessed a brighter eye, and that one more perfect curves of cheek and chin, and yet another a neater foot and more taste in dress; one sparkled in conversation, and her neighbor sang till the heart was enthralled at her tones; why had not the woman he had chosen all these beauties and charms? And she? She did not at first compare him with other men, but she wondered that he seemed to care less for a kiss from her, and that his manner lost the fine, impalpable air of courtesy and deference that love evokes. But the "Little rift within the lute"

Was there, and it slowly widened through the years till all the music that began when they first loved had become mute—until one night they sat full of memories. Memories are usually sad guests, and especially memories of the past ecstasy that once we felt, when life was an atmosphere of confidence and love; and these two, brooding over the evening fire, made no exceptions to this hard rule. The children had felt constraint, and a vague sorrow that was like a burden on their hearts; so they crept to bed, and did not whisper as was their habit, but lay close to each other and wondered in a childish way at things they could not understand. The wife was mending the clothes, as she had done, week after week, for fifteen years. The rocking-chair vibrated or stood still, as her thoughts moved her soul only. She carefully refrained from glancing at the still figure across the room, and kept her face calm and indifferent. The husband roused at last from his thoughtful posture, and looked at his wife. Something in her attitude recalled the girl he had wooed, when he had felt he must win or life would not be worth the living. He looked again, and seemed to see the face that had bent over him so anxiously, when the fever burned in his veins and his life lay in the balance. The power of the past was upon him, and, when he spoke, it softened his voice to a minor key:

"Do you want all the children, Martha?"

She felt her heart almost stifling her, for she had thought of the children constantly, and longed to know what arrangement could be made concerning them, but had not had the courage to put her thought in words. She looked at her husband with a pale face and eyes full of suffering.

"I would like to have them all, Ben, if you are willing, but I have tried to learn to part from some of them."

"You can keep them all. I did think I would take Bob and go to the mines, but I expect he is better off where he is."

Martha Grant said nothing, only looked at her husband, and then hastily left the room.

He dropped his head in his hands, and sat quite still; it was not so easy after all, this severing of the intricate growth of so many years; and he felt that the future did not look so fair, nor freedom so desirable, as he had persuaded himself to believe. His children had often felt the force of his anger, and he had sometimes thought with envy of the nonchalant liberty of his bachelor friends; but now he felt more pangs than he liked to entertain when the final parting from his children stood before his vision like a perfect drawing. His wife might not be the fairest or most accomplished woman he knew, but she had loved him, which these women had not, and she had borne many things for his sake which they perhaps would not have borne; and he was used to her and her ways. He always knew that if he tried he could rouse her sympathetic interest in his troubles and in his successes. Other women might be lovely, but could he, with his gray locks and sober ways, ever hope to win them? And would a fair woman, tender and delicate, be suited to take upon herself and successfully carry the burdens his wife would have to bear? Martha had been a brave, strong woman, and in all her trials—and they had been not a few—she had been patient as most women. Of course her temper had flamed at times, but had he always been mild? She had sometimes seemed weary and disheartened; but had he not also questioned destiny, and longed for a different fate? Well, it was likely that most people had times of dissatisfaction, and seasons when their best friends looked ugly and disagreeable. Poor Martha! she was somewhere now, crying because she was to keep all the children. How queer women were; they cried if they did not get their way, and they cried if they did.

Martha left her husband's presence and went to the bed where her two girls were sleeping. Their faces lay on the same pillow, and the slight fingers of one clasped the hand of the other. Their expression was the relaxed, solemn one of deep slumber; and the mother stood hushed, looking at them and vaguely wondering where her children were—if these were they, or did they wander in some unknown land that the dreamer alone may enter? Would they ever stand as she stood, and gaze at their children asleep, while the husband and father sat in another room, ready to break away from them as from some dark evil? So she slept beside her sister the night before her wedding day, and dreamed of the coming hour that was to crown her queen of one heart for life. So she slept for many nights after, close within strong arms that were to be her tower of help, and against a breast that had promised to be her shield through all changes. How proud he was of Bob, the first boy, as the little shapeless thing opened its blinking eyes and gave him a vacant stare. No glance from the eye of beauty ever thrilled him as did this meaningless gaze. She would not think longer, but, kissing her girls, and going to Bob's bed for another look and kiss, she went to her room.

In the morning the family met around the breakfast table, but with constraint and lack of cheerfulness. To-day Mr. Grant was to leave the home that had for so long chafed him with its cares and bound him with its viewless chains. He was to leave his wife and children, and see if the world could not yield him more pleasure than lay in their power to bestow. His wife had carefully prepared his clothes, and various little packages for his comfort were stowed away where he would not see them till he was far away. She had grown so used to caring for him, you see. When the hour for parting came, he shook his wife by the hand, and we will not look at their faces nor peer too curiously into their hearts. The children were too frightened and awed to cry, and besides they did not really comprehend that their father was leaving them forever. It is so difficult for childhood to understand final farewells. They kissed him, and put their soft hands up to his shoulders, forgetting past pain inflicted by him, and remembering only that father was going away for a long time.

"Be good to the children, Martha," was all he could say as he turned to the door and stumbled over the threshold.

"I will do the best I can, Ben; and you will take care of yourself?"

"It doesn't matter about me; I'll get along. Good-bye."

He drove away, and they watched him as he went. Well, the world never could be the same again, and nothing—not even eternity—could erase the memory of what had been. No matter what the coming years held for them, they would never forget this day, and the husband and father who left them for another start in life.

And can he ever forget the past, and those who will never wait for his return? He may die in a strange land, and they know it not. They may be laid away to sleep, and no tidings of the change reach him. Each now has freedom and liberty to form new ties, but what avails liberty to the one who is in chains to memories that nothing can lay to rest? We see these things every day, and let each one judge for himself if they be good and profitable things.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1880.

V. SAVELLI.

Another Stroll through the Art Museum.

BOSTON, February 10, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—I haven't finished my art ramblings yet, by a deal. Passing from the Egyptian room into the Archaic Greek Gallery, one must walk over the cast-off fetters of art—for the ancient Greeks threw aside the conventionalities of their Egyptian neighbors, and while in a manner they imitated them, they improved on their models.

In the first Greek Gallery we see the signs of that liberality and freedom which were to pave the way for the feet of the immortal Phidias. On the left of the room as we enter are casts in plaster—the gifts of Charles Sumner—from the eastern and western pediments of a "Temple of Minerva." The originals were restored by Thorwaldsen, and are now in the Museum of Berlin. The larger and more interesting of the two represents the contest of Hercules and Læonædon, in the first expedition against Troy. The figures are all true to nature, save in one respect; but, compared with the best and freest of the Egyptian sculptures, they are magnificent. The one great fault is the one prevalent in all statues of the age, i. e., the expression of the faces. The lips are drawn into a bland smile, so that both victor and vanquished have the appearance of saying in the most off-hand manner, while they give and receive deadly blows, "Oh, certainly, anything to oblige you!" Achilles plucks the lance from his wounded breast with the facial expression of a ballet dancer who kisses her hand to the audience after some extraordinary pas seul. But with the faces all such incongruity ceases. The figures are boldly done.

There is a queer little bust of Apollo which attracts the notice of but few—as it stands in a corner and is very small—but it is an infallible remedy for the blues. If the most miserable man in the world were to look at it he would laugh, for it has the jolliest, roundest, quaintest little face imaginable. Apollo is usually represented as the most dignified of gods; and, whether we take the Belvedere or the Apollo of Praxiteles, we find the look of calm dignity equally expressed in both; but this one is entirely different from any other representation. If the Apollo Belvedere is called the personification of the sublime, surely this little pseudo-archaic bust is the embodiment of the ridiculous.

On the walls of this room hang bas-reliefs from the "Harpy's Tomb" (in Asia Minor), and many grave-slabs covered with unintelligible hieroglyphics and queer outlines of human figures. The rampant lions from the gate of Mycenæ are also here. In the centre is the Dresden Pallas (Minerva), an imitation in marble of a wooden statue, which was colored and draped with real garments. Once a year the maidens of Athens made a crocus-colored robe or "peplus," embroidered it with scenes from Minerva's festivals, and, amid great rejoicing, clothed her statue with their handiwork. This room is somewhat barren, and, with the exception of the objects mentioned, is rather uninteresting.

Passing to the second Greek room, we stand enraptured among casts from the marbles of Phidias and Praxiteles. Casts of the Parthenon frieze look down on us from the walls.

The first thing on which the eye alights is a cast of Praxiteles' "Hermes and the Infant Dionysius" (Bacchus). The statue is horribly mutilated, the legs below the knees being gone; the right arm and part of the left, and all of the infant Bacchus except the trunk, are missing. Mercury is here represented, not as the "light-winged messenger of the gods," but rather as the thoughtful guardian of the child placed under his care. His body leans against the trunk of a tree, a position common to nearly all the statues of Praxiteles. On his left arm sits the child, while the right offers it a bunch of grapes. The pose of the manly head, as if in tender attention to the child on his arm, the magnificent portraying of the muscles in the back and chest, the grace of the whole figure, show that the Venus of Milo has at least an equal, and she stands not alone in her beauty.

The Marble Faun is also in this room—a lithe, joyous, happy figure of the youth whom the chisel of Praxiteles and the pen of Hawthorne have made immortal. The latter describes it thus:

"The Faun is a marble image of a young man leaning his right arm on the trunk or stump of a tree; one hand hangs carelessly by his side; in the other he holds the fragments of a pipe, or some such sylvan instrument of music. His only garment, a lion's skin, with the claws upon his shoulder, falls half way down his back, leaving the limbs and entire front of the figure nude. The form thus displayed is marvelously graceful, but has a fuller and more rounded outline, more flesh and less heroic muscle, than the old sculptors were wont to assign to their types of masculine beauty. * * * The whole statue, unlike anything else that ever was wrought in that severe material, marble, conveys the idea of an amiable and sensual creature—easy, mischievous, apt for jollity, yet not incapable of being touched by pathos."

I shall write further about this room in my next.

MELLIE.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The Cincinnati Commercial, in mentioning Henry Ward Beecher's approval of General Grant at the New York celebration of Lincoln's birthday, says:

"This reminds us of a very doubtful note that was presented at a bank with a certain indorsement on its back. The bank officer examined the note, and then looked at the indorsement, and returned it to the party who presented it, with the remark: 'The face of the note is bad enough, but with that indorsement it is not worth a blank.'"

Our gardeners seem to be a very short-sighted set. Very recently, and probably now, the Central and Southern Pacific railroads have made it a practice to sweep the manure from their cattle cars into the bay. It seems almost criminal that so much high-class fertilization should be allowed to go to waste. Some forward movement on the part of the gardeners of Alameda county, and of this city, would doubtless be met half-way by the railroad company.

The Sun says: For the first time in the history of the country, a man has made his appearance on the stage of public affairs so craving, so greedy, so insatiable in his ambition, that all the military honors enjoyed by Washington, with even higher military rank, and two full terms of the presidency—the same as held by Washington—do not appease his hunger for place, but seem only to have whetted his appetite for office and power. He is now a candidate for a third term, being the first man ever in the White House who has presumed audaciously and contemptuously to turn his back upon the grand example set by the father of his country.

There are many reasons (says the Boston Advertiser) why gentlemen should not give up their seats in horse-cars to ladies. It is not necessary to enumerate them all, but one is that oftentimes a lady accepts a seat when she is only going to ride the distance of a block or two, and the obliging gentleman, who is going to Grove Hill or Forest Hill, frequently has to stand the rest of the way because she relinquishes her place to a third person. A propos of this subject, a most aggravating exhibition of ingratitude was witnessed in a Metropolitan car last week. A lady got in accompanied by a great lot of a boy, fourteen or fifteen years of age, and an elderly gentleman gave his place to her. Presently some one who had been seated on the opposite side arose, whereupon the lady eagerly exclaimed to her overgrown offspring: "There, Charley, there's a seat; take it quickly before any one else gets it."

The Sergeant-at-Arms of the House (says the New Orleans Tribune) has again forbidden the sale of "cold tea," the Congressional name for toddies, at the House Restaurant; yet, strange to say, some of the newspapers are doubtful whether this will be altogether productive of good. It will diminish the amount of Congressional drinking—of that there can be no doubt—but it will, at the same time, lead away a number of members of Congress, who, instead of being at the Capitol attending to the business of the country, will be out on the streets or in some neighboring bar-room looking for a drink. If whisky is banished altogether from the Capitol, those papers insist, Congress will be frequently without a quorum.

We quote the following paragraph from the Nation, as illustrating the conservative Eastern feeling on one phase of the Indian question:

Boston sympathy for the Poncas has, or had a month ago, sufficed to raise six or seven thousand dollars toward the sum deemed necessary to test in the Supreme Court the right of the tribe to be reinstated in their old Dakota home. At this juncture a benevolent lady offered to raise instantly, or herself give, the remainder, if Secretary Schurz could be induced to lend his support to the movement. Mrs. Helen Jackson, the poetess, undertook this mission; and the four letters which make up the correspondence have just been published, with the Secretary's permission. Mr. Schurz states that the appeal from the habeas-corpus decision of Judge Dundey, entered by the United States District Attorney at Omaha, was dropped on his (the Secretary's) representing to the Attorney-General that he did not approve the principles on which the argument was based, so that no money is needed to resist this appeal. Nor can any be usefully employed in testing the right to the original reservation, since "the Supreme Court has repeatedly decided that an Indian tribe can not sue the United States nor a State in the Federal courts." To this Mrs. Jackson rather naively objects, that "lawyers of skill and standing" are "found ready to undertake the case;" and the Secretary can only reply, "Of course there are such. You can find lawyers of skill and standing to undertake, for a good fee, any case, however hopeless. That is their business." He strongly recommends that the money be applied "to the support and enlargement of our Indian schools, such as those at Hampton and Carlisle." Mrs. Jackson expresses her surprise at the suggestion, seeing that the money was given for a different and specific object. Mr. Schurz, therefore, has to explain that he did not mean that the subscribers to the fund should not first be consulted. He assures her that the greatest hope of the Indians lies in the success of his policy of getting them established in severally on land in fee-simple, and that he has grounds for expecting the passage of a bill to this effect at the present session, several having been introduced. Being very desirous that the present revival of interest in the Indian question should be maintained and directed to attainable objects, he can not favor a course which is certain, by ending in failure, to dishearten the philanthropic.

Table decorations are oftener of foliage than flowers. This season, mosses are in demand for low border trimmings for the table, and the begonia family and other hot-house treasures of scantless brilliancy provide all the rich hues required. For tall ornamentations the lance-like palm is in higher request than hitherto. There appears to be a potent unity of association between the lily which graces the toilet of the lady and this tropical foliage of her table almost certain to be seen at the same entertain-

THE PARD'S EPISTLE.

The Old Man Turns Himself Loose in the Legislative Menagerie.

ROOM 40, IN THE LEGISLACHER, March 4, 1880.

OLD SON:—Sence I seen ye last I've sorter recovered from my tussle 'ith Maud 'n Maud's aunt, wich I'm sartin ye'll be glad to hear mentioned. But Bill, ol' son, I'm like the vilet that's bin trod under foot—I'll never hump myself agin ez the Snaggleby ther allus refused to mix good whisky 'ith anythin' but sugar, exceptin' w'en cocktails was in nomination. But ther's all dead 'n gone. I'm a busted community on the matrimony racket. No more fash'nable high-flyers in mine, Bill, 'n I reckon you're on the same lay. Comin' down to bizness, I'm on the lobby racket jest now. I've got kinder reckless sence the ol' gal throwed off 'n me, an' I'm playin' into the hands o' some o' the boys that wants the Normal School moved up to Rawhide, an' I think we'll fetch. Ef we don't, I'm safe on the stock racket anyhow. Me an' Boruck's got the thing dead on the Gorley bill, an' w'en me an' Boruck makes a break somethin's got to come, or we'll cut the traces an' shove off the brakes. I'm talkin', Bill, an' w'en ye hear me howl thar's a wolf out fur an airin', or my name ain't Jim Snaggleby. Then thar's two or three other little rackets, but I'll save 'em till I jump 'em in committee—committees is my strong hold, an' Jack Mannix was tellin' me yesterday that ef I'd work committees ez a specialty I'd clean the Tbird House cleaner 'n a shotgun, an' I b'lieve I would.

I tell ye w'at it is, Bill, we've got the toughest citizens ye ever see to tackle. They're more independent 'n a half-curved mule, 'n the wust in the deck to bust round tryin' to find out w'at the true bizness is that ye've got on hand. Now, thar's that rooster they calls Maybell. To hear him spoutin' 'bout the classics ye'd think he'd tackled Shakspeare in the buck-eye patches o' Grant County; an' w'en it comes down to a good squar cuss in Milton, it seems ez though he'd jumped the claim o' Lucifer himself an' d come up from the iron works to legislate Kearney himself out o' office. W'at Maybell don't know 'bout Heliogabalus an' the youth ther fired the Ephesian dome an' the widders an' orphans, ain't wuth callin' the crowd up to treat on. But Maybell ain't a circumstance to Braunhart. Sam ain't heavy on the classics, but w'en it comes down to a gouge-an'-go-lucky rattle 'ith Tyler, thar ain't nuthin' on the top o' the footstool kin begin to hold a candle to him—not even Tyler. He got bawled afore the Bull House the other day, an' it was better'n the side-show to a snide circus to see him butt his head agin the stone wall—Cowdery (thet's the duck thet swings in at the right time an' fetches the opposition up to the bull-ring) a whackin' away at him on the sit down-or-I'll-knock-ye-down lay, Tyler a hailin' him afore the House to fire him out o' the Legislacher, Fox a beltin' round demandin' thet his language be took down, an' the rest o' the majority a pilin' on top o' him like more mud on a hoodlum stock. An' then to see Braunhart, a standin' 'ith his hands folded across his manly buzzum a gazin' round at the galleries like a lamh jerked up to the slaughter, a remarkin', kinder chipper an' brash like: "Here's a first-class brand o' political victim," or, "W'at's the attorney o' Spring Valley a hev'in me yanked round like a chicken thief fur?"—meanin' Fox—or, "Ye've got a good chance to git even 'ith me"—meanin' Cowdery.

I tell ye, Bill, them ducks ez used to stan' up an' lip back at the Roman Senators d' bust 'emselves ef they could a got onto Braunhart w'en he chucked them defiance at his enemies. Well, they histed him out o' the buildin'; they wouldn't let him chip on the sand-lot, and they played him on the vindication game in the Supreme Court. They beat him all round, an' now he's playin' fur even on ol' Tyler. He's got more dockments 'n d patch Lux & Miller's cow-ranch from fence to fence that he's goin' to pull on w'at he hez quit callin' "the gentleman from Alameda"—he don't keer a continental jingle w'ether Tyler's from Alameda or Siskiyou, but the "gentleman" lead ain't his play at this stage o' the game. Why to-day he draws the case o' Jimmy McGinn against Malachi Keane on ol' criminal practice, an' ef Tyler hadn't objected, an' recess dropped in to back him up, he'd a made the member thet Braunhart scorns to call "the gentleman from Alameda" remember thet Leander Quint, who used to live up in Tuolumne, ye know, was the rooster ther fixed up the hull bizness on him, an' writ the brief, ez they call it, that Braunhart was doin' his level best to knock him down 'ith. But May dropped onto the little game, an' thinkin' perhaps ther'd be a spittoon convention, 'ith ink-stand pints of order, kicked over the traces, an' the boys lost a heap o' fun. I allus thought Doc. May hed some wit an' humor in him; I thought his pleasant smile was the beamin rays o' the candle-light o' a tearin' good time 'ith the boys, but I'm disappointed—ez a good joke an' a high ol' time, the Doc's a failure.

I'm sick o' the way the Republicans try to keep up a reputation fur peaceable legislators—knockin' Tyler galley-west an' crooked in private caucus, an' chuckin' Braunhart out o' the councils o' the State w'enever he prances round shoutin' fur the right to represent his constituents. 'Taint lively enough here to suit me. Mebbe I'm too close onto my flare-up 'ith Maud an' her aunt, but I'm a horse thief ef I wouldn't like to see 'em rule out sech nonsense ez pints of order, previous questions, parli'mentary language, an' sech like. Then ther' would be music, an' no mistake. Never mind, Bill, the Democrats an' the Workin'men is goin' to rule the roost nex' year, an' ef Cowdery, an' Fox, an' Tyler, an' Finlayson, an' Mulholland, an' Adams, an' May poke ther noses inside the door o' the Assembly Chamber ther's goin' to be a row, ye hear me whoop. Ez soon's I bear how my outside lay-outs is figurin' I'll hit ye whar ye live, an' until then think o' me ez

Yer Broken Hearted Ol' Pard,

JIM SNAGGLEBY.

N. B.—I hear ther's a galoot bin slanderin' me, an' I'm layin' fur him. He's crawlin' round tacked onto a sign board displayin' the name o' "Judith." D'ye recollect any o' the boys down in 'Frisco packin sech a holy, infernal, carpet sack sort o' name ez "Judith"? Ef ye do, let me know, an' I'll make him think the day o' judgment's on hand, an' ol' Gabe's knockin' the cobwebs out o' his horn over the back o' Mr. Judith's neck. Ye hear me!

To WM. BELCHER,

Tuttle-town, Tuolumne Co, via Copperopolis.

THE BLIND WHO WILL NOT SEE.

The Bulletin purposely misstates Mr. Engineer Schussler's figures, arguments, and motives, when, in reply to his plain and very direct statement regarding the expenditure of an additional million of dollars by the Spring Valley Company for increased water supply and better facilities for extinguishing fires, he holds that the city should pay a fair interest on this increased expenditure. He says in his card to the Bulletin:

"I wish to state that the proposed hydrant tax was not intended to swell the gross income of the Spring Valley Water Works, but was to form a portion of the gross income as derived from such rates as the Board of Supervisors may fix, thereby giving the rate-payers the benefit of this reduction."

The burdens of the whole water business are now upon the seventeen thousand water consumers. For extinguishing fires, for flushing sewers, for sprinkling streets and parks, and for all purposes of health, cleanliness, beauty, comfort, and safety, wherever water is used and for whatever public purpose, the charge is added to the private consumers. It is now ascertained that, in order to furnish a more complete protection against fires and conflagrations, the company is invited to spend another million. "Yes," says the company, "but who is to pay the interest on this new million of borrowed money?" The answer of the Bulletin is, "Slap it on to the seventeen thousand consumers, or else give the water free." Or, in other words, steal this sixty thousand dollars a year from the citizens who are now overburdened by an excessive water-tax (excessive because unequally distributed), or steal it out of the company's present income by reducing the dividends of stockholders so much. The city demands a better and larger supply of water to extinguish fires. The company is willing to furnish it if paid, by a hydrant tax or other tax, the annual interest on the money so expended.

It is a very plain and simple business proposition. The company will borrow and lay out for the use of the city one million dollars, if the city will pay the interest on that amount. This proposition the Bulletin stigmatizes as "a naked proposition for a subsidy to improve water works which are not in any way to revert to the city." Of course they are not to revert to the city. If so, the city should pay not only the interest, but the principal. The Bulletin is either dishonest or befuddled. If the Bulletin demanded that its landlord should put an additional story upon its printing office, to cost ten thousand dollars, and the landlord should reply, "I will do so if you will pay an added rent of six hundred dollars, which is six per cent. upon my expenditure," would not this be right? and would the Bulletin say, "You must add the story, and we will pay no increased rent; and if we do pay the rent, this upper story should belong to the Bulletin?" Such talk as this is twaddle, and every business man who stops to consider it and analyze it must detect the absurd position in which the Bulletin places itself.

If the municipal government can compel the water company to furnish water to its present capacity, at inadequate and non-compensating rates—which we don't believe—it certainly can not compel the company to enlarge its works, bring more water, and increase its debt and its expenses, without paying for it. If it could, it would be dishonest and dishonorable. This proposition of the water company has no feature of subsidy; and, as the negotiation stands to-day between the city and the company, it is a simple contract on the one side to supply a commodity, and on the other to pay for it. Business men so understand it. The seventeen thousand consumers fully appreciate their position and the relation of their property to this tax, and they do not thank the proprietors of the Bulletin for the endeavor to make their personal quarrel with the company a means of depriving this city of an adequate supply of water to extinguish fires, unless they can steal it from the pockets and dividends of stockholders in the water company, or from the pockets of the seventeen thousand now over-burdened water-rate payers.

Mr. Schussler says, justly, that:

"Collecting their entire water tax from the tax-payers has been a large factor in creating the great dissatisfaction of the community with the water rates, and the water company generally. I took the liberty to suggest the taxing of hydrants, as practiced in many Eastern cities, as one of the fairest and perhaps most equitable modes of reducing the cost of water to the consumers, without this tax being intended to increase the company's income in any manner whatsoever."

If the water tax of this city were placed where it belongs, by some sensible and just plan of distribution, so that all property, real and personal, would pay its quota, and the consumer his quota, this whole business could be easily adjusted. To accomplish this, we look to the present Board of Supervisors, who have the power, and, by the new Constitution, are compelled to perform this duty.

Letter from Sacramento.

DEAR ARGONAUT:

"There's a something comes with the spring.
A lightness or else a weight;
There's a something comes with the spring,
And it seems to me it's fate."

What do you suppose that "something" is that makes us all feel a little different in mind and body from what we do in mid-summer or winter? Mayhap it's the sudden change from the winter. But everything is so lazy and languid. Nothing exactly pleases us, and we invariably reach to some far-off goal. It is possible San Franciscans do not feel this influence under their hracing sea-breezes. But everything in Sacramento smells of pure, sweet air, and those lovely little flowers we call violets, which "by any other name would smell as sweet." Every one is making a garden; the children have begun putting on sun-bonnets, and I saw one little boy's dirty pink toes pattering along the sidewalk. The sun is so warm, and the breeze so balmy and soft. Sacramento is a veritable Italy in the spring-time, and every one seems lazily bappy, or wretchedly miserable, because the hountiful, beautiful spring has brought them none of its pleasures.

There was a violin here last week—a very ordinary looking affair—but ye gods! how that little violin did go and go and go in all sorts of reveries and sonatas and concertos. There was a great tall man stood beside it, some one called J. Wilhelm or Wilhelmj, we don't know which; and then,

Steinway was there, and it banged and clanged and wailed and moaned—equal to Chickering—and Max Vogrich was as much satisfied with its performance as Ketten was; and Emerald Mary was there, to be sure, with her wonderful voice and her Italian name. And Tuesday night that precious Bric-a-Brac Club entertained Russia and Germany and Ireland in a manner truly becoming their good name and their distinguished guests.

At Mrs. Henry Miller's, on Eighth Street, about one hundred and fifty of our prominent people congregated to hear Willie use that violin again, and Herr Max moan melody from Mrs. Miller's Grand; and then, when we were all ready and waiting, don't you think Willie's violin was at the hotel, and Mrs. Miller's piano was Chickering, "horrible, you know!" So we had to be happy listening to Mrs. McCally's sweet voice and Messrs. Lewis and Heymans play the piano, violin, and violincello, and Miss O'Brien render us a pretty little poem, and Mr. Lydston ventriloquize for us. And I think we were all just as bappy, perhaps more so, for these parties all did well, and succeeded in pleasing and amusing, which is certainly as much as the greatest artist living can do. The Bric-a-Bracs were easily distinguished, as they wore little hedges of satin ribbon, with two bees, signifying bric-a-brac tacked on them. This generous club gave us a dainty little supper also. Several paintings by the artist members were exhibited, which were certainly a credit to them, if they did profess nothing but amateurism. 'Twas a happy, jolly, evening, and must certainly have given this Wilhelmj man a good opinion of our good-will and hospitality. They do say there is another club in this city, an "impecunious" sort of an organization, not representing quite the wealth (?) of these busy Bric-a-Bracs. But they boast something better: all the brilliancy and brains of the Legislature, with two of its wittiest and brightest at their head.

Friday night, Miss Rowe gave a vocal recital to her large class in the Baptist Church. The programme was interesting, but rather lengthy, and some good voices made good showing. After the entertainment several mutual friends finished the evening in partaking of refreshments provided by the class.

BETSY AND I.

SACRAMENTO, March 1, 1880.

What They Know About Everything.

Life treads on life, and heart on heart;
We press too close in church and mart
To keep a dream or grave apart!—Miss Barrett.

Love is a sorry slave and a sad master.—Simms.

They oftentimes take more pains who look for pins than those who find out stars.—Fountain.

We should make ill fortune as contemptible to us as it makes us to others.—Beaumont and Fletcher.

Care to our coffin adds a nail, no doubt,
And every grin so merry draws one out.—Dr. Wolcott.

Thought is damnation! 'Tis the plague of devils to think on what they are!—Rowe.

Millions never think a noble thou ht.—Bailey.

God does not require us to live on credit. He pays us what He can, as we earn it; good or evil, heaven or hell, according to our choice.—Charles Midway.

Experience is an excellent spy-glass, but it has this one drawback: that prejudice very often clouds the lens.—Ouida.

Church ladders are not always mounted best
By learned clerks and Latinists professed.—Cowper.

The unhappiness of man proceeds from his inconstancy.—Chateaubriand.

When the little kitten Poetry mews in her tenderest tones, the dog Prose begins to bark furiously, and the little enthusiast is silenced.—Spilthagen.

Death, thou art infinite—'tis life is little.—Bailey.

He who binds his soul to knowledge steals the key of heaven.—Willis.

He that lies most loud is most believed.—Dryden.

There's not a day but, to the man of thought,
Betrays some secret that throws new reproach
On life, and makes him sick of seeing more.—Young.

Nothing is a misery unless our weakness apprehend it so.—Daniel.

Jealousy is a seed sown but in vicious minds, prone to distrust because apt to deceive.—Lansdown.

Joy's a moon reflected in a swamp or watery bog.—Wordsworth.

And conscience, truth, and honesty are made
To rise and fall like other wares of trade.—Moore.

As no roads are so rough as those which have just been mended, so no sinners are so intolerant as those who have just turned saints.—Colton.

I have too deeply read mankind
To be amused with friendship; 'tis a name
Invented merely to betray credulity.

'Tis intercourse of interest—not of souls!—Havard.

SACRAMENTO, February 29, 1880.

N. B. S.

A person who says "My name and address is H. S. Lyman, Pacific Theological Seminary, Oakland," is good enough and sufficiently discreet to write us an impudent letter disapproving of the manner in which we prefer to conduct our business. The Pacific Theological Seminary appears to be a sequestered spot where they teach the young idea how to shoot mud-guns. Some weeks ago a silly young theologian of that institution conceived a grievance against us, and for a fortnight or so he wrote us daily letters of coarse abuse tempered by lack of coherence and illuminated by grammatical and orthographic innovation. His name is David F. Taylor, and if any member of the Faculty (we assume that the P. T. S. has a Faculty) would like to inspect these precious results of theological training, a round dozen of them can be seen at this office. In all friendliness we venture to advise this institution of learning to chain up its pups.

THE CONDITION OF THINGS.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Froude, writing in England almost ten years ago, might have been a prophet writing of San Francisco. He says:

"From a combination of many causes we are passing now into a sea where our charts fail us, and the stars have ceased to shine. The tongue of the prudent speaks stammeringly. The fool clamors that he is as wise as the sage, and the sage shrinks from saying that it is not so. Authority is mute. One man, we are told, is as good as another. Each by Divine charter may think as he pleases, and carve his actions after his own liking. Institutions crumble; creeds resolve themselves into words; forms of government disintegrate, and there is no longer any word of command. In place of the pilots who stood once at the helm, gave their orders, and compelled obedience, we have crews now, all equal—who decide by the majority of votes. We have entered on an age of universal democracy, political and spiritual, such as the world has never seen before; and civilized mankind are broken into two hundred million units, each thinking and doing what is good in his own eyes."

All this is true of us to-day in San Francisco. We have two overshadowing problems on our hands—the Chinese question and the labor question. Superficially considered, the latter of these questions seems to be an outgrowth of the former. Really, as the Argonaut said last week, it has no deeper root than unfettered demagogism, following—and, of course, abusing—almost unlimited license. A certain amount of clap-trap, bile, buffoonery, and bad language has always been, and always will be, an inseparable part of political discussion and industrial agitation. As long as asses are allowed legally to bray we have no legal redress. But we are permitted, under the great unwritten law of self-protection, to shoot the crazy beast who rushes at us with open mouth, threatening to rend us. "Them asses" of the sand-lot have been threatening to "rend us," ever since we failed to squelch their first leaders—so many months ago that it seems years. Yesterday they wanted to hang a lot of us because we have houses and horses and clean shirts. To-day they are silent, content to scowl at us as we pass. Tomorrow they are very likely to roast a few of us alive. Faugh! our dishonor smells to heaven.

They understand these things better in many older and less studiously money-grubbing communities. We can not expect to have alien adventurers in our midst, who are willing to become voters but incapable of being intelligent citizens, without submitting to an infinite deal of ignorant nothing bawled from every throat that has the itch of impudence and the gift of gab. But we are simply asses ourselves to allow "them asses of the sand-lot" to go beyond a fixed and clearly defined line in either speech or action. Fancy an English community tolerating the tongue of this fellow Kearney for a single month. We have submitted to it and to him, with only occasional spasms of lukewarm protest, for eighteen months—and he is still talking. Fancy, if you can, the endurance of public threats—such as those we have submitted to—by the reputable tax-payers, the real workmen—of any other great city in the world. And this brings us face to face with a pertinent query, painful to our local pride: is San Francisco a great city? In situation, market, constituency, prestige, prospects, our city has all the elements of greatness. Of brains, culture, enterprise, we have, perhaps, our fair proportion. But have we that sober undertone of social and mercantile stability which is as much a part of the greatness of a community as is its mercantile prosperity, its letters, or its arts? If we have this, is it because we are so sure of ourselves that the sand-lot rattle-snake has not yet been even scotched, has so far lost not one rattle? A. H.

A Very True Story.

A minister had been invited to preach as a candidate in a little rural church in Northern Pennsylvania, where the members, although only on a par with most distant country churches, liked to flatter themselves that they were "pretty well posted." Before starting for the place, the minister met an old clerical friend, who had had some experience in the same neighborhood, and who advised him to give them some Latin and Greek; it will tickle their vanity, and they'll set you down for a very smart man.

There was a little difficulty in the way of the minister's giving his hearers a dose of Latin and Greek, for he knew no more of either language than the people he was to preach to. But he was equal to the emergency. He was a native of Wales, and spoke Welsh as well as he did English, though these two were the only languages he knew anything about. When he got nicely into his sermon he introduced a little passage of Scripture, and said: "This passage, brethren, has been slightly altered in the translation. It is only in the original Hebrew that you can grasp its full meaning. I will read it to you in Hebrew, so that you may comprehend it more exactly;" and he gave the passage in very good Welsh. The old Deacons looked at each other and nodded approval, as though they would say: "That's the stuff; that's the kind of thing we want."

Presently the minister, who saw by the faces of his hearers that he had made a hit, came upon another Scripture passage that could not be correctly rendered in English. "This passage," said he, "has to be read in the original to be appreciated. In all the languages, there is none I know in which the meaning can be so well expressed as in the Greek. I will read you the verse in Greek;" and again he gave them a long Welsh sentence. Again the deacons nodded approvingly, and before long the minister found it necessary to read a verse in Latin, "so that his hearers might understand it thoroughly," and gave them a little more Welsh.

Everything was going along smoothly, and the minister, as he approached the end of his sermon, thought he would give them just one more taste of the dead languages. "I am about to read you," said he, "another passage on this subject. But it is another of those passages that have been altered in the translation, and I will read it to you in the Chaldaic, in which it was written." He was just about to give them a little more Welsh, when, casting his eye over the congregation, he saw seated near the door a jolly-looking man, who was holding his sides tight to keep from bursting with laughter. The minister took in the situation in an instant. Here was a man in the church who understood Welsh, and who was laughing at the trick which had been played upon the congregation. But not a feature in the minister's face changed. Fixing his eyes straight upon the laughing man, just as the congregation thought he was about to give them the Chaldaic version, he said, again in Welsh:

"For God's sake, my friend, don't say a word about this till I have a chance to talk with you."

The congregation went home satisfied that they had listened to one of the most learned of sermons; the laughing man never told the story; and the minister was soon settled over the church, the people believing that a clergyman who could read the Scriptures in five languages was just the man for them.

A correspondent writes:

"Who is the Rev. G. de F. Folsom, of San Mateo? If the virtuous Bulletin reports this great unknown correctly, he said last Tuesday, before the Bay Association of Congregationalists: 'A nice sense of honor in business dealings is not noticed here as in other places.' If the Rev. G. de F. Folsom is an old citizen of this community, he has hitherto kept himself so secluded from the metropolitan gaze that we of San Francisco wot not of him. If he is an old citizen it would be more modest of him to wait until he were better known before he sits in judgment upon an entire community. If, as I think, he is one recently come into our midst, it would have been more judicious of him to hold his tongue until he knew better what he was talking about. I think the Rev. G. de F. Folsom is an impudent."

We do not know the Rev. Folsom; but we think his language, as quoted, simply states a self-evident proposition. We have been a community too few years to be either a very wise or a thoroughly honest one. San Francisco has been for too many years a city of refuge for the disappointed, the vicious, and the malcontent to admit of anything like systematic concert of honesty. We have had in California few home ties, and until the past few years none that seemed to promise permanence. We have had, therefore, little or no family pride. In business we have been too little specialists and plodders, and too much speculators "all along the line." As merchants, therefore, we have cultivated no healthful esprit de corps. Some one recently spoke of San Francisco as the "rat-pit of civilization," and if the sneer is uncalled for now it certainly has not always been so. If we will look a little closer at our business methods we may see our faults—our dishonesties—in such a clear light that "a nice sense of business honor" will become synonymous with "policy."

His hair was long, yellow, and straight, or at least not curled. He rode into San Antonio on a pony. His boots were spangled with stars, his Mexican hat was heavy with the double toquilla that girdled it, and the horn of his saddle had on it a metal-rimmed plate big enough for a ballet-girl to dance on. When he had taken about twenty drinks his soul waxed warm within him and he remounted his pony for a ride. At the corner of Alamo and Commerce Streets he halted and uttered a yell that made all the glasses and bottles in the saloons for a block around rattle. "I am a Texican," he said, when he had settled down in his stirrups, after the yell; "I am a prairie wolf with steel thorns on my hide; I was raised on mesquit beans boiled in mustang blood, and my first shirt was rawhide. My father was born on a sandbar and sucked a cow-whale, and my mother was a Navajo squaw; I can out-ride a monkey, out-swim a fish, out-jump a kangaroo, out-cuss a bee-bitten parson, and I can shoot out the eye of a baby-flea." Having finished the foregoing oration the cow-boy dug spurs into his pony's flanks, and disappeared in the direction of the railway depot.

Burdette says: All through your life, my boy, cultivate flashes of silence. Now and then an hour of contemplation is worth a week of talk. The friend you love is all the dearer to you when you sit and hold his hand (if that is his gender, my son) and can say nothing to him. When you meet a stranger, my son, who can talk eleven hours a day, avoid him if you can, and don't shoot him if you can possibly get rid of him by any lawful means. And one parting word, Telemachus: Don't talk to a man in a railroad car. He is never, at least rarely, thankful to you. Railway conversation is always tiresome; the listener has to strain his ears to hear, the talker has to strain his voice to speak; if you speak too low you can't hear each other. Never talk to people on the train, strangers or friends, unless you have something to say, and then say it and close your shell. Don't talk in the mere effort to pass away the time. You will only make the hours infinitely heavier. Of course, circumstances and the people you meet, their habits and varying dispositions, will show you when and where to make liberal exceptions to these rules; but don't talk, never, never talk on the train to a man who doesn't want to talk, and only keeps up his part of the conversation from courtesy. And if you can't tell when a man doesn't really want to talk with you, my son, you had better get a position as teacher in some asylum for the deaf and dumb, and learn to lose your voice entirely as fast as you can.

The following neat retort is to the credit of the New York World: The London Telegraph commends the career and example of the late Sir Charles Pressly to the attention of Americans, "chiefly in connection with the fact that he retired from the public service in 1864, having faithfully, ably, and zealously performed his duties for six-and-forty years." Oh, thanks! How very kind! And as one good turn deserves another, allow us to commend to the attention of Englishmen the career and example of the still living Mr. William Hunter, Second Assistant Secretary of State, chiefly in connection with the remarkable fact that he has faithfully, ably, and zealously performed his duties for one and fifty years, and has not yet, happily for the country, retired from the public service. It will be seen that it will take our esteemed English friend five years to come in.

Heliotrope is the new color to be introduced in spring silks, grenadines, and wool goods. It is defined as a false purple by the merchants, and is precisely the rosy purple seen in the newly-blown heliotrope. Next this is the coachman's drab, which includes several of the light cream brown shades used for coachmen's livery. These shades will be used in wool suits of a single color and entirely of one material, made up simply with a surtout and full skirt for walking and traveling dresses. Green shades, such as bronze, olive, and the darkest bottle-green, will be much used in combinations with figured stuffs; this is also true of the Japanese blue shades that are popularly known as peacock and gendarme; also the turquoise and sapphire-blue tints.

LITERATURE.

Judge Jere. S. Black writes the leading article in the North American Review for March, on "The Third Term." He is "ferminist" it. The Hon. W. E. Stoughton follows with an article favoring it. Is there no middle course?

The Indianapolis Journal's poet has heard Emma Abbott, and jumps at an innocent and unsuspecting public in this style:

Adieu, O peerless bird of melody!
We wave tear-spangled hands in fond adieu;
For every limpid song poured out by you
Fell in our hearts and brimmed them lavishly.

Mr. Swinburne says that, from well-nigh the first years he can remember, he has "made the study of Shakspeare the chief intellectual business and found in it the chief spiritual delight of his whole life." Nobody could have written so bad a book about Shakspeare as Mr. Swinburne has done, without very closely misstudying him through a long series of wasted years.

Mr. Sidney Lanier, a writer of indifferent verses, who was pitchforked into a transient notoriety by his selection to write a very bad ode for the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia, is to publish a work on "The Science of English Verse." The necessity of justifying his errors of ignorance pleads strongly for his presumption.

Talleyrand's memoirs will be printed next July, at which time the author's prohibition expires by limitation. Meantime, publishers are offering the custodian of the MS. such sums to violate the dead man's wishes that he thinks of leaving France to preserve his honor.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, publish, seasonably, a book entitled The Inter-oceanic Canal and the Monroe Doctrine. The author's qualifications for the task—or any task—may be judged from the fact that he is opposed to the construction of the canal unless it be constructed by Americans. If in business matters any sentiment is more offensive than any other it is the sentiment of patriotism.

In the February Macmillan Cetawayo has an account of the recent war. Cetawayo "brings to his task a mind ripened by culture and instructed by observation, singular powers of analysis, and an accurate acquaintance with his subject." Vide the book reviews, passim.

It is said that Parnell the agitator is a great-grandson of Parnell the poet. The relationship disgraces Parnell the poet without dignifying Parnell the agitator.

Mrs. Southworth says that she began to write from necessity and continues from love. We are thankful that we did not create the necessity, and that it is not for love of us.

Nothing new about this spelling reform. Chaucer practiced it. In 1368 he wrote:

"Ful well she sang the service divine
Entuned in her nose ful sweetly."

Nothing new in the singing reform either, apparently.

Boston littérateurs are industriously writing a memorial history of that city, against the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its settlement by the whites—next year. We venture to suggest the following as suitable headings for chapters in the first volume: "The Creator Determines to Make Boston." "Preliminary Surveys." "Founding of the Stellar and Solar Systems." "The Earth." "Preparation of the Earth—Various Geological Catastrophes and Periods." "The Time Ripe: Building of Boston." "Creation of the Baked-Bean Vine and the Brown-Bread Tree." "Adam and Eve Created and Placed in Boston." "Opposition of Susan B. Anthony to the Marriage of Adam and Eve."

The Marquess of Bute's recently published translation of the Roman Breviary is the first translation yet made of it out of Latin into English. Every line of it was written by the hand of the marquess himself, who has been engaged on the work for ten years. Some notion of the magnitude of the work may be gained from the fact that it comprises over three thousand closely printed pages in double column—as much matter as would fill twenty ordinary volumes. "Breviary," by the way, is from the Latin brevis, short.

Mr. Ruskin has sent from England to Walt Whitman, at Camden, for five complete sets of Leaves of Grass. Mr. Ruskin, in a letter, says the reason Mr. Whitman's books excite such furious criticism is, "They are deadly true—in the sense of rifles—against all our deadliest sins." We did not know Mr. Whitman's books had excited any furious criticism. As to their truth—well, certainly, they have "more truth than poetry," but it is the meanest and nastiest species of truth in all literature.

His Honor our Right Reverend Mayor in God, while using all sorts of abusive and blackguard epithets against his political opponents, has, so far as we have observed, abstained from the use of the adjective "lecherous." The exclusive use of this word has been left to his superior in authority, Denis.

CXVIX.—Sunday, March 7.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Soup—Madras Mulligatawny.
Fried Trout. Lyonnaise Potatoes.
Brains, with White Sauce, Served in Paper Cases.
Stewed Beets à la Poitevine.
Asparagus.
Roast Veal.
Indian Salad, French Dressing.
Ice Cream. Fancy Cakes.

Fruit-bowl of Apples, Pears, Oranges, and Bananas.
How to STEW BEETS à LA POITVINE.—Boil, peel, and cut in slices a sufficient quantity of red beets; fry a chopped onion in two ounces of butter, add half an ounce of flour and dilute with half a pint of good broth; mix well; set on the fire until it boils, then add the beets and season with salt and pepper; boil slowly ten minutes, finish with one pat of butter and one tablespoonful of vinegar. Serve hot.

INTIMIDATION.

I will not see, in mockery,
Thy rose-red lips compressed,
Unless they pay the penalty
And make my own lips blessed.

I warn thee, then, this truth to heed:
Where law and love do join,
A fine must follow naughty deeds,
And kisses are its coin.

So, be thou kind, and loyal, too;
Pout not thy lips in scorn,
Else all their sweets shall mine subdue
And leave thee all forlorn.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1880.

SIGNA.

AGAMEMNON.

From Rossiter W. Raymond's "Camp and Cabin."

(CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.)

After making the acquaintance of Mrs. O'Ballyhan, I was lost in wonder that from such a couple the keen, energetic, and straightforward son could have sprung. It was a clear case of what the philosophers call atavism—the reappearance, in some remote descendant, of ancestral qualities which are entirely wanting in the intermediate generations. Doubtless, I reflected, the stimulating atmosphere of this newest New World had developed the dormant germs of character in Young Bullion.

Few words will suffice for Mrs. O'Ballyhan. She was, perhaps, the most utterly negative, washed-out woman I ever met. In all my observation of her I detected only two feelings that had survived the otherwise complete wreck of will and emotion: namely, her appetite for novel-reading, and her admiration for her humbug of a husband. Toward Agamemnon, whose industry and executive ability were the only support of the family, she entertained, apparently, only the mournful sentiment that he was not like his father. I tried once to converse with her on the subject of a sensational romance which she had just been reading, and the result convinced me that she did not remember a word or scene of it. She was like a drunkard, who tastes his liquor only for a brief instant while he swallows it, and can not recall its flavor in his craving for more.

I wondered who cooked and washed—surely not this mere echo of a woman?—and who maintained the general order of the house, the interior of which was by no means so slovenly in appearance as its nominal master and mistress. Two windows mutely answered my two mental queries. Through one of them I saw John Chinaman carrying an armful of wood to the kitchen; through the other, Miss Mary Carleton, briskly returning from school.

I was curious to see what sort of conversation could come of such a strange mixture of ingredients. Would the O'Ballyhan continue to spout maudlin classics, and his spouse sit in rapt vacuity, with her finger in the place where she had left off reading? Would Agamemnon talk about the mine, which must be Greek to the school-teacher, and the school-teacher discourse concerning topics that must be equally Greek to Agamemnon?

"Greek to Agamemnon!" The whimsical coincidence carried my thought further. Of course Miss Mary would have tact, and would speak with Agamemnon in his own tongue as it were. A superior being like her would know how to come down to the level of half-grown natures. Then I found that I was forgetting the whole race of O'Ballyhans, and thinking with all my might of the pretty school-teacher; and then—the door opened, and she stood like a picture against the background of pine woods and sky.

She did not enter, but said she was going to the post-office to mail a letter. I offered to accompany her, and she assented gracefully, observing that, as the office was next door to the hotel, it would not take me out of my way. So, making an appointment with Agamemnon for the following morning, I took leave of the O'Ballyhans.

We walked slowly down the street in the slant sunshine. What we said, as we walked, I think is hardly worth repetition. Indeed, I remember of it only how hard I tried to be agreeable, and how neatly she foiled my attempts to learn anything about herself.

After supper, as I sat lazily on the porch, watching a dog-fight in the "middle distance," I became aware of the presence of the O'Ballyhan, who had come from his mansion by the perilous road of the gulch itself to avoid the keen eyes of Agamemnon, or the greetings of tell-tale acquaintances. Everybody knew that he was under filial surveillance, and in process of reform against his will, and there were thoughtless persons who would not have hesitated to ask him, in a too sonorous and repetitious way, whether he had a pass from his son to be out after dark.

"Bedad!" he said, in a stage-whisper, as he came suddenly upon me out of the shadows, "it's hard work I had to lave 'em behind, domus et placens uxor, an' thim sharp eyes o' the school-mistress an' me first-horn. Av' they hadn't fell a-talkin' wid wan another, actum est de Republica, it would 'a' been all up wid the O'Ballyhan. But I gev 'em the slip; an' the O'Ballyhan kapes his word—non sine pulvere, not widout a dale o' trouble. Sure I came widin an ace of findin' meself paddlin' about in gurgite vasto in the ould hydraulic reservoir. A 'rare swimmer' I'd 'a' been—an' that's a nate thing, too, 'av' ye comprehend it."

I was in no mood for the old fellow's discursive conversation, and I hrought him peremptorily to business. Thereupon he led the way to the neighboring saloon, and, entering by a back door, showed me into a room of considerable size, in which a motley crowd was gathered about a green-haize-covered table, intent upon gamblin'. No one paid attention to us, although the O'Ballyhan, following an impulse which he could not resist, paused at the table and stood on tiptoe, to watch the game over the shoulders of the players.

"Maybe ye'd loike to try yer luck," he whispered. "Andaces fortuna juvat, the bould boy's the lucky wan! Or ye might make use o' my supayrior skill an' expayrience, by permittin' me the honor to invist a small amount for ye?"

I shook my head sternly, and motioned him away. "Ah, thin, it's a comfortable drop ye'd prefer. Ad utrumque paratus—the O'Ballyhan's ready to accommodate ye." He withdrew me to a small table in a remote corner, and, disappearing for a moment, returned with two glasses full of some variety of alcoholic "mixed drink," such as the seasoned palates of Pactolus required. When I declined to join him, he proceeded in due course to perform duty for both of us, and, as I found afterward, at my expense. ("D'ye think," said the bar-keeper, forcibly, "that we'd 'a' trusted that old galoot for half a dozen drinks, if he hadn't ordered for a respectable gent?")

After all these preliminaries, he began to develop his important communication. It was twofold: First, he wanted to bribe me; secondly, he tried to blackmail my clients through me. He had the power to destroy the value of the title to the Agamemnon lode, and would use it if he were not bought off. To this I replied: "Very well. If there is any such trouble about the title, I shall advise my clients to have nothing to do with it, and of course I shall tell your son the ground of my unfavorable decision."

At this he began to weep, with whisky and emotion, and lapsed into Latin, from which his strictly business communication had been comparatively free "Est quadam flere voluptas, there's a certain relays in tares," quoth he; "hinc ille lachryma. But ye wouldn't tell the boy, now, nec prece nec pretio, not for love nor money. Sure, he'd murder me." And, in his dismay over this prospect, he abandoned his plan of operations, and confessed that his claim to the title of the mine consisted merely in the fact that Agamemnon was a minor, and that he was consequently himself the real owner. After which I had to help him home.

As I turned away from his door, with his "Serius in calum redeas, may ye live a thousand yares, an' spind all yer avenin's in improvin' conversation wid the O'Ballyhan!" sounding in my ears, I saw through a window Miss Mary Carleton in her own room. She sat, pen in hand, with a half-written letter before her. Her face was raised, and her eyes were turned upward. Was she thinking of some absent friend, or only hunting after a suitable adjective? I know not; but I know that she had a beautiful profile.

IV.—THE SCHOOL-TEACHER.

I felt it my duty, on the following day, to call Young Bullion's attention to the possible defect in his title to the mine which bore his name. He chuckled with a knowing air, and, instead of replying to the point, at once began to tease me about my interview with his father.

"Th' ole man show ye how to play cards?"

"No; I didn't choose to learn."

"Stuck ye for the drinks, hey? I knowed it when I see yer towin' him home."

"For his drinks. Yes, I must confess I was obliged to pay for them, or make trouble. But how did you happen to see us? I thought you were all abed, except Miss Carleton. There was a light in her room."

"Oh, I was jest prowlin' around, 'n thinkin' matters over—who does she keep a-writin' to, 'n stoppin', 'n cryin'? That's what I waot ter know!" he added, fiercely.

With sublime virtue I replied that I didn't know, and that perhaps it was none of our business.

"Ke-rect," said Young Bullion; "it's none o' yours. But it's my business when she cries, now, you bet! She ain't a-goin' to cry if Agamemnon O'Ballyhan can help it."

"Who is she?" I inquired.

"Ain't a man in this camp as knows. She jest come down on the camp out o' the sky, 's ef she was sent. Ye see, when things got livelier, on account o' the quartz, the boys said we orter start up the school-house agin. Some on 'em was for havin' church, too, right away; said it looked more like civ'lization; 'n the others said no—they couldn't afford to run a fust-class parson, an' they warn't goin' to have no cheap sardine of a parson to bring the gospel into contempt. Nor they couldn't agree on the kind o' church, to begin with. Some o' 'em up 'n said they was Catholics, an' some was Methodists, 'n so on; 'n afore the meetin' that we had to consider the question come to ajourn, there was a dozen religions a-cussin' one another, where nobody knowed, up to that time, there was any one. So they broke up in a row; 'n the next day a committee come round to me 'n said the camp was goin' to leave it to me, 'cause my head was level 'n I hadn't got no prejudices."

"Well, gentlemen," says I, "yer wrong thar; ye hain't allowed for curiosity. I never was inside of a church while she was in operation, 'n I'm o' good mind to give it a trial. But we'll wait 'n see how the mines turn out, 'n we'll get the school to producin' reg'lar, 'n at the same time we can prospect around 'n stake out for a church." Then they had another meeting, 'n lected me chairman o' the committee on education 'n religion. Th' ole man, he thought he'd got a soft thing, 'n was going to be principal o' the academy. But I sot on him. 'N in a day or two along come Miss Carleton, 'n said she was a candidate. Well, we hed a meetin' o' the committee, 'n they asked her fur her references; 'n she give one o' her looks, ye know, 'n said right out, straight 'n clear: 'Gentlemen,' says she, 'fur reasons o' my own, I don't propose to give references. I have taught school in the States, 'n I think I am competent. If you will give me a trial, you will soon find out whether I can manage and teach the children.'

"French Joe, he was on the committee, 'n he objected. But somebody said how would he like to furnish references, 'n he shut up quick. 'N Miss Carleton turned round 'n spoke about a dozen words to him in his own lingo—clear French; 'n Joe was unanimous for her after that, you bet! Well, the more they talked, the more they liked her, 'n at last they voted her in. Now there ain't a man in Pactolus that wouldn't go through fire 'n water to serve her."

"Then, since your school is so well provided for," said I, "you are about ready to start a church."

"I ain't no judge o' that," responded Young Bullion; "but I guess our boys'd rather hev things as they are. You see, Miss Carleton has half the camp up to the school-house every Sunday afternoon to her Bible-readin'; 'n the boys spend a good part o' the forenoon fixin' up 'n gettin' ready, 'n that keeps 'em out o' mischief. Besides, nobody'd want to go to Bible-readin' tight; so they jest haul off early Saturday night, 'nstead o' keepin' 'n up all night 'n all Sunday. 'N they set round there till dark, talkin' an' thinkin' it over; 'n what she says jest stays by a feller. Somebody sort o' mentioned the church business the other day, 'n all he got was to dry up; what was the use o' leasin' a priest, 's long 's we had one o' the Lord's own angels free?"

Agamemnon's eloquence on this subject might have continued indefinitely; but I remembered my duty to my employers, and reminded him that the serious question of title ought to be settled immediately, since, without a satisfactory basis in that particular, I could not properly spend time and labor in examining the mine.

"Oh!" said he, "that's all right. The ole man don't git ahead o' me! Why, he was a-cop'yn' the papers yesterday; 'n when he found that one o' 'em was a full deed o' his right, title, 'n interest, he thought he'd struck it rich. Didn't know he'd hed any right, title, 'n interest up to that time. 'N he hain't, accordin' to the laws o' this district. But I jest got a p'int or two through my agent in San Francisco, so as to make things all serene; 'n when he said the lawyers said that wards, minors, 'n idjits, 'n so forth, couldn't give deeds, says I, 'Who's an idjit?' 'Oh!' says he, 'it's a minor you are.' 'What kind of a minor,' says I, 'if I can't sell a mine?' But James he wa'n't no slouch. He understood it right up to the handle; 'n he explained it all, 'n we got the papers fixed before I left."

"But perhaps your father will refuse to sign, unless you pay him some of the money."

"He won't sign, won't he?" said Young Bullion, with superb contempt. "He'd sign away his ole soul for five dollars, or one dollar, or two bits; 'n he'll sign that thar deed for nothin' when I tell him to."

"You seem to be very confident of your power over him. Do you use corporal punishment in the family?" I asked jocosely.

He took my question quite in earnest. "I know what you mean," said he: "we had a talk about that in the school committee; 'n Miss Carleton said she wouldn't hev it. But it's a hefty thing to fall back on. As to my family, I never had to lick th' ole man but once; but I did it up in style that time. He was hangin' th' ole woman about the room; 'n I made up my mind if he couldn't set a better example 'n that I'd commence 'n boss 'the shebang myself. But I've got a better holt on him than that. Don't you worry; he'll sign."

I suspected afterward—no matter on what evidence—that the son had saved the father from either lynching or jail by paying some claim, which, if pressed, would have convicted the old scamp of felony; and that he now held in terrorem over the culprit's head, for the purposes of reform, the proofs of the crime. What a strange feeling he must have entertained toward the father whom he could make such sacrifices to save, and then govern by a mixture of thrashing and blackmail! Young Bullion's code of ethics was certainly confused. He seemed to have a sense that the family was a burden laid on him oy fate, to be borne without complaining, and a fierce determination that, though it was a burden, it should cease to be a disgrace.

My examination of the mine and neighborhood was prolonged through that week and the next. I sent off very early, however, my preliminary report and a box of samples by express, with a letter to my clients, saying that I would await further advices, and watch the developments of the work then going on. This was, no doubt, wise; but I was conscious that circumstances made it also pleasant; for, as the days went on, I became, in every respect except her own personal history, very well acquainted with Miss Carleton. We had many subjects of conversation which she could not discuss with the rude inhabitants of Pactolus. She possessed the great charm of directness and simplicity. Perfectly aware of the worshiping regard of her constituency, she spoke of it as openly and yet with as little vanity (or affected modesty, which is the same thing) as if it were another person, and not herself, that was concerned. "It is a great pleasure," she said one day, "to be really a 'superior being,' and to go down to help and lift such thankful souls as these. There is a sort of intoxication about it—for a young woman of twenty-one."

"Do you never feel a longing for some companionship more congenial—more like what you have been accustomed to?"

"I did; and I am grateful to you for taking so much interest in my work, giving me such intelligent sympathy."

I felt a little guilty at this; for my interest in the work was certainly subordinate to my interest in the woman. Our acquaintance, however, remained on the same footing as at first. I wondered why I could not even assume the fraternal tone. When she was sad, as I often fancied she was, why did she so effectively evade sympathy, saying: "Now I am tired and melancholy, don't mourn with me, but make me laugh?" And why—

Well, thus I drifted, until it was high time for me to stop wondering over her position, and take an observation as to my own. But everybody knows that it may be high time for some duty, and yet one may take no note of the time until the signal sounds the hour. At last the clock struck for me.

On the second Saturday a letter arrived from my clients, advising me that the results of all assays had been favorable beyond my estimates, and that, if my own judgment continued to approve the purchase, they would close the bargain at once. I was instructed to see that the papers were made out in due form, and Mr. O'Ballyhan could then express them to his agent in San Francisco, who could deliver them, and receive the money.

I went at once to Young Bullion, half expecting that this good news would startle him out of his preternatural maturity. It would have been a relief to hear him whoop with joy, or see him stand on his head. But he turned pale, and staggered as if he had been shot.

"It's most too much for me," he said; "not the money, but—"

With an effort that gave me a higher conception than ever of his manly self-control, he turned hastily to the table-drawer, and produced the papers of title. They were complete in every particular—the certificate of original location, the deeds of the co-locators to Agamemnon Atrides O'Ballyhan, the complete and absolute quit-claim of Miles O'Ballyhan and Leonora, his wife, to the said Agamemnon—all duly acknowledged and indorsed by the proper officer, as recorded in the proper "Liber." The young man had evidently not been idle. He must have ridden to the county-seat, many miles away, to secure these last, and in those days somewhat unusual, evidences of regularity. The papers were all in the same handwriting—an elaborate, flourishing script, which he said was the old man's. Finally he showed me another deed, transferring the title in blank, and not yet signed. "When I put my name to that," said he, "the thing's drove in 'n clinched. I left this one blank; because if your folks didn't buy I might want to use it for some one else."

"I find everything in order," I replied. "You have only to fill up and execute this final deed, and send it to your agent."

Then I walked out, and up into the woods, and meditated for a long time upon non-professional matters, without coming to any conclusion.

Should I seek a final interview with Miss Carleton?—and if so, what should I say to her? I was not so really "in love" as to deliberately intend to offer myself to her without knowing anything of her history; yet I felt that a farewell talk might lead me to just that rash act, unless I definitely decided beforehand what should be its nature.

My reflections were suddenly interrupted by the appearance of the lady herself. Since it was Saturday afternoon, and therefore holiday, she was evidently intending to use her freedom for a walk. Ordinarily I would have hastened to join her, with a pleasant impression that my company was not unwelcome. This time, however, I hesitated; because I had not yet finished my mental debate, and was in a perilous state of impressive uncertainty. I remained sitting a little distance from the path, in the expectation that she would pass by without seeing me; then, I thought, I would hasten to make up my mind, and on her return I could casually meet her, prepared to speak as the result of my reflection might dictate. I ought to add that prudence would have had, in any case, nothing to say if I had been able to see any signs of a more than friendly interest on her part; but I could not honestly say to myself that any such sign had been discernible hitherto. I could not doubt that a declaration of any special interest on my part would be a great surprise to her; and really, I was not myself prepared to make it, unless hurried over the edge of deliberation by some sudden impulse.

She neither saw me nor passed me: on the contrary, she stepped aside from the path, and seating herself on a fallen tree a few yards in front of me, and with her back to me, read and re-read a letter; then, looking steadfastly down over the town, and out through the gulch, toward the foothills and the valley, she seemed to be weeping. Which would be more embarrassing?—to make my presence known, or to remain an involuntary witness of her suffering? I had just resolved to go forward and speak to her—any words that would comfort her—when a new incident checked my purpose. Headlong up the path came Mr. Agamemnon Atrides O'Ballyhan. There was no indecision about his manner. He came, to use a homely expression, "as if he had been sent for."

V.—NOT, MISS MARY, BUT "QUITE CONTRAIRY."

A moment more, and he stood before Miss Carleton. "I saw ye goin' up the hill," he said breathlessly, "n I thought I'd catch yer. The Agamemnon's sold, Miss Mary: she's sold!"

With ready sympathy, putting aside her own trouble, she replied: "How glad I am! Now what will you do?"

"That's what—what I was a-goin' to ask y' about. Ye see, I s'pose th' ole man 'n mother ought to be fixed somehow; ought to be took care of, I mean. Not to have any money: they can't take care o' money. Ye see, he'd spend it in cards 'n whisky, 'n she'd spend it in novels 'n opium. Gets opium on the sly from the Chinamen. Now, I mean to appoint Cripple Dan garden for them two. He'll never do any more work since the bank caved in on him; but he is smart enough to watch 'em, 'n not be took in by any o' their tricks. He can play cards with th' ole man to keep him out o' gamblin', 'n he can buy novels as fast as mother can swaller 'em. Shouldn't wonder if he could ring in some o' th' ole ones on her once in a while, by changin' the covers. But whisky 'n opium—they must be kep' out."

"A very practical arrangement, I should say. But what are you going to do?"

At this simple question Young Bullion became much embarrassed. "Do you," said he, "Miss Mary—would you—be seventy-five thousand dollars enough, do you think, to run a reg'lar gentleman's house?"

She sighed involuntarily. "It is enough to maintain a happy home with every comfort and luxury. There are many refined gentlemen who bring up their families in content on far less money than the income of that sum."

"Well, but—Miss Mary—would it be enough for you?" She started in astonishment. "For me? What do you mean?"

"I mean," replied the young man, conquering his timidity, and speaking with a simple dignity that made him handsome—"I mean that you are the one that made me want to be a gentleman, 'n I can't be a gentleman unless you help me; 'n I love the ground you tread on, Miss Mary. If you'll be my wife, you shall never work, or cry, or be sorry again."

There was a moment of painful silence. Then she said: "I did not dream of this. I am so much older than you, you know."

"You are not very much older," he pleaded. "That is not what troubled me. But you are so much better 'n wiser, that's what's the matter with you! I wouldn't 'a dared to speak to ye; but I knowed ye was in trouble. 'N now the Agamemnon's sold, 'n what's it all good for 'f I can't give it to you?"

"My dear friend," she answered slowly, but with that simple frankness which belonged to her, "I have been—I am—in trouble; but I can not take your help. You must forget, as I will forget, all that you have said; but not the kindness that prompted it, nor the gratitude with which I refuse it."

Agamemnon looked keenly at her, with the air of one who still pursued a fixed purpose. The refusal of his offer did not seem to be a conclusive defeat to his mind.

"Ye couldn't change yer mind?" he asked reflectively.

"No."

"Not never? Not if I was older 'n I be?"

"Never. You must not think of it."

"Then ye're married to some other feller!" said Agamemnon, with a sad triumph. "Now, Miss Mary, it ain't no business o' mine, I know; but ye'd better tell me anyhow. Wouldn't it sort o' quiet my mind, 'n do me good, hey?"

This subtle appeal to her benevolence accomplished what no inquisitive stratagem could have compassed. After a slight hesitation she said: "There is not much to tell, and it is not very important that I should keep it secret, only I have preferred to do so; and I trust you to help me in that. Yes, I am married; and my dear husband is slowly recovering at—a place on the San Joaquin, from a long, wasting fever. I left him when he was pronounced out of danger, and I have seen him but once since then. It was the other day, when I took the journey by stage from which I returned on the same coach with you. It is hard to be parted from him."

"Now, don't ye cry again, Miss Mary. It ain't none o' my business, ye know; but it would sort o' settle my mind—he's good to ye, ain't he? Ye didn't go for to leave him 'cause he wouldn't let ye boss the ranch?"

"The ranch?" she replied sadly. "I left him because, after his long illness, we were so poor that we were in danger of losing our pretty ranch altogether, and of starving perhaps, unless one of us could get work. That one was I, and the work I understand best is teaching."

"You bet!" assented Young Bullion with enthusiasm. "But—jest to ease my mind completely, ye know—why didn't you tell somebody afore? This camp would 'a' raised yer salary, 'n fetched yer husband up here, 'n built ye a shebang, 'n—look here, what line o' business is he in?"

"He is a minister."

"Whoop la!" shouted Young Bullion; "that's our lay exactly. There's a fust-class vacancy right here, 'n I'll—no, I guess I couldn't quite stand it, hevin' him around: that's what's the matter with me! But why didn't you tell us afore this—this trouble was made? We'd 'a' voted him 'n you in unanimous. Anybody that's a good 'nough husband fer you's a good 'nough minister fer us."

"I wish I had told you at the beginning," said she; "but, perhaps, if I had done so, you would have declined my services altogether. I heard about your dispute over a minister, and I feared to let you know I was a minister's wife. It was so important, so very important to me then, to get a place immediately."

Young Bullion made no reply. If what he had heard had not "eased his mind," it had at least given him much to think about. The silence which ensued recalled me to a sense of my embarrassing position as a listener; and, with sudden presence of mind, I stepped forward.

"You must pardon me, my friends," I said, "that I have overheard your conversation. Nothing that you have said shall be repeated. But every word has deepened my respect for both of you. If I can in any way be of service to you, Mrs.—Mrs. Mary, you have only to command me as a faithful friend." Then I lifted my cap, and retired in as good order as a fellow could—under the circumstances.

I had gone but a few steps when Young Bullion overtook me. That boy's penetration was most annoying at times, and this was one of the times.

"Goin' to play fer the school-teacher yerself, wa'n't ye, if I hedn't got the call fust?" was his dreadful greeting. "Well, 'tain't no use fer nary one of us. You jest go 'n thank the Lord ye'veer knowed her, 'n don't whine 'cause she's picked out a better man. No cryin' over spilt milk. That's me!" And he straightened himself until his short stature visibly increased.

I got rid of Young Bullion as soon as practicable, and went to the hotel in a dazed condition, as if I had fallen from the top of the mountain, and rolled down the gulch. When one has seriously weighed a question like that which occupied my thoughts that afternoon, it is inevitably startling to find that it was a matter wholly beyond question all the time. I wanted to think it over. But I did not succeed in thinking it over on the porch after supper: so I went to bed to meditate there; and finally I went to sleep, my last reflection being, that I would review the whole matter on the morrow, after which I would pay the school-teacher a cordial, friendly farewell call.

But the morrow brought its own topics for surprise and reflection. At early dawn I was waked by a hand on my shoulder, and, turning sleepily in bed, met the energetic look of Agamemnon Atrides O'Ballyhan. He, at least, had thought over his situation and made his decision.

"Sorry to h'ist ye so early," said he; "but I'm off. Now don't ye go fer to ask no questions, but 'tend to business. Here's them papers: they're all right, 'n you'll find my directions along with 'em. I'm off. Take care o' yerself, ole boy." And he was gone.

I opened the package he had left on my bed. It contained all the papers I had previously inspected. The final deed, however, had been filled up and executed; and I was not a little surprised to find my own name inserted as the owner of the Agamemnon. Enclosed in the deed, however, was a document in a cramped school-boy hand which threw full light on the transaction. It ran as follows:

"This is my Will. But I aint ded no nor goin to be but I am as good as ded with it. All the Same I me gone over the Range, the mine belongs to miss mary and u give her the munny she knos about Crippe dann and the olman and mother you pay my agent a thousand Dollars and doan take nothin fer yureself yure foaks pays u with the munny I antid up I trust u because u likt miss mary too."

"AGAMEMNON ATRIDES O'BALLYHAN."

Why should I detain the reader with an account of what followed? It was not easy for me to execute the charge confided to me. The lady at first utterly refused to accept the strange legacy of which I was trustee. But I succeeded in persuading her to take the money, and carry out Agamemnon's wishes until he should be found—an event which I felt sure he would not permit to happen. "Get your husband to come here and live," I said. "If the boy ever means to be seen again, it is to this place he will come; and it is here, in the good work you have begun, of which his own awakened manhood was one of the first fruits, that you should expend the income of his legacy."

Cripple Dan, it turned out, had been already sounded as to his willingness to take charge of the two wayward O'Ballyhans on a handsome allowance for the three. He assumed the position at once, and smashed two hidden bottles for the O'Ballyhan the first day. That disconsolate old toper supposed the orders for this vandalism proceeded from the school-teacher. "Dux famina facti, it's a woman is in it: cedant arma togæ, the glory o' the O'Ballyhans is swipt away be a petticoat," was his lament. But he submitted to be made comfortable, and seemed none the worse for his enforced sobriety.

VI.—SIMILIA SIMILIBUS CURANTUR.

Thus I left them all, and closed a chapter in my own life which I expected never to re-open. But time brings about unexpected coincidences; and what should it bring to me, the other day, ten years after the events narrated in this story, but a visit from Agamemnon Atrides O'Ballyhan?—a prosperous, manly fellow as one would wish to see, with stylish clothes and a fine mustache. And on his arm—could I believe my eyes? Was it the school-teacher, become as much younger as Agamemnon had grown older?

"Mrs. O'Ballyhan," said he proudly, "Miss Mary's sister. You and I didn't feel very happy that day, you know; but now I'm glad I waited." The latter remark was fortunately an aside, so that Mrs. O'Ballyhan did not hear it.

"You bet!" I answered, clothing due felicitation in what I thought would be a congenial style. But I was mistaken as to the style. Agamemnon had "swore off" from slang so far as human nature would permit. Only now and then, as he confessed, "conversation got the better of him."

During the short half-hour that the happy pair sat in my office, my old friend gave me an outline of his career from the day when we had parted. It would make another story by itself, and I am sorry that it must be condensed in a few lines.

After "striking it rich" again, over the Range in Nevada, and accumulating from several lucky hits a fortune at least double that which he had given away, he had returned to Pactolus, six years from the day of his disappearance.

"It took me about that time," said he, "to get over things. But then I couldn't rest till I had seen the old place, and so I came back. The old folks were both dead—best thing for 'em. But there was the minister and his wife just about worshiped by everybody; and there was an Agamemnon Academy, and an Agamemnon Free Library, and so on, all built with the interest of my money. You'd better believe everybody was astonished to see me. All thought I was dead, sure, except Mary; she stuck to it I would come back. Even when they found somebody's bones over in the sagebrush beyond the summit, and had a funeral on 'em, she wouldn't let 'em call my name at the funeral, nor put it on the tombstone."

"Well, they wanted me to take back my capital. But I told 'em I'd got enough; and, at any rate, there wasn't any hurry. I'd stay round a while, and consider. So, after I had considered a little, I went to Miss Mary and the parson, and says I, 'What I want is to go to school. I feel pretty old; but I guess I ain't too old to learn.' You see, my Susy here, she was assistant teacher in the academy, and I thought she could teach me if anybody could. But they said I was too big to go and sit on the benches in the academy. Susy said she couldn't think of trying to manage a scholar twenty-two years old: that was so very old—a whole year older than she was! So I had to take up with the minister's offer to give me private instruction. And I got my pay, too, before long; for the minister said I got ahead so fast that I had better join the reading-class. That meant to come every other day and read and talk over books with him and his wife and Susy."

"It was a good while before I made up to Susy. Had a good lesson once, you know—and, besides, I had got more bashful. The more I learned, the more I found I didn't know; and I felt so ugly and clumsy, and inferior every way, it didn't seem as if a lady like her would care for me—unless it was by reason of the two hundred thousand dollars. But Susy didn't know about that, and she wouldn't have minded it a mite if she had. Fact is, she thought a good deal better of me than I deserved all the time; for her folks had been cracking me up for years and years, and all the Academy Commencements and the Annual Reports had a lot in 'em about the 'munificent founder' and the 'generous benefactor,' and I don't know what all; and so, when I turned up alive at last, she was prepared to believe I was better than I looked. Anyhow, I got to be like one of the family; and Susy was as good as she could be, and took no end of pains with me, to help me put on a little style, and talk the correct thing, and so on. And one day she was showing me bow to hold yarm for her to wind; and says I, sitting there as meek as a lamb: 'Seems to me, if you couldn't manage a big boy of twenty-two, you've somehow got the knack of managing him now he's nigh twenty-four.'"

"Well, one thing led to another; and that skein of yarn got so tangled (because I forgot to lay it down) that Susy said it should never be unraveled. She keeps it as a curiosity."

"The next morning I went to the parson, and says I, 'Now let's talk business. I'll take that hundred thousand back, just to please you; though I've got twice as much, and I don't want it.' He said, 'All right; but he looked a little cast down, too. Parsons are human.'"

"Now, says I, 'it's mine; and I'm going to make another business proposition. You marry Susy and me, and I'll give you, say, a hundred thousand dollars as a wedding-fee.'"

"Oho!" says he. 'Well, my boy, she's worth it. You've made a good bargain, and so have I.'"

"That was two years ago; and Susy and I have just been the happy pair you read about, ever since. She's been going right ahead with my education, and got about as much polish on me, I guess, as the grain will bear. You can't make mahogany out o' redwood, if you rub it forever. So the other day I made a little turn in Agamemnon stock—those blamed fools in California Street thought the mine was played out, when they had a new body of first-class ore right under their noses—and I asked Susy if she didn't think a little foreign travel was about the thing to finish off with. She wasn't long saying yes to that; and here we are, bound for everywhere. I expect we'll go round the world before we stop."

We had a most friendly and familiar chat; and the last I heard of them was as they were departing in merry mood together, and the sweet voice of Mrs. O'Ballyhan said: "He offered to get the Legislature to change it; but I said no. I like him just as he is, name and all—Agamemnon Atrides O'Ballyhan."

She laughed a musical laugh of mingled mirth and pride as she added, glancing fondly at her husband, "But I call him 'my dear,' for short."

St. Louis girls say that those of Chicago—that are mates, because of the difficulty of of leather alike.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served at 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1880.

A gentleman and Irishman said to us the other day: "You Americans are a patient and long-suffering people. A class of low Irish are doing things in this city that are utterly disgraceful, and would not for an hour be endured in any other civilized community in the world. How you have endured the insolence of this lawless foreign class, and why you allow them to set at defiance every principle of decency, is more than I can understand. If your politicians think they are conciliating the Irish, or are in any way benefiting their parties by this cowardly surrender of America to Ireland, they are mistaken. Every Irishman of respectability, character, and property is disgusted with this Kearney-Gannonism, and they are more disgusted that this native-born demagogue preacher should have gained the position he has. Every reputable Catholic regards these men as the enemies of the church and of good government. Every honest man who has a homestead, or who expects to labor for a living, recognizes that he is suffering from this agitation. I am not in politics, but I see this: If the Republican party had the manliness and courage to oppose these sand-lotters, and to place itself in bold antagonism to them, and to all their agrarian schemes, it would bring to it all foreigners of the better class, and, together with the law-abiding, intelligent, and property-owning classes, would make a political organization that would be irresistible."

We regard any compromise or adjustment—any truce, peace, or cessation of hostilities—with the Kalloch element of society as a calamity. We observe that this reverend humbug is reversing his engines, is turning tail, and is not singing as loud as he was a few days since. He hears the muttering of the underground movement, and he has not read the history of San Francisco in vain. He knows that in the earlier days better men than he were warned and exiled, imprisoned and hung; and that, out of an organized coöperation of law-abiding citizens, the law and the courts were temporarily suspended, and society was purified as the heavens are sometimes purified by a storm. Mayor Kalloch may profitably to himself recall the pregnant fact that the official robes did not then protect men from suspicion of being villains; that even the "judicial ermine" was not permitted to cover up crimes; that from the Supreme Bench was dragged and imprisoned one who had offended the people, and that the Governor of the State was powerless to arrest this organized disobedience of the law. Mayor Kalloch must be conscious of the fact that the accidental occupation of a municipal office gives him no authority to break the law, or to become the captain of a foreign banditti, whose apparent object seems to be the destruction of property and the subversion of order. This fact enhances his crime against society, and makes it more probable that he will be held to a higher and stricter accountability.

There is a sentiment abroad in this community that this disorder is only curable by severe and heroic remedies. There are men in this community whose patient calmness does not indicate lack of personal courage or fear of assuming responsibility when the time for earnest and effective action shall come; and when that time does arrive it will seem as though public sentiment is unanimous. There will then be no gathering of unemployed upon the sand-lot, no idle parades of petticoated blusterers of both sexes, no Tenth Ward Rifles or W. P. C. military organizations, no Union Hall orations or Metropolitan Temple prayers, no Delphic editorials in undecided and mercenary newspapers; but there will be a movement that will be thorough and effective. Its influence on the community will be felt, and it will leave lasting and beneficial results.

The cry that the "Chinese must go" is not the echo of an ignorant sentiment. That the Chinese must be dealt with according to law is the expression of every healthy-minded and honest man who is not either a moral or physical coward, or both. If an international treaty has not force against a foreign mob, then we have no government. If the people of San Francisco and California will not defend the Chinese in the enjoyment of their legal rights, then it is a cowardly community. To allow one man or ten thousand men from Europe to say that one man or one hundred men from Asia shall not have the protection of a treaty, is to allow the men from Europe to revolutionize the American Government and overturn the republic. Kearney comes from Ireland, Wellock from England, and Steinman from Germany, under the same treaty that brings Ah Sin from China; the one has the same right in this country as the other. To permit one set of foreigners to drive out another set of foreigners—one alien to displace another alien—would be a piece of shameful cowardice of which we do not believe the American people will be guilty. In saying this we are not advocating the immigration of Chinese, and we are not attempting to arrest or stay any legal endeavor to prevent the incoming of Chinamen, nor to hinder the departure from among us of those who are now here under treaty invitation. So that when Kalloch, Kearney, Wellock, Gannon, and Steinman, or anybody, native or foreign born, talks of force, fire, blood, and hemp to produce an illegal result, the native-born American and the respectable foreigner should spit in their cowardly faces.

There can not be, and ought not to be, any law enacted or enforced by the city of San Francisco that recognizes any class or color or national distinction. If there is a Chinese store, dwelling, or brothel that is a nuisance, it ought to be abated; and if there is a store, dwelling, or brothel that is a nuisance, belonging to a church or corporation or individual, it ought to be abated. The well-behaved, law-abiding, decent and orderly Chinaman that is here under protection of a national treaty, is equal under the law to the man native-born to the soil, or the foreigner from Europe, that comes by the same character of treaty, and relies upon the same principle of law for his protection and personal safety. The General Government has the sole authority to determine whether the people of any nation are desirable as immigrants to this country. If in the opinion of Congress they are not desirable, treaties may be abrogated and laws enacted to prevent their coming. We have thought Chinese undesirable citizens, and for nearly twenty years the writer of this article has endeavored to so educate public opinion that laws might be passed for their exclusion. Whenever it is found that the immigrants from any European country are undesirable, we shall hope that Congress will prevent them from coming to this country; and if it is ever demonstrated that any foreign class abuse the election privilege, we shall hope that the privilege be extended no further. We are fast becoming convinced that it is not the men of Asiatic birth who are most dangerous to the welfare and peace of this country. It is not the Chinamen that now most seriously menace the prosperity of San Francisco, and it is not the Chinamen whose presence among us is most threatening to the prosperity of our republican form of government.

As to the power to protect Chinese among us, there has been a great misunderstanding. It is supposed by many that the General Government has no right to interfere until called upon by State authority; and the State Government no right to interfere except upon notification by the local authority. So that the Mayor, Kalloch, must take the initial step to invoke the Federal power. This is not the law. When the treaty was made with China, it was found that the empire was divided into eighteen provinces, each with distinctive authority. It was early ascertained by all the ambassadors of foreign powers in China that reclamations or settlements between their citizens and these provincial authorities would be embarrassing and impracticable. Hence it was determined by all the great powers that the Imperial or central power should be alone responsible, and that to Peking alone should all disputes and misunderstandings be referable. This is the law, and this the custom; and this law is embodied in the Burlingame Treaty, and all the claims arising, as in the Province of Yunnan, the Margary outrage, and other causes of complaint, have all been referred to the central government of Peking, and settled by it. This feature of the treaty is reciprocal, and the Chinese Government recognizes in the United States no State governments, and no jurisdictions of municipal authority other than the central government at Washington. If it has any complaints to make for its people, it makes them at the nation's capital. If it demands protection for its people, it demands it from the Federal power. So that in event of a local defiance of the law, and a violent and illegal invasion of the Chinese quarter, it becomes the duty of General McDowell to suppress it by the military force under his control. Mayor Kalloch and Sheriff Desmond would cut no figure in such a conflict. Governor Perkins and the State authorities would only act as auxiliaries to aid the government, and the municipal police would only be called upon to preserve the peace, by resisting those who would resist the law. Chinese subjects in America are entitled to the protection of the central authority, as were Catholic priests and schools, and as were French and American missions and property when assaulted by Chinese mobs. China has paid our people six hundred thousand dollars of indemnity since the treaty; and if any violence here should be attended with loss of life to Chinese, or destruction to Chinese property, the Government would be liable, holding a claim over against our city for its repayment.

As for a special reason—the famine in Ireland—it has been determined, in many cities of the Union, not to celebrate St. Patrick's Day, the time is opportune for asking, Why celebrate that festival at all? Ireland is not a nation; the people are not free; the country was conquered by England more than seven centuries ago, and has since practically remained in a state of serfdom. What is there to celebrate? The helots of Greece and the slaves of Rome never went through the mockery of rejoicing over their chains. The negroes of this country did not begin to celebrate until after their fetters had been struck off and their emancipation had been proclaimed. The slaves of Santo Domingo are battling for their freedom instead of glorifying over their bondage. The serfs of Russia sang no pæans of joy over their wretched condition. It is only Irishmen who cut the rather ridiculous figure of parading every 17th of March, with bands playing and flags and streamers flying; with mottoes and devices flung to the breeze, which would apparently proclaim that Ireland is not only a nation, but that she is the greatest and freest country in the world. In the evening banquets are held, and the same speeches are made year after year; the same songs are sung, the same "poetry" recited, the same festivities indulged in, and the next morning the participants wake to find themselves as much political slaves as ever, and with England's heel still on their necks. The whole thing is threadbare, and something fresh is needed. It is so many centuries since "Malachi wore the collar of gold which he won from the proud invader" that the ornament is too worn to be exhibited any more in public. The people know all about how St. Patrick made the snakes and toads "git," all about Brian Boroihm and Clontarf, and all about the great ancient historical incidents which came off between Cape Clear and the Giants' Causeway, without any more annual reminders on these subjects. Nor do we require to be told so often of the great patriots, orators, and poets of Erin. These dishes have been served up too frequently, and Curran, Moore, and the rest of them should be permitted to repose peacefully in their graves until their names can be associated with their regenerated country.

Robert Emmett forbade that his epitaph should be written or his tomb inscribed until his country was free. If he could take a peep from his grave at a St. Patrick's Day procession he would probably exclaim: "So Ireland is at length a nation." When informed to the contrary, he would ask: "Then what is all this mockery about?" It is not usual to celebrate victories until after they are won. It seems rather absurd to do so in advance. Grattan declared that he followed Ireland to her grave. Her "wake" was held at the time, and even in Ireland it is unusual to hold more than one wake over the same corpse, and it certainly is unnecessary to repeat the operation every 17th of March. O'Connell, referring to Grattan's expression, just quoted, said that he would live to "proclaim Ireland's resurrection," but he failed to do so; and she is still, to all intents and purposes, politically dead. It ill becomes her sons to make merry over her grave. Let them rather expend their means, not for whisky, not for bands, hanners, streamers, mottoes and devices, and other mockeries, but in furtherance of measures to aid their honest endeavors to shake off the yoke of the Saxon. Let them free their country first, and celebrate afterward; not celebrate first, and free their country afterward. To this end they must rely upon themselves, and not trust to foreign assistance, as they have been in the habit of doing.

"Hereditary bondsmen! Know ye not
 Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow?"

We hope to see no more of the childish attempts made by the Fenians for the invasion of Canada, when their leader, O'Neill, was dumped into a carriage by a couple of detectives and hurried off to prison. However, this phase of the question is a little beyond our subject. If the present crisis in Ireland shall not merely temporarily, but permanently, until that country shall have become a nation, put a stop to a worse than meaningless celebration, some good will have been accomplished. As St. Patrick was the apostle of Ireland, there can be no objection to the religious observance of the day in the churches. But, beyond this, the celebration is the bugest of shams.

Under ordinary circumstances, we should think the Hon. Judge Tyler, Member of the Assembly from Alameda, somewhat over-irascible, and a little prone to display a quick passion; but when we reflect upon the provocation he gets from the poet Mayhew and the musician (drummer) Brauhart, we become admirers of Tyler, and thank God that there is one man in the Assembly who has the moral and physical courage to resent impudence, rebuke ignorance, defy abuse and despise the insolent and ignorant blackguards who disgrace the Legislature.

AFTERMATH.

We are not advised as to the action finally taken by the Chamber of Commerce in reference to giving land in San Francisco, for terminal purposes, to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad. This road, having reached its objective point of Santa Fé, now seems to be looking out to conclude what to do next. Its great difficulty is to make up its corporate mind whether it will go to Guaymas in Mexico, or to San Francisco in the United States. Here are two propositions so widely different, and the attitude of indecision is so utterly at variance with common sense, that we have a right to suspect some hidden motive. We should of course desire this and all other transcontinental roads to terminate at our port; but the threat to go elsewhere if they do not intend to do so, or the hesitation to go to Guaymas if they do so intend, is very cheap and thin. Conscious of the advantage of our own city with reference to the commerce of the Pacific Ocean, secure in one road already built and the Southern Pacific Road now building, with two roads in process of construction to the north of us, with steam lines already established upon China, Australia, and coast routes, with a city of three hundred thousand people, we need not feel very anxious as to the termination of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Road. Certainly we need not consider what land or how much we shall give them just yet. The Union Pacific route relieves us of any anxiety concerning the rivalry of San Diego or Guaymas. It is the shortest railroad route across the United States, from ocean to ocean. The Southern Pacific will be finished to the Gulf before the other is half completed. When the time comes, and this road shall have determined to come to San Francisco, then we shall hope our city may give the company every favor that it has a right to demand.

The first local "Eisteddfod" was held on St. David's Day, whereat our Welsh fellow-citizens and citizenesses did enthusiastically give each other Taffy—who was a Welshman. We can not undertake to report the proceedings; they opened with a solo—"Hen wlad fy Nhadau" (the hen who laid fine eggs: "hadau" is Welsh for eggs). The Rev. John J. Powell was awarded a prize for the best poem on Monte Diablo—a kind of Parnassus, it would seem, where poems grow spontaneously. The Rev. J. J. P. has not hitherto figured as a poet, so far as we know. We extend to him the hospitality of our waste-basket, where he will find much clerical company. Sam Williams, of the Bulletin, was to the fore, of course, catering to the Cambrian mental stomach with the following eisteddfodder:

"Toreithiog a ffræilbert areithydd—doeth
Odiaefhol olygydd
A gorgenwog arweinydd—
Nemawr wr fel Samwel sydd.

Hedd' ac Anrhydedd rhodiant—yn ei lwybr—
Yn ei law ymlechant;
A Mwynder, ar dyner dant,
A gana ei ogoniant."

Sam, like Chaucer, "has talent, but he can't spell;" it will be observed that he gets a "w" into his own name in telling us what "Samuel said." And, after all, nobody cares what he said; the charm lies in his inimitable manner of saying it.

Seriously, is it not very great nonsense, these excellent people getting together and uniting their breath to revive the failing embers of a merely sentimental tradition which they persuade themselves they care for? Having no race prejudices, we should rather like to be a Welshman—Sam Williams, for example—in order to have an experimental knowledge of whatever intellectual profit or emotional satisfaction there may be in perpetuating the traditions of a country that is not a nation, and a people that is without a history, in a language that has not a literature. Is it anything more than a harmless pastime?

We commend to those timid Republicans and cowardly Democrats who have been influenced in their legislative acts by fear of the sand-lot, the following extract from the Hon. Grove L. Johnson's speech in the State Senate upon the revenue law:

"Barking dogs seldom bite. And when these things that are unworthy to be called men gather upon the sand-lots and threaten to erect a gallows to hang men whose shoe-strings they are unworthy to unloose, I have for them simply scorn and loathing, not fear. I have no fear of any such craven curs, and I have nothing but disgust for the men who indorse them and their sentiments. I fear no trouble. I have that confidence in the deep-seated feeling of justice and manhood that is in every American citizen, I have that belief in the grandeur and dignity and majesty of our free institutions, I have that confidence in the common sense of the people of San Francisco, I have that confidence in the men who are in power there, and in our Governor, which impels me to the belief that the first symptom of mob violence there would be crushed out, as it would deserve to be crushed out, by the iron band of armed freemen, raised to protect the rights of civilization and the rights of decency."

The public is very much indebted to the local artists for having the goodness to exhibit their pictures. Not that the public cares anything about the pictures—there are precious few worth caring about—but it likes its regular annual "criticism" in its daily newspapers. The reporter, who in the interval between the last dog-fight and the crunching of the next woman under the wheels of a dray, finds time to step into the rooms of the Art Association and lay about him with his pen, performs a real service, and the painter, who made occasion is a public benefactor. A characteristic incident in point: A well-known artist, having completed a picture, was asked by the art reporter of a daily newspaper when he would have it on exhibition. "It will not be exhibited," was the reply; "I painted it for Tiburcio Parrott, and it will be sent directly to his house." "As a representative of the public," said the "critic," "I think I have a right to see the picture!"

Another reporter of whom we have heard went about among the artists asking them to "spell and define" various technical terms, and from the information so obtained he builded in his note-book a copious vocabulary, explaining that he was expecting a "detail" as art critic for the approaching exhibition. From what we have had the heart to read in the dailies, we infer that he was detailed by them all.

Ballantyne, in collating his Essays in Mosaic, quotes this bit from Harrington's Oceanus, published in 1659: "There is something in the making and ruling a commonwealth, which—though there be great divines, great lawyers, and great men in all professions—seems to be peculiar only to the genius of a gentleman." The then Mr. Disraeli, writing in 1848, said: "The proper leaders of the people are the gentlemen of England. If they are not the leaders of the people, I do not see why there should be gentlemen." We, acting for San Francisco in 1879, turned part of the city government over to demagogues, adventurers, and stupid. The gentlemen stayed at home. The sand-lot voted to a man. Leadership implies obligation. If gentlemen want to be leaders, they must look to it that they arise on election mornings as early as the sand-lot.

It is rumored, and we believe on good authority, that the Argonaut will shortly suspend publication, its patronage not being sufficient to justify a continuance of its publication.—Stock Report.

Well, old man, what is your grievance? Warble it out, pardner; maybe we can take it all back and you'll let us live till Bunker returns.

Now here is a simple little proposition. We will give Mr. Bunker of the Stock Report access to the books of the Argonaut, to prove and publish facts regarding circulation and patronage, if we may be permitted to do the same regarding the circulation and patronage of the Stock Report. It would be a very interesting exhibit to the advertising constituency.

"Speaker Cowdery's eyes filled with tears and his voice had grown husky with emotion as Mr. Braunhart was removed by the Sergeant-at-Arms from the floor of the Assembly."

It must have been a very touching scene, Speaker Cowdery weeping as this insolent little jackanapes was hustled away from a position he has constantly disgraced. If Speaker Cowdery, who is a broad-shouldered six-footer, had come down from the Speaker's desk and kicked this pestilent little fellow down the aisle and out of the Capitol, and across its grounds, and into the Sacramento River, it would have made every respectable native-born American angel burst into a broad guffaw, and flap his wings over the battlements to see justice done to an empty-headed, yawping miscreant who has disgraced himself every hour since the session opened. Tears, forsooth! We hope our Speaker did not wet himself bad.

Kearney is a fool; Kalloch is a scholar. Kearney is a coward; Kalloch a man of courage. Kearney is a promoted drayman; Kalloch a fallen gentleman. Kearney is repellent; Kalloch magnetic. Kearney knows nothing he ought to know; Kalloch everything he ought not. Kearney has no personal grievance; Kalloch has wrongs to avenge. Kearney quarrels with God only; Kalloch wars with mankind. Kearney is a contriver of epithets; Kalloch a planner of treason. Kearney is pushed along by the mob; Kalloch draws the mob after him. Kearney is ridiculous; we laugh. Kalloch is dangerous; we arm. O Jupiter, take away King Stork, and restore to his penitent subjects King Log.

A bill was introduced into the New York Legislature on the 12th instant, providing that after its passage no fare shall be collected from any street-car-passenger unless in exchange therefor a seat is provided. This principle has been rigorously enforced, in both France and England, for many years. The only objection to such a law for San Francisco is its sweeping needlessness. No good woman—and all San Francisco women are good—will permit a gentleman to stand in a San Francisco street car while she has a seat.

Senator Satterwhite, in the debate upon the revenue bill, has taken a decided stand in opposition to savings banks, as conducted in this State. His arguments have much force; and, if his assertions can be established as facts, we are not quite certain that the Senator is not substantially correct in his position. He denies that the savings banks of these days are the institutions of the poor man or the man of small means, and declares that it is placing accumulated capital in the hands of a few men that gives them an unhealthy financial control; that they are places where men can too easily borrow and encumber their homesteads for speculative investments; that the small savings banks depositors had better use their money in homes, or farms, or small industries. To relieve savings banks depositors from taxation, he says, is to drive all the money of the country into savings banks, and thus give to them power to crush the merchant, farmer, and business man. This would give them undue political influence. The Senator comes to the conclusion that it is not good policy to encourage savings banks, and that they should be discouraged. There is the germ of good sense in all these positions, and if our legislators would give something more than a superficial attention to this question, we are sure they would agree with us in thinking that the opinions of Senator Satterwhite are entitled to grave consideration.

De Lesseps was to-night given a grand reception by citizens of New York. It was the most notable gathering of the season.—Associated Press Dispatch.

Apparently, then, the citizens of New York are less averse to the play of An Inter-oceanic Canal, with the part of "The Monroe Doctrine" omitted, than are the newspapers of New York. We suspect, too, that this is as true of the whole country as it is of New York.

Your true journalist is nothing if not chivalrous. He is devoted to "the ladies, Gobblessem!" In New York a leading newspaper has undertaken in a calm, unimpassioned way to make the hotel-keepers and restaurateurs feed the fair sex after dark, which it appears they have been unaccustomed to do unless the fair sex are accompanied by the fowl. The rule of exclusion assuredly works a certain hardship to the belated female who has not the power of Joshua to make the sun stand still. "What!" said one of these unfortunates, on being denied a meal, "am I compelled to go out in the street and pick up a man in order to get something to eat?" We should be sorry to have this misunderstood as a protest against the practices of the gentle cannibal; no lady, we hope, would be averse to eating a strange man if she felt the necessity, and no gentleman would object to be eaten. The lady's question, however, is significant: a woman who is compelled to go into the street at night to pick up a man for any purpose is in considerable peril. She may get hold of another woman's man, for example, in which case it were better for her never to have been born.

We do not know that we entirely sympathize with our professional brother in his crusade against a custom which compels a woman to have a man with her at night or take the consequences in an empty stomach. If there is a proper place and time for our sex—a proposition which has been somewhat disputed of late by certain members of the opposition—it is at the side of lovely woman when the sun is down. That is the way it seems to us, and we favor any action on the part of anybody which tends to the enforcement of what we deem our rights in this matter. If the ladies have to be starved into a recognition of these rights we deplore the necessity, but abate nothing of our claim—a modest one, on the whole, considering that our right to escort these innocents to supper includes also our right to pay the bill.

Thy "Liar," Sazerac, is here—
The dapper little cad.
A pity 'tis that Austin town
Has all the brains he bad;
For this sweet Hart without a head
'S a pretty little lad.

Jones has blazing red hair and writes for the Daily Scalp-snatcher. Editor says to Jones: "If I don't feel better tomorrow I shall not be at the office." Jones: "All right; I'll fill up the paper with incendiary articles." Editor thoughtfully contemplates Jones's hair. "Write 'em out of your head, I suppose."

A correspondent ("O. G." of Marysville) writes us, à propos de rien: "The saying, 'To wet your whistle,' is of Norman pedigree, and as old as the thirteenth century. Henri d'Audeli thus commences his poem on 'The Battle of the Wines':

'Volez oïr une grant fable,
Qu'il avint l'aubrier sur la table—
Au bon Roy qui eut nom Philippe,
Qui volontiers moillait sa pipe
En bon vin qui estait du blanc.'

'Will you hear of a great fable,
That happened the other day at table
To good King Philip, who did incline
To wet his whistle with good white wine.'

"King Cetawayo is said to be a man of simple and abstemious habits. He does not drink to any excess and does not smoke, his reason for not doing so being that it would spoil the color of his teeth."—London Times.

The writer of this paragraph knows the foregoing statement to be false. In the year 1870 he spent five months in Zululand, Cetawayo being his host, companion, and guide during nearly all his sojourn in the king's country. Cetawayo is one of the most confirmed smokers the writer has ever known, his chief rivals being Senator Dickinson, Assemblyman Fox, and the Editor of the Argonaut, who is his peer intellectually.

A FAREWELL TO THE CHINESE.

It must be so, my almond eye,
My copper-colored son—
The times are dark; I am afraid
The little game which you have played
Is done.

The sand-lot howls, the people frown,
The law strikes blow on blow;
And now the Board of Health declares
That Chinatown, with all its snares,
Must go.

'Tis sad to part! For thirty years,
In storm and sunny weather,
Your oily visage in the throng
Has cheered me as we jogged along Together.

Farewell! The jig is almost up;
The lightnings gleam and dart:
A day of wrath is drawing nigh,
And lo, the burden of each cry
Is "Start!"

And oh, when moons on Jackson Street
Look down in tender way,
And when I wander through each lair
Where you were wont to braid your hair,
And eat and sleep and smoke and swear,
And find each wash-house stripped and bare,
And not a pig-tailed Mongol there—
Not e'en a clothes-line in the air
Of May—

Ah, then methinks the tears will come;
And I will take your kettle-drum,
And bombs and gongs and devilish things,
And weep to think such joys have wings!
Go East, and like a fungus crawl
About each town and city wall,
Let Massachusetts know your tread,
Go multiply and grow and spread
O'er all the lovely Eastern land.
They do not know nor understand
Your winning way and oblong eye.
They'll know your virtues better by
And by.

PROPOSED IMPROVEMENTS.

Engineer Schussler's Suggestions for Our Security from Fire.

We have undertaken to keep our readers advised of what was being done in reference to the water company's negotiations with the Supervisors. Our very earnest opposition to the purchase of the Lake Merced property was based upon the conviction that the sum of $1,500,000 was grossly in excess of the value of the property, that the supply was inadequate, and that, as the city extended to the margins of the lake, the water would become impure; and that, in addition to all these reasons, there would grow out of the purchase a bad municipal job. The Spring Valley Water Company is now in negotiation with the city for the establishment of water rates. The letter of Mr. Charles Webb Howard to the Board, the argument of Mr. Newlands, the figures of the engineer, Mr. Schussler, and the testimony of Messrs. Quinlan, Staples, and Chief Engineer Scannel, together with a free discussion among the Supervisors, has brought the whole negotiation where it ought to be—out into the daylight, where it may be considered and understood by the tax-paying and water-rate paying people. It affords an opportunity for the consumers, house-holders, and property-owners of the city to get a thorough insight into the relations that exist between themselves and the water company. There is no reason that this relation should be an unfriendly one, and there is every reason that the best understanding should exist between the company and the people with whom it deals. The Bulletin and Call, for some narrow and selfish motives of their own, have persistently and for years endeavored to promote a hostile feeling against the company, and, in the carrying out of this malevolent design, do not hesitate to charge every person and journal differing from them with corrupt and mercenary motives. The truth is, this city has but one practical source of water supply, and this, by the business forethought of long-headed men and the expenditure of a large amount of money, has been appropriated by a private company. The peninsular system is the only available and practicable water supply for this city, and the Spring Valley Water Company have seized it by the appropriation of running streams, sites for reservoirs and dams, and by the actual purchase of some eighteen thousand acres of land that controls the catchment. It is good water, pure, and clear. It is abundant, and by the completion of certain dams and reservoirs, and the connection of the Crystal Spring supply, and by adding the catchment of the Calaveras valley, can be made adequate for a city of a million inhabitants. The new Constitution has clothed the Board of Supervisors with authority to fix water rates. The company acquiesces in the law, and the only question now is the performance of this duty. It is agreed between the Supervisors and the corporate directors that the rule should be a fair interest upon what the system has cost, a fair allowance for working expenses, a fair amount for keeping the property in repair, and a fair allowance to the fund for necessary extensions.

Mr. Schussler's report has been printed in all the daily journals. The work proposed by him is as follows:

1. To finish the Crystal Springs dam to its contemplated height.
2. To construct a substantial waste weir.
3. To construct a conduit from this reservoir to San Francisco.
4. To construct a distributing reservoir at the end or outlet of this conduit in San Francisco.
5. To connect this reservoir by a large iron main pipe with the pipe-system of San Francisco.

"The object of the company," says the engineer, "is to have an abundant supply in all the peninsular and city reservoirs, and to have the pipe lines leading to San Francisco larger than will be necessary to the largest daily demand." During the last year the San Andreas reservoir was taxed to its utmost capacity by excessive demands, thus causing a lack of pressure through the entire lower and business portion of the city. This excessive demand occurs always in the dry season, and often during the period when demands prevail. A conflagration occurring at such a time, and when the water pressure is materially reduced, soon assume dimensions beyond the control of our Fire Department. Our Board of Supervisors will be derelict in its duty if every possible precaution is not taken against a calamity from fire by reason of a deficient water supply.

Our ever-present danger, in this city of dry seasons and diurnal winds, is the fire-fiend. If the demon ever gets the best of our Fire Department the calamity would be irreparable, and no small water economy is justifiable in the presence of such a possibility as a general conflagration. "The company," says Mr. Schussler, "has never received a dollar from the city for fire purposes;" and he admits, while his reservoirs are central and high, that the pipe system is in some places defective.

We quote from the Engineer's Report to the Mayor and Board so much as suggests his proposed remedy:

"Up to date we have already expended at Crystal Springs a large sum of money for lands, rights, and works. The dam is built to a height of about fifty feet, forming a reservoir of a capacity of 3,380,000,000 gallons. The lake being full, it overflows through the waste weir during the rainy season, the water running to waste into the bay. The pumping works erected at Crystal Springs during the drought of 1877 can pump 3,000,000 gallons daily, but at great expense, as fire-wood is getting scarcer and dearer in the neighborhood, and coal requires transportation by rail or team via San Mateo and over a toll-road. At the same time, in order to utilize these pumping works during such period of excessive demand, we are compelled to pump the water from the level of the pumps to an elevation 635 feet above tide, run it into San Francisco through the Upper or Pilarcitos pipe-line, and, after arriving in San Francisco, drop it down into the San Andreas supply district, which lies at and covers the lowest but most valuable portion of San Francisco. In order, therefore, to stop this costly uphill work, and to properly utilize the water annually collected and stored in the Crystal Springs Reservoir, and particularly to secure a more abundant supply for fire purposes as detailed above, I have strongly recommended to the Spring Valley Water Works to complete the Crystal Springs dam to its contemplated height of seventy-five feet; build a substantial waste weir to carry off the freshest waters, when the lake is full; construct a substantial wrought-iron pipe, forty inches in diameter, and about twenty-one miles in length, from Crystal Springs into San Francisco, having a daily delivering capacity of nearly 12,000,000 gallons; construct a large distributing reservoir in the southern part of San Francisco, and at the end of this forty-inch pipe; lay from this reservoir and along Folsom Street, to or toward the city front, a twenty-four-inch iron main pipe, to which all pipes running across the entire length of Folsom Street would be connected, as well as the parallel pipes, thereby securing for the district east of Valencia and south of Market Street a complete supply, and good pressure, and thorough circulation; the proposed twenty-four-inch Folsom Street main forming the main artery of this entire district.

"The duty of the San Andreas water would thereby be reduced from its present excessive area to a comparatively narrow strip, including Market Street and the lower or flat area west of Valencia and north of Market Street; while Pilarcitos water and that from Lohos Creek would take care of the hills and higher parts of the city.

"The cost of the works herein proposed I estimate as follows:

Completing Crystal Springs dam, inclusive of waste weir.....	$ 70,000
Twenty-one miles of 40-inch pipe, complete in the ground.....	600,000
Reservoir in San Francisco, of a capacity of fifty million gallons, inclusive of land.....	110,000
Four miles of 24-inch main pipe on Folsom Street, complete in the ground and connected.....	170,000
Replacing small mains by larger ones in this district, to improve pressure and circulation.....	50,000
Total cost.....	$1,000,000

"I also propose to connect the large 22-inch main pipe on Valencia and Market Streets, which will be the main artery of the middle city supply, with this lower or Crystal Springs system, and also the 22-inch main pipe from Lake Honda, forming the main artery of the upper city supply, with the 22-inch main on Valencia and Market Streets. These respective connection gates between the upper and middle city supplies, and between the middle and lower city supplies, being kept shut ordinarily, could be instantly opened in case the supply in any one or the other districts should become weak and the pressure low during an extensive conflagration, which would bring the entire supply stored in the next higher district to the assistance of the one requiring it.

"The following table shows our reservoirs in San Francisco, their elevation above city base, and their contents, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 7 being the reservoirs completed and in operation, while No. 6 represents the one herein proposed, to complete the entire scheme:

A.—UPPER CITY SUPPLY.
Name.	Elevation.	Capacity.
1. Lake Honda.....	377 feet.....	32,918,000 gallons.
2. Upper Russian Hill.....	396 ".....	3,724,000 "
3. Clay Street Hill.....	375 ".....	141,000 "
Upper City Supply Storage.....
36,783,000 gallons.
B.—MIDDLE CITY SUPPLY.
4. College Hill.....	252 feet.....	15,006,000 gallons.
5. Market St. Reservoir.....	196 ".....	2,500,000 "
Middle City Supply Storage.....
17,256,000 gallons.
C.—LOWER CITY SUPPLY.
6. Potrero Reservoir.....	170 feet.....	50,000,000 gallons.
7. Lower Russian Hill.....	139 ".....	6,712,000 "
Lower City Supply Storage.....
56,712,000 gallons.
Total capacity of all seven reservoirs in San Francisco.....
110,751,000 gallons.

"By thus dividing the city into three districts, viz., the upper, middle, and lower districts, we apportion the city more appropriately than we have been able to do heretofore, without the introduction of the Crystal Springs water.

"The upper district uses about one-third, the new middle district would use about one-sixth, and the new lower district about one-half of all the water consumed in this city. As, with the above disposition of the city reservoirs, the upper district would have about 36,500,000 gallons storage, the middle district about 17,000,000, and the lower district about 56,500,000 gallons in their respective city reservoirs, these storage capacities are very nearly in proportion to the water used in the respective districts.

"In addition to these extraordinary facilities for extinguishing fires, I wish to call the attention of your honorable body to the facilities which we would have for sending an additional supply into this city in case of or during any extensive conflagration.

"All our works being connected by telegraph with each other and with the city, we could instantly order the following heads of water turned on:

	Gallons Daily.
From Pilarcitos.....	11,000,000
From San Andreas.....	9,500,000
From Crystal Springs.....	12,000,000
From Lake Merced.....	7,000,000
From Lobos Creek.....	2,000,000

Making a daily total of.....41,500,000

Which could be turned into the city reservoirs during such a calamity to assist the amount of 110,000,000 gallons kept on hand in the city reservoirs.

"Upon this showing I venture to say, and I have no doubt that your honorable body, as well as the Fire Department and the Board of Underwriters, will agree with me, that our city will have the best system of fire protection in the world, as it has now one of the best in the United States."

Mr. Schussler asserts and demonstrates that the company can, by its present system, supply its present customers and keep up its present revenues; "hut," he asks, with some show of force, "what is the sense or justice of entailing upon the seventeen thousand consumers the cost of protecting all the property of this city from fire?" And he demands to know what propriety or justice there will be in compelling the company to expend an additional million of dollars, and increase its debt from two to five millions, for the purpose of protecting the city from fire, unless the city is willing to pay for it. There is no power to compel the company to build new reservoirs or rebuild old ones, to lay more pipes or increase the size of present mains, unless the city is prepared to pay for additional expenditure. Mr. Staples estimates one hundred million dollars worth of insurable property—undoubtedly an under estimate. Everybody that knows anything about our present cost of insurance, and what it would be without an adequate supply of water and an efficient fire department, knows that at least two per cent. per annum is saved in this item of fire insurance alone. Two per cent. upon one hundred million dollars is two million dollars—nearly double the whole amount of annual rates collected by the company. To this, add the security given to uninsured property, and there is no estimating in dollars and cents the value of this water system to our city.

There is neither sense nor reason in placing all this water burden upon consumers, and allowing all the unimproved property to pay nothing, and all the commercial property next to nothing; or in allowing sewers to be flushed, streets sprinkled, and parks improved at the cost of the householder who is unfortunate enough to live in the city, and to keep horses, lawns, and bath-tubs. This indecent political and newspaper war is apparently directed against the Spring Valley Water Company, but it is really a war upon the water consumers. The man who owns a hack, dray, furniture-wagon, or other vehicle of public convenience—the person who endeavors to live in a cleanly and decent manner, using water enough for the health and comfort of his family—is hearing a burden that, except for the Bulletin and Call and a few politicians, would be more equitably distributed. The Argonaut office pays more money to wash its type than the dry goods palaces of Scholle Brothers and the White House pay for the protection a full supply of water is to their stocks of goods. The man who drives his dray pays more than the absentee who lives in Paris and drives in the Bois de Boulogne, living from rents received in San Francisco.

The whole business of adjusting water rates is an exceedingly simple one; and when the gentlemen who compose the Board shall recognize the mutual relations existing between the company and the city, and be prepared to act as fair-minded and honorable business men ought to act in the execution of the trust reposed in them, and will close their ears to angry editors and ambitious politicians, the better it will be for all parties concerned.

"I'm hungry and ragged and half sick and dead-broke," muttered a tramp as he sat down for a sun-bath on the Valje Street Wharf, "but it's just my luck. Last fall I got into Frisco just two hours too late to sell my vote. Nobody to blame. Found a big wallet on the street in December, and four police came up before I could hide it. Luck again. Got knocked down by a street car, but there was no opening for a suit and damages, because I was drunk. Just the way. Last fall nails were way down. I knew there'd be a rise, but I didn't buy and hold for the advance. Lost ten thousand dollars out and out. Allus that way with me. Glass went up twenty-five per cent, but I hadn't a pane on hand excepting the pain in my back. Never knew it to fail. Now lumber's gone up, and I don't even own a fence-picket to realize on. Just me again. Fell into the river t'other day, but, instead of pulling me out and giving me a hot whisky, they pulled me out and told me to leave town or I'd get the bounce. That's me again. Now, I've got settled down here for a hit of a rest and a snooze, but I'll be routed out in less than fifteen minutes, and I know it. It'll be just my behanged luck!" He settled down, slid his hat over his face, and was just beginning to feel sleepy, when a hundred pounds of coal rattled down on him. "I knew it—I knew it!" shouted the tramp, as he sprang up and rubbed the dust off his head; "I said so all the time, and I just wish the durned old hogshead had come down along with the coal and jammed me through the wharf."

A Quincy small hoy was looking at some Scriptural engravings, and gazed long and earnestly upon a representation of Adam and Eve in their primitive dress. Turning to his mother he asked:

"Ma, didn't Adam and Eve wear any clothes?"

"No, my son."

The lad reflected a moment, and said:

"By hokey, though, but I'll bet the mosquitoes jist made them hump themselves lively!"

A QUERY: BRISTLING WITH POINTS.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 21, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I have not the honor of knowing, either personally or by reputation, your correspondent the friend and disciple of John Stuart Mill, who in a recent Argonaut goes into ecstasies over Mr. Henry George's Progress and Poverty. But I have read that remarkable—I would once have said damnable—book, and like him, though probably for very different reasons, I am curious to know what men of your class think about it. I say men of your class, for, if I am rightly informed, you were an original Republican, and back of that an Abolitionist, and in this community your paper certainly represents the wealth and culture—the class that, combining at last with the fanatics, drove the South into an attitude which made her seem the aggressor, and then, by the sheer weight of your money (for we could have stood your avalanche of men had our credit held out), beat her down and stamped upon her. I am curious to see how you feel when it is proposed to strip you of your property on the very same principles that were perfectly satisfactory to you when it was proposed to rob Southern families of the property they inherited.

I have read this Progress and Poverty, and, wild as it may seem, I do not believe your correspondent attaches any too much importance to it. For it does, to use one of the expressions of its author, "swim with the current of the times," and that current is setting over Niagara. It must become a famous book, for it puts into philosophic thought and eloquent language just what your Parnells and Justin Swabs and De la Martys are vaguely aiming at. It breaks down the fragile barriers of sophistical reasoning which your writers and thinkers have attempted to rear against the flood of their own doctrines. It carries to their logical result just what your Stones and Beechers and Greeleys and Whittiers and Weeds and Pixleys have been so long preaching. In the name of the brotherhood of man you demanded that the slave should be freed. Now your own chickens come home to roost, and in the name of the brotherhood of man it is demanded that you should make land common property! "If chattel slavery be unjust, then is private property in land unjust." That is the cry of this book, and if that cry is not soon taken up by a million voices then I do not read the signs of the times aright.

Your correspondent says that this book far surpasses all that John Stuart Mill ever published, and throws Herbert Spencer into the shade. Whether this criticism is just or not is not the question, though it certainly seems to me that, wherever they come in conflict, Mill and Spencer have been used up with their own weapons; but it will be the opinion of thousands of men who read this book, or the books like it which are sure to follow: for when once you begin revolutions, each leader is in his turn superseded by some one who goes further.

Mill says: "The land of every country belongs to the people of that country," and then he adds: "The persons called land-owners have no right but to the rent."

George says: "The land belongs to the people; therefore the persons called land-owners have no rights at all, and justice demands that we should confiscate their rents."

Spencer first demonstrates to his own perfect satisfaction that there can be no exclusive right to land, and then, like Mill, shrinks from his own conclusions, when they assume practical form, by declaring that it would be a very simple matter to deal with them if we had before us the people who originally robbed mankind of their heritage; but it is a very delicate question as to how we shall deal with descendants and purchasers who have been so long in possession.

George says: "There can be no exclusive right to land; therefore let us make it common property." There can be no question as to which snake will swallow the others. And then, by and by, when the doctrines preached with such ability (for there is no use in denying that) in this Progress and Poverty become widely disseminated, some one else will arise to say: "The earth is our common mother, and all men are brothers; therefore let us divide not only the soil, but all the proceeds thereof!"

You may smile at this just now, but look at the signs of the times. Look at the Capital at Sacramento, where your Republicans are vying with Democrats in introducing agrarian bills!

I think I know a great book when I see it, and, if I am not mistaken, Progress and Poverty is a book which marks an epoch, and which is going to exercise more influence upon its generation than anything since Uncle Tom's Cabin. It has all the directness and force of Tom Paine's Common Sense, all the impassioned sentiment of Rousseau's Contrat Social, with a vigor and grasp which equal the methods of Herbert Spencer. And, in the name of philosophy, in the name of philanthropy, in the name of religion—the very powers you invoked against slaveholding—it proposes to strip you land-holders of your possessions, declaring that you will be a good deal happier and more sociable when reduced to an equality with your neighbors!

As for me, I must confess that it has almost converted me into a thorough-going agrarian. But what I am most curious about is to see what your Republican preachers and editors will have to say to this new gospel of revolution. You scoffed at vested rights; you preached human equality; you stamped Burke as a madman and Calhoun as a traitor. Now the spirit you have fostered turns on you in turn. "John Brown's body lies mouldering in the grave, but his soul goes marching on." And I am curious to see whether men of your class are going to join in the march, or will vainly try to make a stand against it.

EX-REBEL.

History gives an account of how, many hundreds of years ago, ladies devoted several hours to the arrangement of their hair. One can easily imagine, while gazing upon the portraits of court ladies and queens, and seeing their elaborate coiffures, how much time could be given to the art. And yet ladies of the present day, in order to have the services of certain hairdressers, will often have their hair dressed a whole day and night before they are ready to appear at a reception or ball, and many of them are known to sit bolstered up in bed, with head resting against the head-board of the bedstead, afraid to move or hardly to breathe for fear a lock or bairpin might be disarranged.

THE WORLD'S WOMEN.

The Hon. Mrs. Ronald Campbell, whose husband was killed in the engagement on the hill of Kambula, accompanies the Empress Eugénie in her pilgrimage to Zululand.

Another instance of the well-directed benevolence of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts is mentioned. She has given £250 toward the liquidation of a debt which has weighed down the poverty-stricken fishermen of Cape Clear Islands, in addition to £600 already contributed by her this year for the same object. The result of this generosity is that eighty local boats will shortly be enabled to engage in the mackerel fishing.

The Princess Louise is the subject of a picturesque Canadian anecdote. It is related that as she was about leaving Halifax the other day a crippled old Crimean soldier broke through the guard, and lifting his hat, held out his hand, saying that he had shaken hands with her royal mother before the Princess was born. With "eyes dimmed with tears" the young lady heartily shook hands with the ancient veteran, and the crowd about cheered.

Lady Thornton carries out her British ideas in Washington. A correspondent of the Syracuse Journal says that the Englishwoman very emphatically declares that her guests shall not by her consent be criticised through the press. Whoever attempts to describe what this or that lady wore at the British Legation has gained such information without the consent of the hostess; and, having once offended in this particular, need not expect to be again invited.

Mrs. John Jacob Astor has taken under her patronage a school for poor children, started by the Children's Aid Society at West Fourteenth Street, New York. Some of the hundreds of boys and girls which she has sent West, at her own expense, to homes provided for them, have gone from this school. Every year she sends five or six hundred children to the South or West, many of whom have written letters of earnest gratitude and pleasure at their new surroundings.

The aged Empress of the Chinese seems to be what the clergymen call a womanly woman. She has a new pearl-embroidered gown that is exceedingly valuable, and she refuses to lend or give it to anybody else, although she knows it must be burned if she should die with it in her possession. In fact, she is animated by the same spirit that causes some loving wives to leave orders that they are to be buried in their best clothes, in order that they may not become the property of hated sisters-in-law.

The Washington Capital says that Mrs. Annette Wilkins W. Hicks-Lord will go to Europe early in June. She will first visit the Duchess of Norfolk, in England, and her next visit will be to the home of the Marquis of Bute. Her stay abroad will cover an indefinite period. This would seem to set at rest the rumor of an intended marriage with Charles O'Connor. Indeed, it is quite improbable that Mrs. Lord, who is a woman full of ambition, will wed an American, but will seek an alliance with one of the highest among the English nobility. Why not? She is enormously rich, handsome and engaging.

A correspondent in Washington says: "Imagine an English duchess who has inherited the rare beauty which descends with hereditary rank. Why are the English nobility the finest specimens of personal beauty? It is because the members leave nothing undone to perfect the physical proportions of the race. Of English origin, Mrs. Ramsey brings to the Cabinet any amount of that material which this administration lacked most. Mrs. Ramsey's long residence at the capital, her superior intelligence and winning ways are doing much to retard the criticism which ended with the retirement of her predecessor."

They tell a story in the Paris papers to the effect that the Czar of Russia has now at his court a young lady who is his daughter, her mother having been a Princess Dolgorouki. The Princess died eight years ago, and the Emperor, having had the most profound love for her, recently determined to bring their daughter to the palace. He obtained the sanction of the church, but the Empress was indignant and refused to receive the girl. However, she relented, and the Princess came to court and has remained there ever since. It is said that her favor is indispensable to whoever wishes to obtain anything from the Emperor.

Tom Thumb is exhibited in New York, and they only charge ten cents admission. The General was a good deal offended when it was first broached to him that he put himself on show at such a price, but Mrs. Thumb reasoned with him, and brought him to understand that the days of high prices are over. Mrs. Thumb, who is no bigger than an ulster button herself, is the man of the Thumb ménage. She compelled the General to sell his yacht, for with his professional engagements and his passion for sailing the gentleman was never at home. It is well that Thomas has somebody to look after him. He was running very wild a year or two ago.

The Baronne de Wykerslooth, née Princesse de la Tremoille, whose death occurred recently, delighted in being impertinent. On her appearance as a bride, at the Belgian court, some thirty years since, one of the Queen's ladies addressed a few courteous remarks to the new arrival, who opened her large black eyes and exclaimed: "How delightful, madame! I was told Flemish was such a difficult language for strangers, but I understand you almost as well as if you spoke French." Her Majesty, the daughter of Louis Philippe, overheard the observation, and, turning to the Princess, said: "I, too, am French by birth, and I find that French is as purely spoken in Belgium as on the other side of the frontier." On one occasion, at a state hall, the King's librarian, M. A., requested the honor of dancing with the Baronne de Wykerslooth. "You must excuse me," was her quick retort, "but your brother has made my shoes too tight for me." M. A.'s brother was, in truth, a disciple of St. Crispin. If, in shopping, her name and address were required, she sent for her footman, a Belgian. "Peter, give my name [turning to the shopman]; I never can pronounce it myself."

SEVEN GREAT SONNETS.

To most readers of English the sonnets of Shakespeare are a sealed book; to many their existence is unknown. Their archaism, their lack of symmetry and sequence in idea, their astonishing compactness of thought, entailing frequent baldness of diction, are difficulties demanding almost a special education. Yet these poems (except in one unimportant particular they are not sonnets at all) are of the wisest and sweetest in the language. The seven here selected are in our judgment the best. Than in these, Shakespeare could hardly have done better work, even had he wrought in loyal bondage to a severer art, under the stimulating exactions of the sonnet proper. Those to whom Shakespeare's sonnets are unfamiliar or unpleasing have in that fact assurance of richer results of profit and pleasure from their study than equal intellectual effort in any other direction can command. It is in the hope of exciting a desire for the fruits of such labor that we here reprint these creations of a mind that did nothing ill.

XXIX.

When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,
I all alone beweep my outcast state,
And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless cries,
And look upon myself, and curse my fate,
Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featur'd like him, like him with friends possess'd,
Desiring this man's art, and that man's scope,
With what I most enjoy contented least;
Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
Haply I think on thee—and then my state
(Like to the lark at break of day arising
From sullen earth) sings hymns at heaven's gate;
For thy sweet love remember'd, such wealth brings,
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

XXX.

When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
I summon up remembrance of things past,
I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste:
Then can I drown an eye, ununs'd to flow,
For precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
And weep afresh love's long-since cancell'd woe,
And moan the expense of many a vanish'd sight.
Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,
And heavily from woe to woe tell o'er
The sad account of fore-bemoan'd moan,
Which I new pay as if not paid before.
But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
All losses are restor'd, and sorrows end.

XXXIII.

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
Flatter the mountain tops with sovereign eye,
Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchymy,
Anon permit the basest clouds to ride
With ugly rack on his celestial face,
And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace:
Even so my sun one early morn did shine
With all triumphant splendor on my brow;
But out! alack! he was but one hour mine,
The region cloud hath mask'd him from me now.
Yet him for this my love no whit disdaineth;
Suns of the world may stain, when heaven's sun staineth.

LX.

Like as the waves make toward the pebbled shore,
So do our minutes hasten to their end;
Each changing place with that which goes before,
In sequent toil all forwards do contend.
Nativity once in the main of light,
Crawls to maturity, where'th'being crown'd,
Crook'd eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
And time that gave, doth now his gift confound.
Time doth transfix the flourish set on youth,
And delves the parallels in beauty's brow;
Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
And nothing stands but for his scythe to mow.
And yet, to times in hope, my verse shall stand,
Praising thy worth, despite his cruel hand.

LXXI.

No longer mourn for me when I am dead,
Than you shall hear the surly sullen bell
Give warning to the world that I am fled
From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell:
Nay, if you read this line, remember not
The hand that writ it: for I love you so,
That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
If thinking on me then should make you woe.
Oh, if (I say) you look upon this verse,
When I perhaps am compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse;
But let your love even with my life decay:
Lest the wise world should look into your moan,
And mock you with me after I am gone.

LXXXVII.

Farewell! thou art too dear for my possessing,
And like enough thou know'st thy estimate;
The charter of thy worth gives thee releasing;
My bonds in thee are all determinate.
For how do I hold thee but by thy granting?
And for that riches where is my deserving?
The cause of this fair gift in me is wanting,
And so my patent back again is swerving.
Thyself thou gav'st, thy own worth then not knowing,
Or me, to whom thou gav'st it, else mistaking;
So thy great gift, upon misprision growing,
Comes home again, on better judgment making.
Thus have I had thee, as a dream doth flatter,
In sleep a king, but waking no such matter.

CXVI.

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments. Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove;
Oh, no! it is an ever-fixed mark,
That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
It is the star to every wandering bark,
Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.
Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his bending sickle's compass come;
Love alters not with his brief hours and days,
Nor bears it out even to the edge of doom.
If this be error, and upon me prov'd,
I never writ, nor no man ever lov'd.

"This is how it is, Jake: Yer like it better the third time yer see it than yer did the first, for why?—there's so many things into it w'ich you don't see the first time." Rem acu tetigit. The speaker was a gallery-god; his subject, Sothern's "Dundreary;" his speech, the very core and essence of criticism on that famous creation. It has been said, in view of the changes that have been made in the play, that the title, Our American Cousin, is become a misnomer, and that it should be called Lord Dundreary. Hardly. "Asa Trenchard" was originally one of the lengthiest parts on the stage; it has been cut no more than enough to compensate the new length given to "Dundreary," nor otherwise sacrificed more than this cutting required. It is Sothern in the part of "Dundreary" who dominates the play, rather than the part of "Dundreary" itself; and were his lordship in other hands, it would appear that the American Cousin remains quite the leading character. The mistaken criticism just adverted to, connects itself with one broad question of contemporary dramatics that has a bearing on the future of the noble art of play-acting, and has been thought to threaten its nobility. One correspondent of the Argonaut, last week, bewailing Mr. Sothern's defection from the utilities of general comedy, intimated an opinion that the art and its lovers had thereby made a loss.

The financial success that has of late years attended "Dundreary," and one or two similar creations, is one of the noteworthy phenomena of recent histrionics, and renders it quite certain that similar work on parallel lines will still be pursued by some of the best actors. If, then, the influence of such work is to be pernicious to the art, the art is in a bad way—for the work will be persisted in. Let us prospect this thing and pan it out, and we shall find in our pan one nugget of truth, at least, viz: That this same Dundrearyism, or Rip-Van-Winkleism, is in itself at once fruit and proof of a state of high vigor, health, and growth in the trunk on which it springs.

There is one sense in which it is true that our rarest actors do appear lost to their art and to us in its general scope, but it will also appear that no part of this loss is due to the working of the rich pocket of Dundrearyism. Had it never been struck at all, it still does not follow that we could have hoped to hear the Queen Mah speech or to have a "Tony Lumpkin" from Mr. Sothern, any more than we do now hope for a "Hotspur" from Edwin Booth. This state of affairs has its root deep in the history of our stage, and has nothing to do with any merely modern aspects of it. Dundrearyism is essentially specialization, and is nothing else than specialization; and specialization is, in general, only one aspect of development. In the present case, it is giving us examples of highly specialized but very highly finished work. These examples are as exuberantly developed and opulent in detail as they are highly finished. They are masterpieces after their kind. By all this, art and we are gainers so long as the specialization in any single direction does not proceed to the length of aborting other and coordinate powers, or of impairing their symmetry or beauty, or their vigor or grace in action.

There is, of course, one thing in play-acting that is greater than the actor or the acting—namely, the play. No exhibition of histrionic skill or strength could compensate for decay in the drama; and such decay has been pointed out as one possible consequence of Dundrearyism. The peril is an imaginary one. Dundrearyism has laid no profane hand on any dramatic shrine. When it shall actually offer to do so, and to affix its inch of novelty to the classic length of Cleopatra's nose, it will be time enough for critics to arise and tweak its own. Glancing back along the annals of our stage—the oldest stage, he it remembered, extant—there appears to be scarcely a period not marked by some specialty akin to that of to-day; and at all the brightest, lustiest epochs, this feature appears in its prominence. We have ourselves survived a Barney-Williamism, and other sorts, and are gratefully thankful in comparing their day and date with that better time we are now fallen upon.

Of itself "Dundreary" is a gem—yep, of exquisite cutting; it is one of our permanent possessions, and a joy in the memory. Even while lapping ourselves in its delicious humor, it will be worth while to draw around it such definite lines of limitation as may help to preserve order among our dramatic notions. And it will be granted at last that the world has the better of its bargain with Mr. Sothern, for all it rewards him munificently. The man who makes two laughs to grow where one laugh grew before, owes to second rank among the benefactors of his kind.

How much—of the enjoyableness of Mr.

Sothern's engagement at the Bush Street Theatre is due to his excellent support; there is a sufficiency and completeness in the casts that are infinitely comfortable and satisfying. It may be that the star system is destined, as predicted, to wreak evil upon that of the old-time stock company; but if it shall, at the same time, take on this latest form—viz., that each star is to swim through his orbit accompanied by his own planetary system—egad, perchance no one will be the lover in the new order of things. It is not improbable that the glory of the theatric firmament may even be heightened thereby.

"Fear is the mother of foresight." If there be any in this community who fear the threatened whirlwind of communism and incendiarianism, let them prepare to meet the worst. Now is the accepted time: the very best time to buy rifles and learn how to use them. The sand-lotters are doing this thing. Rifles must be met with rifles, bullets by bullets, blood by blood, Kallorchism and DeYoungism by DeYoungism and Kallorchism.

The Eastern Socialistic Labor Party, of which John Swinton is the head, has no considerable organization here. A man named Rafferty, and a few women, talk to a rag-tag-and-bob-tail crowd in a Fourth Street cellar; but as yet the movement has not taken definite shape. Yet there can be no reasonable doubt that sympathy exists between the Eastern socialists and the Western sand-lotters. In a recent speech, Swinton, in answer to the question, "What would you do with Queen Victoria, who spends £470,000 a year, while a portion of her people are starving?" said: "I would guillotine her. I would have a court convened at Hyde Park, consisting of twelve Irish paupers, which should try her for her life, and cut her head off." Then Mr. Swinton went on to denounce Bismarck and eulogize Parnell and Kearney.

Pearl Eyttinge is a very pretty young lady. Her charms completely captivated a Brooklynite when she was playing in Wives at Colonel Sinn's establishment recently. His passion took the shape of a mammoth bouquet of roses and a delicately scented note, during a performance, to the back door. Colonel Sinn happened to be passing by, and Miss Eyttinge handed the epistolary effort to him for perusal. The Colonel read as follows:

"You are beautiful! If you will wear the flowers I send you in the last act, I will ever after wear a Pearl in my heart."

"What shall I do with it?" asked Miss Eyttinge. "Give the bouquet to me," replied the doughty Colonel. When the curtain rose on the next act, the expectant "S. S.," who sat in the front row, saw, with what feelings we cannot attempt even to describe, every person in the cast, with the exception of Miss Eyttinge herself, decorated with a rose plucked from his amatory bouquet. The musicians, from the leader down to the drummer, each had a bud from the same source in their button-holes. The verdant youth was evidently an adept student of the language of flowers, for with considerable haste, and more sense than one would give him credit for, he gathered up his belongings and made for the door. As he sped past the grinning ushers, he noted with dismay that they also sported boutonnieres. He left that theatre without a Pearl in his heart, which was as empty no doubt as the head from which emanated the desire to obtain Miss Eyttinge's favor. He will be as surprised to see this little story in print as will the gallant Colonel Sinn himself, who was responsible for lacerating the young man's feelings.

There is a question undergoing discussion in Eastern circles, whether Ralph Waldo Emerson was enlightened by listening to the Reverend Joseph Cook, and whether he obtained certain new views from the ungoverned Philosopher of the Hub. Punch once contained a cartoon of two cockney artists looking at a glorious sunset. "Very neat," said cockney No. 1. "Very, but cribbed from Turner," replied cockney No. 2. Kindred to this was the remark of a female art critic at the exhibition of the School of Design: "Landscape. Oh, yes, by Miss Nellie Hopps. Good thing. Tom Hill paints like her." There is another picture at the gallery by one of Strauss's pupils, in color, style, and handling so very like the work of the master that we think the master did all of it except to purchase the frame.

It is well said by the Hotel Mail that "a French bill of fare in a French hotel or restaurant is proper. In an American caravansary, to a thousand and one people out of a possible thousand, an English bill of fare is more acceptable, as it certainly is more sensible." And more than that, the French of the American bill of fare is a thing of horror to any one who knows the French language. It is always misspelled, never accented, and invariably has words which possess no meaning whatever.—Progress.

If one might be as brave as General McComb appears, as benevolent as Justice Leman looks, as wise as Mr. Pickering is not, as impudent as Mr. Braunhart is—there would be left no virtue and no accomplishment in life for which one might reasonably sigh.

A subscriber asks: "What is a pessimist?" The query evidences a very great amount of ignorance. A pessimist is a—a pessimist is not an optimist. We thought everybody knew that.

TWO NOBLEMEN.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 4, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—The recent rocket-like rise and stick-like fall of the soi-disant "scion of nobility" visiting our city have recalled to my mind several incidents tending to show the blinding halo which to many encircles the wearer of a title, no matter how uncertain its tenure. Many years ago there arrived in a Southern city, from the Island of Cuba, a person announcing himself as a French count. Taking up his quarters at one of the principal hotels, he soon made acquaintances, and his title, handsome face, and insinuating manners readily gained him admittance into the most fashionable society, where for a brief season he illustrated the superiority of the attractions with which nature endows a nobleman. In addition to the fascinations already mentioned, he possessed the irresistible one of being in an aristocratic state of delicate health—his countenance, in consequence, wearing a most becoming and interesting pallor. Invitations were showered upon him, and no entertainment was considered complete unless graced by his noble presence. His popularity attained its climax when he formed the habit of having a frightful hemorrhage whenever an opportunity for his comfortable accomplishment presented itself. Often while engaged in sweet converse with some gentle, unsuspecting lady, he would sink back upon a sofa, exhausted and apparently dying; the life-blood oozing from between his pale lips attested his suffering. The frantic screams of his alarmed hostess would call to her aid servants bearing pillow, fan, and eau de cologne; all were needed, but so entire was his collapse that even the soothing influence of soft hands applying sweet restoratives was long unavailing. At length, however, his ministering angel would be rewarded by a languid glance and faint smile, giving the joyful assurance that the vital spark had not forever fled. The approaching close of the season now warned the count to concentrate his attentions, with a view to a matrimonial campaign; for hemorrhages, though they had so far proved valuable stock-in-trade, were of necessity perishable, and must inevitably, in the course of time, be cured; for if they did not pall upon him, they would upon his tender friends. His choice was soon fixed upon a much-admired beauty and heiress, who, dazzled by the thought of wearing a coronet, discarded a lover so unfortunate as to labor under the disability of plain American descent; the musical accent and courtly bow of a distinguished stranger, after being once known, could not be dispensed with by any lady having pretensions to fashion or fortune. The count accompanied his fiancée to her home in an adjoining State, and was urged by her mother to remain at her house, that he might receive the care that his failing health required.

Matters progressed most satisfactorily to all concerned, until about two weeks before the time appointed for the wedding, when the proud mother-in-law expectant received a letter containing tidings far from glad. It stated that friends in M— had learned from a trustworthy source that the count was a highly appreciated barber of Havana, and that those harrowing hemorrhages, upon which so much sympathy and cologne had been wasted, were conjured at will, not from his lungs, but from his pocket, where they were contained in a bottle wrapped in his handkerchief, ready at a moment's notice when an auspicious moment presented itself. The scene that followed the perusal of this cruel letter was indescribable; suffice it to say, there was a stormy interview between mamma and the late count; rage and mortification so overcame the belle that she indulged in no leave-taking, and soon afterward was fortunate enough to be able to console herself with her old love; and woe he unto man or woman who ventured to allude to that most romantic episode in her career. Our hero took his departure for a new field, and as he was never heard of again, probably betook himself to his former occupation.

My next experience with a noble foreigner was in this city, about six years ago, when a prospective count (the genuine article this time) brought a letter of introduction to a fashionable lady of my acquaintance. Shortly after I was invited to dine with him. I thought him charming, and was delighted to make his acquaintance, though his personal appearance varied widely from my preconceived idea of how a count should look. His features looked as if they had been thrown into his face by chance, with an unusually provoking disregard of the fitness of things, the whole disgraced with a rough, purplish complexion that added to the sinister expression of his deep-set, small, black eyes. His costume, however, was worthy of his rank, "the customary suit of solemn black" being materially enlivened by an expanse of finest embroidery, and every button in sight was a superb solitaire all set to match.

Monsieur was making only a short stay in America, and, as I inferred from his conversation, simply to await the death of an old cousin from whom he was to inherit title and estates. He resided in London, having married an Englishwoman. She having died, he expressed himself as not averse to an alliance with a wealthy American. I do not think, however, he sought a victim here. Two or three years after his departure from San Francisco I was horrified at seeing the name of our friend, the count, figuring in the papers as a terrible criminal. It seems, after his return to London, he married for the second time an heiress, and started for a tour upon the Continent. While traveling in the Tyrol, early one morning, they left the small inn at which they were stopping and started out to see the scenery. In a short time he returned alone and asked for assistance, saying that his wife, venturing too near, had fallen over a precipice. His perfectly indifferent manner, and the position in which the poor woman was found dead, proved she had been pushed from the height. His arrest immediately followed, and he was subsequently convicted of murder and sentenced to death; his punishment, however, upon a second trial, was commuted to twenty years in the galleys. During the trial some investigations were made in regard to the death of the mother of his first wife, the circumstances of which, to say the least, were very strange. His mother-in-law was very wealthy, and his wife her only child. The latter was in failing health, and there was every reason to believe her mother would survive her. Now this model son-in-law showed the old lady a loaded pistol, which went off accidentally and killed her. The daughter inherited her property, died soon after, and left it all to him. So many years had elapsed, however, that nothing could be proved. Upon the departure of monsieur for Europe, he left his address with several ladies of my acquaintance, promising, should they visit England, to entertain them at his residence. It is needless to say that cards are no longer considered worthy of preservation. His present abiding place certainly has the recommendation of entailing none of the obligations of hospitality. I could relate some amusing incidents of the visit to San Francisco of this worthy nobleman, but there are ladies who might object to being mentioned in this connection; so, for the present, this is "what I know" about noblemen.

HELOISE.

Last Tuesday evening the fifteenth annual exhibition of the San Francisco Art Association was formally opened, the customary reception being well attended. About one hundred and fifty pictures have places—some of them creditable, and others execrable, reflecting neither art on the part of the perpetrators, nor judgment on the part of those who admitted them to a hanging. There is an excuse perhaps for the quality of this season's work in the desperate endeavor to paint something that will sell, the artist partly reasoning that the art is as good as the public appreciation of it—financially speaking. Mention of the pictures themselves is reserved.

This is what a Paris correspondent writes about Worth: A certain Californian lady, whom we will not more clearly point out, visited his atelier once upon a time and proceeded to state her views as to the costume required. She was simply, indeed dowdily dressed, having no pretensions to style in her personal appearance, but of great wealth. M. Worth listened politely. At the conclusion of her remarks he rose, and, bowing profoundly, replied, in a tone respectful but firm: "Pardon me, madame, I can not risk my reputation upon you."

A Perhaps.

Together, on the beaded lawn,
We bent to pluck the jeweled stars
Of blood-red columbine—like Mars
Shaming the dazzle of the dawn;
Wild flotsom from some distant dell,
That had we watched from babyhood.
We bent together; who may tell
If this were omen ill or good?

Mine were the fingers first to press
The lissome stalk of burnished green;
Our fingers interlaced between
The pauses of a curt caress.
Were hands to blame that, in the rout,
Each made for each a cruel miss?
Were lips to blame for harb'ring doubt
That ended in a blameless kiss?

ALFRED HARDIE.

SAUCELITO, March 5, 1880.

Obscure Intimations.

C. J. S.—We really do not know if our contributor, Mr. Sanford Bennett, is a baritone. We don't let anybody sing much in this office.

J. Q., Marysville.—Your lines:
"Grant is endorsed by the preacher Beecher;
Good! but who'll vouch for the Beecher creature?"

Are probably the best poetry that we have ever had the advantage of publishing in this paper. A hypercritical taste might perhaps object to the word "endorsed." "Endorse," as we understand it, means to write across the back. Rather a liberty for one man to take with another, you know.

H., Oakland.—Thanks; we needed that comparison between the two galleys-builders, Kearney and Haman, very badly indeed. It completes our set.

GLASS HOUSE.—We do talk a good deal about Kearney and Kallorch, that's a fact. But the prominence that we give them is not eminence. It is not, we hope, of a kind to do them much good. The dailies, on the contrary, report their proceedings in just the way that they would wish them reported if they paid for them.

BRIDGE.—Accepted and will appear soon. The judicious compliment in your personal note did its duty nobly. In the hands of a skilled flatterer, even of the foul sex, we are as "an unresisting child."

MIDDAY.—You are "as right as a trivet." (By the way, what is a trivet?) "Too much education" is a great misfortune to any man. It has been the undoing of us.

CHIPS FROM OTHER BLOCKHEADS.

"Mamma," said she, "why do people buy twins?" Her little brother solved the question as follows: "So that cannibals can eat philopœnas."

He had climbed the flour barrel with a step as light as air, And his gentle voice did carol, when he saw the sweetmeats fair That were hidden in the pantry high upon the upper shelf, "I'm a pilgrim, I'm a stranger, but I want thee for myself."

Suddenly the door was darkened, and from out the deep'ning gloom Came a wail of mortal terror, as if some impending doom Was about to overtake the youth with sweet things at his side, And the shadow of his mother's shoe was softened in his hide.

"Gail, have I bribed anybody during the last hour?" inquired Mr. Blaine, recovering from one of his sympathetic fits. "No, James," Gail responded, with a sweet civil-service-reform sigh; "nobody at all." "Then," said Mr. Blaine, "the insinuation is a base charge, and the charge is a double-dyed lie. Hand me down my trusty claim more!" This shows where and why there was war in Maine.

Where rolleth the Verdigris down to the sea, Where the Chickasaw roams on the flowery lea, Where the azure Wewoka sweeps on in its way From old Pottowatomie down to the bay: Where the flipflap chirps cheerily out of the gloam, And the sad phillaloo sings of mother and home— With my Cherokee maiden enconced on my knee, And my Kickapoo darling, I'm pining to be.

Oh, 'tis vain that the gawgaw sports in the hedge, And the pollywog glints in the slippyrsome sedge, Or the proud cockadoodle sweeps down from ber nest, And soars on the blizzard that yawns in the west; The dado may wail in the shimmer of moon, And charm the dull Seminole ear with his tune— It is still I am pouring my passionate tide For the love that I bear for my Kickapoo bride, I chase the fierce tittlebat out of his lair, I lure the shy gingersnap into my snare; I hunt the wild tattletale over the hill, And coax the coy cocklebur out of the rill; And then the Arrapahoe virgin is glad, And the Boggwyok squaw in her wampum is clad, And my Tishmingo beauty goes hip-hop with glee, And my Kickapoo darling reclines on my knee.

Not to have enjoyed the luxury of riding on the California Street cable-road is to have failed in the knowledge of one of San Francisco's very best things. By no other route may one so easily see how extensive our city is, and what possibilities of builded elegance and cultivated beauty its rough landmarks, as well as its softened outlines, promise its citizens. When one may sit on the smoothly rolling, almost noiseless dummy, and look out on a landscape of surpassing beauty, and at the same time converse without undue effort, one may have more luxury for five cents than is often crowded into one experience. But if the California Street Railroad is so pleasant a thing for the transient passenger, what a boon of convenience it is to the resident of the Western Addition! It is no extravagance to say that the California Street Railroad has done more to build up that section of the city with luxurious homes, and happy, contented families, than almost any other circumstance in San Francisco life. At present the extension of the road has not sufficiently developed itself to admit of definite consideration; but there can be no doubt that its completion will be of great additional benefit to the community. The city has already five cable roads in continuous operation. Others are promised—some of them longer, some less important than any now being run. But of all the roads present and prospective, there is not one which promises more, has done more, or deserves better of the public than the road now doing such efficient service on California Street.

Do as She Does!

SO. BLOOMINGVILLE, O., May 1, 1879.
SRS.—I have been ailing for over ten years, and I tried your Hop Bitters, and I found that it done me more good than all the doctors. I will get up a club with my neighbors, as others do, and send to the nearest wholesaler, and get them cheaper by the dozen, as we must have them to keep us well.
MISS S. S. BONE.

Daudet's latest novel, Les Rois en Exil, is being translated into Polish.

APHONIA CURED.—FELLOW'S COMPOUND SYRUP OF HYPOPHOSPHITES.—Aphonia or Loss of Voice, is remedied in a short time, no matter whether the cause be from inflammation of the lining membrane, from cold, or from nervous derangement.

A monograph on Astrolabes, by Mr. Knobel, will shortly appear.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR AND MANAGER.

Monday, March 8, during the week, and Saturday matinee. Third week of

MR. SOTHERN

And his

COMPANY OF COMEDIANS.

Mr. Sothern in two of his greatest characters every night, the "TWO BROTHERS," bill, SAM and DUNDREARY, the 3-act comedy called

DUNDREARY'S BROTHER SAM,

And the great Sothern farce,

DUNDREARY MARRIED AND SETTLED.

In preparation,

DAVID GARRICK, HOME,

.....AND.....

THE HORNET'S NEST.

Seats reserved one week in advance.

O'LEARY VS. WESTON

—AT THE—

MECHANICS' PAVILION!

Corner Eighth and Mission Streets, San Francisco.

MATCH FOR $10,000

SIX DAYS GO-AS-YOU-PLEASE,

—COMMENCING—

MONDAY, MARCH 8, 1880, AT 1 O'CLOCK A. M.

Terminating Saturday, March 13, at 11 P. M.

FIRST-CLASS MUSIC. - - - ADMISSION, FIFTY CENTS.
Seats Reserved for Ladies Free of Charge.

WHITE LEAD.

Use "ATLANTIC" brand, the STANDARD NEW YORK LEAD. Stipulate for it in all your contracts. Do not permit any other to be employed.

Property owners are cautioned against the substitution by Painters of cheap, low-grade Leads, which, owing to inferiority, can be bought for considerably less than the cost of Atlantic brand.

C. T. RAYNOLDS & CO., Sole Agents.

French, Spanish, and Italian Conversational Lessons, practical method. Post-office box 1574.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Just arrived from Europe, all the works of Chopin and many other novelties in the celebrated "LITOLFF EDITION." HOLBROOK & LEWIS, Music Dealers, 23 Dupont Street.

Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery St.

Hackett & Dean, Dentists, No. 126 Kearny Street, Thurlow Block.

MORSE'S PALACE OF ART, 417 Montgomery St.

THE BALDWIN THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER,
R. M. EBERLE.....STAGE MANAGER.

POSITIVELY LAST PERFORMANCE OF

CLARA MORRIS'S

NEW PLAY,

THE SOUL OF AN ACTRESS,
THIS (SATURDAY) MATINEE, AT 2 O'CLOCK.

This (Saturday) evening, March 6, Benefit of

G. R. CHIPMAN,

THE DANICHEFFS,

.....AND.....

MY NEIGHBOR'S WIFE.

Monday, March 8,

CLARA MORRIS

.....AND.....

MISS MULTON.

In preparation, RAYMONDE.

REMOVAL.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.

Have removed to

UNION BUILDING,
JUNCTION MARKET AND PINE STREETS.

PAINTING ON PORCELAIN,

ALSO IN OIL AND WATER COLOR.

Painting on silk, and decorative art generally; acquired in London and Paris; lessons given by MISS RYDER, 26½ Kearny Street.

To insure safety of pupils' work on porcelain, Miss Ryder burns it in her own kiln.

C. BEACH

BOOKSELLER AND STATIONER

107 MONTGOMERY ST., OPP. THE Occidental. Special Notice—Engraved Plate, with 100 cards, $3.00; 100 Cards from Plate, $1.50; only the best Imported Cards used. In the Store is established the Agency of D. APPLETON & CO., of New York, with a full line of their publications. Catalogues furnished on application.

TIFFANY'S

HARLEQUIN PLAYING CARDS. Unique in Design, and Beautifully Executed. A stock of these artistic productions can be found at the store of

EDWARD T. MARTIN,

5 Montgomery Street.

N. B.—"THE BOSS" PUZZLE will arrive shortly, "And Don't you Forget It."

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—MARCH STYLES.

Send Stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine.

SPRING
STYLE
HATS

NOW INTRODUCED BY

HERRMANN

THE HATTER,

336 KEARNY STREET,

Between Bush and Pine Streets.

BRANCH, 910 MARKET ST., ABOVE STOCKTON.

As regards beauty and number of styles, Herrmann still leads.

Spring Catalogues now ready. Send for copy.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

BILLINGS,
HARBOURNE & CO.

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS.

A full line of

STANDARD AND MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS

Always in Stock.

Special attention given to supplying Libraries. Catalogues sent on application.

No. 3 Montgomery Street,
(MASONIC TEMPLE.)

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.,

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co. Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt.

C. F. SHEFFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

PACIFIC

SAW MANUFACTURING CO.

17 AND 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

SAWS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION on hand and made to order. Agents for C. B. Paul's Files.

Repairing of all kinds done at short notice.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento, J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

TABER, HARKER & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco.

H. L. DODGE.....L. H. SWEENEY.....J. E. RUGGLES

DODGE, SWEENEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS,

Wholesale Provision Dealers,

.....AND.....

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Nos. 114 and 116 Market, and 11 and 13 California Sts.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.,

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR Street.

Liberal advances made on consignments.

J. C. MERRILL & CO

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - - San Francisco

Etchings and Rare Engravings.

W. K. VICKERY INVITES ATTENTION

to his large collection of the above, which includes fine original Engravings from the great Paintings of Europe. Rare Portraits, either in oil or water colors. A large number of fine Etchings in colors and black and white. 1 to 5 o'clock.

106 KEARNY ST. (Thurlow Bldg.)

$72 a week. $12 a day at home. Fit free. Address TRUE

CONSERVATISM IN ORDINARY.

The late Winwood Reade had an ardent admirer. After reading portions of the Martyrdom of Man, the friend said to the author: "Why these altogether unnecessary sentences? Is the world any better for knowing these truths—if they be truths? May not the world be worse for believing such statements true, if they be false?"

Surely the world is always worse for accepting falsehood in lieu of truth. But the thinking world does not commonly glean the opinions from which it forms its judgment amidst the fields of paragraph, nor does it always find them in the marts of literature. Thinking men accept no dogmatism. The apparent dogmatisms which they do accept will always be found close on the heels of classified facts. Facts are the "useless lumber" of Buckle, to the man who has once assimilated them, but the stable superstructure of thought in the searcher's laboratory.

Most men do not think at all. Of this overshadowing majority, a portion is intellectually too indolent, and a larger portion mentally too incapable, to think either vigorously or wisely. Vigorous thinking is not essentially right thinking. It is often radically unreasonable, and is potent for evil to those only who do not themselves think rightly, and in whom the pride of opinion is not a component of what powers of thought they have. It is in sad evidence of the unfortunate conditions under which intellectual progress must work that natural aptitude for thinking is not a spontaneous incentive to thought. The bright man is very commonly the lazy man; and even when both bright and active, men are often purblind from inheritance.

It is a favorite postulate of many brilliant writers that we must accept the conditions under which society exists as cognate with the best results which social science may hope to attain. It seems clear to me that progress is impossible until we rid our reason of this belief. Malthus apart, and the question aside of merely sustaining a continuously teeming population with the world's future food-supply, it does seem convincingly clear that we can not cultivate the conglomerate brain of humanity in bulk. Yet is not that about what we are trying to do in these free States, under our free flag, in this free century?

A distinguished Anglican divine once said to a still more distinguished London journalist: "You have neither intellectual nor moral right to print anything which may lead a fellow-mortals to choose a false philosophy or to despair of good." Elaborated, the speaker's remark might be reasonably construed to mean: "As a professed friend of thought, you should weigh every word you employ. As a lover of truth, you should be a zealous guardian of every principle you have ever seen in Truth's company—for her guests, her friends, her children, demand the chivalrous protection of every honest man."

This is the sort of conservatism which tinges the theologic writing of every established exponent of the mediocre in religion, and colors the political opinions of every monarch who dodges about the skirmish line of progress, and takes his meals in the pauses of conspiracy. It is not the going ahead falsely that hurts the world, it is the going ahead blindly. Many sincere though mistaken reasoners may move in the wrong direction through excess of principle. The fanatic moves in the same direction either through lack of principle or lack of sense. The reasoner may retrace his steps, with possible profit to his day and generation, from the lesson of his mistake. The march of ignorance is like the flight of the locust, and the field-fires of self protection are the landmarks of a double ruin.

Is there any infallible rule by which to know when one is right and when one may safely go ahead? I think not. But surely conservatism is no talisman.

ALFRED HARDIE.

Theatric Elocution.

Does any reader remember Mrs. Butler? It was the chief charm of Mrs. Butler's Shakspearean readings that every character was brought out. She, indeed, had a voice for every individual. How wonderfully this was shown in reading The Tempest—for here a contrast must be drawn between the rough, deep bass of "Caliban" and the softest notes of "Ariel," "a spirit too delicate for the abhorred commands" of "Sycorax."

I enjoyed one of Mrs. Kemble's performances upon a most extraordinary occasion. It was no less than a reading of Julius Caesar in the city of Rome itself.

The hall was singularly unattractive. There was nothing suggestive of the immediate outer world. Neither marble nor canvas lent their aid; but there was the reproduction of a scene made familiar to us in America: those naked walls, the rude platform, the simple desk, the volume made precious by the touch of Mrs. Siddons, and the majestic form of the last of the Kembles!

She opened the book with a kind of reverence, and as the grand music flowed from her lips, that strange and motley audience soon evinced the witchery of her art. The volatile Frenchman seemed to change natures with the grave Spaniard and the phlegmatic German, while here and there a dark Italian eye flashed like a gem, and muttered bravas gave other evidence of appreciation. Surely the Anglo-Saxon element was stirred to its very depth. The spirit of the great dramatist seemed to fill the room, as if claiming part possession, by right of Roman and Venetian conquest, of the soil that had given birth to Dante and to Tasso.

Here, too, was an evidence of the power of Mrs. Kemble's elocution over imagination. We had wandered through the Forum and on the Capitol, passing broken column and ruined arch, and tried in vain to rebuild the past. The very ruin forbade reaction of the "lofty scene." But as our ears drew inspiration from the great reader, the centuries rolled back. We heard the pathetic notes of the soothsayer, the grumbling of Roman discontent, the deep tones of conspiracy, the warnings of "Calphurnia," the vaunts of "Cæsar" and his dying groan; while the actors of the drama, to the mind's eye, appeared strangely vivid and distinct.

JOHN MURRAY.

BERKELEY, March 1, 1880.

Her petticoats are used for walking by English women. Look like satin, and wear forever.

OUR BITTER HALVES.

Beware of women who wear high-necked dresses and always keep their eyes cast down. They are full of pride and jealousy—natures of iron and passions of fire. When these are wedded they are dangerous.

There is no unanimity among the great operatic singers. Some of them have one husband, and others have two. But no matter how many a prima donna has, she has them all to support.

French ladies carry little china apples filled with hot water in their muffs, to keep their tiny little fingers from being frost-bitten.

A Bostonian who hires a hundred girls says that he always expects to see the bride walk in about three weeks after her marriage and ask for work, and considers it rather strange if she does not also inquire whether he can not also make a place for her husband, who is out of employment.

When you see a young lady running after a horse-car, shaking her umbrella like mad, and crying, "Here, here!" the thought comes that all this vexation might have been saved if she had been taught to whistle through her fingers.

A very French view of it:

"You do not marry?"

"No."

"Why?"

"Because it would make me angry."

"Why would you be angry?"

"Because I would be jealous."

"Why would you be jealous?"

"Because I would have reason."

"Why would you have reason?"

"Because I was married."

A man recently committed suicide on account of the death of his mother-in-law. Another has done the same because he continually quarreled with his mother-in-law. The former probably missed the excitement, the latter had had enough of it.

"You see, she had an enormous fan, and as I sat immediately in front of her, she kept a gale blowing on the back of my neck, winter and summer, hot and cold; and then the creaking and growling machinery of that monstrous fan was forever in my ears, until I was worked up into that nervous condition that I dreaded Sunday to come, and got but little good of the sermon. I wouldn't take that pew another year if they gave it to me for nothing!" At Dr. Stone's?

Remarks by a Texan maiden to her perfidious lover: "I ain't got no brother, and dad's too old to fight; but if you will just take one of these here pistols and step off a few paces, I'll jine in the duet, and misses won't count."

One of the newly married men of the New York World's staff writes: "There are some men so ugly that pretty women fly to them and marry them for pity's sake."

There are no better prudes than the women who have some little secret to hide.

An old bachelor wants to know if a scolding woman with her mouth shut can be arrested for carrying concealed weapons.

The Tokio Times thus describes a recent festival on the grounds of the Emperor's palace: "Many ladies were present, Japanese and foreign; the former, it was pleasant to note, were completely at their ease. Some, indeed, were actually unattended by their husbands, and yet the earth did not heave with indignation, nor Fujiyama roar in eruptive protest. The sun shone, and the trees nodded approvingly in the light breeze, just as if no social marvel were manifesting itself in that antique stronghold of tradition and immovable routine."

The best of men are tempted sore,
And wicked men will swear;
A woman's oath is 'Bang the door,'
And sometimes 'Bang the hair.'

A young lady in Missouri shot her cousin dead because he pulled a chair from under her when she went to sit down, and caused her to make the windows rattle. She wouldn't have been so mad if her back hair had not been jarred off by the concussion. A young man who pulls a chair from under a young lady deserves the same punishment as the one who attempts to haul down the American flag—spotted on the snout.

The experienced never speak of Chicago girls' feet by that name. They mention them respectfully as Chicago's great terminal facilities.

It is a mean woman who will paste a last year's plate of fashions for bonnets into a this year's fashion book, and lend it to her female friends just before Easter Sunday.

When the Prince of Wales condescends to visit a lady it is lese majesté for any person to enter the room. This reminds one of the old Spanish custom: When the father confessor gave absolution to the fair dames at home, on entering the lady's chamber he left his sandals at the door, which the husband, noticing, crossed himself and passed on. The modern husband heels himself and passes in.

Considerable excitement was occasioned in one of the public schools of Rochester by the announcement of the teacher, a sour-visaged lady of an uncertain age, to this effect: "Children, I am engaged." The fun was soon over, however, for, remarking the murmur of astonished delight, the lady hastened to add, "but not to any fool of a man."

Prudery is the hypocrisy of modesty.—Flattery destroys more women than love.—Sarrasin: "Wrinkles are the tomb of love."—Voltaire: "To be suspicious is to invite treachery."—Victor Hugo: "Life is a flower, of which love is the honey."—Balsac: "A woman who laughs at her husband loves him no more."—Bussy Rabutin: "It is a terrible affair to be obliged to love by contract."—We take women for what they are not, and we leave them for what they are.—Alfred de Musset: "Take of love as a sober man takes wine; do not get drunk."

FLOTSON.

Absent.

Your cozy crib is in the corner yet;
I sit and watch it just as day is dead,
You can not press again, my vanished pet,
Its pillow with your drowsy golden head.

You can not reach your arm to get my kiss;
Or dart about with rosy, naked feet,
Babbling soft syllables of that and this,
A tiny, night-gowned fairy, blithe and sweet.

Empty the home where, frolicsome and fair,
Your precious presence made so bright a part,
Empty your little crib, your clothes, your chair,
But emptiest of all your mother's heart.

Enchantment.

The sails we see on the ocean
Are as white as white can be,
But never one in the harbor
As white as the sails at sea.

And the clouds that crown the mountain
With purple and gold delight,
Turn to cold gray mist and vapor
Ere ever we reach its height.

Stately and fair is the vessel
That comes not near our beach;
Stately and grand the mountain
Whose height we may never reach.

O Distance, thou dear enchantress,
Still hold in thy magic veil
The glory of far-off mountains,
The gleam of the far-off sail!

Late to Church.

Loud sang the bobolinks, and round
The milkweed flowers the bees were humming;
I sauntered on, but soon I found
Behind me there was some one coming;
I did not turn my head to see,
And yet I knew who followed me
Before Tom called me—"Kitty! stay,
And let me share with you the way!"

We did not mind our steps grew slow,
Or notice when the bell stopped ringing,
Or think of being late, but lo!
When we had reached the church the singing
Was over, and the prayer was done,
The sermon fairly was begun!
Should we go in, should we stay out,
Press boldly on, or turn about?

Tom led the way, and up the aisle
I followed—all around were staring—
And here and there I caught a smile;
I tried to think I was not caring;
And yet I blushed, I know, and showed
A face that like a poppy glowed,
For every one seemed saying, "Kate,
We all know why you are so late!"

When Lover Turns Rover.

They met each other in the glade—
She lifted up her eyes;
Alack the day! alack the maid!
She blushed with swift surprise.
Alas! alas! the woe that comes from lifting up the eyes.

The path was full, the path was steep—
He reached to her his hand;
She felt her warm young pulses leap,
But did not understand.
Alas! alas! the woe that comes from clasping hand in hand.

She sat beside him in the wood—
He wooed with words and sighs;
Ah! love in spring seems sweet and good,
And maidens are not wise.
Alas! alas! the woe that comes from listening lovers' sighs.

The summer sun shone fairly down,
The wind blew from the south;
As blue eyes gazed on eyes of brown,
His kiss fell on her mouth.
Alas! alas! the woe that comes from kissing on the mouth.

And now the autumn time is near,
The lover roves away.
'With breaking heart and falling tear
She sits the livelong day.
Alas! alas! for breaking hearts when lovers rove away.

Wed.

White-robed she comes, my love, my own,
Yet purer than the robe she wears;
White flowers she holds, the fairest known.
Yet sweeter than the flowers she bears;
So white, so sweet, yet I could seek
And find beneath that white veil bid,
Love's hue upon that gentle cheek,
Love's heart beneath that long-fringed lid.

Clash out, brave bells! Ring far and wide,
And laugh the piping birds to scorn.
Fair kinsmen, kiss the bonny bride,
She wanders far with me this morn;
And if her eyes are dim with tears
I grudge them not their tender rain,
My love can chase the misty fears,
And kiss the sunshine back again.

Waiting.

Only a word, like many another,
Only a sign of something undone,
Only a token of hopeless sorrow,
Only the shadow of doom to some.

Yet to its slight, precarious promise
Many a heart in agony clings;
Many a life has its only expression
In wishing and waiting for better things.

Opportunity.

How brightly on the morn it lies!
Purple monarch in disguise—
Hail him, crown him; if you wait,
'Twill forever be too late.

Youth by May's enchantment led,
Dreams of roser days ahead;
But only he who fronts the hour
Carves the spiral path to power,

"DOMESTIC"
THE LIGHT RUNNING
SEWING MACHINE.

It is PERFECT in every feature, and COMPLETE in all its details. It embodies all of the MODERN improvements that are of PROVED VALUE.

J. W. EVANS,
No. 29 POST STREET (MECHANICS' INSTITUTE BUILDING).

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Reoted, and for Sale oo the Iostallment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

CHICKERING
PIANOS AT COST.

P I A N O S

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.
These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, oot imitation.

WANTED!

Nos. 1 (March 25), 4 (April 15), of Vol. I of the ARGONAUT for 1877. Twenty-five cents will be paid for each of the above numbers at the ARGONAUT office, 522 California Street.

English and American BICYCLES.

KEPT IN STOCK

And imported to order. Prices only $5 over those in Boston.

LORING CUNNINGHAM

No. 206 Sansome Street, office of Macondray & Co., S. F.

CHOLLAR MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth day of February, 1880, an assessment (No. 3) of fifty cents (50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of March, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the thirty-first (31st) day of March, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.

Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

POTOSI MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth day of February, 1880, an assessment (No. 3) of fifty cents (50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of March, 1880, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on THURSDAY, the first (1st) day of April, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.

Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

OFFER EXTRAORDINARY!

THE Automatic

THE ONLY LIGHT RUNNING AND NOISELESS SEWING MACHINE made. It has no Bobbins, no Shuttle, no Tension. It is sold wholly upon its merits.

We hereby offer to parties who have owned an Automatic for Six Months and are dissatisfied, a New Machine of any other make, on even exchange. No other Company dare make such an offer.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.

124 Post Street, San Francisco, and 361 Twelfth Street, Oakland.

CHICKERING PIANOS

Perfect in tone, durability, and finish. Over 55,000 in use. Legitimately the Standard Piano of the world. Our new Patent Upright pronounced the very best in use. Sold on easy terms. Exclusive and only agency, No. 23 Dupont St., San Francisco.

L. K. HAMMER, AGENT.

The ARGONAUT is Printed with Ink Manufactured by

SHATTUCK & FLETCHER,

520 Commercial Street, San Francisco.

LADIES

All know how unsatisfactory Foreign Black Silks are in both cutting and wearing shiny. We give you a reliable test below that will give you a perfect guide in selecting silk material for actual wear.

JOHN D. CUTTER & CO.'S

RAVEN BLACK AMERICAN SILKS are now being retailed by the following established firms:

Doane & Henshelwood, San Francisco.

M. W. Henderson, Portland, Oregon.

O. A. Hale & Co., San Jose.

H. C. Taft & Co., Oakland.

THE TEST.

Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulteration, and will either cut or wear shiny.

Cutter's Samples for the trade.

ALLEN C. REID & CO.

SCHOOL AT DRESDEN.

MRS. AURELIA BURRAGE, LATE Principal of the School at 850 Van Ness Avenue, has opened a School for American Girls in Dresden. Terms $50 per month for board and tuition. For particulars apply to Miss West, 2001 Sutter Street, or address Mrs. Burrage, care of Dresden Bank, Dresden, Saxony.

DANIEL GIOVANNINI,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL dealer in Wood, Coal, Charcoal, and Coke, 816 Pacific Street, between Stockton and Powell. Charcoal Depot.—Charcoal for sale in lots to suit, from 1 to 10,000 racks.

BISHOP KIP'S WORKS.

Arrangements have been made with

C. BEACH,
BOOKSELLER,
107 MONTGOMERY STREET,

By which he will keep a full supply of the

WORKS OF BISHOP KIP,

So that members of the diocese can procure any copies they may desire. The following is the list:

THE LENTEN FAST.
DOUBLE WITNESS OF THE CHURCH.
CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS IN ROME.
JESUIT MISSIONS IN NORTH AMERICA.
HISTORICAL SCENES IN OLD JESUIT MISSIONS.
CHURCH OF THE APOSTLES.
UNNOTICED THINGS OF SCRIPTURE.
THE CATACOMBS OF ROME.

We would particularly commend to Church people, at this season, the first on this list, THE LENTEN FAST, as containing a full account of "the origin, history, and manner of observance" of the Holy Season through which we are now passing.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,
No. 325 Montgomery Street,
Odd Fellows' Hall.

WM. F. SMITH, M. D.,
OCULIST, 313 BUSH STREET.

Office hours, from 12 M. to 2 P. M.

J. A. HUNTER, M. D.,
No. 321 Sutter Street, devotes Special Attention to
Catarrh, Deafness,
Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, and all ailments of the Throat, Lungs, and Heart.

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
COAL DEALERS.

Office and Yard, 14 Post Street.
Store Yard, 718 Sansome Street.
BRANCH OFFICE.
J. Middleton & Son, 419 Pine Street,
Opposite California Market.
All kinds of coal at lowest rates. Orders may be sent by telephone through any of the company's offices free.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., March 2, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 13, of Seventy-five (75) cents per share, was declared, payable on FRIDAY, March 12, 1880, at the office in this city, or at the Agency of the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, in New York. WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

THE COPARTNERSHIP HERETO-fore existing between J. V. Hart and W. W. Phelps, under the firm name of Hart & Phelps, is hereby dissolved by mutual consent.
J. V. HART,
W. W. PHELPS.
Mr. J. V. Hart can be found at No. 27 Second Street, SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 19, 1880.

STATEMENT

....OF THE....

CONDITION AND AFFAIRS

....OF THE....

STATE INVESTMENT

....AND....

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF SAN FRANCISCO, IN THE State of California, on the 31st day of December, A.D. 1879, and for the year ending on that day, as made to the Insurance Commissioner of the State of California, pursuant to the provisions of Sections 610 and 611 of the Political Code, condensed as per blank furnished by the Commissioner:

CAPITAL, $200,000.

Amount of Capital Stock paid up in Cash.....$200,000 00

ASSETS.

Real Estate owned by Company.....	$140,611 68
Loans on Bond and Mortgage.....	50,686 77
Cash market value of all Stocks and Bonds owned by Company.....	83,745 00
Amount of Loans secured by pledge of Bonds, Stocks, and other marketable securities, as collateral.....	39,272 77
Cash in Office and Banks.....	16,202 82
Interest due and accrued on all Stocks and Loans	1,098 85
Interest due and accrued on Bonds and Mortgages.....	5,593 05
Premiums in due Course of Collection.....	40,323 83
Bills Receivable, not Matured, taken for Fire and Marine risks.....	17,323 30
Total Assets.....	$375,058 07

LIABILITIES.

Losses Adjusted and Unpaid.....	$ 8,593 16
Losses in process of Adjustment or in Suspense.	3,750 00
Gross Premiums on Fire Risks running one year or less, $70,139.89, re-insurance fifty per cent.	85,079 94
Gross Premiums on Fire Risks running more than one year, $6,559.25, re-insurance pro rata	3,659 85
Gross Premiums on Marine and Inland Navigation Risks, $776.47, re-insurance 100 per cent.	776 47
Gross Premiums on Marine Time Risks, $31,726.66, re-insurance fifty per cent.	15,863 33
Cash Dividends declared to Stockholders remaining unpaid.....	1,270 45
Marine Notes payable.....	820 00
Total Liabilities.....	$119,803 20

INCOME.

Net Cash actually received for Fire Premiums.....	$167,341 98
Net Cash actually received for Marine Premiums	45,178 19
Bills and Notes received for Premiums, $17,323 30
Received for Interest on Bonds and Mortgages.	2,864 45
Received for Interest and Dividends on Bonds, Stocks, Loans, and from all other sources....	7,012 45
Rents.....	11,159 15
Total Income.....	$233,556 22

EXPENDITURES.

Net amount paid for Fire Losses (including $8,918.16, losses of previous years).....	$ 81,578 21
Net amount paid for Marine Losses (including $6,725.24, losses of previous years).....	43,488 72
Paid for or allowed for Commission or Brokerage..	39,917 55
Paid for Salaries, Fees, and other charges for officers, clerks, etc.....	26,300 00
Paid for State, National, and local Taxes, Rents, Fire Patrol, Advertising, Printing, and all other expenses.....	21,006 65
Total Expenditures.....	$209,291 13

	Fire.	Marine.
LOSSES incurred during the year	$76,514 21	$45,252 48

RISKS AND PREMIUMS.

	FIRE RISKS.	PREMIUMS.	MARINE RISKS.	PREMIUMS.
Net amt of Risks written during the year.....	$12,620,835	$187,679 79	$847,107	$59,612 82
Net amt of Risks expired during the year	13,211,225	197,792 07	931,009	64,489 65
Net amt in force Dec. 31, 1879.....	11,942,270	176,719 14	346,258	32,593 12
Risks written in State of California.....	11,238,424	157,383 34	847,107	56,619 82

A. J. BRYANT, President.

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 2d day of February, 1880.
M. M. RHORER,
Dy. Ins. Com'r.

Office: 218 and 220 Sansome Street, in Company's building.

The Argonaut.

VOL. VI. NO. 11.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 13, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WATER WORKS.

Is it Right and Expedient to Steal Them?

We of the superior class have occasion to be justly and grandly indignant at the audacity of the sand-lot. We of the intelligent part of the community are justly outraged at the exhibition of agrarian and communistic ideas entertained by the vicious and ignorant. We of the law-abiding, order-loving, and property-respecting part of society are shocked at the outrageous conduct of those who would, in defiance of all moral principle, deprive us of our earnings, and seek to appropriate to their use the product of our labors. We thunder forth our resentments from the press, the pulpit, and the forum. We declare ourselves ready to protect, with our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor, these our inalienable rights.

And yet we of the superior clay—we the intelligent, high-principled, virtuous, and altogether respectable class—are doing all the time and continually that of which we so justly complain. The sand-lot is jealous of those more fortunate. The poor are jealous of the rich, the ignorant of the learned. If the sand-lot were prosperous and had money, and we, against whom it wars, were poor and unfortunate, the sand-lot would be conservative, and some of us might become agitators. As the sand-lot quarrels with those more prosperous and lucky ones within its reach, so do we quarrel with wealthy men and corporations just within our reach. The sand-lot clamors for cheap bread and high wages: just so do we clamor for cheap fares and freights, cheap gas and water, and that rich men and corporations should pay high taxes. We are jealous of the corporation millionaires because they are millionaires, while if we were in their positions we would do just as they are doing: charge just as much for fares and freights, just as much to light and water their dwellings, as they now charge us. The solemn fact is, we are none of us any better than we should be, and there are some of us not so good as we ought to be.

All this preamble is herein set forth as preliminary to saying that there is a part of this community, some of our politicians and the proprietors of two of our leading journals, who are deliberately endeavoring to steal from the San Francisco water company its property. To assault the railroad companies, and by arbitrary legislation fix their fares and freights, which are the measure of their property's value; to assault the gas companies, and proclaim as a principle of law the legal right to say at what price they shall sell their commodity; to assault the water company, by fixing the rate at which it shall supply its customers with water—is only the first advance to the establishment of a universal right, on the part of organized society, to regulate the price of all commodities, the value of all services, and the conditions that shall govern all the relations of society. If the municipal government, under the new Constitution, has the right to fix water rates and compel the company to give a certain quantity, why does not the right to fix the rate of interest, and to compel the banker to lend his money, follow.

If the water company go to the Santa Cruz Mountains and bring water to San Francisco for sale as a commodity, and have not the right to make its own contracts with its consumers, then the milk-man who brings his milk in cans from Marin County must submit to a fixing of price for the sale of his merchandise. The man who keeps a public warehouse, or a public lodging-house, or public gardens like Woodward's, or a hotel like the Palace, or drives a dray, or engages in any business having relations with the public, may become subject to similar legislation. The prices of bread or meat, of fuel or horse's feed, of rent of houses, or hire of carriage, the lawyer's retainer, the physician's fee, or the preacher's salary, may all come under a like control. The merchant's stock, or the manufacturer's productions, or the laborer's wages, ought not to stand in any better or higher relation to the law than does the Spring Valley company's water, the gas company's gas, or the railroad company's rolling stock and freight sheds.

It is specious to say that the corporation, which is an artificial person, created by law, has any fewer rights, or is entitled to any other or less legal protection, than the individual. A corporation is after all but a copartnership, and stockholders are but natural persons. The law authorizing corporations is a general one, open to everybody and available to all. Any individual, or any number of individuals, may incorporate under general laws. The same persons who have organized the Bulletin Publishing Company may organize to bring water to San Francisco, to furnish it with gas, or to construct a railroad. There is no monopoly other than capital, preoccupation of the business, and its energetic pursuit. There is no better reason for fixing rates on water, gas, freights, fares, and interest, than for fixing the rate per "square" of advertisements, or the subscription per year of newspapers.

Water or gas is not more indispensable than the daily journal. Impure water or deleterious gas is not so hurtful as impure, dishonest, and dishonorable journalism. To fix an iron rule to measure the expense of carrying freight, the cost of making gas, or the outlay for gathering and distributing water, ignores all the possibilities that may enter into these respective occupations. The current of trade or travel may be large and highly remunerative at one period, and then commerce may languish and times be dull, and freight and passenger traffic decline. The cost of coal may advance or decrease, and the cost of producing gas may vary. The water company may have to-day seventeen thousand consumers, and at another time ten thousand. All these corporations may meet with casualties and accidents—such things can not be foreseen. Hence the impossibility of establishing just relations between company and client, except by the ordinary rules of business, such rules as prevail between all other sellers and buyers of a commodity. Yielding the principle that the municipal, State, and General Government may have the abstract legal right to "fix," "control," and "regulate," is it wise and politic to exercise that power? We leave this branch of the subject to the consideration of all those persons who have themselves occupations, interests, or property rights that are liable to interference.

Let us now look at the actual business of the Spring Valley Water Company, under consideration by the Board of Supervisors. And we must premise that these are our views, and whether they are or are not acceptable to the water company, the company must not be held responsible for utterances that it can not control. We do not believe that it is legal or constitutional for the Board of Supervisors to fix rates upon their own one-sided, ex parte, and necessarily hasty and unintelligent examination of the water company's business. This stock is owned abroad, and if any foreign citizen who owns shares should go into the Federal courts, and could make the showing that his property was being confiscated by the municipal government—that his company was required to do that which would involve it in debt, or was compelled to sell its water for an inadequate price—we believe there could be found to exist, somewhere within the authority of these Federal courts, a restraining power against such acts of injustice. If the law is the perfection of reason, it must follow that the foreign stock-holder of an incorporation owning property in San Francisco can not be deprived of his property by the one-sided determination of a municipal board, in which he is not represented, and before which he has no opportunity to be heard. If we are wrong, and there is no remedy at law, then we are sure that railroad, gas, and water companies may take the law into their own hands, and in a peaceful way demand a recognition of their rights. This peaceful remedy that we suggest is a heroic one, and it would cost the companies a great sacrifice to make it, but it might be better than to be crushed down and kicked to death by the million-toed mob. Let us ask the water and gas consumers, the passengers and freight payers, what they would do about it if these companies should go out of business?

If the Spring Valley Water Company, which gathers water by catchment from its own eighteen thousand acres of land in San Mateo and other counties, and stores it in reservoirs of its own construction, should open its sluice-gates and let this water run to the sea—should disconnect San Francisco with the mains at the county boundary line, and stop the water-flow to San Francisco—what would the Bulletin do? Would it endeavor, by mandamus or judicial writ, to compel the use of the company's land for catchment, or its reservoirs for storage, or its mains for distribution? If the water company should turn its acres into pastures, and sell its iron as old junk, and retire from business, and leave the Bulletin to purchase its water from a cart on wheels, or a cask on the back of a jackass, could the Bulletin help it? This water supply lies beyond the municipal jurisdiction of the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco County. The writ of its courts do not run there; and if the Bulletin proprietors should be summoned as the posse comitatus, they would be met at the San Andreas Lake by the Sheriff of San Mateo County, and turned back with a squirt gun. What difference in principle is there between bringing water for sale in iron pipes from San Mateo, by a corporation, and bringing it, by an individual, on a jackass? Would the Bulletin contend that the Board would have any other data to fix jackass rates of water (if they had a right to fix them at all) than by estimating the value of the donkey, the cost of the casks, the wages of the driver, and the expense of his shoeing and findings, and giving a fair and honest remuneration therefor? If this one donkey could not bring enough water to sprinkle the sand-lot and put out fires, would the Bulletin demand that the owner of the one animal should go in debt, and mortgage the first jackass to buy another, and then deny the right of the owner to have interest on his debt, or increased pay for the extra water? If the Bulletin people should be so unreasonable, we would suggest they bring their own water from the mountains of Santa Cruz and San Mateo Counties, and let the donkeys edit their journal. And suppose the municipal board should refuse to give the owner of this donkey adequate compensation, is there any power under the law to compel him to continue the business? If he should break in the heads of the casks, kill the donkey, and sell his shoes for charms to nail over his door to keep the devil away, is there any law to prevent him?

If the gas company closes its furnaces, shuts its retorts, takes up its mains, disincorporates, goes out of business, and refuses to make gas, is there any power under the law, or above the law, to prevent it from doing so? If the railroad company shuts its offices, ties its Chinese steamers to the wharves, runs its engines and cars across the mountains and out of the State to Nevada, or Arizona, banks its fires and refuses to turn a wheel, is there any power that can compel it to continue in the passenger and freight business in this State? Can any laws relating to money, or for regulating bank management, compel the Bank of California, or the Nevada Bank, to keep and lend its money in California? Assuming, then, that all our ideas of law, equity, and fair dealing are wrong, would it be politic to endeavor to compel corporations or individuals to do an unprofitable business? It would be just as easy to make water run up hill.

There is a false and vicious sentiment abroad in this community in reference to the rights of property. It begins at the sand-lot, and it ends in the disregard of healthful laws by millionaires. Demagogues find their profit in agitating these questions, and journals think they find their profit in pandering to the prejudices of the ignorant and the unscrupulous. This devilish sentiment is undermining the foundations of society and government. It is encouraging ideas that will end in an overthrow of order and a subversion of law. It is fanning a flame that may become a conflagration. Every man of the industrious, economical, accumulating middle class, who has not money enough to run away and abandon the country, or who is not so poor as not to care what becomes of him if he stays, is interested in stemming this wave of agrarianism.

We have made the Spring Valley Water Company the text from which to preach this homily. We are interested in none of the corporations whose champion we seem to be. We have watched this water company business, because it has happened to be the first upon which the issue has come. If, in our judgment, it would be the last, we should have dismissed it with a paragraph; but we feel that there is a great and vital principle at stake. When the water corporation can be confiscated, and its property appropriated for public use at the valuation that may be fixed by those who consume it, it will follow that gas companies, railroad companies, bank corporations, and all other properties in public use may be seized and escheated to the State. The next step will be to appropriate lands and personal property. Then the prices of labor will be fixed, and we shall find ourselves in the enjoyment of a communal form of government, with practical agrarianism: intelligence out-voted by ignorance; the moral outnumbered by the criminal; property-owners overwhelmed by paupers and mendicants, who have nothing to lose and everything to gain.

The following statement, made on Monday evening by Mr. Charles Webb Howard, the Spring Valley Water Company's president, shows the extent to which this spirit of confiscation has been contemplated by at least some members of the Board—Messrs. Stetson and Litchfield. These gentlemen are business men and honest men. They sell hardware and stoves, clothing and gloves. They know the relation that the seller of a commodity holds to the buyer, and the relation the buyer holds to the seller; for they buy of the iron-founder and the manufacturer, and of the cloth-maker. They would resent the law that came between them and their customers; but they would, if Mr. Howard's figures are correct, confiscate the Spring Valley stockholders' property without allowing them a fair hearing or an honest deal. Mr. Howard said: "The Stetson ordinance would reduce the company's income $377,520 per year; and the Litchfield ordinance would reduce the income $602,748 per year. Last year's report stated the income at $1,258,000. This would be reduced to $880,480 in the former case. Deduct from this the running expenses and interest as per last year, $587,000, and there would remain only $293,480, or only three and two-thirds per cent. dividends to stockholders per annum. In like manner the Litchfield ordinance would reduce the company's income to $655,000, which, after paying the same expense and interest, would leave only one per cent. per annum to stockholders. Neither ordinance provides for a sinking-fund or future improvements. In one case, the market value of stock would be reduced $4,000,000, and under the Litchfield ordinance it would become valueless. Such reductions would stop improvements and practically confiscate the property; hence, the company prays for a more thorough investigation."

The arrest of Kearney is an experiment—the last, we hope—in the direction of ascertaining whether his threats, and those of his associate yoke-devil, Mayor Kallach, can be restrained by law; to determine whether there is any legal remedy for that kind of crime that threatens life, property, and the public peace, and stops short of arson, murder, and riot. Kearney and Kallach have said all they could say, and done all they dared to do; their followers, by their advice, have made domiciliary visits to threaten women unless they discharged their servants; have made midnight reconnaissance in preparation for plunder. If the law will not punish these things, then there will be a movement to correct the evil outside of the law. First the law, and then the higher law.

Of two agitators choose the least—that is, the least disreputable. Of Mr. O'Keefe and Mr. Finnerty, of the Tenth Ward, we choose the former for commendation. He acknowledges that the one dollar a day from the Bush fund is good as far as it goes, and advises its acceptance. Mr. Finnerty, on the contrary, declares that when wages are one dollar a day he would rather steal than work. This is going pretty far in the direction of frankness, but we will go farther: We declare that with bread at one cent a loaf, Mr. Finnerty would rather steal than eat.

Kearney having been bailed out, did not make Desmond's parlor carpet "dem damp."

A THEOLOGICAL CONUNDRUM.

In Nine Queries.

What is thy victory, Faith? The life sublime
Clear to the soul beyond the mists of time.

What is thy victory, Hope? The present night
Waning to gray before the dawn of light.

What is thy victory, Love? To nurse the soul
In warm embraces till its final goal.

What is thy victory, Time? To turn to dust
The human temples of our love and trust.

What is thy victory, Will? To subjugate
Adverse events, and conquer, spite of fate.

What is thy victory, Pain? The triumph mine
Of merging human suffering in divine.

What is thy victory, Soul? To wait and fret,
And glory in the good that cometh yet.

What is thy victory, Death? We bow the head,
And praise the Hand that took the holy dead.

What is thy victory, Grave? A grassy sod,
A silent spirit waiting for its God.

DUBLIN, January, 1880.

HAMILTON DRUMMOND.

THE SKELETON IN THE CLOSET.

A Twice Told Tale.

I was in the civil service at Richmond. Why I was there or what I did is nobody's affair. And I do not in this paper propose to tell how it happened that I was in New York in October, 1864, on confidential business. Enough that I was there, and that it was honest business. That business done, as far as it could be with the resources entrusted to me, I prepared to return home. And thereby hangs this tale, and, as it proved, the fate of the Confederacy.

For, of course, I wanted to take presents home to my family. Very little question was there what these presents should be—for I had no boys nor brothers. The women of the Confederacy had one want, which overtopped all others. They could make coffee out of beans; pins they had from Columbus; straw hats they braided quite well with their own fair hands; snuff we could get better than you could in "the old concern." But we had no hoop-skirts—skeletons, we used to call them. No ingenuity had made them. No bounties had forced them. The Bat, the Greyhound, the Deer, the Flora, the J. C. Cobb, the Varuna, and the Fore-and-Aft all took in cargoes of them for us in England. But the Bat and the Deer and the Flora were seized by blockaders, the J. C. Cobb sunk at sea, the Fore-and-Aft and the Greyhound were set fire to by their own crews, and the Varuna was never heard of. Then the State of Arkansas offered sixteen townships of swamp land to the first manufacturer who would exhibit five gross of a home-manufactured article. But no one ever competed. The first attempts, indeed, were put an end to when Schofield crossed the Blue Lick and destroyed the dams on Yellow Branch. The consequence was that people's crinoline collapsed faster than the Confederacy did, of which that brute of a Grierson said there was never anything of it but the outside.

Of course, then, I put in the bottom of my new large trunk in New York, not a "duplex elliptic," for none were then made, but a "Belmonte," of thirty springs, for my wife. I bought, for her more common wear, a good "Belle-Fontaine." For Sarah and Susie each, I got two "Dumb-Belles." For Aunt Eunice and Aunt Clara, maiden sisters of my wife, who lived with us after Winchester fell the fourth time, I got the "Scotch Harebell," two of each. For my own mother I got one "Belle of the Prairies" and one "Invisible Combination Gossamer." I did not forget good old Mamma Chloe and Mamma Jane. For them I got substantial cages, without names. With these, tied in the shape of figure eights in the bottom of my trunk, as I said, I put in an assorted cargo of dry-goods above, and, favored by a pass, and Major Mulford's courtesy on the flag-of-truce boat, I arrived safely at Richmond before the autumn closed.

I was received at home with rapture. But when, the next morning, I opened my stores, this became rapture doubly enrapured. Words can not tell the silent delight with which old and young, black and white, surveyed these fairy-like structures, yet unbroken and unmened.

Perennial summer reigned that autumn day in that reunited family. It reigned the next day, and the next. It would have reigned till now if the Belmontes and the other things would last as long as the advertisements declare; and what is more, the Confederacy would have reigned till now, President Davis and General Lee! but for that great misery, which all families understand, which culminated in our great misfortune.

I was up in the cedar closet one day, looking for an old parade cap of mine, which I thought, though it was my third best, might look better than my second best, which I had worn ever since my best was lost at the Seven Pines. I say I was standing on the lower shelf of the cedar closet, when, as I stepped along in the darkness, my right foot caught in a bit of wire, my left did not give way in time, and I fell, with a small wooden hat-box in my hand, full on the floor. The corner of the hat-box struck me just below the second frontal sinus, and I fainted away.

When I came to myself I was in the blue chamber; I had vinegar on a brown paper on my forehead; the room was dark, and I found mother sitting by me, glad enough indeed to hear my voice, and to know that I knew her. It was some time before I fully understood what had happened. Then she brought me a cup of tea, and I, quite refreshed, said I must go to my office.

"Office, my child!" said she. "Your leg is broken above the ankle; you will not move these six weeks. Where do you suppose you are?"

Till then I had no notion that it was five minutes since I went into the closet. When she told me the time—five in the afternoon—I groaned in the lowest depths. For in my coat pocket in that innocent coat, which I could now see hanging on the window-seat, were the duplicate dispatches to the Secretary of War, for which, late the night before, I had got the Secretary's signature. They were to go at ten that morning to Wilmington, by the Navy Department's special messenger. I had taken them to insure care and certainty. I had worked on them till midnight, and they had not been signed till near one o'clock. Heavens and earth, and here it was five o'clock! The man must be half-way to Wilmington by this time. I sent the doctor for Lafarge, my clerk. Lafarge did his prettiest in rushing to the telegraph. But no! A freshet on the Chowan River, or a raid by Foster, or something, or nothing, had smashed the telegraph wire for that night. And before that dispatch ever reached Wilmington the navy agent was in the office in the Sea Maid.

"But perhaps the duplicate got through?" No, breathless reader, the duplicate did not get through. The duplicate was taken by Faucon, in the Insu. I saw it last week in Dr. Lieber's hands, in Washington. Well, all I know is, that if the duplicate had got through, the Confederate Government would have had in March a chance at eighty-three thousand two hundred and eleven muskets, which, as it was, never left Belgium. So much for my treading into that blessed piece of wire on the shelf of the cedar closet, up stairs.

"What was the bit of wire?"

Well, it was not telegraph wire. If it had been, it would have broken when it was not wanted to. Don't you know what it was? Go up in your own cedar closets, and step about in the dark, and see what brings up round your ankles. Julia, poor child, cried her eyes out about it. When I got well enough to get up, and as soon as I could talk and plan with her, she brought down seven of these old things—antiquated Belmontes, Simplex Elliptics, and horrors without a name—and she made a pile of them in the bedroom, and asked me, in the most penitent way, what she should do with them.

"You can't burn them," said she; "fire won't touch them. If you hurry them in the garden they come up at the second raking. If you give them to the servants, they say 'Thank-e, missus,' and throw them in the back passage. If you give them to the poor, they throw them into the street in front, and do not say 'Thank-e.' Sarah sent seventeen over to the sword factory, and the foreman swore at the boy, and told him he would flog him within an inch of his life if he brought any more of his sauce there; and so—and so," sobbed the poor child, "I just rolled up these wretched things, and laid them in the cedar closet, hoping, you know, that some day the government would want something, and would advertise for them. You know what a good thing I made out of the bottle corks."

In fact, she had sold our bottle corks for four thousand two hundred and sixteen dollars of the first issue. We afterward bought two umbrellas and a corkscrew with the money.

Well, I did not scold Julia. It was certainly no fault of hers that I was walking on the lower shelf of her cedar closet. I told her to make a parcel of the things, and the first time we went to drive I hove the whole shapeless heap into the river, without saying mass for them.

But let no man think, or no woman, that this was the end of troubles. As I look back on that winter, and on the spring of 1865, it seems to me only the beginning. I got out on crutches at last; I had the office transferred to my house, so that Lafarge and Hepburn could work there nights, and communicate with me when I could not go out; but mornings I hobbled up to the department, and sat with the chief, and took his orders. Ah me! shall I soon forget that damp winter morning, when we all had such hope at the office? One or two of the army fellows looked in at the window as they ran by, and we knew that they felt well; and though I would not ask Old Wick—as we had nicknamed the chief—what was in the wind, I knew the time had come, and that the lion meant to break the net this time. I made an excuse to go home earlier than usual; rode down to the house in the major's ambulance, I remember; and hopped in, to surprise Julia with the good news, only to find that the whole house was in that quiet uproar which shows that something had happened of a sudden.

"What is it, Chloe?" said I, as the old wench rushed by me with a bucket of water.

"Poor Mr. George, I 'fraid he's dead, sah!"

And there he really was—dear, handsome, bright George Schaff—the delight of all the nicest girls of Richmond; he lay there on Aunt Eunice's bed on the ground floor, where they had brought him in. He was not dead—and he did not die. He is making cotton in Texas now. But he looked mighty near it then. The deep cut in his head was the worst I then had ever seen, and the blow confused everything. When McGregor got round, he said it was not hopeless; but we were all turned out of the room, and, with one thing and another, he got the boy out of the swoon, and somehow it proved his head was not broken.

No, but poor George swears to this day it was better it had been, if it could only have been broken the right way, and on the right field. For that evening we heard that everything had gone wrong in the surprise. There we had been waiting for one of those early fogs, and at last the fog had come. And Jubal Early bad, that morning, pushed out every man he had, that could stand; and they lay hid for three mortal hours, within I don't know how near the picket line at Fort Powhatan, only waiting for the shot which John Streight's party were to fire at Wilson's Wharf, as soon as somebody on our left centre advanced in force, on the enemy's line above Turkey Island stretching across to Nansemond. I am not in the War Department, and I forget whether he was to advance en barquette or by echelon of infantry. But he was to advance somehow, and he knew how; and when he advanced, you see, that other man lower down was to rush in, and as soon as Early heard him he was to surprise Powhatan, you see; and then, if you have understood me, Grant and Butler and the whole rig of them would have been cut off from their supplies, would have had to fight a battle for which they were not prepared, with their right made into a new left, and their old left unexpectedly advanced at an oblique angle from their centre; and would not that have been the end of them?

Well, that never happened. And the reason it never happened was, that poor George Schaff, with the last fatal order for this man whose name I forget (the same who was afterward killed the day before High Bridge), undertook to save time by cutting across behind my house, from Franklin to Green Streets. You know how much time he saved—they waited all day for that order. George told me afterward that the last thing he remembered was kissing his hand to Julia, who sat at her bedroom window. He said he thought she might be the last woman he ever saw this side of heaven. Just after that, it must have been, his horse—that white Messenger colt old Williams hired—went over like a log, and poor George was pitched fifteen feet, head-foremost against a stake there was in that lot. Julia saw the whole. She rushed out with all the women, and had just brought him in when I got home. And that was the reason that the great promised combination of December, 1864, never came off at all.

I walked out in the lot, after McGregor turned me out of the chamber, to see what they had done with the horse. There he lay, as dead as old Messenger himself. His neck was broken. And do you think, I looked to see what had tripped him. I supposed it was one of the boys' handy holes. It was no such thing. The poor wretch had tangled his hind-legs in one of those infernal hoop-wires that Chloe had thrown out in the piece when I gave her her new ones. Though I did not know it then, those fatal scraps of rusty steel had broken the neck that day of Robert Lee's army.

That time I made a row about it. I felt too badly to go into a passion. But before the women went to bed—they were all in the sitting-room together—I talked to them like a father. I did not swear. I had got over that for a while, in that six weeks on my back. But I did say the old wires were infernal things, and that the house and premises must be made rid of them. The aunts laughed—though I was so serious—and tipped a wink to the girls. The girls wanted to laugh, but were afraid to. And then it came out that the aunts had sold their old hoops, tied as tight as they could tie them, in a great mass of rags. They had made a fortune by the sale—I am sorry to say it was in other rags, but the rags they got were new instead of old—it was a real Aladdin bargain. The new rags had blue backs, and were numbered, some as high as fifty dollars. The rag-man had been in a hurry, and had not known what made the things so heavy. I frowned at the swindle, but they said all was fair with a peddler—and I own I was glad the things were well out of Richmond. But when I said I thought it was a mean trick, Lizzie and Sarah looked demure, and asked what in the world I would have them do with the old things. Did I expect them to walk down to the bridge themselves with great parcels to throw into the river, as I had done by Julia's? Of course it ended, as such things always do, by my taking the work on my own shoulders. I told them to tie up all they had in as small a parcel as they could, and bring them to me.

Accordingly, the next day, I found a handsome brown paper parcel—not so large, considering; and strangely square, considering—which the minxes had put together and left on my office table. They had a great frolic over it. They had not spared red tape nor red wax. Very official it looked, indeed, and on the left-hand corner, in Sarah's holdest and most contorted hand, was written, "Secret service." We had a great laugh over their success. And, indeed, I should have taken it with me the next time I went down to the Tredegar, but that I happened to dine one evening with young Norton, of our gallant little navy, and a very curious thing be told us.

We were talking about the disappointment of the combined land attack. I did not tell what upset poor Schaff's horse; indeed, I do not think those navy men knew the details of the disappointment. O'Brien had told me, in confidence, what I have written down probably for the first time now. But we were speaking, in a general way, of the disappointment. Norton finished his cigar rather thoughtfully, and then said: "Well, fellows, it is not worth while to put it in the newspapers, but what do you suppose upset our grand naval attack the day the Yankee gunboats skittled down the river so handsomely?"

"Why," said Allen, who is Norton's best-beloved friend, "they say that you ran away from them as fast as they did from you."

"Do they?" said Norton, grimly. "If you say that I'll break your head for you. Seriously, men," continued he, "that was a most extraordinary thing. You know I was on the ram. But why she stopped when she stopped I knew as little as this wineglass does; and Callender himself knew no more than I. We had not been hit. We were all right as a trivet for all we knew; when, Skree! she began blowing off steam, and we stopped dead, and began to drift down under those batteries. Callender had to telegraph to the little Mosquito, or whatever Walter called his boat, and the spunky little thing ran down and got us out of the scrape. Walter did it right well; if he had had a monitor under him he could not have done better. Of course we all rushed to the engine-room. What in thunder were they at there? All they knew was they could get no water into her boiler."

"Now, fellows, this is the end of the story. As soon as the boilers cooled off they worked all right on those supply pumps. May I be banged if they had not sucked in, somehow, a long string of yarn and cloth, and, if you will believe me, a wire of some woman's crinoline. And that French folly of a sham empress cut short that day the victory of the Confederate navy, and old Davis himself can't tell when we shall have such a chance again!"

EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

The young ladies of Mills Seminary are an independent set. The following verses were recently written on the dining-room door in charcoal, by the pretty daughter of a notable Friscan law-giver:

Dumplings old, dumplings cold,
Dumplings long, dumplings strong,
Dumplings rough, dumplings tough—
Confound dumplings, I've had enough!

Diplomacy has put an end to one of the abuses of the court balls in Berlin. Cavalry officers used to stuff their pockets full of sweetmeats, so that the dishes on the buffet emptied themselves with awful rapidity. No strong measures were resorted to, and no offensive notice was stuck upon the wall begging noble guests to eat their fill but not to carry anything off. Maccaroons, caramels, and pralines were replaced by the creamiest of meringues, the wettest of tipsy cakes, the "squashtiest" of patties, each and all delicacies of the most seductive toothsome, but provokingly ill-adapted to transport except in the stomach. Prince Hohenlohe, the high steward, has done this.

THE MAN WHO IS BEING BLOWN UP.

The feeling which comes uppermost in the mind of any one who sees the Czar for the first time is one of sincere pity. He is a large, ox-eyed man, evidently of good intentions, but with a look of sadness and perplexity. His voice is as harsh as the grinding of a coffee-mill out of order, for an affection of the throat, under which he has long suffered, renders speech painful to him. He would have made a very amiable private gentleman, and could have got far more ease and amusement out of life if he had handed all the botheration of government over to his brother Constantine, who has a taste for that sort of nonsense. He himself could hardly have wanted to reign. It was the Schouvaloffs, the Lamberts, the Bariatinsky, the Adlerbergs, the Dolgouroukys, and some others, who desired he should be a firm ruler of men. They were forever goading and coaxing him by turns, as beef is driven to market for those who wish to roast it. They must often have had a difficult task, for his ponderous majesty—good, easy man—is slothful and heavy-witted by nature. He must have been frequently unable to understand even what was wanted of him. He is subject to melancholy periods of hypochondriasis, during which existence seems but a dreary blank to him. He is haunted by fears of sudden death and by the dread of assassination. At these times he moons about on apparently solitary walks, with a large dog; but there is always a policeman handy to keep the sacrilegious from approaching him. When well, he devotes much of his time to tailoring—changing his costume with much stolid perseverance—and he likes to be attended by a humbled privy councillor, who acts as foil to his fine figure and sets it off, for he is a well-built man, tall and straight, though rather too German in the rotundity of certain of his curves.

His father Nicholas, who was in many respects a notable sovereign, had him very carefully brought up; and, foreseeing that he would want support, perhaps devotion, in after life, to counteract his apathy, surrounded him with some select young men who could be relied upon. This little band of cronies have hung together ever since. They have lived with and on the emperor without interruption from the time of his accession until now. He provides for their wants; they dip their fingers into his purse whenever they are so minded.

He is a loosely-hung emperor—more like the good fellow of a free-and-easy than the despotic master of millions, when in the midst of these his familiars. He has been known to sit in his shirt-sleeves, a-straddle on a chair, hob-a-nobbing with them.

The late Count Strongonoff, who was a preux chevalier and a very high-pacing person generally, once broke in upon the party thus employed. The emperor looked at him with those unutterably mournful eyes of his, and held out a champagne glass to be refilled from a bottle which stood by. The old soldier drew himself up and answered, sternly: "Let those who love you less than I do perform that service." The Czar showed no sign of displeasure, but within a few months Strongonoff was deprived of his offices, though he was nearly connected with the imperial family, his son having married the Grand Duchess Marie.

When his majesty is in the humor he plays a good deal at cards with his own chums; and it is rather a good thing for these gentlemen, for, whenever any one of them is in want, the Czar will lose to him the sum of which he stands in need, as a delicate way of giving it, and this method of bestowing substantial favor is perfectly well understood among them. The Czar is a good shot, and has done some grand things on hears. He sometimes wears a pelisse, which once covered a fine bear he brought low with his own hands, and it has been so exquisitely dressed that it is valued at about ten thousand dollars, which is even more than is ever paid either for the sable or the black fox.

His personal deportment is excellent. He stands and marches well. He shows to advantage in uniform, though for several years he has willingly clothed himself in multi. His manners are those of a gentleman, and there is something extremely sympathetic about him. He produces the impression that one would like to know him better, if only he were not an emperor. It is this unfortunate circumstance which takes the amiability out of him, sets him upon his dignity, and gives a certain fuddiness to his aspect. His father really could be dignified, but he can't. There is a chubbiness and nervousness in his proceedings upon great occasions which reminds one more of a drum-major or fugleman of Landwehr than an autocrat.

Formerly the emperor, as might have been expected from one of his lethargic temperament, was averse to moving about; latterly he has been troubled with a perpetual restlessness. He lives very plainly, and his table is sparsely served. A heefsteak for breakfast, a roast gelinette and salad for his dinner, form the staple of his fare. His appetite is not robust, and he sleeps badly.

The first fall of his reign was the common blunder of heirs apparent when they come into power. He had been much courted by the discontented, and he made far too much haste to undo all the work of his father. He was emotional, pitiful, generous, all in a headlong, precipitate way. When he resolved suddenly to abolish serfdom, several of his generals and nobles threw themselves bodily at his feet and besought him to manage so great a change very gingerly. It was of no use; he gave everything he had to give, knocked down the great farmers-general of taxes like so many nine-pins, upset monopolies for the discreet sale of vodka, closed the free port of the Black Sea, according to the latest principles of political economy, dashed off the shackles from the press, and laughed at comic newspapers. There was a caricature published in St. Petersburg shortly after his accession, which represented him as a droschky driver in the state that drivers of droschkies usually are after dinner. His hat was pulled over his eyes, and his horses were galloping wildly on the road to "Reform." Behind him was the Grand Duke Constantine, saying: "Gently, brother, I am the fare." Still the emperor laughed. He laughed, too, when a piece was played in the Court Theatre exposing the corruption of his officials, and a very fine piece it was. Then somebody shot at him, and shattered his nerves forever. He fell into a sort of panic, trying hastily to undo all he had done. He had new gyses put on writers; he ordered some awful cruelties in Poland. He tried to win back his sulky nobles. It was all in vain; and now he is thoroughly flustered and frightened right out of his senses. His only chance of peace and happiness would be abdication, and a year's yachting without newspapers. At present he is worried into a fever every morning by a summary of all the unpleasant things which have been printed about him for the last twenty-four hours throughout Europe. It is prepared by a special précis writer, appointed for the purpose, and his majesty takes care that it shall spare him no pang of this self-inflicted torture, for he will not trust a professional diplomatist to do it, lest he should gloss over the truth and endeavor to make things pleasant for promotion's sake. A Baron Herder, a connection of Stieglitz, the banker, not long ago performed this delicate service, and perhaps he does still. The King of Yvetot was a happy monarch; the Emperor of Russia is not. Surely, times must be strangely altered.—Truth.

"Under the Tricolor."

In the short story called A Bundle of Letters, by Henry James Jr., there is a description of a Paris boarding-house frequented by Americans. An account of a similar resort and its temporary inhabitants fills the earlier pages of Mrs. Lucy Hooper's book, Under the Tricolor; or, the American Colony in France. It may even be that both writers had the same establishment in mind. Nothing can well be more different, however, than the results.

For any one whose knowledge of life in the American colony in Paris extends back half a score of years, it is an easy task to tear off the masks from the people in Under the Tricolor. The book is dedicated to Mrs. John W. Mackay, and that lady figures effulgently throughout its pages as Mrs. Bryan. The narrator of the story, Aunt Jane, is obviously intended as the reflex of a certain side of the actual author's character, and is endowed also with some of the author's own experiences. There are three chapters that might well be torn out before laying the book on the drawing-room table; but, bad as they are, they are the only ones in which Mrs. Hooper really says anything. The Mrs. Harding, who "speaks her mind," will probably be recognized by the Americans in Paris. She is supposed to be a model woman; yet her head is filled with the doings of the demi-monde, and the reader who believes her statements will wonder that any decent woman stays five minutes in Paris. Here is a quotation from an afternoon chat between the writer of the book and Mrs. Harding, who are driving in the Bois de Boulogne, where "monde and demi-monde are out in full force, and the landau of an ambassadress was not unfrequently grazed by the low, showy victoria of some belle petite à la mode."

"Look at the old Duchesse de St. Aymon, for instance. There is as blue blood in her naughty old veins as ever ran beneath the epidermis of a Bourbon or a Hapsburg. I could get you an invitation to her house to-morrow, and she gives charming entertainments I am told; and you might be dining in the Bois with her next week. But you might as well associate with Tata Topaze, or Winnie Williams, or Bebé Wilson, as with her. She was separated from her husband long years ago, and, did the laws of France permit of a divorce, he might have got a divorce from her ten times over. But she is a genuine duchess for all that. Then there is the Marquise de Miraville, whom I hear of occasionally at American parties. Now, the De Miravilles belong to the oldest and best nobility of France, and Madame la Marquise is a very pretty, modest-looking lady, and takes wonderfully in American circles, I am told. But I happen to know that she used to keep a flower-shop on the Rue Choiseul before her marriage, and that not one of the old Marquis's family will visit or receive her. And I could multiply such instances ad infinitum. For just so sure as you find a titled Frenchwoman taking extensively to American society, you may be sure that there is a screw loose somewhere."

Mrs. Hooper, warming up to her subject, tells of two American girls who married Frenchmen:

"To be sure, Blanche's husband has been tremendously talked about with little Rose Beauré of the Variétés, and Anne's Baron has wasted two-thirds of her fortune at the gaming-table and on the race-course. But they are pretty good husbands, as titled Frenchmen go. After all, it is easy enough for an American girl to marry a French nobleman, no matter what her parentage or antecedents may have been, if only she can afford to pay high enough for the privilege."

A lady rides by in her carriage, and the reader is told that she is the Baroness Blankenswergh, "with a husband somewhere." Here is one of the Baroness's friends:

"The beautiful Countess Massara was no other than the ci-devant chère amie of the old Duke of Saxe-Spitzeneben; and at the very time that Madame Blankenswergh was chaperoning her into American society, the house on the Parc Monceau, and the Worth toilets, and the elegant equipages, were all being paid for by a certain foreign banker, well known in the high financial circles of Paris."

How much more or less Mrs. Hooper will be beloved in the French capital, after Under the Tricolor is read there, can easily be imagined. It may safely be predicted that, for one person at least, the climate in Paris during the ensuing summer will be decidedly too hot—and that person the wife of the present vice-consul of the United States.

If one must be blackguarded, it ought to be to some satisfaction to a man of brains to be blackguarded in clean English. Mr. Wendell Phillips is an eminently clean verbal bully. And the agitators who know no denunciation beyond profanity, and no force beyond piled-up adjectives, might take a cue from the Boston orator with great profit to themselves and their audiences. Arguing before the Committee on the Liquor Law of the Massachusetts Legislature, the other day, Mr. Phillips began by saying of the said Legislature that it gave him no satisfaction to address one of its committees, for the reason that it "did not dare to go against political interests, and was an organized hypocrisy which passed laws it did not believe in, and did not mean to enforce." "Rum rules the Government," he further observed, adding that it had "all the light which it needed, but it was not brave enough to act according to that light." There "would not be for forty years," he thought, "a Mayor who would dare to enforce a law against the liquor interest."

Dramatis Personæ—Miss Tabitha, a governess, prim, starched, and of an uncertain age. Master Tom, a young gentleman of precocious genius. Grip, a Scotch terrier, just returned from having his ears and tail cut, with wounds still fresh and bleeding.

Miss Tabitha—"Poor little thing, how sore it must feel."

Grip—"Ow, ow-oo-oo!"

Master Tom—"Sore! I should just think so. How would you like to have your ears and tail cut off?" Curtain.

HUMOROUS OLD FAVORITES.

The Sailor's Consolation.

One night came on a hurricane,
The sea was mountains rolling,
When Barney Buntline turned his quid,
And said to Billy Bowling:
"A strong nor'wester's blowing, Bill;
Hark! don't you hear it roar now?
Lord help 'em! how I pity all
Unhappy folks on shore now!"

"Foolhardy chaps who live in town—
What danger they are all in!
And now they're quaking in their beds
For fear the roof should fall in.
Poor creatures! how they envy us,
And wishes, I've a notion,
For our good luck, in such a storm,
To be upon the ocean."

"But as for them who're out all day,
On business from their houses,
And late at night are coming home,
To cheer the babes and spouses,
While you and I, Bill, on the deck
Are comfortably lying—
My eyes! what tiles and chimney pots
About their heads are flying!"

"And very often we have heard
How men are killed and undone
By overturns of carriages,
By thieves and fires, in London.
We know what risks all landmen run,
From noblemen to tailors;
Then, Bill, let us thank Providence
That you and I are sailors!"—Charles Dibdin.

A Preachment.

His text was one that gave him room
To fume and fulminate, and make
The house of God a bouse of gloom,
In which to make the sinner quake.
Corruption was the theme of it,
And heil the lurid gleam of it.

Mankind, he preached, were poisoned through,
Corrupt without, corrupt within,
Black was the universal hue.
"In short," said he, "the rock of sin,
On every side has wrecked you all,
Moral and intellectual."

He proved each man from head to foot
A mass of putrefying sore;
Thoughts festering in a heart of soot,
Sin oozing out at every pore;
The body and the soul of us,
The devil had the whole of us.

He loved his theme, 'twas clear enough—
For all the rottenness and dirt
And rank defilement of the stuff,
One felt he had the thing at heart—
He hugged it so and handled it,
And dressed it up and dandled it.

Then, plunging past the gates of death,
He mixed the sinner's awful cup,
Till, hot and red, he stopped for breath,
And mopped the perspiration up.
If terror could refashion us,
He did not spare the lash on us.

I saw him when his task was done,
His gown and morals packed away;
His deep self-satisfaction won,
His reeking supper on the tray;
And, looking through the smoke of it,
'Twas then I saw the joke of it.

The pious wrath, the wordy run,
From practiced mouth too glibly poured,
Which make us feel that we have done
Some special service for the Lord—
Oh, the deceiving seed of it!
The tongue without the deed of it!—Anon.

Larry O'Toole.

You've all heard of Larry O'Toole,
Of the beautiful town of Drumgoole;
He's hid but one eye
To ogle ye by—
Oh, murther! but that was a jew'!
A fool

He made of the girls, this O'Toole.

'Twas he was the boy didn't fail,
That tuck down potatoes and mail;
He never would shrink
From any strong drink,
Was it whisky or Drogheda ale;
I'm bail

This Larry would swallow a pail.

Oh! many a night at the bowl
With Larry I've sat cheek by jowl;
He's gone to his rest,
Where there's drink of the best,
And so let us give his old soul
A howl,
For 'twas he made the noggin to rowl.

—Thackeray.

The Day of Judgment.

With a world of thought oppressed,
I sunk from reverie to rest.
A horrid vision seized my head,
I saw the graves give up their dead!
Jove, armed with terrors, bursts the skies,
And thunder roars and lightning flies;
Amazed, confused, its fate unknown,
The world stands trembling at his throne!
While each pale sinner hung his head,
Jove, nodding, shook the heavens, and said:
"Offending race of human kind,
By nature, reason, learning, blind;
You who, through frailty, stepp'd aside;
And you who never fell from pride:
You who in different sects were sham'd,
And come to see each other dam'd;
(So some folk told you, but they knew
No more of Jove's designs than
The world's mad business men)
And I resent these pranks
I to such blockheads sent
I damn such fools!—Go!"

—Swift.

NEGLECTED WEALTH.

What Chicago Knows about the San Joaquin Valley.

The following article in the Chicago Tribune (doubtless from the pen of Mr. Medill) is at once freer from errors of statement, and more intelligent in conclusions, than we are accustomed to see in the Eastern journals—qualities which appear to us to justify its appearance in these columns in support of what we have ourselves so often urged:

"The condition of affairs in San Francisco is not very encouraging. If violence be avoided for the present, the causes which have produced this condition of affairs will not be changed. The great business 'boom' which has extended to all parts of the country appears not to have benefited California. Her large cities are filled with laboring men who have no work, who have been unemployed for a long time, and who are really suffering, while alongside them are the comparatively few holding immense wealth. Kearney has become a power in the State with the idle and discontented workingmen, and a war between accumulated wealth and unemployed labor is openly declared. The expulsion of the Chinese from California is but an incident of the real condition of affairs. Kearney himself is but an incident of the changing circumstances of the State. If labor was well employed, if wages were remunerative, if the State was really prospering—there would be no Kearneyism and no Kearney to head mobs and foment mischief. Men at work and earning a comfortable living pay but little attention to brawling demagogues of any degree, and much less to fellows who preach disorder and strife. But idle men with families to support, unable to obtain work at any wages or the ordinary comforts of life, do become listeners to and followers of communistic brawlers, to whom, ordinarily, they would pay no attention. Kearney's success is due to a condition of affairs in California which naturally throws to the surface just such men. He is not so much a cause as he is an effect. If it were not Denis Kearney it would be somebody else as bad or worse.

"The money capital and movable wealth of California are gradually, but pretty rapidly, leaving it. The employers are moving away, but the unemployed are left behind. Security to life and property is weakening, and between the collapse of gold and silver productions on the one hand and the threatenings of the hungry, idle mob on the other, California is brought to face a new condition of affairs which should have been foreseen and been provided against in time.

"California has neglected, during thirty years of gold and silver hunting, a greater source of wealth than was ever hidden in her mines. In the vast valley that lies between the Sierra and the Coast Range of mountains is to be found the great field for industrial production and of inexhaustible wealth. This valley extends south from the neighborhood of Sacramento to the point where the two ranges of mountains unite. It is three hundred miles long, by from thirty to fifty miles wide. The soil is enriched by the alluvial deposits of ages, washed down from the snow-covered Sierra Nevada. This valley, capable, if watered, of more than Egypt's productiveness, is almost blighted by a destitution of rainfall. Whatever may be the rainfall on the high mountains, the great valley is left untouched, except during the brief term known as the 'rainy season,' which takes place for a few weeks in the winter-time. Nature, however, has furnished the means whereby this immense valley can be made productive. Through its entire length courses the beautiful San Joaquin River. This river is fed at comparatively short distances apart by a series of streams bearing water from the enclosing mountains. These streams, ranging in size from tumbling brooks to navigable rivers, are never dry, but filled at all seasons. This entire body of water, capable of thoroughly irrigating a plain twice the size of the entire San Joaquin Valley, is borne away to the ocean, and no effort is made to utilize it. The result is, that there is not more than one fair crop raised every three years in this valley, which contains more than seven millions of acres of land that can be made more fertile with water than even the valley of the Nile. The climate is better even than that of Egypt. The soil, sunshine, and subtrity can not be excelled on the face of the earth; but it is a treeless plain, a thirsty, parched expanse, with plenty of water rolling through it untouched, unutilized, and idle to the sea. While the whole land cries out for water, no man gives it a drink from these flowing streams.

"California is of such a warm and equable temperature that the land, with proper irrigation, will regularly produce two crops—one in summer and fall and one in winter and spring—every year. At present, and since the American occupation of California, the wheat crop of the San Joaquin Valley is a fair one once in about three years, averaging perhaps fourteen to eighteen bushels per acre; the next year it may average ten, and the third year five, or nothing. There is no rotation of crops—it is wheat, wheat, wheat; or, if there be any change, it is barley on wheat stubble. No grasses are grown, no root crops—nothing but grain. The land is becoming exhausted by this sort of farming, with shallow plowing, and no manuring or clovering. This same land does not fail to yield thirty to forty-five bushels of wheat per acre, and other crops in proportion, wherever the experiment of applying water is fairly tried. Instead of a valley blooming with unexampled productiveness, it is suffered to lie idle during eight or nine months of the year—a yellow, dry, barren waste, over which the winds bear almost perpetual clouds of dust. The cultivation that is adopted is trifling; the earth is merely scratched. The land is held in immense Spanish grants by monopolists, who are content with cultivating some of it in the cheap and unscientific manner described, or using it for a few half-starved flocks of sheep or lean herds of cattle to rove over in quest of the scanty herbage on those dry plains and the parched foot-hill ranges.

"The necessity and the abundance of means at hand for irrigation are well understood by observing Californians. Irrigating companies have been formed, but the land-owners will not pay for the water they need, and are content to wait for a 'good crop' every three years. The cities of California abound with multitudes of unemployed laborers who would take this land in small, workable farms, but who have not the means to provide for irrigating it at their own expense. To purchase the water of the companies at high prices in a remarkable situation is therefore presented of millions of acres of land capable of being the most fertile in the world left a dry, barren, dusty plain, and sixty thousand able-bodied and idle laborers. So engrossing has been the search for gold and silver, and the speculation in mining stocks, that the cultivation of the soil in a proper manner has been regarded as beneath the attention of a people expecting to become millionaires by striking bonanza mines; and yet in that neglected San Joaquin Valley rests more annual wealth than was ever found in the mines of the Pacific coast. Now California is confronted with a population willing to labor, but denied the opportunity. The long-neglected duty of the State becomes a matter of absolute necessity.

"Under the new Constitution the Legislature is clothed with ample power to do what is needed for the present emergency. It should at once provide a system of general irrigation canals by which that entire valley shall be watered. The supply of water is abundant; all that is needed is a system of canals connecting with one another, intercepting it as it is pouring down the numerous streams from the mountains, and distributing the water through that vast plain. The area watered by the Nile is not so great as the area of this valley of California, and it supports five millions of people. The State has the power to establish such a system, and to levy a water tax for that purpose; a small annual tax per acre will reward the land-owner a hundred fold. Instead of a scanty crop every third or fourth year, it will give him two big crops annually. Instead of requiring a ranch of twenty thousand or fifty thousand acres for sheep to wander over in search of herbage, not even farms of the prairie size, of one hundred and sixty or two hundred acres, will be needed by one farmer, as forty to sixty acres of well-irrigated land in the valley of California will give a profitable support to a man and his family. There is the land, the fertile soil, the genial sunshine, the unexampled climate, the almost perpetual season of fruits and flowers, and of all crops, and there is the abundance of water flowing idly through that plain. All that is needed is for man to utilize that water, multiply its channels, intercept the rushing streams, and conduct the water through a larger area, and the earth will team as it never teamed before; the parched, yellow plain will be covered with verdure and become an ever-producing harvest field, and from the inexhaustible soil will spring forth a richer and a more continuous reward to the laborer than was ever found in any placer or in any bonanza uncovered by the highest perfection of science.

"This is no mere theory or idle speculation, as every man who has visited Salt Lake can bear witness as to how irrigation will transform an alkali desert into fruitful fields. The land around Salt Lake City, which is the centre of one hundred and fifty thousand prosperous people, bears no comparison in natural fertility with the soil of the California valleys, and the climate of the former lacks the equable and genial warmth of the latter. The quantity of available water in the Salt Lake Valley for irrigation purposes is not a fiftieth part of what can be found in the State of California, for it is not the San Joaquin Valley alone that is thirsty and can be watered, but numerous other valleys, as the great Sacramento, the Feather, Yuba, Eel, and Russian rivers, containing an aggregate of full ten millions of acres that can be, and require to be, irrigated before yielding a tithe of the produce of which they are capable. A system of general irrigation in California would greatly increase the supplies of water by reason of the evaporation that would rise from the watered earth, which, borne by the winds against the lofty Sierra Mountain wall, would condense into rain and run down again in torrents to the rivers, and be spread by means of the canals in fruitifying streamlets over the grateful land. The Mormons assert that the rainfall of their valley has doubled since irrigation has been adopted. The same effect on a vastly greater scale would undoubtedly follow general irrigation in California. This is the solution of the industrial problem on that coast. This is the only way to make the ex-Golden State prosperous and happy, and give her a full share in the great business boom that has waked up the nation."

It is really refreshing to read this week the Kern County Californian. Politeness and courtesy are so cheap and so charming—they go so far and accomplish so much—that it surprises us that "WE of the press" do not oftener indulge in the luxury of its enjoyment. Our dispute with the Kern County journal is about the railroad. We are surprised at the answers it has made to our inquiries. It says: "There are two hundred less voters in the county than when the road was commenced. . . . The wealth of the county has decreased in value, and if put up for sale would bring little more than half what it would before the railroad came. . . . Lands have decreased in value more than one-half." Now, all this seems strange to us, and is so utterly at variance with our previous notions that we reserve ourselves for further inquiry before we make further comment. We had thought Kern County out of the world before the railroad—a great, broad empire of splendid land, over which roamed great herds and countless sheep; that it was rich and fruitful, with splendid capacities of soil—with rivers, lakes, and streams that should pour their wealth over parched lands, and make the deserts blossom like the rose. We thought its only drawback was that it was distant from market, and naturally, when a railroad was built to it and through its lands, we reasoned that the interests of the corporation would be identical with those of the residents. The farmer and the common carrier would divide the profits of grain-raising and fruit-growing. If the railroad is not liberal, and does not those things which will enable it to make money, it seems to us most strange. It is clearly and always the interest of a railroad company to accommodate the people upon whom it lives. It is the road's interest to give wealth, population, and prosperity to the country through which it passes. It is above all others intended to encourage the various industries of the people. It would be directly interested that merchants should prosper, that it might carry their freight and merchandise; that farmers might prosper, that it might transport their produce; that the population should increase, that its passenger trade might flourish. Assuredly self-interest would dictate all these things. We must inquire further. If we owned the Southern Pacific Railroad, and an industrious family wanted to go to Kern County, with its household goods and stock and farming utensils, we would carry them up cheap, with a view to future business. If we had railroad lands we would sell them cheap to actual settlers, because we would rather earn money by hauling freight and conveying passengers than to pay taxes. If any new enterprise was started, we would help it and put it on its legs, and encourage it to grow and become strong. If the company does not do such things, we must ask about it. The Kern County Californian must be wrong, we think. We have never known a corporation to deny itself the privilege of making all the money it could.

It is a very suggestive fact that nearly all the leading Democrats and Democratic journals are plotting to aid the nomination of General Grant by the Republicans. It is also a significant fact that nearly all the leading Republican journals of the nation, and all prominent Republicans not in office or candidates for office, are opposing General Grant's nomination.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Lamp-Post!

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT:—In the proclamation of "The Council," that body—a body, apparently, without a spirit—declares its objects to be:

- "First—The preservation of the public peace.
- "Second—The protection of life and property.
- "Third—The restoration of confidence in the security of life and property from all violence.
- "Fourth—The recuscitation of the legitimate commerce, industries, and business of the people."

That is pretty nearly what is needed, I take it. But "The Council" adds: "All this we intend and expect to accomplish within the law, and by peaceful methods." This, it strikes your humble servant, is the idlest nonsense. What do these gentlemen expect to accomplish within the law which a timorous and disaffected judiciary have from the first refused to enforce? What by peaceful methods that peaceful methods have not already failed again and again to effect? Are the legal methods of proceeding against the sand-lot miscreants in any way increased or strengthened by perfecting an organization unknown to the law? So far, they have effected the arrest of Kearney, who was immediately—as "within the law" he had to be—released on bail. He had been arrested and released on bail a number of times before; with what advantage to the community, let "The Council" explain.

In the "little books" in which we are asked to inscribe our names, the same infantile assurance is given that nothing is to be done outside the law, which means that nothing is to be done. Those who wish to join the organization known as the Citizens' Protective Union are expected to declare themselves by their signatures. "The Council" prudently keep their own names a secret; they evade responsibility by not even appending them to their "proclamation." This is effrontery. A gentleman who went about with a "little book" assures me that many declined to put down their names, indignantly averring that the "legal measures" clause in the agreement put the movement outside the hope of effectiveness, and made it a farce; many of those who signed did so protesting against the obvious insincerity of the whole business. "We want a formidable array of names," explained "The Council's" agent. "Formidable," forsooth! Can a rank of names fire a volley of bullets? Can a column of names storm a barricade? If these gentlemen of "The Council" meant business, the sand-lot would wake some morning to find all its leaders nice and dead, and that would end the sand-lot boom.

The people are ahead of their self-constituted "leaders," whom they are vainly endeavoring to pull along behind them. I know the temper of this people. I know that if "The Council" will declare themselves—not publicly; that is unnecessary—pledging their honor and fortunes to secure immunity from "the law," within three hours fifty resolute men can be obtained who will see to it, without any fuss or "proclamations," that the sun shall go down that day to rise no more on a living head-barbarian of the sand-lot. We have had enough, and more than enough, of this child's play and baby talk, these "proclamations," this "formidable array of names," this secret and shuffling leadership that takes legal advice. As it is not enough to endure Kearneyism and Kallolism, but we must now be tethered and fettered by a "Council"? Must we throw off our leaders before we can even be permitted peacefully to burn in our beds? Where is Coleman?

Oh for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!

VIGILANTE.

Judith Bares Arms.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 8, 1880.

TO JIM SNAGGLEBY:—Since you are an old married man, I suppose I may give you a thrust without being told by the Argonaut that "we don't keep a matrimonial agency," etc. Between you and me, Jim, "and the lamp-post," I think it would—in a minute—have resulted in matrimony between "Growler" and "Judith," if the editor hadn't shut up our mouths—pens, I mean. But then the Argonaut got jealous— and I must pass through life in single blessedness! You're married, Jim, and it's all right. So, you want this "galoot," do you? Looking for me, eh? Why didn't you fight it out at the masquerade the other night? Are not you the white-haired old man who followed me up so persistently Friday evening, the 5th? I did not see your "N. B." till noon on Saturday, or I'd have then given you the chance you pretend to want, to "show me the cobwebs of that horn." You were pretty full the close of the evening, Jim; ever so nice at first, though. But I'll be up to Sacramento next week, and we'll "have it out" there. We never show a challenge the "white feather"; and, if you do kill me, I'll get Governor Perkins to pardon you. I presume he would with pleasure. I was up there that day they ousted Braunhart, and I heard Mr. Perkins say in that familiarly musical voice of his, as he came into his private office: "What a row! I never saw the like of it! Almost a fight!" and he looked so like his old self, with the dainty rose-tint in his cheeks—before they spoiled him.

Pooh! Yer broken-hearted of pard! As if you had a heart. Men don't have such things. Bih! It's only a gizzard, Jim—a gizzard! and if you don't look out, I'll have it on a spit before the grate and broil it. If Maud isn't enough for you, I'll teach you that Judith is a woman—a real one, too—to your sorrow! You know, don't you, what that other Judith did? I give you fair warning, Jim Snaggleby, to keep on guard, for my arms are bared to the shoulder, and my "ten-hutted" are ready for battle. Yours, for war or peace, JUDITH.

Two Straight Steals.

ORANGE, Los Angeles County, March 4, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I desire to submit the following to your judgment as literary expert of the Pacific Coast jurisdiction:

1. In the December number of Scribner's Monthly appears a story, in rhyme, called "Brother Antonio," by Elizabeth Akers Allen. The same story, not in rhyme, was published many years ago in England, by a writer named Clarke. It has been reproduced in this country, and may be found under the title of "A Toad in a Hole," in Burton's Cyclopaedia of Wit and Humor, volume 11, page 804. The narrative is substantially the same, the only alterations being of the nature of the change made by Mr. Pecksniff in Martin Chuzzlewit's design for a grammar school, when he "put four windows in it and spoilt it."

2. Among the contributions to Temple Bar, about two months since, there is a story called "The Sealed Letter." This story, exact word for word, except the title, which in the original was "The Three Red Seals," was read by the writer of this communication thirty years ago, in a collection of Tales of the French Revolution. What I want to know is, are the above, or is either of them, to be considered as violations of the moral code by which literary gentlemen and ladies are supposed to be guided? and, if not, whether the labor of the writer of the future is not likely to be chiefly confined to the overhauling of forgotten publications, and a judicious adaptation of their contents to suit the taste of the modern reader. A. J.

THE SHADOW LOVER.

Translated from the Bostonese of G. P. Lathrop.

The Sultan Noureddeen, monarch of the Indies, had a son of marvelous beauty and dignity, Prince Firouz by name, to whom he was tenderly attached. The prince also was full of affection for his father, because he knew that when the latter died he would leave him his boundless wealth and the sovereignty of his immense domains. Notwithstanding this, he made no attempt to hasten the happy day of his accession to power, and this forbearance excited the liveliest appreciation of his goodness of heart among his future subjects. At length, after a reign as glorious as it was long, Noureddeen sank into the tomb of his ancestors. The tomb had been badly constructed by a fraudulent contractor, and when the Sultan, while out hunting one day, incautiously sat down on it to rest, he sunk in, and thus unfortunately brought his reign to a close.

Before he finally expired, however, he took advantage of that happy faculty which eastern potentates formerly possessed, of imparting on the eve of death a large amount of wisdom which they never showed during their lives, to utter as many maxims as would have filled a small volume, hoping that they would assist Firouz in the guidance of his career.

"Live in the sunshine of honesty and well-doing," he said, among other things. "Avoid darkness in all ways, and allow no shadow to come between thee and those who love thee or whom thou lovest. Yet beware that in holding on to that which thou hast, thou lose not the opportunity of gaining that which thou has not."

The prince, with filial piety, promised carefully to observe this advice, though in reality he didn't know what to make of it. The first part seemed clear enough, but Firouz had his suspicions that the last portion merely embodied the vacancy and error of a dying man's brain. Chancing to hear one of the grandees utter this suspicion to a friend, however, Firouz immediately had him put to death, together with some twenty slaves, as a slight tribute to the wisdom of his defunct parent. This so relieved him that he ceased to trouble his head further about the significance of those parting words. Now the Grand Vizier, whom Firouz on becoming Sultan continued in office, had a daughter whom the young prince had often noticed on her way to and from the bath. Her name was Dinarzade, and she was none other than a grand-niece of Scheherazade, who in her day was one of the most entertaining story-tellers the country had ever produced. Notwithstanding a wise man of the kingdom had written a book to prove that genius was hereditary, it appears that Dinarzade did not inherit her great-aunt's talent for reciting; but in other respects she greatly resembled her. She had read much; she had also applied herself to the study of philosophy, medicine, history, and the arts; and she made better verses than the most celebrated poets of the day—which is not always, however, so difficult a thing as it is held to be. The Sultan Firouz lost no time in summoning the Vizier to him, and explaining to him that he desired to marry Dinarzade. The Vizier replied humbly that he paid her too much honor, and that she really was not worthy to do more than adore the shadow of the king of the age.

"What is this about a shadow?" demanded Firouz, his beard bristling with anger. "Do you remember the dying words of the Sultan, my father? He told me that I was never to allow any shadow to come between myself and those I love. -Enough! Be silent, and obey my command."

"Alas, dread sovereign," responded the Vizier, losing his head in the anxiety he felt for that member, "I fear that it is but an evil day in which you make choice of my daughter to be your wife, for she is so engrossed in study and the objects of her favorite contemplation, that she will be far from a satisfactory companion. I entreat your majesty once more, relinquish your design; preserve your own happiness, and destroy not the peace of your humble Vizier."

This whole speech was so extraordinary, and so offensive to the Sultan, that—having some slight knowledge of anatomy himself—he concluded that there must be something wrong about the connection between the Vizier's cranium and spine; and, in order to satisfy his curiosity on this point, he drew his scimeter and without delay sheared off the Vizier's head with it.

"This is certainly in accord with my father's advice," he reflected, "for I am perfectly honest in thus disposing of so objectionable an old man; and when a Vizier has so little discretion, it is an act of humane well-doing to put him out of harm's way, for sooner or later he must have brought himself into serious trouble by his habit of giving undesirable advice."

He then sent for Dinarzade, and their nuptials were celebrated with great pomp.

The honeymoon had not elapsed, however, before the Sultan began to perceive that there was something very singular in the mood of his spouse. He observed that she did not treat him with the cordiality he desired and thought befiting, but seemed always to be thinking of something beside him, or beyond or behind him, rather than of himself.

One day, when they were sitting by the window, it chanced that he saw her eyes fixed intently upon his shadow.

"Why, O Dinarzade," he asked, tenderly, "does your gaze fall upon my shadow instead of on the face of your master?"

Dinarzade blushed and fell into confusion, and would fain have avoided making answer; but, trembling lest her sovereign lord should be offended, she at length replied: "Thy shadow, O king of the age, is beautiful enough for these eyes of mine, that love to dwell upon it. The doe lifts not her glance to the sun, whose glory would blind her, but seeks instead the tempered light of its rays in the cool waters of the mountain stream."

Firouz was of a confiding nature, where compliments to his own person were concerned, and was inclined to accept these words as a truthful explanation. But it so happened that, not many days after this, being drowsy in the afternoon, he lay down, as was his custom, to sleep, having two women attendants, one at the foot and the other at the head of his couch, to fan him and keep away flies that might disturb his slumber. Now, when he had closed his eyes, the two women, thinking him asleep, began to talk of Dinarzade.

"What a pity it is," said one, "that our royal lady is unfaithful to the Sultan."

"Yes," replied the other, "she follows his shadow, as it follows him; but her heart is lost in that, and she cares nothing for him in the reality."

"It is in the garden, in the night," said the first, "that she finds what best pleases her."

"But why," the other woman now asked, "does not our master perceive this, how she slips away at night into the garden, returning always before morning?"

"Have you not noticed that she causes her own shadow to fall upon him before he retires, and that thereafter he is no longer aware whether it be herself or a semblance of her that is present in their apartments?" spake the companion attendant.

"No, that I have not seen," said her fellow. "But if it be so, I now understand how he is blinded by sorcery."

Firouz lost not a word of all this, but, though he with difficulty contained himself, he pretended to be just waking from sleep, and gave no sign of having overheard the two women. That night, when he and the Sultana had retired to their own apartments, he took care that her shadow should not fall upon him, and afterward watched to see what would happen. When the late moon had risen, Dinarzade, too, arose and glided softly out of the hedchamber. The Sultan made haste to get up and put on his slippers, when, robing himself as quickly as possible, he succeeded in following in her exact path.

Passing through many doors, which flew open at a word and without her touching them, Dinarzade threaded her way through the palace and out into the royal garden, called the Garden of the Thousand Apricots. Here, concealing himself at a short distance behind her, Firouz watched her pause and look joyously about her. Then she continued on her way to a wood at the end of the garden, which was hedged all around, with small alleys running through it. The Sultan pursued her, in a jealous rage, and, peering into the wood, saw her walking in the semi-obscurity with—as he was convinced—a lover by her side. Waiting until his queen reached the spot where he stood, he gave a blow with his scimeter at the lover; but, to his astonishment, the blade passed down through empty air and struck violently against the arm of a rustic seat, which threatened to impair his weapon's edge. Dinarzade gave a little scream, and then she began to laugh.

"It is, indeed, a harsh jest you have played me, Firouz," said she. "Had it not been for the hench you might have slain me."

"Where is he who was with you but now?" demanded the Sultan, muffling his wrath. "And why, indeed, are you here at all?"

"I came forth to look at the shadows of the trees, which are always most enchanting on these fair moonlight nights," answered Dinarzade. "Do they not enrapture your soul, also?"

Her accent was so truthful that Firouz could not but trust what she said; and, in his secret heart, the silver and ebony grandeur of the night touched him. He therefore sat with her a while upon the rustic bench, and they enjoyed together the soft breezes of the dusky wood and the play of light and shade, withdrawing again at length through the dewy garden, passing as before through many noiseless doors, and returning to their couch.

In the morning it all seemed like a dream to Firouz, and he was unwilling to question his spouse concerning what seemed to have happened, lest she should take advantage of his doubt, to deceive him. But he thought of the lover whom he had not slain, and the suspicion that the figure he had seen might have been real pursued and agitated him. "Allow no shadow to come between thee and those whom thou lovest," his father had said. A happy thought struck Firouz, on recalling this admonition. He instantly issued orders that the Garden of the Thousand Apricots should be destroyed, and everything which could cast a shadow there be removed. A vast army of hewers of wood entered the place, and before nightfall every tree had been leveled and carried away, the fountains were destroyed, and nothing but a desert remained, enclosed by ruined walls.

Upon this, Dinarzade fell into the deepest grief. She withdrew from the palace of the Sultan, and insisted upon having built for her a great temple with a dome in the centre, where she could worship the memory of the wasted garden. Instead of flying into a passion, Firouz was so struck with the novelty of this idea, that he commanded her wishes to be carried out with the least possible delay. A sumptuous and vast building was erected, full of mysterious winding passages, dark recesses and archways in the interior, and provided with innumerable projections and overhanging roofs on the outside. The interior of the great dome was lined with a wide-spread and mystical design in ebony and silver, representing night and moonlight and the shadows of lovers. Huge trees were brought from the forests of the Mountains of the Moon and planted around the walls. And when at last the edifice was completed, Dinarzade withdrew into the edifice, which she named the Palace of Shadows.

Here she remained a whole year, in great seclusion and sorrow, under close watch by the Sultan, who, however, was not once allowed to enter. At the end of that time he went to visit her, and was received. She pointed out to him the exquisite repetition of the shapes of the forest trees, in the images of them formed below by the interception of the sunlight; and the fairy shadows caused by the recesses and sculptures and hanging roofs everywhere throughout the palace.

"These are the souls of things, with which I dwell," said Dinarzade. "Without them, the substance would be nothing to me. And this, O king, is the true reason why I loved your shadow, and not you alone. For this reason, also, I wandered into the Garden of the Thousand Apricots, at night, and now mourn its lost shadows in the solitude of this palace."

This speech so affected Firouz that he pondered deeply upon it, and when he had returned into his own palace and sat down to think, a vision of some new happiness seemed to dawn upon him, as if Dinarzade and he should yet live a rich and happy life together. "Yet," said he to himself, "why should Dinarzade thus seclude herself? Surely, there is no man in the whole world so well worth admiring as I, and why should she humble me before the mere hollow imitation of myself, that can neither think, feel, nor speak, nor take her into its arms, nor press one kiss upon her lips? It is wrong. She has had time to mourn and to reflect, and now she must come forth into the light of day and be like other women." Scarcely had he made this resolve when the Sultan Noureddeen's warning recurred to him: "Beware lest in holding on to that which thou hast, thou lose the opportunity of gaining that which thou hast not." But this, it seemed to him, referred to the management of his kingdom and the acquisition of land by conquest. If he insisted upon claiming Dinarzade once more for his own, how by this should he lose what he had not? In truth, he had not Dinarzade now, and he would be gaining what he had not.

He soon formed a plan, with the aid of a genie whom he met on a hunting excursion, when he had strayed away from his retinue, which he was convinced would wean Dinarzade from her strange infatuation. At an appointed time, Dinarzade and himself were transported to the deck of a vessel manned by an obedient crew, who steered for the middle of the ocean. "Sail," said Firouz, "until we find a day without a cloud."

At last they came to where the sun poured hottest upon the water, and the clouds that hung upon the heaven until then began to break and fade away. The genie had promised him that by noon there should not be a cloud left anywhere, even upon the horizon; so that when the sun stood straight above the mast, Dinarzade would find no shadow to look upon. "In this way," thought Firouz, "she will learn to exist without shadows."

The sea was so calm that the ship stood perfectly upright, and every sail was lowered. One by one the clouds began to disappear. But Dinarzade sank back upon her pillows upon the deck, as if faint. "You will soon grow accustomed to it, O Dinarzade," said Firouz; but she answered nothing, and shook her head. The clouds faded, the sun rose higher toward the zenith, and the sea remained level. The hour of noon came, the last cloud in sight had sunk down to the edge of the water, and now was lost to view in a sudden plunge over the horizon. For a moment it showed like the tail of some monster fish rearing in its flight up above the waves. Then it was gone.

But at the very instant when it disappeared, Dinarzade, with one last fond and reproachful glance into the Sultan's eyes, swooned upon her pillows and died.

Firouz smote his breast and tore his beard in despair, and leaped into the waves, whence he was with difficulty rescued by the genie. But he remained inconsolable; and when he had returned to the capital he shut himself up in the Palace of Shadows, where it is said he brooded over the dark unrealities of things as Dinarzade had done, and where her soul revisited him as he lay grieving in the meshes of the moonlit nights.

The Chinaman's Revenge;

OR,

THE AWFUL OATH OF THE OUTRAGED ORIENTAL.

A Christmas Tale of Crime and Recrimination.

IN TWO PARTS.

BY AH SIN.

I.

THE DEED AND DETECTION OF THE DEEDER.

Chinaman, Chinaman,
Allee samee Melican,
Hangee upee sock,
Thinkee gettee rats and mice,
Any way little rice;
Longee come
Melican bum,
Puttee in rock.

II.

TERRIBLE THREAT OF THE MOON-EYED MONGOLIAN.

Bimeby Melican
Sendee washee Chinaman—
Shirtee, collar, cuff,
Chinaman him gettee crack,
Tearee shirtee upee back,
Lose a collar,
Charge a dollar,
And ironce buttons off.

A great cook has died in France. M. Cazeneuve, the chef of conquerors and kings, having lived to be ninety-six—Hesiod's generous span of human life—and survived all his celebrated masters, has "gone over to the majority," full of honors and of years. Seventy years ago he was cooking for the Duc d'Angoulême those soul-inspiring dishes which nerved his master to hope against hope for the throne of France; and though for a while in the service of Blucher, and deserving, therefore, of some of the honor that fell to the Prussians for their share at Waterloo, and for a while, too, the chef de cuisine to Talleyrand, and responsible, therefore, for many important events in history, he ultimately rejoined his old employer. The Duc d'Angoulême was now King of France, and having furnished apartments provided for him in the Tuileries, found a corner down stairs for Cazeneuve. His cooking must have been characterized by a singular lack of statesmanship, for a revolution soon ensued, and the apartments were again to let; and though Louis Philippe took possession, the deplorable absence of political sagacity from Cazeneuve's administration of the kitchen led to serious events in 1838. Disgusted with sovereignty, Cazeneuve then retired from public life, and his exquisite management of his own side-dishes fenced with death successfully for thirty years. But he is dead at last, the hero of a thousand feasts, and Europe has lost its greatest cook.

A correspondent of the Springfield Republican writes that Mrs. Frances Hodgson-Burnett, the novelist, is a plump little woman—too plump for her height; she has brown hair, which she wears in a club-braid behind and frizzed in front, "to cover," as she says, "my horrid great forehead." It is a noble forehead, square and projecting; her nose is good and rather large; her mouth and jaw firm, with pretty, white, small, and even teeth, and a charming, cordial, jolly sort of laugh and smile. Her eyes are her best features—large, intense, and expressive, and when fixed upon one's face seem to look through and through into the innermost foibles of one's heart. Their color is indefinite, being those wonderful eyes that are never twice alike. I have seen them gray, and I have seen them black and glowing. She has pretty hands and dimpled wrists, and uses those white hands very gracefully. She's just as jolly and amusing with a room full of women and not a man present as she is when various adorners bow before her.

TOPICS FOR LENTEN MEDITATION.

When the long Nell Gwynne gloves were first worn they were made of linen or cloth, and ladies stitched them for themselves. They don't do it now. Indeed, few girls of today have strength enough to fasten the three wrist-buttons, if a young man be near.

There will be a pretty story of wrath and murder coming from New York, in a few weeks. An artist in that city has announced that he is going to paint the portraits of the prettiest four among the girls who have made their first appearance in society this year.

The latest and most striking instance of Lenten self-denial is reported from a fashionable female boarding-school. The principal had told the young ladies that in the penitential season now at hand "they should mortify the flesh by denying themselves some particular article of food," and she glanced at the table, on which were the viands which custom provides at those establishments. The next morning the spokeswoman told her that the girls had unanimously resolved to "give up hash."

Alexander Dumas took his daughter to a ball the other day, and the young lady would have attracted attention even if she had been escorted by any one less conspicuous than her distinguished father, for she was dressed exactly in the First Empire style, wearing a dress of dead-white silk covered with embroidery, and having its low-necked waist made almost incredibly short. A silk robe of pink and gray was draped as an overskirt, and she carried a red satin reticule and wore an immense chaise-top bonnet.

Philippa has a tender conscience—a conscience as tender as the smallest leaf of celery, and possibly the same color—and Philippa wants to know whether or not it would be proper for her to wear her Languedoc tie in Lent. "You know," she explains, "that it is very yellow; and it is lace, you know, although it isn't real lace, and I thought perhaps it would seem too worldly. It's very, very becoming, and very, very stylish, but, unless it's quite right, I don't want to wear it." Well, really, Philippa, the best thing that you can do is to wear it, as it is very, very becoming, and to leave a button off your gloves by way of penance.

Oliver Harlowe, writing in the Boston Courier, says: The saleswomen employed by the cooperative millinery and dress-making association that Kate Field is getting up, are to share in the profits of the shop and work-rooms, and it is thought that this will make them more civil. The great flaw in the constitution of this organization seems to be the limitation of its privileges to the stockholders. It will require more than ten thousand customers to enable the association to compete with the regular shopkeepers; and, if the stock be valuable, its tendency to collect in the hands of a few persons will diminish the number of customers, and still further cripple the association by limiting its profits. In order to avoid suicide, it will be necessary to admit outside customers to the shops.

Nathaniel Hawthorne once wrote to a lady, who was one of his most valued English friends, a letter, from which a reviewer in the Athenaeum makes a characteristic quotation. She had asked him to a fancy ball, and he answered: "Mr. Hawthorne begs to assure Mrs. H. that he is quite sensible of his own folly and absurdity in declining an invitation which any other man would go down upon his knees to get. He finds himself, indeed, in the position of an owl or a bat when invited to take a pleasure trip in the sunshine: he can not deny that it would be a most delightful affair, but still feels it fitter for himself to stay in his busy hole than to go a-blinking about among other people's enjoyments. The truth is, Mr. H. has all his life been under a spell, from which it is now too late to free himself—or, rather, he was born a solitary brute, and he can not otherwise account for his now being able to resist Mrs. H.'s invitation."

Fashionable hair-dressers are receiving visits from ladies who have heard that short hair is to be worn this summer, and who want to know if their locks be abundant enough to look well dressed in loose curls and fastened by a wreath. The correct answer, accompanied by a multiplicity of French shrugs, is: "Madame, I know not surely that it will make itself fashionable. But to cut off your hair would be—ah—oh!" Here the knight of the comb and brush falls into an attitude of profound desolation at the prospect of such destruction, and mentally wonders how many bald spots he should find under the puffs and braids before him. "I will tell you that which you will do," he goes on. "You will comb all your hair smooth, oh! very smooth, except the little fringe on the brow and the temples, and you will let me make for you one little frissette, and one little toupee, and one little piece for the back of your head, and cover them with curls, and, behold, you will be lovely." "But that's a wig!" cries the lady. "Effectivement," he replies, unmoved.

Doctor Manning, the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster (says the Hour), lives almost the life of an ascetic, contenting himself at the most brilliant dinners with a dry biscuit and a glass of water. He also carries his asceticism into the services of the church. He has abolished lady singers in the choirs, and introduced Gregorian music into the places of worship under his control; so that now the only fine Catholic music to be heard in London is at the chapel in Farm Street, which belongs to the Jesuits, who are, somehow or other, to a great degree out of his power. As a judge of music Doctor Manning is a lamentable failure. About four years ago he was preaching at the Pro-Cathedral, Kensington, and took particular notice of the organist's playing. He sent for him one day, and immediately thanked him for the devotional style of his voluntary, "so much more suited to the house of God than that he was accustomed to hear in other churches." Not very long after he again visited the "Pro." The organist, remembering his past experience, played exactly the same piece. He was again sent for, but this time the Cardinal gave him a severe "wiggling" for daring to desecrate a place of worship with such ribald music.

The Springfield Republican says: Now the Boston Advertiser gravely defends the clerical and other eminent persons for whom drinks were to be stored in St Botolph's larder. Brother Cook's onslaught was quite too savage. He carries no weapon but a meat-ax. If he had only pointed out the obvious absurdity of it and got the town laughing at the ludicrous prominence given to the provision for the sale of "wines, liquors, and cigars" to a club devoted to the very cream, we might even say the best gilt-edged butter, of American literary and æsthetic society—why, then—but it would be in vain to speculate on what might happen if Mr. Cook should crack a joke. If Mr. Cook should display any liveliness of this kind, the Boston Advertiser itself might get lively, and where would the thing stop? We are glad for our part that St. Botolph's is to have a place where "wines, liquors, and cigars" can be had. Boston has always needed such a place. They may not be very good things in themselves, but the most dangerous objects acquire a fascination if a scarcity sets in and it is made difficult to obtain them. This is obviously the great danger in Boston. Boston has a great many noble charities and institutions, schools, colleges, churches, Cook lectureships and lecturing cooks, symposiums, soroses, clubs, natural history collections, including the Advertiser, Mr. Kimball's museum, and Wendell Phillips's statuary—she needs one thing more, one more club where "wines, liquors, and cigars" are to be had, where the swell ministers and newspaper men can sit down in peace to a stand-up drink, beyond the gaze of a vulgar, and perhaps an unfeeling world. It is curious how the exacting problem of convivial nutrition comes in to disturb the serenest and most divine atmospheres. We not only undergo the bore of eating and drinking when we are hungry and thirsty, but drag out the disability of our infirm natures on most other occasions when we get together for mutual pleasure. As a knowing New Yorker remarked in regard to the habits of that metropolis: "When any grand movement of a philanthropic, high moral, or political nature is started in this city, we get together and have a grand dinner over it. Then it stops." Physical receptivity seems to destroy aggressive mental quality, and this is the reason why Mr. Cook never passes the cigars before entering the arena. A few good dinners judiciously placed would have killed the anti-slavery movement.

TWO FAVORITES.

Aux Italiens.

At Paris it was, at the opera there—
And she looked like a queen in a book that night,
With the wreath of pearl in her raven hair,
And the brooch on her breast, so bright.

Of all the operas that Verdi wrote,
The best, to my taste, is the Trôvatore;
And Mario can soothe with a tenor note
The souls in Purgatory.

The moon on the tower slept soft as snow;
And who was not thrilled in the strangest way;
As we heard him sing, while the gas burned low,
"Non ti scordar di me?"

The emperor there, in his box of state,
Looked grave, as if he had just then seen
The red flag wave from the city gate,
Where his eagles in bronze had been.

The empress, too, had a tear in her eye.
You'd have said that her fancy had gone back again,
For one moment, under the old blue sky,
To the old glad life in Spain.

Well, there in our front-row box we sat
Together, my bride betrothed and I;
My gaze was fixed on my opera-bat,
And hers on the stage hard by.

And both were silent, and both were sad.
Like a queen she leaned on her full white arm,
With that regal, indolent air she had—
So confident of her charm!

I have not a doubt she was thinking then
Of her former lord—good soul that he was!—
Who died the richest and roundest of men,
The Marquis of Carabas.

I hope that, to get to the kingdom of heaven,
Through a needle's eye he had not to pass;
I wish him well, for the jointure given
To my lady of Carabas.

Meanwhile, I was thinking of my first love,
As I had not been thinking of aught for years,
Till over my eyes there began to move
Something that felt like tears.

I thought of the dress that she wore last time,
When we stood, 'neath the cypress-trees, together,
In that lost land, in that soft climate,
In the crimson evening weather:

Of that muslin dress (for the eve was hot),
And her warm white neck in its golden chain,
And her full soft hair, just tied in a knot,
And falling loose again:

And the jasmine-flower in her fair young breast
(Oh, the faint, sweet smell of that jasmine-flower),
And the one bird singing alone to his nest,
And the one star over the tower.

I thought of our little quarrels and strife,
And the letter that brought me back my ring;
And it all seemed then, in the waste of life,
Such a very little thing!

For I thought of her grave below the hill,
Which the sentinel cypress-tree stands over.
And I thought . . . "Were she only living still,
How I could forgive her and love her!"

And I swear, as I thought of her thus, in that hour,
And of how, after all, old things were best,
That I smelt the smell of that jasmine-flower
Which she used to wear in her breast.

It smelt so faint, and it smelt so sweet,
It made me creep, and it made me cold!
Like the scent that steals from the crumbling sheet
Where a mummy is half unrolled.

And I turned and looked. She was sitting there
In a dim box, over the stage; and drest
In that muslin dress, with that full soft hair,
And that jasmine in her breast!

I was here: and she was there:
And the glittering horse-shoe curved between:
From my bride betroth'd, with her raven hair,
And her sumptuous, scornful mien,

To my early love, with her eyes downcast,
And over her primrose face the shade.
(In short, from the Future back to the Past)
There was but a step to be made.

To my early love from my future bride
One moment I looked. Then I stole to the door,
I traversed the passage; and down at her side,
I was sitting, a moment more.

My thinking of her, or the music's strain,
Or something which never will be express'd,
Had brought her back from the grave again,
With the jasmine in her breast.

She is not dead, and she is not wed!
But she loves me now, and she loved me then!
And the very first word that her sweet lips said,
My heart grew youthful again.

The Marchioness there, of Carabas,
She is wealthy, and young, and handsome still;
And but for her . . . well, we'll let that pass,
She may marry whomever she will.

But I will marry my own first love,
With her primrose face, for old things are best;
And the flower in her bosom, I prize it above
The brooch in my lady's breast.

The world is filled with folly and sin,
And Love must cling where it can, I say:
For Beauty is easy enough to win,
But one isn't loved every day.

And I think, in the lives of most women and men,
There's a moment when all would go smooth and even,
If only the dead could find out when
To come back and be forgiven.

But oh, the smell of that jasmine flower!
And oh, that music! and oh, the way
That voice rang out from the donjon tower,
Non ti scordar di me,
Non ti scordar di me! —Owen Meredith.

He and She.

"She is dead!" they said to him; "come away;
Kiss her and leave her—thy love is clay!"

They smoothed her tresses of dark-brown hair;
On her forehead of stone they laid it fair;

Over her eyes, that gazed too much,
They drew the lids with a gentle touch;

With a tender touch they closed up well
The sweet, thin lips that had secrets to tell;

About her brows and beautiful face
They tied her veil and her marriage lace;

And drew on her white feet her white silk shoes—
Which were the whitest no eye could choose—

And over her bosom they crossed her hands.
"Come away!" they said; "God understands."

And there was silence, and nothing there
But silence and scents of eglantere,

And jasmine and roses and rosemary;
And they said: "As a lady should lie, lies she."

And they held their breath as they left the room,
With a shudder, to glance at his stillness and gloom.

But he who loved her too well to dread
The sweet, the stately, the beautiful dead,

He lit his lamp and took the key,
And turned it—alone again—he and she.

He and she; but she would not speak,
Tho' be kissed, in the old place, the quiet cheek.

He and she; but she would not smile,
Tho' he called her the name she loved erewhile.

He and she; still she did not move
To any one passionate whisper of love.

Then he said: "Cold lips and breasts without breath.
Is there no voice, no language of death?"

"Dumb to the ear and still to the sense,
But to heart and to soul distinct, intense?"

"See, now; I will listen with soul, not ear;
What was the secret of dying, dear?"

"Was it the infinite wonder of all
That you could ever let life's flower fall?"

"Or was it a greater marvel to feel
The perfect calm o'er the agony steal?"

"Was the miracle greater to find how deep Beyond all dreams sank downward that sleep?"

"Did life roll back its records, dear,
And show, as they say it does, past things clear?"

"And was it the innermost heart the bliss
To find out so what a wisdom love is?"

"Oh, perfect dead! Oh, dead most dear,
I hold the breath of my soul to hear!"

"I listen as deep as to horrible hell,
As high as to heaven, and you do not tell.

"There must be pleasure in dying, sweet,
To make you so placid from head to feet.

"I would tell you, darling, if I were dead,
And 'twere your hot tears upon my brow shed—

"I would say, though the Angel of Death had laid
His sword on my lips to keep it unsaid.

"You should not ask vainly, with streaming eyes,
Which of all deaths was the chiefest surprise,

"The very strangest and suddenest thing
Of all the surprises that dying must bring."

Ah, foolish world; oh, most kind dead!
Though he told me, who will believe it was said?

Who will believe that he heard her say,
With the sweet, soft voice, in the dear old way:

"The utmost wonder is this—I hear
And see you, and love you, and kiss you, dear;

"And am your angel, who was your bride,
And know that, though dead, I have never —F.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served at 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1850.

"By order of the Committee" is the formula through which an aroused and indignant public has proclaimed its determination no longer to submit to the disgraceful menaces of the sand-lot mob, its interior organization of criminals, and its exterior surrounding of politicians. It is "THE COUNCIL" that orders, and this "Council" is composed of men who have had experience in this line of business—men of intelligence and firmness, who, recognizing their right to live, have determined to live securely. This "Council" has not only a head to direct, but arms to execute. Four hundred thoroughly armed policemen, two hundred veterans of the late war—men of both armies—who understand arms and their use, with Winchester rifles, to step to the front if the conflict comes; regiments of volunteer soldiers to be filled to their complement; a Gatling battery, with men who know how to use it; fifteen hundred United States soldiers, artillery, cavalry, and infantry; an American ship of war in the harbor. And behind this National, State, and city authority are enrolled a body of good citizens, twenty thousand strong, to give its moral support for the enforcement of peace. This proclamation will be read by every criminal and disturbing adventurer and ambitious demagogue in this State. It will be thumbed in dirty cellars, and read by politicians at the State capital. Its anonymous character will recall the days of the "Hounds," the mysterious movement of the first Vigilance Committee, and the "Eye" of the second, with "33, Secretary," for the only signature that followed decrees for arrest, banishment, and death. The movement is timely, dignified, and irresistible. It restores our self-respect. It asserts our character abroad, and it will bring repose or a bloody encounter in San Francisco; and following either, there will return to us the period of prosperity that has been delayed only by the criminal acts of a class composed almost entirely of ignorant and vicious foreigners. San Francisco is to-day a safe city to live in for all who do not conspire to its hurt. There are two secret organizations within this general agitation; the great bulk of sand-lotters belong to neither. These secret gatherings are for the purpose of plunder in the event of collision. It is from these secret plotters that all suggestions of violence come. Mayor Kallach belongs to neither. His conspiracy is only political, and he would confine the agitation to politics. Kearney belongs to one of the secret gangs, but it is the least dangerous: it does the most talking. The little band of Internationalists, or Socialists, are the most silent; most subtle, and most dangerous. They are all foreigners, and have no Irish among them. They are all known; a detective organization has obtained a full history of nearly every member. They are shadowed, and are not to be feared.

The sand-lot movement came into existence under the leadership of Kearney, Knight, and Wellock. Knight subsided and retired, because he is an intelligent, well-meaning citizen, and was the first to measure and expose the shallow, mendacious, haggard, and cowardly character of the Irish drayman. Then Wellock and Kearney quarreled; Wellock denounced Kearney for everything that was vile and contemptible, and was kicked over to the Democracy. Then came Kallach, the Baptist preacher, and into the sand dripped his blood from an encounter growing out of the vilest scandal that ever human being uttered against woman. The complications of the political situation so confused many good people that they failed to draw the line of distinction between the political martyr and the personal blackguard, and so the blackguard and demagogue became the leader of the sand-lot, and Kearney faded away upon the pay-roll of one or two corporations. Then—succeeding the Irish drayman, the English shoemaker, the Yankee preacher—came the Irish tramp named Gannon, from the colony of Victoria, proclaiming that he did not want work and would not work. His ambitious soul aspired to free gin. With him came a colossal German, Hans Steinman, whose capacious and insatiable stomach wanted free beer, smacraese, and blood-pudding. Gannon and Steinman then gave way, and lastly comes an Irish woman of the name of Smith, a red-faced female, with an uster, an umbrella, and a blistering tongue; and so far as we can now perceive, this female with the blistering tongue, who says she would rather go to San Quentin than to the country for work, is the head and front of the sand-lot. It is this ragged end of draggle-tailed nastiness that is to overturn a national treaty, and drive the Chinese out. It is to this miserable and utterly contemptible end that this movement has come. It is this mob of tramping mendicants, never numbering six hundred people, that has frightened our city and depreciated property values. It is upon this wave that the blackguard Baptist preacher hopes to ride to Congress. The whole thing has been and is a ridiculous and contemptible farce, which has not now, and never had, anything in it to frighten anybody, except the cowardly.

The daily press has, all through this business, been conducted with a most shameless disregard of the public interest. When Kallach was not killed, and a band of German-Italian soldiers took possession of our streets without authority and in utter disregard of law, the police should have arrested or shot them down. The police now should disperse the mob from the sand-lot and imprison the leaders, and no street procession should be permitted. If there is no law, then a vigilance committee should at once be organized, to see to it that our city is no longer disgraced by this organization, composed only of the vile of the foreign element. For this later sand-lot business we do not hold the Workingmen's party responsible, except Kallach, Maybell, Braunhart, and a few other most contemptible demagogues. If the Democracy proposes, as we understand it does, to affiliate with this sand-lot crowd, we say, By all means. Society is dividing into two parts—the decent, law-abiding, and order-loving on one side; the vicious, the idle, and the worthless on the other. We will call the one party "American," and invite all respectable men of foreign birth to come into alliance with it; the other may name itself by its acts. With this party we will try conclusions—with ballots or bayonets, as its members may desire. If the discontented, ignorant, and vicious can drive from this peninsula the party that will not submit either to be robbed or to live in fear, let the issue come, and come now. If this business has a peaceful conclusion we shall regret it as a lost opportunity to punish crimes that in our republic the law is powerless to reach.

We confess our surprise that Messrs. Traylor, Dickinson, and Hittell, Senators from San Francisco, and such gentlemen as Baker and others from the country, should favor a bill interfering with our common schools. The Constitution has honestly endeavored to prevent special legislation. To legislate for "cities of over one hundred thousand inhabitants," and pretend that such legislation is not directly leveled at San Francisco, is a disguise too thin for honest and sensible men to hide themselves in. We have in this city a Board of Education, and for the first time in twenty years one that is endeavoring to economize. For our San Francisco delegation to take this business out of its hands, and deny us economy in this branch of our government, is an impudent intermeddling in business that does not concern it. Our school system is an extravagant and costly sham. It is a fraud. It is a crime. Our legislators were elected on a pledge of economy, and the Traylor bill will, if it passes, increase our annual school expenses $150,000. It is a shameful violation of the decencies of legislation; and the bill will pass because seven hundred school females bring their necessities, their arts, and their blandishments to overcome and outweigh all arguments of sense and reason. We pay teachers one-third more than is paid in other American cities. The average cost per pupil here is largely in excess of that in any other city in the United States. It is $32.37. In Chicago, it is $17; Cincinnati, $19; St. Louis, $20; New York, $20; Baltimore, $20; Portland, $18; Washington, $18; Nashville, $17; Louisville, $15; Jersey City, $22; Newark, $14; Albany, $20; Providence, $14; Paterson, N. J., $13; Troy, N. Y., $14. Chicago has a debt of $2,500,000, and $17.62 is the average cost per pupil. In Cincinnati, $19.82 includes the cost of a deaf-mute school. In New York, books are free and the cost $20.50. In Jersey City, Newark, and Paterson, with free books, the average is $16.48. In Portland, Or., including a deaf-and-du ab school, the cost is $18.01. Our taxes in this city are insupportable, our rents are declining, and our values disturbed, and still the shameful extravagance and waste piles up and accumulates. We are spending money to teach one class of foreigners foreign languages while another is threatening to burn our city. We are spending money to educate in music, drawing, and other accomplishments the children of men who are prowling our streets defying our laws. We see danger ahead—a danger that does not come from the sand-lot, but from a class of cowardly politicians who dare not look above the sand-lot for popular support.

Last year the Board of Education asked an appropriation of $989,000. It was cut down by the Supervisors to $900,000. That was on the basis of $30 per head for 30,000 pupils. This year we are informed that Mr. John W. Taylor wanted to get $35 per head for each pupil. This would have made $1,050,000. The Board, after a hard fight, have asked this year for $25 per head, which, for 30,000 pupils, makes $750,000, a saving against the figures of last year of $150,000, and a reduction from Mr. Superintendent Taylor's estimate of $300,000. The time will come when Mr. Taylor will wish he had been more economical. It is all very well to be popular among young women teachers, but it is the tax-payers who vote, and it is our opinion that Messrs. Taylor, Van Schaick, and others are guilty of criminal extravagance in wasting the tax-payers' money. To teach Latin, Greek, German, and French in the Boys' and Girls' High Schools, and in two grammar and two primary schools, is a piece of wasteful and criminal extravagance; it is robbery under guise of law. To give a set of idle carpenters $350 for eight hours' labor, when better mechanics can be obtained for $250 per day, is stealing without the sanction of law. Our children ought to be educated at an average of $20 per head, or $600,000 per annum.

"B. and others," of San José, write, asking the significance of our heading—the bear and walrus afloat in mid-ocean. The walrus is dead, and the bear contemplates his position: if he eats the walrus he drowns; if he does not eat the walrus he starves. When the Argonaut started, we thought the device a good one. We deliberately put ourselves afloat in the mid-ocean of journalism. Ours was a venture between drowning and starving, with the hope of rescue by an appreciative public. We were warned by the wrecks that lay strewn along the beach—dead newspapers washed up on the shore. We visited Mr. Pickering's journalistic graveyard, and we saw it a grove of tombstones, some old and moss-grown, some with honorable inscriptions of useful service, some barren of name or record, some sunken and neglected graves upon which no flower had ever been laid; some evidently young—the little mounds indicating that the spirit had passed early from the little form that lay mouldering below. Here we saw the grave of political journals—sinners that had gone down in the stern and bloody encounter of party strife—lying side by side with religious journals that had died in the odor of sanctity. Some were the graves of suicides, some had died of lingering illness, and some had been murdered by jealous rivals, and some (ever so many) had been stillborn. Seeing these wrecks, and graves, and clustering tombs, we said to ourselves: "This is a venturesome voyage. We will not be over-confident—we will start looking death in the face, so that if Mr. Pickering has the grateful duty of writing our epitaph he shall not charge us with the over-presumption of a boastful and audacious start." Journalism was a venture then, and probably will always be—that is, the kind of journalism that we were bold enough to dare, and sanguine enough to hope might succeed. We said to ourselves: "We will be clean, respectable, and non-sensational; we will be fearless, independent, and tell the truth; we will not favor the ignorant mob, nor flatter the vanity of the empty-headed demagogues who profess to direct the politics of the country; we will be American; and while we will utter no word that shall offend the adopted citizen who respects himself and loves this country, we will spare the utterance of no language that may show our detestation of the vile and criminal elements that come to us from the slums of Europe and the shambles of China." We said to ourselves: "We will call Irish Irish, German German, Jew Jew, Catholic Catholic, as freely as we will call Yankees Yankees, or Democrats Democrats."

We have done so, and lived. We might have made more money; we might have sold ourselves to the rich; we might have toadied to the mob; we might have blackmailed the guilty, the unfortunate, and the timorous; we might have been more sensational and newsy; we might have been nasty; we might have hored every business man for an advertisement; we might have sent our solicitors to ring every door-bell for subscribers. We have not done so. We have annoyed no gentleman or business house to contribute to our existence; we have persecuted nobody to give us patronage; we are on nobody's pay-roll; we wear no collar of corporation or master; no hank, nor corporate organization, nor railroad, nor party, ever paid us as much money as did Hill, the agent of Denman Thompson, who played two engagements of Yankee characters at the Bush Street and Standard Theatres. We have now a circulation of over nine thousand copies per week, during this the dullest newspaper season of the year, and when there is any special excitement or political interest, we print as high as eighteen and twenty thousand copies. Our advertising business is light, but it is healthy and honest. We do not seek to advertise patent medicines and quack doctors; we do not pad and spread to fill our space; nor do we set loose a mob of solicitors to bound every advertiser for his patronage, and threaten if he does not give it. Sometimes we think it strange that this effort is not better appreciated, and that our business men do not better understand the kind of service we are endeavoring to render the community. We get splendid compliments, and if compliments had any sort of market value which we could exchange for printers' ink and good white paper, we should be doing a most flourishing business. However, we are not complaining, but only explaining about the hear and the walrus—the effort not to starve nor sink.

The Argonaut is not starving nor sinking. It owes no living man an overdue dollar. It has the best press, and the best engine, and the best type, and the best conveniences for doing good work, and they are paid for. It has a half-year's contract for the same paper it is now using, and the house of Remington & Co., with whom its contract is made, is solvent. Some of our contemporaries every now and then say we are going to suspend for lack of patronage; and every now and then a rumor goes out that we are about to publish a daily. And while it is nobody's business what we are going to do, we say this to our country subscribers (who all pay in advance)—if we ever stop publication we will refund your money. If we turn to a daily, we will send you that instead of the weekly. And further, we say this—that when we do change, it will not be down and out; it will not be a step backward, but forward and upward. We are very much in love with the weekly Argonaut, and the only possible change that we can contemplate is to a daily. When we started this hear out upon the dead walrus we thought we should be content; it was a slow voyage, but comfortable and sure. We thought a weekly dignified, and that opinions not hastily made, nor hastily written, would be of more force than the daily utterance; but a week is a long time in this city, and sometimes when we get a black eye we feel impatient that we are compelled to nurse our wrath eight days for a reply. Sometimes when burning questions are pending, when the town is alive with some stirring topic, we wish we could strike our six hews a week in order to get in more effective work; and then we think again of the expense and toil and responsibility of putting steam machinery into the dead walrus, and turning our present slow, sure-going craft into an armor-clad, heavily-manned, aggressive ram-of-war. The present is a time when San Francisco demands good and active service. The spring brings us an important municipal election; the summer a national campaign; and we are sometimes tempted to put on the armor and step squarely to the front. But we shall see what we shall see. In the meantime, let no friend of the Argonaut go into mourning anticipating its funeral.

Our reverend Mayor, who denounces so earnestly the sin of wealth, and warns the sinners of local hell-fire and temporal damnation, has no word of reproof for the harharians of the sand-lot who blaspheme God. Not an immortal soul of them ever gets upon his hind legs to make a speech but he straightway utters a copious torrent of profanity. They all invoke hell, revile heaven, call God names, speak of His angels contumeliously, and treat the dead with an unprovoked incivility—all, according to Mr. Kalloch's church, sins for which Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists, and infidels will be roasted to a rich seal-brow in the hot hereafter. Why does he not caution them to moderate the exuberance of their rhetorical style, soften an expression here and there, indicate the Deity by an oblique allusion, asking him to condemn us by indirection? Is our reverend Lord of Misrule more concerned for his followers' stomachs than for their souls?—more mindful of their temporal prosperity than of their eternal welfare? We feel that way ourselves about the matter, but then the devil never pitchforked us on to the quarter-deck of the Ship of Zion, taught us to hox the theological compass, and commissioned us to comfort the women of the bum-boats.

Speaking of Kalloch, it occurs to us that with the change of a single word the closing lines of the "Dunciad" describe with considerable accuracy the future of San Francisco, if this gloomy miscreant is suffered to prolong his régime to its logical conclusion:

"Religion, blushing, veils her sacred fires,
And unawares Morality expires;
Nor public flame, nor private, dares to shine;
Nor human spark is left, nor glimpse divine.
Lo! thy dread empire, Chaos, is restored:
Light dies before thy uncreating word;
Thy hand, great Kalloch, lets the curtain fall,
And universal darkness buries all!"

There was an age when the wager of battle decided differences of opinion. There was a later era when the duel was resorted to to decide conflicting issues. Now, we have a little local misunderstanding in San Francisco. There exists between the sand-lot and society a little courteous difference of opinion. The sand-lot thinks it ought to live upon the community by theft, and the community thinks it ought to labor or starve. The sand-lot thinks it ought to be allowed to steal the accumulations of other men's toil, and society thinks it will see the sand-lot d—d first. The sand-lot thinks that a set of nondescript immigrants from Ireland, Nova Scotia, and the Rhine have an exclusive right to the control and direction of our politics, while the native-born and foreign intelligence thinks that Americans have some rights in the country that foreigners ought to respect. The sand-lot thinks that these differences should be settled, not by the ballot, but by violence, and society is rapidly coming to the same conclusion. The Argonaut, always conservative and cool, always desirous of a speedy and fair adjustment of all differences of opinion, would act as umpire between the sand-lot and society. The sand-lot says the "Chinese must go," and the Chinese say they won't go, but will rest under the protection of the treaty and fight for their rights; and society says the sand-lot is wrong and the Chinese right. So the Argonaut proposes a duel, or wager of hattle, between the sand-lot and society.

Let Major-General Kearney and Major-General Barnes, with their respective staffs, hold a council of war, and, as in the olden and chivalrous times, arrange a conflict of arms. Let the military organizations of the W. P. C.—the Tenth Ward Rifles, and the various other forces of the sand-lot—under command of Major-General Denis Kearney, challenge the four hundred armed forces under command of Marshal Crowley, the two hundred veterans under command of Stuart Taylor, the volunteer militia under command of Major-General Barnes, the one thousand five hundred soldiers of the regular army under command of Major-General McDowell, with the Chinese held in reserve under command of Colonel Dee, and the twenty-five thousand of the Landwehr under command of William T. Coleman. Let the combat take place on the Presidio Reservation—say, on some bright Sabbath morning. Let it be a square encounter to the bloody end, and let the devil and his imps take care of the heated party. If society can be driven into the sea by these tramps, it may as well be settled now as to wait longer. If this Citizens' Protective Council allows any more nonsense it will not answer the expectations of the best people of San Francisco.

Parnell telegraphs from Montreal that the dissolution of Parliament renders his immediate return to Ireland imperatively necessary.

O Parliament, resigned we toll
The bell and chant the prayer;
Thy dissolution frees a soul
Our body well can spare.

Mr. Crittenden Thornton, in his discussion of the validity of the corporation employment law, has become a prophet of evil. The next financial calamity likely to overtake the country, he says, is to come from the overthrow of such large financial institutions as the New York Mutual Life Insurance Company. Sixty-seven of one family are employed in the company's building, all stockholders. Good family to marry into. It would evidence this company's solvency if all this family would insure their own lives in the concern. This is one of the first families of New York, doubtless. The old Virginia aristocracy was blue-blooded; our New York nobles are yellow-blooded. There is some sense in Mr. Thornton's suggestion. If we were insured in this company we should hope to die early in order to get our money.

See-saw, riot and law;
Frisco's in need of a master,
A head and a hand, in this city of sand,
To marshal events the faster.

See-saw, riot and law;
Our truce is knit with a plaster.
A fighter we need, a fellow of speed,
To trip the heels of disaster.

Mr. Pickering has frankly confessed in the columns of his newspaper that he does not know which has been the most destructive during the past twenty years in the United States, fire or water. The rivers that Mr. Pickering has set on fire will do no further harm, anyhow.

Some of our very wise men in the mining stock market affect to see in the sale by Mr. Flood to Mr. Mackay of his mining interest a cause for a decline in the stock market. "If," say they, "Mr. Flood has sold out, it is because he has lost faith in the Comstock." They forget that there is an equally strong argument in the fact that Mackay has purchased. Flood was the hanker, Mackay the underground miner. Flood, who has no practical knowledge of deep mining, sells; Mackay, who has lived in the howels of the mine, buys. This is evidence that Mr. Mackay thinks the Comstock has a future, and he pays $5,000,000 to get a larger interest than he had. It is an evidence that Flood has all the money he wants, and that Mackay wants fifty or a hundred millions more. It is evidence that in Mackay's opinion the Comstock is not worked out, that it has a future, that it is not to be abandoned, but to be prosecuted with powerful machinery and unlimited capital.

When Braunhart, beginning the House to harass,
In irony ventured to mention
That he was, no doubt, what they called him—an ass,
It wasn't pretense, but pretention.

The amount subscribed in America for suffering Ireland exceeds $600,000. The amount contributed by England is not more than $125,000.

Weakness acknowledged is humiliation confessed. Yet out of shame comes sometimes resolution and performance. We have come to the jumping-off place in our experiment of pure democracy, and beyond the brink are things unutterable. We have dallied with lawlessness, and have warmed in our bosoms the vipers of license. They lie coiled on our hearthstones now, threatening to strike; and we stand mutely hesitant, with sheathed swords and unprotected throats. We have become a reproach and a by-word in the eyes of the nation; yet half a dozen well directed blows would end this reign of terror, and huy hack for us a little of the world's respect. "Unless the wheel of progress is to turn backward, and mankind are to decline as they have risen, the natural superiority of truth to falsehood, of right to wrong, will recover in some shape or other the form of practical authority," which means brute force—swift, terrible, decisive.

In this Drama you will see
Prophecy of things to be.

SCENE, the sand-lot. TIME, the morning.
DENIS (loquitor).—I vow
There shall be a bloody row!
D—the Council! D—the laws!
Scoundrels soon must go! (applause.)
Then (presented with his "sawning")
Reads it with a pallid brow;
I am lame, so I'll start now.

When the "Council of Two Hundred" formulated its address to the people, it evidently had Mr. Pickering and the Call in its mind's eye, when it said:

"There is no middle ground upon which any man can stand. Neutrality in this crisis can only be excused by extreme age or a pitiable cowardice."

Our Kalloch's young nephew's arrested;
"The books" showed him "short." It is well
By this exposition attested
That figures and blood will tell.

We hope our political friends at the East will not fail to keep in mind the fact that we have but one controlling political issue on this coast, and that upon the attitude of the candidates on this OUR ISSUE depends the electoral vote of three States. "Shall Chinese immigration be discouraged and restrained by Congress and the laws? Shall the Burlingame treaty be modified?" This is our "live question." We care but little for financial matters, nothing for the "bloody shirt" business, and less than nothing for individual candidates. We will give our votes to that party that will give us the best assurance of speedy relief from what we regard as a pressing danger.

The nightly fire-fly when in quiet sleeping,
Or leisurely along the roadway creeping,
Seems but a sonibre bug, and only blazes
When, to be off, its masking shards it raises.
So, Kalloch—stupid in denunciation,
But lively in your coward proclamation—
You as a "man of parts" your fear discloses,
And that part brightest which your flight exposes.

Mrs. Hicks-Lord denies that she is going to marry Mr. Charles O'Connor, who, by the way, has not asked her. She avers that she is "fond of him as a lawyer, nothing more." On his part, Mr. O'Connor loves her as a client only. This kind of affection is truly touching. Talk about the loves of the angels, the attachment of Pygmalion for his statue, the preference of Paul for Virginia, the mutual flame of Abélard and Héloïse, and the passion of Maud Tarbox for Jim Snagglehy! They are not a circumstance, nor the half of one.

The only daily religious paper in the world, so far as we know, has suspended publication for lack of support. This generation likes religion well enough in its proper season, but it doesn't want it on business days. When it comes to rustling round after hash, the world, the flesh, and the devil are the trump cards of the situation, as the game is commonly conducted.

If the "Council of Two Hundred" means business when it says—

"Public threats of the accomplishment of such wicked and inhuman designs can not and will not be longer tolerated. The drills in secret places, the nightly tramp in the streets of irregular armed forces, accompanied by the arrogant threats of violence by their leaders, is an intolerable menace to the peace and well-being of society. If no harm is intended, there will be no more threats, and the display of force will be henceforth confined to public parades in the open day. The city wants peace, and it is our purpose to give it that tranquillity which will assure renewed prosperity, and again place it in the highway of its grand destiny"—we know where it can find a Winchester rifle with a man behind it.

The sand-lotter says: "I'm unable
To think destitution a trifle:
My family freeze in a stable,
With never a bite on the table.
By G—, I'll go huy me a rifle!"

That woodpecker Mayhell thrust a hill into the Assembly, imposing a tax on the Chinese, and authorizing the equipment of an army of one hundred men to collect it. This is too many; fifty thousand could get it from the Chinese, and it would be twice as easy to get it from them.

We would suggest to the Wasp a cartoon representing the condition of our Bible-heating Baptist blackguard, whom the miraculous rescue from a deserved death made Mayor. Let him be represented as a double-headed and double-ended dog. Let one end resemble the head of a bloody-jawed and brutal blood-hound; the other the rear of a cowardly and yelping cur, with a tin-kettle tied to his introverted tail. From his ferocious extremity, let his Union Hall speech of February 21st issue; from his other, the proclamation of March 9th.

TWO BARBER'S POLES.

The incident, as told in the funny fifth column of the New York Times, occurred at West Meredith, in the State of New Hampshire, where it is alleged that there is a wide difference of opinion as to the propriety of sliding down hill on a sled—"coasting" it is called. Mr. Hopkins was a model young man with no vices—he did not "coast." Miss Brown was a model young woman, and Hopkins was her "young man." She did "coast." One day in midwinter, Miss Brown asked Mr. Hopkins to take her to the top of Latham's hill, and let her slide down it just once. The proposal shocked the young man's finer instincts, but the young lady persisted, and finally asked him if he was so lacking in respect for her as to believe that she could propose anything that was not strictly proper. Of course, after this there was nothing to be said, and Mr. Hopkins, surreptitiously horrowing Master Charles Brown's sled, escorted the rash young lady to the top of Latham's hill.

The hill was a long and steep one, and, as it was nearly noon o'clock, not a soul was visible in the clear moonlight. Mr. Hopkins sat down on the forward part of the sled and Miss Brown knelt behind him, steadying herself by placing her hands lightly on his shoulders. Everything being ready, Mr. Hopkins started the sled, and in a few seconds they were flying down the hill at a speed of about fifty miles an hour.

Near the bottom of the hill Mr. Hopkins perceived a board which had apparently fallen from a wagon, and lay directly across the road. To strike it would insure a disaster, and Mr. Hopkins turned the sled out of the direct course to avoid it. The result was a frightful one. The sled struck a stone, and Miss Brown was shot with fearful velocity over her conductor's head, and landed head downward in a huge snow-bank.

When the young man came to himself, and disentangled his head from the wrecked runners of the sled, he saw an appalling spectacle. From the surface of a snow-bank what to his astonished eyes seemed to be two beautifully colored barber's poles projected, each surmounted with a delicate feminine hood. He called loudly on the name of the adored Miss Brown, but no one answered, and he began to fear that some accident had happened to her.

Mr. Hopkins sat down in the snow and asked himself what was the duty of the hour. To pull Miss Brown out was not to be thought of without a shudder. It was clear to his mind that he must rescue her in such a way that she need never know that the moonlight had shone upon—in short, that she should never know anything about it. After some moments of reflection, he decided to go to a neighbor's, borrow a shovel, and reach the head and shoulders of Miss Brown by driving a tunnel through the lower part of the snow-bank, by means of which he could extricate her without putting her to any inconvenience.

It took some time for Mr. Hopkins to obtain a shovel, but his search was finally successful, and he began to dig his tunnel. The bank was an enormous one, and he foresaw that he should have to work a long time before he could strike Miss Brown in paying quantities. He worked on steadily and silently. Not a sound came from the imprisoned young lady, though he repeatedly begged her to make herself comfortable, and to rely upon his devotion and shovel. Fully twenty minutes from the time the accident had elapsed, young Smedley, from the Post-office, approached the scene, on his way home. To his questions Mr. Hopkins replied by explaining in the most delicate way the difficulty under which Miss Brown labored, and the means by which he was endeavoring to extricate her. Young Smedley heard him through, and then, with a totally irrelevant remark, expressing an inexplicable confidence that in the future he would be personally and completely "darned," he climbed the snow-bank, seized—that is to say, took hold of—in fact, pulled Miss Brown suddenly and violently from her snowy tomb.

The young lady, as every one knows, recovered consciousness in the course of the evening—thanks to Dr. Sabin's prompt and skillful attention. Strange to say, however, she conceived an unaccountable hatred for Mr. Hopkins, and carried it to such an extent that she is now understood to be engaged to marry young Smedley. The most painful feature of the affair is this curious incapability on the young lady's part to appreciate the delicacy and respect with which Mr. Hopkins treated her. He would have dug her out in the course of an hour, and released her without subjecting her feelings to the slightest wound, but she actually preferred the rough and brutal treatment to which young Smedley subjected her. Can it be that Mr. Goldwin Smith is right and that we are on the verge of a moral interregnum?

A New York Social Success.

Writing of the Arion Masquerade, at Madison Square Garden, New York, on the 19th ultimo, the Times describes the decorations of the garden as follows:

The garden was never before decorated to such advantage. The Fourth Avenue side was partially occupied by an immense golden punch-bowl, filled with imitation ice, and containing a dozen enormous champagne bottles, labeled in Chinese characters. Around the base of the bowl were banked potted flowers in full bloom, seemingly springing out of a row of rocky fragments. At each side was a huge evergreen tree, and all around were ice and icicles, with little blue imps dancing in the recesses. There were two large holes in this arctic grotto, which were hung with red curtains, and were for the use of the processionists in appearing and disappearing. The inner amphitheatre was hung on the northern and southern sides with deep, pointed drapery, covered with painted figures, representing in succession the various stages through which a guest was supposed to be obliged to pass from the receipt of the invitation to the final next morning's headache. The caricatures were of the most grotesque and amusing character. They were supplemented with shields placed in the cuts, out of the centre of each of which an exaggerated bird or animal made faces at the men and women above him. Painted bolognas, strings of onions, old boots, slices of watermelon, and similar suggestive articles depended from the broad golden border of the drapery proper. Across the Madison Avenue end was a painted scene, representing Arion standing forth before a background of golden sun, rocks, caves, dolphins, shells, amphitruons, mermaids, and painted water filling up the sides prettily.

All the pillars, of both inner and outer circles, were hidden in encircling evergreens, dotted with large paper flowers, and at the base of each of the inner rows was a large silvered urn filled with sweet-smelling and many-colored potted flowers in full bloom. Festoons of evergreens and hells composed of cut flowers also depended at intervals from the tapestry all around. The stand for the use of the press had been erected across the Madison Avenue front of the floor, beneath the gallery. It was a complete arbor of evergreens, palms and potted flowers, and stuffed doves. American flags and other tasteful devices, stuck here and there, enhanced its beauty. The front of the gallery was hidden by palm leaves and flowers. Small caricatures en silhouette oroamented the tops of the outer row of pillars. Two music-stands—one on each side, north and south—were also hidden in evergreens and flowers. Two calcium lights added their powerful rays to the myriad of colored lights of the arches and the numerous unshaded lights dotting the ceiling. The scene when the floor was crowded—as it was at an early hour—by maskers in every variety of glittering and parti-colored costume, when the seats at the sides were packed with spectators, when the music was in full blast and the fun at its height, was one that may be better imagined than it can be described. Nothing approaching it in immensity and beauty was ever before seen in New York. In the latter respect it was incomparably the best hall the Arions have yet given. A large tin star and an enormous egg suspended from the ceiling should not be forgotten. At midnight both burst. From the former flew fifty frightened sparrows, and from the latter descended a shower of bou-tonniers houquets.

Some Dishes which Shakspeare may have Eaten.

There are pleasant chapters to be found in the Elizabethan books of cookery. Naturally, it was a grand and heroic one. Those doughty Englishmen who drove back the Spaniards and the Armada must have been honest feeders. It was not only sound beef and bread that made these English lusty and good hewers with their swords, but it was the plentiful mingling of hot spices with their food that gave them their elan. Mustard belongs more to that wonderful period than to ours. If the many-sidedness of Shakspeare is insisted upon, if a vast amount of learning is advanced, to show how the greatest of all writers was divine, doctor, lawyer, all at the same time, a more modest claim—that of his being a first-class cook—may be insisted upon. Returning to our Elizabethan cook-books—for there are more than one of them—one is called the Jewel House of Art and Nature, and contains "divers rare and profitable inventions, together with sundry new experiments in the art of bushandry, distillation, and moulding, faithfully and familiarly set downe, according to the author's owne experience, by Hugh Platte, of Lincolne's Inn, gentleman." The date was London, 1594. The other book—less ambitious—is called The Ladies Delights, and its author was a gentleman, too, the fine Sir Hugh Platt, and his book was published a few years later. One can almost fancy that the dioner ordered by Justice Shallow for Falstaff was cooked according to Sir Hugh's receipts: "Some pigeons, Davy, a couple of short-legged hens [were there, then, chicken-fanciers in those days?], a joint of mutton, any pretty little tiny kick-shaws, tell William, the cook." Now, what does Recipe 9 of The Delights for Ladies tell us? Just how to hoil pigeons with rice: "Boyle them in mutton brothe, pulling sweet herbs to fill them. Then take a little rise [rice], and boyle it in creame with a little whole mace. Season it with sugar, lay it thicke on their breasts, wringing, also, the juice of a lemmon on them." With all our admiration for the Elizabethan era, this method of cooking pigeons must have made them, according to our ideas, highly objectionable. The pigeons must have tasted like mutton, and sugar in a squab would possibly, make Miss Corson drop her hasting-spoon in horror. Still, there is a great deal to be learned from Sir Hugh Platt. If rice was necessary for the birds, where did it come from? This is a question not readily solved, but it is quite probable that rice-culture was then as common in Northern Italy as it is to-day. Lemons and mace in the pigeon stew explain, too, England's commerce with the East, and France or Italy. Now for the short-legged hens; how did William, the cook, dress them? They were to be "boyled in faire water," but a complicated sauce was to give additional zest to the fowls. "A few currans and a quartered date were to be cooked in a ladle full of mutton broth, and a little white wine, a little whole mace, a bundle of sweet berbs, a little marrowe, some sugar, almonds, and verjuice were to be put in, which, when chopped and mixed, were to be put into the hens." As to the leg of mutton, that required not only the talent of the cook, but somewhat the skill of the comparative anatomist. The whole of the meat and bone were to be withdrawn, leaving only the skin untouched. The meat was "chopped up, mixed with currans, raisins of the sun, nutmeg, sugar, eggs and pepper. Then all reintroduced again into the hole whence came the bone," and this was stewed in marrow and eaten with sliced carrots. The kick-shaw (undoubtedly derived from the French quelque-chose) was quite as complicated, the basis being calves' feet, with the same ingredients as for the pigeons or short-legged hens, only these additions were made: "four ounces of sugar candie and three spoonfuls of rose-water, with one grain of musk." Certainly, the fine dames and brave gallants in Raleigh's time had no odor of onions about them. As much, though, as we may appreciate the literature of those days, their finer cookery must have been abominable.

An exquisite costume for a fancy ball is a water lily. The skirt of white silk to represent leaves is round and full, trimmed with flounces, pointed at the edges and bound with white satin. The green satin corsage to form the calyx fits the figure closely, and clusters of artificial water lilies ornament the bosom, waist, and hair.

Two young ladies confided their love affairs to each other. "My first lover," said the one who commenced, "was several students of law!"

THE DUEL OF THE FUTURE.

A Parisian journal has the following account of the circumstances that are to attend the dueling of our esteemed posterity:

There are advertising agencies, matrimonial agencies, funeral companies, employment bureaus—almost everything, in fact, that can be imagined—but for the dueling age we must look to the future. The day, however, will come when a joint-stock company will make a specialty of dueling, and when it does come this is how the new thing will work:

Trousperin will write a paragraph in the Electric Eel that Bouzinard, editor of his esteemed contemporary, the Delirious Cockroach, owes his laundress. Bouzinard will go to lounge at their usual haout, the Café des Dindonneaux, and meeting Trousperin, give him two Krupp whacks over the head with his cane.

Inferring from this that Bouzinard's design is to insult him, Trousperin will remark:

"You are a scoundrel, and you will hear from me, sir." Whereupon Bouzinard retorts, wittily, "I shall be more fortunate than posterity, monsieur," and departs.

Trousperin, not having the necessary funds for the hack-hire, breakfast to seconds, etc., goes to the dueling agency. "Sir," he says to the clerk, "yesterday I received two whacks from a cane—"

"Next window, monsieur; this is the Kick-and-Black-Eye Department."

"Yesterday I—" begins Trousperin at the designated window.

"Very well, sir," says the official instantly; "what is his name and address?"

"Bouzinard, editor of the Electric Eel."

"All right. Do you want seconds with mustaches or without? With regular fierce military mustaches it is five francs extra."

"Let me have one with mustaches and one without them."

"Ah, I see what you want—a duel of the eighth class. The charge will be twenty-five francs fifty centimes, which will entitle you to two half-clean seconds, with spring-bottomed pantaloons; a two-place coupé (you will have to sit with the driver); two fourth-quality swords, with leather handles; the attendance of a veterinary surgeon from the suburbs in case of a wound; a clean shirt for the encounter; lint à discrétion. Twenty-three francs and a half, if you please."

"Here are twenty-five francs, monsieur. As to the shirt—do I keep it?"

"If you are killed—yes; if not—no."

Trousperin withdraws, and that night receives a letter as follows:

PARISIAN DUELING AGENCY,
95 Rue Marivaux, January 22, 1880.
SIR:—I have the honor to inform you that your duel with M. Bouzinard will take place at 7:15 A. M. to-morrow, at Clamart.
MM. Puffignac and Barbotteau, your seconds, will call for you at six o'clock.
You will be expected to stand the beer.
Respectfully,
IVAN DE MUFFLENSKI,
General Manager.

Next morning the duel takes place, and Trousperin is wounded in the left thumb-nail. At noon he receives the following circular:

PARISIAN DUELING AGENCY,
95 Rue Marivaux, January 26, 1880.
SIR:—We shall take pleasure in securing a gratifying amount of publicity for your affair of honor this morning with M. Bouzinard. Specimen notices and terms are appended.
Respectfully,
IVAN DE MUFFLENSKI,
General Manager.

In the evening papers appears the customary item beginning, "After a somewhat heated newspaper discussion, Messrs. Trousperin, of the Electric Eel, and Bouzinard, of the Delirious Cockroach, had a hostile meeting," etc.

The Lively Gaul.

La Baronne de Z. applied to a detective agency to have her husband watched, she suspecting him of infidelity. For the detective's services she agreed to pay fifteen francs a day. At the end of twelve days la Baronne saw no result was obtained, save a bill presented to her of two hundred and fifty-five francs.

"What does this mean?" she exclaimed. "Twelve days at fifteen francs makes only one hundred and eighty francs."

"Certainly, madame," says the director, "but monsieur your husband has owed us seventy-five francs for a long time. He had us watch for him during five days Mlle. X. of the Palais Royal."

An egotist saw one of his friends in a paroxysm of coughing.

"How sorry I am to see you cough like that," he said, in a moved voice.

"You are very kind, dear friend."

"Oh, it is not that I am kind, but to see any one cough like that always makes me cough, too!"

Upon reading an obituary notice of the first water:

"Excellent! Admirable! I like to hear a great man well spoken of. But this strewing flowers upon the hearse of the great is monotonous. Why does no one think of signaling the birth of our eminent statesmen and patriots?"

Said a son-in-law yesterday, speaking of his mother-in-law, who is both deaf and short-sighted:

"Doctor, the half of my fortune if you can restore her sight and hearing, and three-quarters of it if you can deprive her of speech!"

Maxime, an inveterate gambler, is sunning himself on a chair in the Champs Elysées, yellow and haggard.

A friend (severely)—See here, Maxime, this won't do. You'd better go to your bed, and stay there a day or two.

Maxime—I wouldn't mind staying there a day or two, but the nights, when the club is open—that is what grates me.

A concierge said to one of our most charming comedienues, in speaking of the latter's cook:

"Oh! she behaves badly enough to you, because she knows you are an actress. But she is imbecile to do so—for who knows what she may become herself some day!"

LONDON FOG.

LONDON, January 4, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Your readers will no doubt be puzzled to know how a letter of any interest can be written about London fog. It is an old subject, but in this case let me begin by saying I have "lived" in London fog, know it in all its colors, from white to green, and even black. I have felt my way with a stick, touching door railings, curbstones, and corners; have stood looking up in wonder at a small, luminous, meteoric ball, which nothing but holding to the post could have convinced me was a street lamp.

To begin fairly, let it first be explained that London fog is the same as Birmingham or Manchester fog. It is a British institution, common to nearly all cities on the humid isle. "London" fog is a misnomer—"British" fog is the proper term, and moreover it is a peculiarity the people are proud of. If there is anything to which this patriotic term of British can be applied, it is at once sacred in the eyes of an Englishman.

The second thing to be explained is that fog in England does not, as in America, mean "mist," but anything which obscures vision. London fog may therefore be, and often is, smoke pure and simple; sometimes it is mist, but generally is a mixture of the two, so compounded as to choke one, and also promote colds and rheumatism in a most effective way. Smoke and fog make perhaps the most unwholesome mixture known to human discomfort. An English wit has named it "smog."

Never shall I forget the first London fog which fell within my experience. For months the event had been looked forward to with interest. Other "lions," all of them, had been done. From the Isle of Dogs to Sheppard's Bush, and from Hampstead to Brixton, all prominent roads and streets had gradually come out of chaos into a kind of order; I knew London all but the fog, and finally that came, about nine in the morning of one October day.

I was sitting writing at a second-story window in a narrow street in the west centre of London, when all at once there were observed waves of green smoke in the street below. At first only a few feet in depth, but increasing, piling up as one might say, growing deeper and higher like an inundation. I noted that the smoke from the chimney pots, instead of soaring away, as well-ordered smoke ought to do, tumbled down on the roofs and then off into the street, swelling the green sea below. Then I caught the first idea of a London fog, namely, that the phenomenon is the result of a low barometer, or light air. The atmosphere becomes lighter than the smoke, and the latter sinks through the atmosphere as a stone does in the water.

The smoke rose until it reached my window, which, contrary to special injunctions, was opened for the occasion, and poured into the room. Pictures on the wall disappeared, the coal fire turned to a dull crimson like the sun when in eclipse, the outside world disappeared, and at last I had seen and felt a London fog.

The first act was satisfactory, and willingly would the rest have been foregone, but there was no escape. I tried the streets, bribed an "Arab" to pilot me to a railway station, so as to escape into the country; but there at six miles away the smoke turned to mist and smoke combined, so there was nothing to do but submit with the best grace possible. The roar in the streets, from being continuous and uniform, nearly ceased, or became spasmodic. The bewildered cabman's "hi!" with other exclamations, profane or otherwise, took the place of rumbling wheels. It was to me awful, and gave the impression of some grand natural phenomenon—not a local circumstance, as it really was.

At the end of two days, when a rain came and the fog rose, a friend living out on the high ground at Sydenham informed me that no fog to speak of was seen out there, only seven miles away.

Certain parts of London are much worse than others during a fog. I have passed into and out of the fog in Piccadilly as if passing through a streak of pure smoke—if smoke can be pure. Sometimes the fog will "lift" from some particular place in a few minutes, and then as suddenly return.

The time of coming on is usually about nine o'clock in the morning—that is, when it lifts during the night, as is common. Sometimes, however, it will remain thick and dense for a whole week, day and night. There seems to be no kind of forecast to warn people when a fog may come, or when it will go. In fact, the whole seems to depend upon barometrical pressure and the "cussedness" of the climate generally.

The chromatic changes of a London fog are never suspected until one sees by experience that the term does not mean mist. The pure white of water mist blended with ever-varying proportions of coal smoke, gives yellow, green, grey, white, and black.

The fog gives the cabman a rich harvest, and enables them to exercise that power of which they are most proud: that is, a knowledge by instinct of all the curious windings, turnings, and places in this modern Babylon. Most of all, however, is the suspension of regular fares a matter of interest to "cabby." The regulation shilling a mile can be expanded into "five bob," or a half sovereign, and the bargain which a cabman detests in ordinary times he now insists upon, for without it he may be cut off with a regular fare, fog or no fog.

The river Thames, which, in the ordinary course of American conceptions, should furnish the fog, seems to be no factor in the case; that is, for what a cockney would call a proper fog. The river, it is true, is sometimes covered with mist, so as to stop the omnibus-boats and other traffic; but the two things are distinct. The white fog or mist seems to rise out of the ground or come stealing around corners in an unsuspected manner. Clearly, it does not come from the river, unless immediately along the banks.

I have seen two dense fogs come and go within as many hours in the midland cities and towns of England, stopping for the time all wheel traffic. Sometimes a general fog comes on, extending for a hundred miles or more, so that railway signals are useless, and trains are moved by telegraph, and signaled by torpedoed placed on the track; and one who has ridden on a military train during our civil war, when no lights were permitted for fear of shots through the windows, will be reminded of the circumstance by the bang of torpedoed on an English railway during a fog.

CAL. A. FORNIA.

THE TRUTHFUL STORY-TELLER.

A farmer had some wheat stolen a few nights since, and he was so sure that he knew who the thief was, that he secured a warrant for a certain young man living near him. When the case came up for trial, the defendant said he could prove an alibi. In order to do this, he had brought in "his girl," a buxom lass of twenty-two. She took the stand, and swore that he sat up with her from seven o'clock in the evening until broad daylight next morning.

"People can very easily be mistaken," observed the plaintiff's lawyer.

"I don't care—I know he was there," she replied.

"What did you talk about?"

"Love!" she promptly answered.

"What time did the old folks go to bed?"

"I give 'em the wink about ten."

"Sure he was there at midnight, are you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Why are you sure?"

She blushed, looked over to her lover and laughed, and, getting a nod to go ahead, she said:

"Well, sir, just as the clock struck twelve, the old man jumped out of bed, up stairs, and hollered down: 'Sarah, yer mar wants some o' that catnip tea!' And we got such a start that we broke the back off the rocking-chair and went over backwards kerplunk!"

"Then the jury must understand that you were seated on Samuel's knee?"

"I object," put in Samuel's lawyer, and his honor remembered the days of his youth and sustained the objection.

An old gentleman from the East, of a clerical aspect, took the stage from Denver south in ante-railroad days. The journey was not altogether a safe one, and he was not reassured by the sight of a number of rifles deposited in the coach, and nervously asked for what they were.

"Perhaps you'll find out before you git to the Divide," was the cheering reply.

Among the passengers was a particularly (it seemed to him) fierce-looking man, girded with a belt full of revolvers and cartridges, and clearly a road agent or assassin. Some miles out, this person, taking out a large flask, asked: "Stranger, do you irrigate?"

"If you mean drink, sir, I do not."

"Do you object, stranger, to our irrigating?"

"No sir." And they drank accordingly.

After a further distance had been traversed, the supposed brigand again asked: "Stranger, do you fumigate?"

"If you mean smoke, sir, I do not."

"Do you object, stranger, to our fumigating?"

"No, sir." And they proceeded to smoke.

At the dining place, when our friend came to tender his money, the proprietor said: "Your bill's paid."

"Who paid it?"

"That man"—pointing to the supposed highwayman, who, on being asked if he had not made a mistake, replied: "Not at all. You see, when we saw that you didn't irrigate and didn't fumigate, we knew that you was a parson. And your bills are all right as long as you travel with this crowd. We've got a respect for the church—you bet!" It was no highwayman, but a respectable resident of Denver.

A little Quincy urchin, who had just been the recipient of a good warming while bent over the maternal knee, sneaked around the corner and was giving vent to his feelings in words which were never learned in Sabbath-school, when a minister happened along.

"My son, my son," said the reverend gentleman, "do you not know that swearing is a great sin? You are a handsome boy, and everything about you indicates that you have been tenderly reared, and—"

"Tenderly reared!" roared the lad. "If mother would yank you across her knee and give you the 'rearin' she just give me, you wouldn't think it was so darned tender!"

The minister smiled sadly, and passed on.

Mr. John McElroy, of the Toledo Blade, who during the civil war was a prisoner in the hands of the Confederates, has published a book entitled Andersonville, which is described by those who have read it as the best and truest narrative of that horrible place that has yet been written. Here is Mr. McElroy's description of the arch-miscreant Winder and his accomplice Wirz:

"There rode in among us a few days after our arrival an old man, whose collar bore the wreathed stars of a major-general. Heavy white locks fell from beneath his slouched hat nearly to his shoulders. Sunken gray eyes, too dull and cold to light up, marked a hard, stony face, the salient feature of which was a thin-lipped, compressed mouth, with the corners drawn down deeply—the mouth which seems the world over to be the index of selfish, cruel, sulky malignance. This was John H. Winder, the malign genius who in August could point to 3,081 new-made graves for the month, and exultantly tell his hearers that he was doing more for the Confederacy than twenty regiments.

"Wirz was an undersized, fidgety man, with an insignificant face, and a mouth that protruded like a rabbit's. His bright little eyes, like those of a squirrel or a rat, assisted in giving his countenance a look of kinship to the family of rodent animals—a genus which lives by stealth and cunning. He was dressed in a pair of gray trousers, with the other part of his body covered with a calico garment like that which small boys used to wear, called 'waists.' Upon his head was perched a little gray cap. Sticking to his belt and fastened to his wrist by a strap two or three feet long, was one of those formidable-looking but harmless English revolvers that have ten barrels around the edge of the cylinder, and fire a musket-ball from the centre. Wirz was not a villain of large mental calibre, with a genius for cruelty. He was simply contemptible, from whatever point of view he was studied. Gnat-brained, cowardly, and feeble-natured, he had not a quality that commanded respect from any one who knew him. His cruelty did not seem designed so much as the ebullitions of a peevish, snarling little temper, united to a mind incapable of conceiving the results of his acts, or understanding the pain he was inflicting."

THE OTHER POETS.

An Arabian Love Song.

At the gates of the Orient stands
Zadel, Zidel;
And she clasps her lovely hands,
Zadel! Zadel!
For over the stormy tide
She waits for her lover to ride—
He is coming close to her side!
Zadel! Zadel!

Oh, swift is the Arab steed
Upon which Abuker rides!
And great is the charger's speed,
And long are his swinging strides.
But swifter the maiden's heart,
Goes out the rider to meet,
And faster it bears its part
Than the galloping of his feet.

O Zadel! Zadel! fair'st Arabian maiden,
Light of my harem, my houri;
Smile to me under the moon,
Zadel, Zadel, fair'st Arabian maiden!
Wait for me by the palm-trees
Sighing in love's soft swoon.
Zadel, Zadel, angels repeat the whispers
Where they were standing together
Under the fig's waving pride.
Charger and rider and maiden
Journey unperturbed forever
Over the sands where Abuker
Won her and made her his bride.
—E. N. Gunnison.

A Letter.

I am sitting alone in the garden to-day,
Though the summer is well nigh dead,
We have gathered the fruit and garnered the hay,
And the withering woods are red;
All the beds on the terrace are yet aglow,
And the roses are clustering still,
But the tender blossoms are all laid low,
And the evening breeze grows chill.

A time-serving robin comes chirruping near;
He is 'ware of a terrible day,
When the beds shall be bare and the woodlands sere,
So he chirrups, while chirrup he may.
The children are shouting, with kite and with ball,
Away by the hazel-wood lane,
And I—I have stolen away from them all,
Just to write to you once again.

But of what can I tell you, my only friend?
That I miss you by night and by day?
That the dreariest hours are those that I spend
Since the one when you journeyed away?
That your form seems beside me when others are by,
And your head on my bosom at night?
That regrets will arise and ambitions die—
Is it thus that you wish I should write?

But, as heedless of all these changes of thought,
Of this vast undercurrent of doubt,
We smiled and we sorrowed, we sold and we bought,
And we jested at dance and at rout;
There was never an echoed step on the stair,
Or a form at the turn of the street,
But my heart leapt up ready to greet you there,
And to thro' at the sound of your feet.

Yet here, where the bracken waves under the pine,
And the heather grows pink on the hill—
It is here, in this home that was yours and mine,
That your spirit seems lingering still;
And on days like this, when the summer is done,
And the children are gone to their play,
I can sit me down in the garden alone,
And say all that I hunger to say.

For it seems to me now, at the turn of the year,
Ere the tempests of winter blow,
I must send a "good-morrow" to you, my dear,
Even whether you hear it or no;
For it lightens my heart of some part of its woe,
And dries some of the tears that I weep,
Ere I seek for the worthiest blossoms that blow,
Which may die on the turf where you sleep.
—Violet Fane.

The Lost Kiss.

I put by the half-written poem,
While the pen, idly trailed in my hand,
Writes on: "Had I words to complete it,
Who'd read it, or who'd understand?"
But the little bare feet on the stairway,
And the faint, smothered laugh in the hall,
And the eerie-low lisp on the silence,
Cry up to me over it all.

So I gathered it up—where was broken
The tear-faded thread of my theme,
Telling how, as one night I sat writing,
A fairy broke in on my dream,
A little inquisitive fairy—
My own little girl, with the gold
Of the sun in her hair, and the dewy
Blue eyes of the fairies of old.

'Twas the dear little girl I had scolded,
'For was it a moment like this,"
I said, "when she knew I was busy,
To come romping in for a kiss?
Come rowndyup up from her mother,
And clamoring there at my knee
For 'one little kiss for my dolly,
And un' little uzzer to me!'"

God pity the heart that repelled her
And the cold hand that turned her away,
And take from the lips that denied her
This answerless prayer of to-day!
Take, Lord, from my memory forever
That pitiful sob of despair,
And the patter and trip of the little bare feet
And the one piercing cry on the stair!

I put by the half-written poem,
While the pen, idly trailed in my hand,
Writes on: "Had I words to complete it,
Who'd read it, or who'd understand?"
But the little bare feet on the stairway,
And the faint, smothered laugh in the hall,
And the eerie-low lisp on the silence,
Cry up to me over it all.
—J. H.

Raymonde is a nice play; an excessively nice play—within the meaning of that word which imports a play of nasty ideas. Should the French literature of this century chance to be lost hereafter, it will be restored again in the remoter future, when evolution shall have qualified the Poodle race to produce a literature of its own.

At the Baldwin, Raymonde has been played more than admirably. A strong cast gave praiseworthy care to their several parts, and produced the play with a various completeness that calls for thankful recognition. Mr. Max Freeman divided with Miss Morris the honors of the success. Raymonde is cleverly contrived and well managed. The dramatic interest is lively and sustained; the characters are discriminated and individualized. In the title role, Miss Morris has a part that could not fail of being effective in the hands of an actress of half her powers. "M. Octave" owes much to the author; at the same time, few actors would have given it with half the effect of Mr. Freeman. His work, too, was of that nice sort in which the judicious joy is finished, like some Dutch pictures, with laborious minuteness, yet so masterly that there is no sense of the labor; and while Freeman's "M. Octave" is wrought out with extreme detail, the effect is that of simple ease. The range of this actor's powers may—or may not—prove to be a strained one; but he has given some warrant that, within it, they are of a high quality.

In taking leave of Miss Morris for a season, it would be only gracious to render some token as tribute to the much admirable work the lady has done for the public delight. It might also be improving to attempt some study of her method—some estimate of her gifts, and of the training she has bestowed on them—some instance of the good judgment, good sense, and good taste evinced in the management of all, and some definition of the limitations of her powers. And it is scarcely gracious to point to the distinct misuse she makes of these last, to the frequent bad taste in which her plays are selected, to the consequent waste and loss of all result from her performance, beyond that residuum which is left in the box-keeper's till. From time to time the public taste has its spasms of perversion, but they are very temporary. At one period it will run to leg business, at another to stage carpentry. Just at present it is showing a nice appreciation of tables, and is really critical of andirons. It is the manager's business to cater to each freak of these vagrom fancies, and fill his boxes and till. It is the actor's business no less to keep the same great aim in his eye; but it may be well for him to keep the other eye on the coming days when successively the leg, the locomotive, and the æsthetic chair are banished the stage, lest he then be found to lag superfluously there. In similar wise, Miss Morris may depend upon it that the fancy of the English-speaking public for, or their tolerance of, the Poodle drama, will prove fleeting. It is to be hoped that she will have prepared, against that time, something to take its place more worthy of herself and of the stage. Some of the work that is most peculiarly her own is of a kind hard to match, and which we ought not to lose, but it is a truth as certain as death or taxes that, at no distant date, she must be prepared with some different things—or go.

In "Brother Sam," it is brought home to one how much of the enjoyableness of Mr. Sothern's present engagement is due to his thoroughly admirable support. The comedy is fantastic, skirting the border of farce, with protracted raids across the line; and nothing short of excellent personation throughout the cast could save some portion of it from lapsing into mere frolicsome fooling. But it is more than saved, and a human reality preserved through all its freaks, by dint of good, sound acting. Mr. Sothern, whose work as work is of a high order regardless of the material he may be working in, is rich and delightful in "Brother Sam"; so rich and so delightful, in truth, as to provoke the question whether it was best worth his while to create this character, instead of giving, for example, a "Puff," or some other exemplar of our standard comedy? The question does not answer itself by any means. It will not be argued here, but it may be in order to point out that the practical turn of the same question is, Would it have paid Mr. S. as well peculiarly to have adopted "Puff" as to have created "Sam"? Of this question the actor himself is the ultimate judge, and it must be granted that he is probably the best qualified to decide it, as he is certainly most interested in the decision. The above test may not be the kind of test under which some would prefer to see the process of dramatic selection worked out. Under it, that which will be found to survive as the "fittest" would, in a period of perverted or degraded public taste, be a perverted or degraded drama. It is the principle of natural struggle for existence which has been to our English stage the law of its being, in contrast with that other principle of subsidy, under which the continental stage has been developed. Granting, now, that the success of "Brother Sam" has been greater than that of some standard comedy might have been, the fact affords no sign of vitiation in the public taste.

A confusion of thought is apt to creep in along with expressions like that just used—"standard," applied to our English drama. Aside from Shakespeare's, and a bare half-score of plays that have survived their contemporaries, the stage does not know—has never known, and never will know—any stable "standard" dramatic performances. The new plays of one generation become standard with the next, obsolescent with the third, and obsolete with the fourth. Just as "damns have had their day," so, too, in a sense, has the comedy from which that gem of speech is quoted. "Sir Affable Hawk" could not now be received with the acclaim accorded him by a public which had itself been the subject of the great railway mania. "Sir Charles Coldstream" was received by the society which sat for the portraits of Sir Leicester Dedlock and Lady Selina Vipont with the same natural rapture that was excited by "Dundreary" and his "Brother Sam" in audiences of whom Lady Tippins, Lord Decimus Barnacle, and the Prince of Wales are units. All of which is to say that the outward and visible aspect of "Dundreary" is as essentially a reflection of a possible phase of fashion in 1880 as that of "Coldstream," for example, was for a youth-time now gone bald-headed; as the maonors of a "Surface" were conceivable under the Regency, or those of a "Young Marlow" just one century ago. "Fitzaltamont," the crushed tragedian, reflects no passing fashion nor temporary social phase. Were the play good enough to maintain itself permanently on the stage, the part, as played by Sothern, is good enough to rank as a "standard" one, within the fullest meaning that that word may import.

This line of remark is not purely gratuitous, for even a judicious critic recently used the word "standard" in reference to the part of "Sir Charles Coldstream," in a collation showing that it was vaguely associated in his mind with the few surviving masterpieces of the Georgian era. Doubtless it is associated with his own early play-going days, and will thus present itself to his mind as venerable and hoary with accumulated years. For only actors read plays and know them by reading; others gaze upon the stage, behold, and indigest—then explain, expatiate, and expound. There is a collection of plays published under the title, The Standard Drama, in which the word is used with the same palpable oo-meaning, and the contents of which contribute to confound the confusion.

In this column, last week, an example of Mr. Sothern's acting was compared with a cancan-cutting. The comparison was not inapt, but it is now in order to add that, in handiwork of this kind, it is worth while to have some regard to fitness in the material operated upon. In Dundreary Married and Settled, the material was not worth working. "Dundreary" is a delightful personation—full of fine touches—of a living fellow-creature, with no more of exaggeration than may consist with a harmless and amiable eccentricity. Dundreary Married is something less than caricature. It is a personation of a personation, a similitude of a simulacrum. The piece is mere fooling, of a quality the reverse of excellent. To offer it at all is not altogether respectful to the public—however, it is not worth talking about.

Mr. Schmidt will do well to mitigate the elemental crasbes of his orchestra. One does not want the drums of ooe's ears brayed out.

Again there is a walking-match in progress at the Mechanics' Pavilion. The public pulse has, we presume, been carefully felt, and at the first symptoms of healthy reaction—that is to say, when it is again in a position to register so many half-dollar heats to the minute—it has been prescribed a course of Weston and O'Leary, to be followed by another go-as-you-please affair, open to both sexes. It is extremely complimentary to San Francisco that it should have been singled out as the exploiting ground of two such doughty champions of the saw-dust ellipse. It is a mark of appreciation, of kind feeling, of what not, on the part of the management, that should serve to draw out our warmest and heartiest sympathies toward the good cause, for, look you, Chicago, St. Louis, or even Cincinnati, might well have been honored with this strife of calves. Can we, by any possible means, lay the flattering unction to our souls that we are indebted for this honor to our climate? It would be so nice to do so. It is said that Westos skips, and flings, and prances, and hops down the saw-dust in his friskiest manner, recalling memories of spring lambs or spring chickens or something of that sort, while O'Leary, with set teeth, does his machine walking in the machioliest kind of way. Still we are dissatisfied, and have a right to be, that the arena is not graced by the calves, ankles, and tendons of the first person in the pedestrian trinity, Blower Brown. Yes, any management with any sense of what is due to itself and us, should certainly have provided us with Blower Brown.

An unpublished poem by Leopardi has been found.

CAPITAL SOCIETY.

SACRAMENTO, March 9, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—Did you ever see that self-caricature, by Nast, of the funny man in the last agonies of despair, trying to think of something funny? There he sits, with papers teeming with amusing pictures and laughable anecdotes strewn around him. An open letter on the table from the Harpers demanding something funny immediately; the perspiration rolling down his face; his hands tearing his hair; agony depicted on every feature; racking, torturing his brain for something to make this simple world giggle! Just imagine the situation of that man! Nothing could be more ludicrously horrible. Some old sage has said: "To be obliged to amuse the public! What a sad situation for a man who thinks." And we have no doubt but these jovial, laughing wits are at times the most wretchedly unhappy mortals.

You see that it is their reputation; they are expected to be witty, they must be witty, or they are a failure in society. And that is about all we think of the article or sketch that has amused or interested us—never think of the effort it has cost to produce it; and before we criticise never stop to think we could not do one-tenth as well. We feel a good deal to-day as the perspiring Nast did. Something must be said out of almost nothing.

However, something did happen of considerable importance to two people at least—Assemblyman Bruner and Miss Flint, both of Sacramento. Perhaps if we tell you of the meeting of the Third House, at the Capitol the other day, and the resolutions adopted by these envious Assemblymen, you'll know what this serious matter was. Well, you must know, because this Mr. Bruner is young and good-looking and altogether fine, and he made pretty Lillie Flint think so also, these sour-graped Assemblymen must go and talk about "an unwise and unscrupulous Providence removing from his seat a friend and brother, against the protestations of married members," and calling him a "kind and indulgent husband, but a tough citizen," and "another good man gone wrong." And they draped his desk in mourning, and a copy of the resolutions was sent to his sisters and his cousins and his aunts; and they offered prayers to the Lord for their brother in his hour of trial, asking Him to have mercy on his soul, and actually had the audacity to offer Mr. Bruner their sympathy! Sympathy! when their bald pates were green with envy!

We all went to Mrs. Colonel Haymond's last night. She entertained some of the legislators. Did we ever tell you about Mrs. Creed? She is one of our witty, pretty, bright little women, who has the knack of making you believe the evening would have been spoiled had you not honored her, and has all the rest of those little pleasantries that make up a good hostess—not a crowd, but just a couple of twenties, or so. Had some of the best singing we have heard this winter. There are half a dozen or so young singers here, who are a whole band of music by themselves. They are so obliging about it, too—never have colds, or no music, and are never out of practice. Crandall is the tenor. His voice is very pure, and he sings with taste and expression. After all, a fine tenor is "the" voice of them all. Mary Milliken, who studied in San Francisco, is a nightingale in the egg. Miss Wiltz sings sweetly, and Miss Jennie Wood's contralto is always pleasing. They all sang last night, which made the evening ten times more enjoyable. There was little dancing. A good supper was laid in the music-room, and everything "went merry as a marriage bell." Assemblyman Fox and his pretty daughter were there; also, Assemblyman Felton. We suppose the proper thing to say right here is, he's an unencumbered widower, a millionaire, and, we presume, necessarily "a great catch." How ridiculous! Though this Mr. Felton, we understand, is very much of a gentleman, with all his millions. Senator Baker, Senator Brown and wife, and Senator Dickenson, who never belies his name, for if any one has the dickens in him it's this same "gentleman from San Francisco." Judge Safford and wife were also present. Several of Mrs. Haymond's Sacramento friends also accepted of her hospitality—Major Beckman and wife, Albert Gallatin and wife, Mr. J. F. Sheehan and wife, the Misses Wilkins, Bernard, Seeley, and Felter, besides a few others.

Born of Fire.

Almost any pleasant Saturday evening, one standing near the junction of the Sutter and Larkin Street cable roads, at the hour of nine, may see two tall ladies in black, each with a book in hand, take leave of each other—not by kissing in the street before a crowd, but with a glance into each other's eyes and the words, from one to the other, "Shall I see you to-morrow?" One takes the Larkin-Street car, the other the Polk-Street. Both are tall. One has dark hair and large hazel eyes; the other has what was once golden hair, now sprinkled with gray, and large blue eyes, with an expression that says life's path has not all been strewn with flowers.

One who professes to know, says that the friendship existing between these two, which is so strong yet so undemonstrative in public places, was born of fire. On that awful October night in 1871, when Chicago for miles was in a blaze, these two ladies found themselves in a doomed building, with egress through the ordinary passages and doorways cut off by the approaching flames. With a calmness born of despair, they tore the bedding from their adjoining rooms into strips, tied and twisted them together, and fastened one end of the improvised rope to the bedstead, drawn close to the window. Which descended first is known only to themselves. As soon as she (the first) approached the ground so that a jump or fall would not be fatal, one at the window, nearly suffocated with smoke and flame, trusted her weight to the rope, but before she reached the bottom the flames had caught it. She jumped, or rather fell, into the arms of her companion, who stood with open arms to receive her. With a few slight bruises, they made a hurried exit through an alley to the next street, and found their way to the shore of the lake. When there, safe from the fire, the reaction came, and it seemed for a time that death stood waiting still to claim his own. Such storatives as could be procured were administered for all were of one family on the lake shore! At dawn toward night, when the flames had abated, a friend home was offered these two ladies. After months' illness, brought on by the terrible strain upon the nervous system, they were pronounced "out of danger" by the faithful physician, who all these long weeks had scarcely left the bedside of the one expected to minister to the other. During the delirious convalescent upon the fever, each thought the other had perished in the flames, and the shrieks and moans were almost beyond the endurance of those who tended them. The day came when the physician said they were strong enough to see each other. Such a meeting! Such an embrace! Since that scarcely a day have they passed without seeing each other. They are not demonstrative in public, but this little incident, which occurred a few evenings ago, will show how true is this singular bond: an evening party a lady spoke of one of these ladies (who was absent) to a friend by her side, in the presence of the other. At the sound of the name she looked calmly into the lady's face, and said, "Madame, Miss ——— is my friend!" The lady blushed, and stammered out an apology. When the Chicago fire becomes the topic for conversation, will soon be discovered, that these two ladies are sisters—they have quietly left the room. M. H.

The following interesting details of the workings of the "Gothenburg system for Regulating the Liquor Traffic" is from a letter to a gentleman in this city written by Ernest L. Oppenheim, United States Consul at Gothenburg, Sweden:

"Roughly stated, the system consists of farming the liquor traffic to a company. The profits—interest and a small percentage to meet the necessary increase of the business—go to the public charitable institutions of the city and district. There seems sort of poetic justice in thus making the source of crime and misery contribute to their alleviation. The chief benefit of the system is found, of course, in substitution of a closely watched monopoly for individual liquor-sellers. The employees of the company have no direct interest in increasing their sales, as are forbidden, under penalties of dismissal, to sell minors or to intoxicated persons. Under the free system there existed in Gothenburg a great number of low, filthy haunts, each a nucleus of debauch and squalor, many of them habitual resorts for criminals. These have been replaced by roomy, airy, comfortable apartments. Even the first-class restaurants and the drinking-rooms at the hotels must be licensed by the company, though they are 'run' by their own employees, paying a tax upon the amount of their yearly sales. The system seems to work well, and the arrests for drunkenness have greatly increased during the past three years."

Sir William Harcourt's house in London recently took fire and the roof was destroyed. He was returning from Birmingham at the time, and on arrival met at the station by his son, a youth of fifteen known as "Lulu," who said to him: "If you please you are not to stop for your luggage, because the house is on fire," perhaps one of the coolest remarks on record. An hour before, one of the servants sought his young master and said to him: "Sir, you please tell Lady Harcourt that the house is on fire?" The boy instantly ran up to the mother, brought down the baby, laid him on his mother's lap and then delivered his message—one of the prettiest and most thoughtful things ever done by a boy of age.

Mr. George H. Jessop, formerly of this city, written a new comedy-farce called Common Traveler, and has already disposed of it to Mr. M. Hill. Mr. Jessop has also written a comedy Mr. J. B. Polk, which he has named A Gentleman from Nevada. Both of the plays are said to be bright, fluent, full of plot and incident, and to contain several good eccentric characters. Those in the city who remember what a bright, genial fellow Jessop was while one of us, will be glad to hear of his success.

Mrs. John W. Mackay is solemnly reported to have engaged the exclusive services of one of the most celebrated Parisian dressmakers, so that there might be no duplicates of her gowns.

Our girls of the period have an amount of energy and ambition that would ensure a brilliant future to the relative possessed of as much. For instance, the foremost society girls of Washington, the Everts, for example, "no matter how late their engagements may have detained them the previous night," get up early in the morning to study art, music, languages, whatever branch their tastes lead them to cultivate; and the same is equally true of young ladies of whose lively lives our readers have a more accurate information than that promulgated by the Washington correspondent. The word "society" girl is, in this latter half of the nineteenth century, a title honorable to the holder.

All monthly prostration and suffering by ladies is avoided by using Hop Bitters a few days in advance.

Epitaphy.

Here lie the remains of Mary Jane Lowder, Who burst whilst drinking a Seidlitz powder, Called from this world to her heavenly rest, She should have waited till it effervesced.

FELLOWS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF HYPOPHOSPHITES will not only supply the waste going on in the brain, but will enable the mind to endure a greater tax than before. It will impart vigor and promote clear conceptions to the intellect. It will strengthen the nerves, and give power to all involuntary as well as the voluntary muscles of the body.

Waldpeters—"One loves most the first time, but not the second." Nestor Roguelan—"When a man takes a false step, her first care is not to cover herself, but to get other women to follow her." Alphonse Karr—"The woman who writes commits two wrongs: she increases the number of books, and diminishes the number of women." Shelley—"A lover sure that he is loved, cares no more to make himself agreeable."

The "Catalogue of Hats for 1880," issued by Herrmann, No. 336 Kearny Street, is the finest which an enterprising hatter has yet issued. Besides the regular trade illustrations, which are graphic and full, there are a number of miscellaneous woodcuts, designed to delight the imagination and sensibilities of the young people into whose household the catalogue finds its way.

Lafayette is all "tore up" over the appalling fact that the doctors claimed the body of a friendless barber under the late law, for scientific purposes. Time sets all things even. The barber may have been guilty of scraping the doctors' chins with dull razor, while they may now chalk out his veins and muscles, and deliberately take their sweet revenge.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had having been in his hands by an East India missionary the mulla of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Cough, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, to a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellow-men. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR AND MANAGER.

ard week and overwhelming success of the Comedy Season.

MR. SOTHERN

And his

COMPANY OF COMEDIANS.

Sothern in two of his greatest characterizations at each performance, to commence with the 3 act comedy entitled:

UNDREARY'S BROTHER SAM.

Followed by Mr. Sothern's Original Farce:

UNDREARY MARRIED AND SETTLED.

This Saturday afternoon at 2 o'clock.

is Saturday and to-morrow (Sunday) evenings for the LAST TIME.

In preparation,

DAVID GARRICK, HOME,

.....AND.....

THE HORNET'S NEST.

THE BALDWIN THEATRE.

OMAS MAQUIRE.....MANAGER.
M. EBERLE.....STAGE MANAGER.

POSITIVELY LAST NIGHT

Of the Engagement of

CLARA MORRIS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 13,

Last Clara Morris Matinee. Last performance of

RAYMONDE

And Positively Last Appearance of

CLARA MORRIS.

s (Saturday) evening, March 13, Complimentary Benefit of

MR. HARRY PEAKES.

The charming English Opera,

MARTHA.

Sunday evening, March 14,

THE TWO ORPHANS.

Monday, March 15,

THE TWO ROSES.

In preparation, FRENCH FLATS.

O'LEARY VS. WESTON MECHANICS' PAVILION. CLOSES TO-NIGHT AT 11 P. M.

STORES AND PRIVATE RESIDENCES.

PROTECT YOUR FRONT DOORS AND CARPETS FROM THE SUN
by getting

AWNINGS

—AT—

E. DETRICK & CO.'S, NO. 123 CLAY ST.

Call and examine our NEW STYLES for 1880. TENTS and CAMPER'S OUTFITS. Tents let for the Season.

WHITE LEAD.

Use "ATLANTIC" brand, the STANDARD NEW YORK LEAD. Stipulate for it in all your contracts. Do not permit any other to be employed.

Property owners are cautioned against the substitution by Painters of cheap, low-grade Leads, which, owing to inferiority, can be bought for considerably less than the cost of Atlantic brand.

C. T. RAYNOLDS & CO., Sole Agents.

French, Spanish, and Italian Conversational Lessons, practical method. Post-office box 1574.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery St.

Hackett & Dean, Dentists, No. 126 Kearny Street, Thurlow Block.

MORSE'S PALACE OF ART, 417 Montgomery St.

TRADE

ABC

MARK

HULLED, CRUSHED, STEAM-COOKED AND DESICCATED AMERICAN

BREAKFAST CEREALS.

A. B. C. WHITE WHEAT. A. B. C. WHITE OATS
A. B. C. BARLEY FOOD. A. B. C. MAIZE.

The most Nutritious, Palatable, and Easily Digested of all Cereal Food.

A Necessity for the Rich, a Luxury for the Poor.

CAN BE PREPARED FOR THE TABLE IN TEN MINUTES.

FOR SALE BY

C. J. HAWLEY & CO.,
LEBENBAUM & CO.,
BOWEN BROS.,

And all first-class groceries. The trade supplied by JOHN T. CUTTING & CO., Sole Agents,
407 Front Street.

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
COAL DEALERS.

Office and Yard, 14 Post Street.
Store Yard, 718 Sansome Street.

BRANCH OFFICE.

J. Middleton & Son, 419 Pine Street,
Opposite California Market.

All kinds of coal at lowest rates. Orders may be sent by telephone through any of the company's offices free.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., March 2, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 13, of Seventy-five (75) cents per share, was declared, payable on FRIDAY, March 12, 1880, at the office in this city, or at the Agency of the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, in New York. WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

THE COPARTNERSHIP HERETOfore existing between J. V. Hart and W. W. Phelps, under the firm name of Hart & Phelps, is hereby dissolved by mutual consent.
J. V. HART.
W. W. PHELPS.

Mr. J. V. Hart can be found at No. 27 Second Street. SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 10, 1880.

TIFFANY'S

HARLEQUIN PLAYING CARDS.
Unique in Design, and Beautifully Executed. A stock of these artistic productions can be found at the store of

EDWARD T. MARTIN,
5 Montgomery Street.

N. B.—"THE BOSS" PUZZLE will arrive shortly, "And Don't you Forget It."

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine.

SPRING STYLE HATS

NOW INTRODUCED BY

HERRMANN

THE HATTER,

336 KEARNY STREET,

Between Bush and Pine Streets.

BRANCH, 910 MARKET ST., ABOVE STOCKTON.

As regards beauty and number of styles, Herrmann still leads.

Spring Catalogues now ready. Send for copy.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—ESTATE
of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator, at No. 327 Pine Street, in the city of San Francisco, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California. HENRY A. NEWTON, Adm'r of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, Deceased.
Dated at San Francisco, March 10, 1880.
SAFFOLD & MEUX, Attorneys.

$72 a week. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address TRUUE & CO., Augusta, Maine.

HARLEQUIN PLAYING CARDS

"GEM" PUZZLE!

TWO PUZZLES IN ONE. SOMETHING NEW!

C. BEACH

107 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Etchings and Rare Engravings.

W. K. VICKERY INVITES ATTENTION to his large collection of the above, which includes fine original Engravings from the great Paintings of Europe. Rare Portraits, either in collection or procured. A large number of fine Etchings in stock. Hours 1 to 5 o'clock.
126 KEARNY ST. (Thurlow Block), San Francisco.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—MARCH STYLES.

Send Stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

REMOVAL.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.

Have removed to

UNION BUILDING,
JUNCTION MARKET AND PINE STREETS.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.,

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nicb. Ashton & Son's Salt.

C. P. SHEFFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

PACIFIC

SAW MANUFACTURING CO.

17 AND 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

SAWS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

on hand and made to order. Agents for C. B. Paul's Files.

Repairing of all kinds done at short notice.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

TABER, HARKER & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE
GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco.

H. L. DODGE.....L. H. SWEENEY.....J. E. RUGGLES

DODGE, SWEENEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS,

Wholesale Provision Dealers,

.....AND.....

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Nos. 114 and 116 Market, and 11 and 13 California Sts.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.,

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR

Street.

Liberal advances made on consignments.

J. C. MERRILL & CO

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON F. LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. . . . San.

THE OLD MAN GOES TO TOWN.

Well, wife, I've been to 'Frisco, an' I called to see the boys. I'm tired, an' more'n half deafened with the travel an' the noise; So I'll sit down by the chimney, and rest my weary bones, And tell how I was treated by our 'ristocratic sons.

As soon's I reached the city, I hunted up our Dan— Ye know he's now a celebrated wholesale business man. I walked down from the deepo—but Dan keeps a country seat— An' I thought to go home with him, an' rest my weary feet.

All the way I kep' a thinkin' how famous it 'ud be To go 'round the town together—my grown-up boy an' me— An' remember the old times, when my little "curly head" Used to cry out "Good-night, papa!" from his little trundle-bed.

I never thought a minit that he wouldn't want to see His gray an' worn old father, or would be ashamed of me. So when I seen his office, with a sign writ out in gold, I walked in 'thout knockin'—but the old man was too hold.

Dan was settin' by a table, an' a-writin' in a book. He knowed me in a second; but he give me such a look! He never said a word o' you, but axed about the grain, An' ef I thought the valley didn't need a little rain.

I didn't stay a great while, but inquired after Roh. Dan said he lived upon a hill—I think they call it Noh; An' when I left, Dan, in a tone that almost broke me down, Said, "Call an' see me, won't ye, whenever you're in town?"

It was rather late that evenin' when I found our Robert's house; There was music, lights, and dancin' and a mighty big carouse. At the door a nigger met me, an' he grinned from ear to ear, Sayin', "Keeds ob invitation, or you nebber git in here."

I said I was Roh's father; an', with another grin, The nigger left me stan'in' and disappeared within. Roh came out on the porch—he didn't order me away; But said he hoped to see me at his office the next day.

Then I started fur a tavern, fur I knowed there, anyway, They wouldn't turn me out so long's I'd money fur to pay. An' Rob an' Dan had left me about the streets to roam, An' neither o' 'em axed me if I'd money to git home.

It may be the way o' rich folks—I don't say 'at it is not— But we remember some things: Roh and Dan have quite forgot. We didn't quite expect this, wife, when, twenty years ago, We mortgaged the old homestead to give Rob an' Dan a show.

I didn't look fur Charley, but I happened just to meet Him with a lot o' friends o' his'n, a-comin' down the street. I thought I'd pass on by him, for fear our youngest son Would show he was askamed o' me, as Roh and Dan had done.

But snon as Charley seen me, he, right afore 'em all, Said: "God bless me, there's my father!" as loud as he could bawl. Then he introduced me to his frien's, and sent 'em all away. Tellin' 'em he'd see 'em later, but was busy for that day.

Then he took me out to dinner, an' he axed about the bouse, About you an' Sally's baby, an' the chickens, pigs, an' cows; He axed about his brothers, addin' that 'twas rather queer, But he hadn't seen one uv 'em fur mighty nigh a year.

Then he took me to his lodgin', in an attic four stairs high— He said he liked it better 'cause 'twas nearer to the sky. An' he said: "I've only one room, but my bed is pretty wide." An' so we slep' together, me an' Charley, side by side.

Next day we went together to the great Mechanics' Fair, An' some o' Charley's picters was on exhibition there. He said if he could sell 'em, which he hoped to, pretty soon, He'd make us all a visit, an' "be richer than Muldoon."

An' so two days an' nights we passed, an', when I come away, Poor Charley said the time was short, an' begged me fur to stay. Then he took me in a buggy an' druv' me to the train, An' said in just a little while he'd see us all again.

You know we thought our Charley would never come to much; He was always readin' novels an' poetry an' such. There was nothing on the farm he ever seemed to want to do, An' when he took to paintin' he disgusted me clear through!

So we gave to Rob and Dan all we had to call our own, An' left poor Charley penniless to make his way alone; He's only a poor painter; Rob an' Dan are rich as sin: But Charley's worth the pair o' 'em, with all their gold throwed in.

Those two grand men, dear wife, were once our prattling babes—an' yet It seems as if a mighty gulf 'twixt them an' us is set; An' they'll never know the old folks till life's troubled journey's past, An' rich an' poor are equal underneath the sod at last.

An' maybe when we all meet on the resurrection morn, With our earthly glories fallen, like the husks from the ripe corn, When the righteous Son of Man the awful sentence shall have said, The brightest crown that's shining there may be on Charley's head.

STOCKTON, February 12, 1880.

J. G. SWINNERTON.

The Press of San Francisco.

The Argonaut says if the daily journals of San Francisco would cease to report the speeches made on the sand-lots it would not be thirty days until no more speeches would be made there. This is probably true. Had the same course been adopted at first, Kearney and Kearneyism would long ago have been forgotten. But the managers of the San Francisco journals thought best to make reports of the performances on the sand-lots a feature of their papers, and at the same time two or three of them undertook to make prestige and coin by courting the good will of the scurvy crowd. Further, almost all the San Francisco journals were at the same time doing what they could to destroy the confidence of the masses in the public men and corporations of California. The Call and Bulletin waged unceasing war upon the Spring Valley Water Company and its officers; the Chronicle pursued, like a sleuth-hound, the mining industry of the coast, and daily pictured the leading mine managers and prominent Republican politicians as thieves. The effort to redeem the barren lands of Kern County, by means of costly irrigation works, was proclaimed a gigantic steal; the Central Pacific Railroad Company, while discriminating in a way to build up San Francisco and California, was declared to be an utterly soulless corporation; all the troubles of the poor were laid at the door of the Chinese, when it was apparent, all the time, that the men who waited for work were not competent to take the places of the Chinamen in case of the discharge of the Mongolians. And the final result was that a new Constitution was demanded, that the monopoly in lands might be broken, that a comprehensive system of irrigation might be inaugurated, that the money of the rich might be made to bear the burdens of taxation, that the railroads might be brought under the direction of the State, and that mining, through the help of the stock board, might be destroyed. The new organic law was prepared and ratified, though it does not interfere with the monopoly in land, though it is a check rather than a help to any irrigation project, and though, instead of curbing the power of the railroads, it in reality removes all restraints upon them. It does, however, seriously cripple quartz mining, and generally is such a menace to capital that, according to the Argonaut, sixty million dollars in money has been withdrawn from the State within a year past, while during that period not an enterprise of any magnitude has been organized in the State. This is what a dishonest press can accomplish for a State; this is what the so-called leading journals of San Francisco have done for California during the last three years. In lieu of sixty million dollars, already sent away, it has secured Kearney and Kallloch to California; in lieu of the general prosperity which was the rule there years ago, a hundred avenues of labor have been closed and not one opened, and while the men who have money dare not invest it the poor clamor for work. The power of the press has been wonderfully exhibited, but the result to the State is not entirely satisfactory, nevertheless. —Territorial Enterprise.

The Friend of Pericles.

All educated men, and many women, feel an interest in the character of Aspasia, who has been much misrepresented and generally misunderstood, even by students of Grecian history. She has generally been portrayed as what the Athenians called a hetaira, or woman of the outcast class, which she by no means was, and never was so considered. Recent investigations have placed the most remarkable woman of antiquity in a truer and better light. She was born at Miletus, a city of Asia Minor, situated in the northern part of Caria, but politically belonging to the Ionian Confederacy. She was, therefore, a foreigner, and the fact that in Athens all foreign women were equally disesteemed, and that their children, even when born in wedlock, were always regarded as illegitimate, has given her an odiously false reputation. She was not at all conventional, for conventionality demanded that Athenian matrons should remain within the seclusion of their own homes. After her marriage to Pericles, who had parted from his first wife with her own full consent, her house became the resort of all the learned and distinguished men—Socrates among the rest—of the polite capital. Her husband, whom the Athenian law, strictly construed, would not have recognized as such, was honored with the title of Olympian Jove, and she was designated as Juno. Her eloquence and familiarity with politics were extraordinary, and her great gifts naturally excited envy. The comic and other authors have done her great injustice. Hermippus, the comedian, profited by a brief irritation of the Athenians against Pericles to accuse his wife of impiety, but her husband's eloquence procured a triumphant acquittal of the malicious charges. Her influence over Pericles, though necessarily strong, has evidently been exaggerated, and even caricatured. Aristophanes has declared that she was the cause of the Samian and Peloponnesian wars; but Plutarch vindicates her from the calumny, and Thucydides, who furnishes minute details of the latter contest, does not mention her name in connection with it. Her marriage to Lycicles, a cattle-dealer, after Pericles's death, has been used to her disadvantage, and an attempt made to show her mental and moral decline. But Lycicles was a considerable personage, and cattle-dealing was not only a lucrative but a dignified and important calling in ancient Greece, and through her he rose to eminence. The life of Aspasia needs to be newly written.

The Empress of Austria.

The Empress Elizabeth of Austria has perfect health, the spirits of a child, and the bloom of youth, and it has come from her constant exercise in the open air and on horseback. Let our weak-nerved women, who shun exercise and God's pure air as an evil spirit, take note. Since the queen is at Godole, races and fairs have been established in the neighborhood, and she is one of the most frequent visitors and patrons. General Grant is not a better judge of a horse's fine points than she, and Rosa Bonheur does not take more pleasure in fine groupings of blooded beasts than does the Queen of the Magyars. Elizabeth is an early riser; five o'clock sees her at breakfast, and an hour afterward, no matter where she happens to be stopping, she is in the saddle or walking in the open air. Her habits of life are perfectly simple and regular. Not a woman lives less ostentatiously than she when away from the ceremonious court. She believes that her open-air exercises have kept her healthy. To the poor she is a silent and constant friend, and many are the noble acts that might be related of her majesty in every quarter where she has been. Yearly, however, her magnificent steeds—a stud of them, some forty in number—are hurried into the cars, and she is off for the foxes in Ireland. The fox-hunt over, she is back to the quiet of Godole. In the affairs of state she concerns herself not at all. This is her husband's business, and his ministers', and the whole Hungarian people say amen; for they would rather see their queen following the hounds than see her mixed up with the politics of the state. The pictures one sees of the empress, striking as they are, do not do her justice. The best of them are not half so beautiful as she. In appearance, she is everybody's ideal of a queen. She is tall and slender, and in every movement is grace and majesty itself. She has dark-brown hair, and more of it than any other woman in her empire—and Austria is famous, too, for the beautiful hair of its women. It is cut square, or "banged," across a square forehead, and fringed above a pair of splendid eyes as dark as itself. When flowing, this wealth of brown hair reaches nearly to her feet. Her complexion is fair, her face slightly oval, and her figure is excellent in its curves and outline. She knows how to dress, and how to wear jewels, and how to look even handsomer than she is. But when she would look very handsome she mounts her fine chestnut mare, lets her hair to the winds, gives her steed the rein, and then everybody thinks if there is a Diana anywhere any more it is this empress—this grandmother—dashing down the Prater.

VIVE LE CONFORT.

Monsieur had the audacity to marry on an income of eight hundred francs. After several months of house-keeping, his employer conceived the excellent idea of doubling his salary, thereby making him the happiest of husbands. Madame belonged to that category of women who, by reason of a frivolous education, have become frivolous in character, in style, and in manner. She was one of those pastry-eating creatures who daily gorge themselves with sweets. She was as incapable of buying a chicken, without paying double the price, as of sewing a hutton on a garment. Embroidery, music (and such music!), with fashionable drives and the daily promenade, engrossed all her attention. What a congenial couple! Ah! I forgot the baby, but he was so small, nobody ever saw him. He was with his nurse. All this by way of introduction.

SCENE I.

Monsieur (alone, and with an air of satisfaction).—"Curious! Very curious! Excessively curious! My wife is a perfect treasure! What luck, when all my friends are so badly married, to have won such a pearl! Economical, careful, and with that elegant manner which is so flattering. I often say to her:

"What! another new dress?" "Why, no," she replies, kissing me; 'it is an old one—a very old one—that I have had made over; it cost in all only twenty-five centimes.'

"The fact is, I have never seen a woman dress so well on nothing. A chiffon here, a ribbon there, and one would swear he saw a Worth creation."

"The number of people jealous of my happiness is marvelous. In the street everybody looks at us—at my wife with admiration, and at me with envy. But that is pleasing. I have a wife who keeps my house in luxury and comfort. She is a fairy. What science in marketing! Mon Dieu! here is her account book:

	Francs.	Cms.
Two pigeons.....	1	1
Trimming fur hat.....	2	35
Butter for the month.....	3	80
Bread, salt, and vegetables for month.....	3	50
One pair of boots.....	6	95
Butcher's bill for month.....	32	00
Matches.....		10
Quarterly bill from Mlle. Longplume (dressmaker).....	27	50
One chicken.....	1	15

"Now, I ask if there are two women in the world capable of buying a chicken for fifteen cents? What a treasure!" (kissing passionately the account book.)

SCENE II.

Enter madame, very richly dressed. "Bon jour, my dear. What! another new toilet?" "Why, no. Don't you recognize it? It is the one I wore the day after our marriage. I have brightened it up with some trimming, at twenty-nine cents a yard." Monsieur (to his imaginary public).—"There, what did I tell you?" (To Madame).—"My dear, you are a treasure (kisses). But I must go." Madame.—"Good-hye, sweetheart."

SCENE III.

Justine.—"Madame, a seamstress." Seamstress.—"Madame, I called to collect the bill for Mlle. Longplume." Madame.—"Have you the bill?" Seamstress.—"Yes, madame, here it is." Madame.—"Very well; two thousand seven hundred and fifty francs." Correct. Come back in two hours, and bring me another bill, receipted, for 27 francs 50 centimes." Seamstress.—"Yes, madame." (Exit.) Madame seats herself at a writing desk:

"MY DEAR BIG BABY:—How disagreeable these dressmakers are. They are always wanting money. Here is the bill for the two last toilets you so much admired. Send immediately the amount necessary to settle it. A thousand kisses from your little pet, AMANNE."

"Justine, take this note immediately, and bring the answer." (Exit Justine.)

SCENE IV.

Enter Monsieur, with a preoccupied air. "Singular, very singular! Excessively singular! I have just seen in a show window a dress exactly like my wife's. That is not especially singular, but the price—970 francs! That is the singular part of it. True, she does get everything at a low figure, but is it possible that she got that for twenty-nine centimes a yard?"

SCENE V.

Enter Justine. "Madame! Madame! here is the answer. (Interrupting herself.) Monsieur! I thought madame was here."

Monsieur.—"The answer—what answer? Give it to me and leave the room." (Justine departs.)

Monsieur, after having read it, falls stupefied into an arm-chair. "Ah! the miserable creature, to deceive me thus—and I so trusting, so good, but not rich enough—I shall kill them." (Growing calmer.)

"How stupid I am! What do I gain by making a fuss? Nothing. What have I to lose? Everything—my ease, my comfort, my good table, my pretty wife, who, after all, only acts for the good of her house. Decidedly best to say nothing about it."

Resealing the letter. "Justine!" (Enter Justine.)

"Here is the letter that I took from you a few minutes ago. I have not opened it. Give it to your mistress as soon as she comes in." (Alone and rubbing his hands.) "Comfort is such a nice thing. It seems to me I recognized the handwriting of my employer. Singular! Excessively singular!" —From the French—of course.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1880.

"DOMESTIC"
THE LIGHT RUNNING
SEWING MACHINE.
It is PERFECT in every feature, and COMPLETE in all its details. It embodies all of the MODERN improvements that are of PROVED VALUE.
J. W. EVANS,
No. 29 POST STREET (MECHANICS' INSTITUTE BUILDING).

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

HOME INDUSTRY
MUSIC
THE LONG
HEMME & LONG
PIANOS
FIRST CLASS PRICES LOW
311 N. DUPONT ST., S.F.
CHICKERING
PIANOS AT COST.
WANTED!
Nos. 1 (March 25), 4 (April 15), of Vol. I of the ARGONAUT for 1877. Twenty-five cents will be paid for each of the above numbers at the ARGONAUT office, 522 California Street.

English and American BICYCLES.
KEPT IN STOCK
And imported to order. Prices only $5 over those in Boston.
LORING GUNNINGHAM
No. 206 Sansome Street, office of Macondray & Co., S. F.

CHOLLAR MINING COMPANY.
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth day of February, 1880, an assessment (No. 3) of fifty cents (50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of March, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the thirty-first (31st) day of March, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

POTOSI MINING COMPANY.
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth day of February, 1880, an assessment (No. 3) of fifty cents (50) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of March, 1880, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on THURSDAY, the first (1st) day of April, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.
By order of the Board of Directors.
W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING
Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth (8th) day of March, 1880, an assessment (No. 62) of Two ($2) Dollars per share was levied upon the capital stock of the Corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the tenth (10th) day of April, 1880, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the twenty-eighth (28th) day of April, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.
E. L. PARKER, Secretary.
Office, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

W. F. SMITH, M. D.,
527, 313 BUSH STREET.
Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.

OFFER EXTRAORDINARY!
THE
Automatic
THE ONLY LIGHT RUNNING AND NOISELESS SEWING MACHINE made. It has no Bobbins, no Shuttle, no Tension. It is sold wholly upon its merits.
We hereby offer to parties who have owned an Automatic for Six Months and are dissatisfied, a New Machine of any other make, on even exchange. No other Company dare make such an offer.
WILCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
124 Post Street, San Francisco, and 361 Twelfth Street, Oakland.

CHICKERING PIANOS
Perfect in tone, durability, and finish. Over 55,000 in use. Legitimately the Standard Piano of the world. Our new Patent Upright pronounced the very best in use. Sold on easy terms. Exclusive and only agency, No. 23 Dupont St., San Francisco.
L. K. HAMMER, AGENT.

The ARGONAUT is Printed with Ink Manufactured by
SHATTUCK & FLETCHER,
520 Commercial Street, San Francisco.

THE CALIFORNIAN.
— THE —
NEW WESTERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
A SPLENDID NUMBER FOR APRIL.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
CONTENTS:
SAND. Chapter IV.....J. W. GALLY.
THE STORY OF AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND.....R. E. DESMOND.
THE HERMIT OF TREASURE PEAKS.....SAM DAVIS.
PALLAS.....CHAS. H. PHELPS.
SHEPHERDS AND SHEEP-HERDING II.....ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.
AT AGUA TIBIA.....AGNES M. MANNING.
AMERICANISM IN LITERATURE.....EDGAR FAWCETT.
CAPTAIN MOLLY.....E. M. LUDLUM.
THE ETHICS OF SUICIDE.....ALBERT WILLIAMS.
OUR OPHIDIAN FRIEND.....JOHN VANCE CHENEY.
NOTABLE AUTOGRAPHS.....POURQUOI.
RUBY.....J. H. S. BUGELA.
ARIZONA.....JAMES WYATT OATES.
A GLIMPSE OF THE UNUSUAL.....W. C. MORROW.
OUTCROPPINGS.....
About Pets.—Waiting for the Galleon.—Pencil Shavings.—Ike Gives his Opinion on Total Depravity.—A Stroll Through Chinatown.—A Vaquero's Love Song.—Under the Smilax.—Winter Rain.—The Voice of the Sea.—Elsie.

One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
SEE THE APRIL NUMBER OF THE CALIFORNIAN!
FOR SALE BY NEWSDEALERS AND THE TRADE GENERALLY.

THE ONE PRICE DRY GOODS HOUSE,
42, 44, AND 46 THIRD STREET.
KID GLOVES A SPECIALTY.
6-Button, first quality.....$1 75 | 3-Button, first quality.....$1 40
4-Button, first quality.....1 50 | 6-Button, second quality.....1 50
4-Button, second quality.....$1 25
Lace-top Lisle and Silk Gloves, from 50 cents and upwards. Our Kid Gloves are the best fitting and most durable.
PEIXOTTO & SILVERMAN, Importers.

LADIES
All know how unsatisfactory Foreign Black Silks are in both cutting and wearing shiny. We give you a reliable test below that will give you a perfect guide in selecting silk material for actual wear.
JOHN D. CUTTER & CO.'S
RAVEN BLACK AMERICAN SILKS are now being retailed by the following established firms:
Doane & Henshelwood, San Francisco.
M. W. Henderson, Portland, Oregon.
O. A. Hale & Co., San Jose.
H. C. Taft & Co., Oakland.

THE TEST.
Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulterated, and will either cut or wear shiny.
Cutter's Samples for the trade.
ALLEN C. REID & CO.

BISHOP KIP'S WORKS.
Arrangements have been made with
C. BEACH,
BOOKSELLER,
107 MONTGOMERY STREET,
By which he will keep a full supply of the
WORKS OF BISHOP KIP,
So that members of the diocese can procure any copies they may desire. The following is the list:
THE LENTEN FAST.
DOUBLE WITNESS OF THE CHURCH.
CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS IN ROME.
JESUIT MISSIONS IN NORTH AMERICA.
HISTORICAL SCENES IN OLD JESUIT MISSIONS.
CHURCH OF THE APOSTLES.
UNNOTICED THINGS OF SCRIPTURE.
THE CATACOMBS OF ROME.
We would particularly commend to Church people, at this season, the first on this list, THE LENTEN FAST, as containing a full account of "the origin, history, and manner of observance" of the Holy Season through which we are now passing.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.
A. J. PLATE & CO.,
No. 325 Montgomery Street,
Odd Fellows' Hall.

J. A. HUNTER, M. D.,
No. 321 Sutter Street, devotes Special Attention to
Catarrh, Deafness,
Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, and all ailments of the Throat, Lungs, and Heart.

SCHOOL AT DRESDEN.
MRS. AURELIA BURRAGE, LATE
Principal of the School at 850 Van Ness Avenue, has opened a School for American Girls in Dresden. Terms $50 per month for board and tuition. For particulars apply to Miss West, 1002 Sutter Street, or address Mrs. Burrage, care of Dresden Bank, Dresden, Saxony.

DANIEL GIOVANNINI,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
dealer in Wood, Coal, Charcoal, and Coke, 816 Pacific Street, between Stockton and Powell.
Charcoal Depot.—Charcoal for sale in lots to suit, from 1 to 10,000 sacks.

The Argonaut.

VOL. VI. NO. 12.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 20, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

ANCIENT AND MODERN SNAKES.

"He mowed all round, at length did feel
A pizing serpent bite his heel."

—Old Yankee Ballad.

It is time for the Argonaut to awaken to the scientific needs of the hour. Mr. Huxley of England, as well as other profound philosophers and naturalists, in different spheres of the scientific world, are after snakes. I, too, know something about them. I know nearly as much about snakes as I do about ants; and I hope your readers have not forgotten all of what I told them upon the latter subject some months ago.

I have been acquainted with a great many snakes—in the grass and otherwise—but I never yet knew one to love him. Which is pious prejudice. The prejudice is pious because we get it from Moses. Moses was a snakist. What he did not know about the snake of his times was hardly worth putting into the Five Books.

According to the great law-giver, the Divinity, with whom he was on intimate speaking terms, was also an expert among serpents. Why there was need for this to be so the man of much meekness does not explain. It is plain, however, that he wishes us to think that a display of snake lore was potent in overawing the unregenerate Egyptian and recalcitrant Israelite. His stories, however, are not consistent, which lack of consistency leads me to infer that he is the father of that style of literature, now somewhat popular in the American newspaper, known as "snake stories;" for in these "snake stories" there is a painful absence of the element of truth, which has, so to speak, a strong Mosaic odor.

In his first snake story, the son-in-law of Jethro tells us: "Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made." At this epoch in the Mosaic reptilian era, it appears that the serpent could stand up, and express himself in choice Hebrew; that he could talk elegant small-talk to a young woman who had no clothing whatever upon her beauteous person. This latter is good evidence that, even if he could stand up and converse well, he was no man. I shall offer no testimony in proof of my statement—that he was not a man—but I appeal, after the manner of a pull-back orator at a woman's rights convention, to every member of my sex. Am I not right, gentlemen? Of course I am.

The next scene in the history of the Mosaic snake is where he started the Horticultural Society, and delivered the first—the original—inaugural address, entitled "Fruits and Fruit-trees of Eden." His address was a success, and had a powerful effect upon his audience. In fact, without the least profanity, I may say he raised hell. After his polemical performance he was stricken to the earth with these memorable words, to wit: "Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life"—which proves beyond a doubt (in the mind of Moses) that if the serpent was not a snake previous to this curse, he became so at once and forever. It also helps to prove the doctrine of "evolution," because if the serpent—being a snake—ate dust for a constant diet in the time of Moses, he has evidently evolved since. The snake of to-day will not, does not, and can not eat dust. He will not eat it because he has no taste for it; he does not eat it because he don't; he can not eat it because he depends upon a slippery salivary swallowing apparatus in deglutating his dinner, in which dust is about as needful as sand in the eye.

Also, I would like to say, though I don't know much about her, that "lovely woman," too, has evolved since the day of the memorable scenes above referred to, because in the supposed climate of Eden, which we may say was north of thirty degrees (30°) north latitude, and therefore not tropical, no woman of this era, or of any era since Herodotus bought vegetables in the market gardens of Babylon upward of twenty-three hundred years ago, could be induced or ridiculed into going about, shivering, naked in the cold—Eden or no Eden—while her husband was boss of such a ranch as Adam had. Moses may have understood serpents, but he did not sabe women. Or else—the doctrine of evolution is true, and women and snakes, who according to Moses used to be on intimate terms, are living proofs that it is true.

The next appearance of the Mosaic reptile is in an interview which Moses says he had with the principal Divinity of the Mosaic mythology. The Divinity desired Mr. Moses to enter the land of Pharaoh and institute the second-hand jewelry and ready-made clothing business by inducing the women of Israel to borrow all the good clothes in Egypt, as well as all the precious ornaments of the inhabitants. But Moses said:

"What's the use? They don't believe a word I say about divinities."

"What is that in thine hand?"

"A rod."

"Cast it on the ground."

So Moses did cast it on the ground, and it became a serpent; and "Moses fled from before it." Which does not argue well for the courage of Moses at that period of his life. But the Divinity said:

"Put forth thine hand and take him by the tail."

Now, as the man Moses had left his shoes at the foot of the hill, we are compelled to infer that he was barefooted, as there is nothing said about socks; and for a barefooted man to sail in and wrestle with a snake on the top of a hill, it is risky business; though I have done it myself with a rattler, in the dark, when he came into our mining cabin. But Moses pranced round till he got the serpent by the tail, and lo! "It became a rod in his hand." Now, with all due deference to Moses, the holy book of Exodus, and all the Children of Israel, I venture to say that I can find a snake out in the sage-brush country upon which no Israelite can play that game, even though backed by all the divinities in all the books. I arise on behalf of the snake. Justice is my plea. Let us have the facts. "A decent respect for the opinions of mankind" requires us to give the snake a chance, if we are going to call him into history.

From the top of Mount Horeb, the snake figures all the way, more or less, through the sacred writings of the Israelites and Judeans. From Genesis to Revelations he wriggles and winds, in and out, through the whole plan of salvation, then turns to an old dragon and sinks into the bottomless pit. It is a picturesque history, but it does not agree with the facts. From reading it in our youth, and hearing it at all times, we derive much of our fear and horror of many innocent reptiles. So, also, from it we get false, useless information regarding the creeping things in nature.

A snake is not the most subtle nor the most cunning of beasts. A coyote can give him many points and then discount him.

Once near Cortez, Nevada, in the sage-brush, I watched, with a strongly magnifying field-glass, a coyote and a rattlesnake. If a rattlesnake, on the approach of danger, can have time to crawl into a bush, or in between stones, he will do so; and there, coiling himself into a pile from which he erects his head and tail, he will usually, but not always, work his rattler vigorously; but he will always in such cases be ready to strike, rattle or no rattle. I say "to strike," for snakes do not bite, in any proper sense: they strike like a whip-lash—only big end foremost, and the stinger, instead of being the lash-point, is two sharp, slightly hooked fangs in the roof of the snake's mouth, well forward, under the point of his nose.

Now the snake, when coiled up, is somewhat like a steel watch-spring—when he chooses to be—and, also, he has a twist-and-untwist motion in his power, whereby he can throw himself out straight. This ability to straighten himself instantly, in any direction, is about all the springing or jumping power I have ever been able to get out of him: on level ground or down grade of course he might do a little better; up-grade, vice versa. The instant after a snake strikes he is helpless until he can coil, or partly coil, again.

Knowing these facts, I was watching the coyote. He was busily tracking a jack-rabbit, as a pointer tracks quail, and he was eager and excited in the chase, when suddenly, from no cause that I could see or hear at the distance I was from him, he jumped about three feet up into the air, and when he came down he had given up the rabbit, and was stepping about very warily around some object in a clear, naked, gravelly space among the sage-bushes. Changing my position a little, I could see a large rattlesnake coiled, with his head erect, near the middle of the clear space. The coyote walked around and around him, stripping his white teeth at him, jumped high over him, pretended several times to leave him and go away, but was careful each time to halt behind a bush and watch the snake. Evidently the canine wanted the reptile to straighten out and start off on his travels. But the snake seemed to feel his danger, and kept carefully in coil. At length the coyote seemed to conclude that the rabbit he was hunting when the snake interrupted him was now far away, and he must needs have snake-steak for supper; so he sat down on his haunches opposite the snake, just beyond reach of what he carefully calculated was the snake's full length; and there he remained for some time, teasing and taunting the reptile by various feints of attack and other manoeuvres. He would strike inside the limits, first with one paw, then with the other; then he would stretch out his head, strip his brilliant white teeth, turn up his nose, and sniff contemptuously at the snake, which, with arched neck and carefully poised head, followed with its cold round eyes every movement of the enemy. At last, becoming impatient, and desperate perhaps, the coyote drew as near to the serpent as it was possible for him to do with any hope of escaping the stroke of the fangs. Here he stood, on all four of his feet, with nerves strung to a high pitch. The snake still arched its neck, quivered its rattles, and eyed the coyote. The coyote would make a sudden feint, which the snake would parry in his different style. This long-range combat of eye-to-eye they kept up for some time. At last the coyote leaped—not upon the snake, as he pretended he was about to leap—but high in the air. The snake struck with full force for the place where the coyote had stood, but the beast was not there at that instant; and in the next instant, before the reptile could re-coil, the coyote had him by the neck and the life was shaken out of him. In about three minutes more the snake was in the digestive apparatus of the coyote. At least I saw him torn to pieces, and when I arrived on the spot there was every evidence that he had been eaten.

The much-vaunted subtlety of the serpent in the Judean mythology points steadily to some squirming reptilian country as being the birthplace—or "second-birth" place—of what we call our religion. This former country of vermicular horrors was, possibly, inhabited by a race akin to the

Jim-jams, and may have been upon some rank and verdurous island or continent, prior to the Glacial Period; but, most likely, the ante-Mosaic remnant of it was located in the snaky portion of what is now known as the British Empire, to wit, India. Tropical Africa is also said to be a snaky-iferous region, but there is not so much animal venom to the square foot anywhere as there is in India. Thousands of people die yearly in that country from "snake-bites," and the happiness of man there has ever been very much marred by the society of crawling things; hence the ancient faith of India is full of snakes and the subtlety of serpents. Egypt also comes into history with a heavy delegation of traditional crawlers. And, as we probably get our fearful faith from India and from Egypt, the serpentine mythology of Moses is accounted for; but that does not account for the sacred subtlety of the snake. Egyptian literature is full of snakes. Everybody can certainly have read or seen the engravings of the serpents in the ancient coronets of the Nile. Everybody has read or heard of Mrs. Ptolemy and the asp; which is a very ancient story, a very salacious yarn, and therefore pawed all over by the poets. I care little about old Mrs. Ptolemy, but I am interested in the asp, hence I give the true story, as follows:

She put him to her bosom,
Then she pinched his little tail;
The serpent gave a wiggle
And the sorceress a wail,
And then she cried "O Antony!"
And turned exceeding pale—
But the serpent died instant,
While the harlot went to jail.

The story shows conclusively that Mrs. Ptolemy (née Cleopatra), although a student of reptilian sorcery, as Moses was, did not sabe real snakes; because, when a small serpent is sufficiently calm and amiable to permit itself to be placed on a bad old woman's bosom, or upon a bare, warm arm, it is not going to strike that bosom or that arm. Small snakes only strike large game to save themselves from being trampled on, or otherwise crushed. The error arises from the false supposition that a snake can bite like a dog, or other incising or masticating animal. A snake swallows everything whole—he bites nothing. Some snakes have small sharp teeth, inclining backward, like fish teeth, for the purpose of preventing the saliva-slimed morsel from slipping out of the grasp and suction of the swallowing power; but these little teeth are not poisonous, even in the most venomous mouth. It is the striking fangs only which contain poison; and these, when not in use, are neatly folded back flat in the roof of the mouth.

But all this does not account for the vaunted and sacred subtlety of the serpent. Does it? No! Why? Because the serpent is the stupidest and least subtle of all beasts. He has very little more brain in proportion to his weight than has an angle-worm. The great talent of the snake is fear; hence his love of solitude and silence.

All the talk we hear and the gush we read about the charming power—the fascinating force—of the serpent, is error. We read of how the bird flutters around and hovers over the uplifted head of the coiled serpent, drawing nearer and nearer and nearer to the fascinating eye of the deadly charmer, until struck at last by the poisonous fangs it falls a victim to its shining foe. Oh, it is a horribly beautiful story, but it is all bosh.

The brave little bird is fighting for her family, or else is trying to get her eggs or her young and tender darlings out of the cowardly maw of the reptile which has swallowed them while she was away from home attending to business. That's what's the matter. The little bird knows full well where her dear ones have gone to, but she does not know they can never be restored to her; hence she fights the snake until he is compelled to strike his fangs into her to protect his own eyes. Sometimes he must strike often before his desperate little foe is defeated, because, aside from the protecting mail of feathers, nearly all birds have a trick of darting a wing across the breast for a shield.

I sold a subtle old sow to the butcher because, although a valuable breeder, she was a hen-charmer. She would gobble up a hen's little chickens, and then, when the hen fluttered about her nose, she would calmly keep her hog eyes on that hen, until the hen, becoming more and more reckless in her matronly grief, came near enough to be caught and torn to pieces and eaten. From this point of view, snake fascination is a very thin humbug.

If any snake wants to prove to me that he is a charmer let him try it on a hog, or a coyote, or a "road-runner," or a blue crane, or—or—or—a skunk.

Of course I do not delight in destroying these sacred and thrilling fictions, but we all owe some duty to the truth, and nothing gives me more pleasure than to do my duty, when I feel like it.

I do not wish to do the reptile any injustice, for, certes, he has been enough slandered already. He has some virtues. He swallows rats and mice. I am afraid the rats and mice will differ with me in parading this among his virtues, but no one writer can please all classes. He does not drink; therefore he is oblivious to the wine interest of California. When you say to your friend: "I don't drink," it is not good form for him to respond: "Neither does a snake." Perhaps a water-snake may take a nip once in a while, but other serpents are total abstainers, so far as I can tell. A rattlesnake will make himself and interesting fectly comfortable in the geographical middle of the dryest desert in America; but so will lizards and horned-toads.

I have roughly dissected the heads of many sorts of snakes, and am led to believe that, while there are not many which are what we call poisonous, still they all have striking fangs. I have heard that some of the constrictors have no striking fangs, but I do not believe it. I have seen the black-snake of the Ohio Valley—which is a constrictor—strike just as other snakes do. In fact, I never yet saw a healthy, hungry snake of any kind, in the United States, that failed to strike when aroused; therefore he has something to strike with.

In one sense, all the snakes that ever I saw are poisonous: that is, they all have some medicine which helps them to capture their prey. In some, perhaps it is merely a narcotic power, like that of hypodermic injections of morphia, and affects only certain animals.

Comparatively few United States snakes are poisonous to man, or to man's intellectual friend, the hog. In a great number of species known to me I can remember only the following: the rattlers, the copperheads, the moccasins, the cotton-mouths, the (so-called) adders, and a nameless little dark-brown snake in the sage-brush country.

I wish to note here that the tone of color in all reptilian life depends upon and is affected by the colors of its environment. Lizards, snakes, etc., inhabiting the black lava-beds incline to blackness; those in the sage-brush valleys to drab or ashen color, though they may be the same kind of reptile in both situations. And this change of tone has led the hasty, superficial observer to find more kinds of reptiles than really exist.

There are three varieties of rattlesnakes in the United States, and perhaps no more in both Americas. First, and most widely disseminated, the banded (belled) dusky-yellowish rattler, found almost anywhere on dry upland south of about forty-six degrees north latitude, growing in rare instances to exceed four feet, but usually from two to three feet long. He is the deadliest of the lot. Next, the diamond-backed rattler, which does not differ from the banded one, save that his back is a little darker, and has a line of rhomboidal figures running the length of it. Both of these are slow, sluggish, and clumsy. The diamond-back is said to grow larger than the banded, but, in observations made at intervals from the Alleghenies to the Sierra Nevada, I have found them about equal in size. The third rattler is the massasauga, or little black rattler of the prairies, in Iowa and elsewhere.

The sound of the rattle differs with age and size. It is a sort of metallic whizz-z-zizz-z-z-z-z-z-z-z-z. If the snake is small, the key-note is higher and thinner; if large, it is heavier and harsher; but in all cases he has a poor ear for music who can not know it ever after he once hears it. Like the thrill of an earthquake, it is always a surprise.

They are all poisonous, but the massasauga is not necessarily deadly, particularly where the patient can get a bottle of whisky and apply himself, or herself, judiciously to that part of the bottle where the cork has been. Neither is the stroke of the larger varieties always fatal; it somewhat depends upon the time of year, state of the weather, condition of the patient, and very largely upon the courage and coolness of the person struck. A bad scare helps the poison to act, hence perhaps the Dutch-courage quality of alcohol becomes remedial. Some tribes of Indians, and all tribes of swine, bury themselves as far as possible in swamp muck when "snake-bit." The Texan and the plainsman put a little pile of gunpowder on the wound and fire the powder, then get roaring drunk if there is any intoxication to be found.

I knew a gentleman who, near Hiko, Lincoln County, Nevada, found a large rattlesnake in a desert place where were neither sticks nor stones to bruise its head with; so that gentleman followed the Mosaic style, and bruised the head of the rattler into the earth with his heel. He thought he had killed the snake, and, putting his foot upon its body, he essayed to pull the rattles off its tail. I hereby warn the reading world that the rattles of a snake are not easily pulled off. Instead of pulling off the rattles, this gentleman drew the snake's head from under his foot, whereupon the reptile made a half coil and struck him on the hand. He clapped his hand to his mouth and sucked the wound; but he had a sore on his lip, and next day he joined the Silent Majority. The moral of this story is: Be sure that the business end of a rattlesnake is very dead before you fool with the other end.

I saw an Indian woman who had some time previously been struck on the hand by a banded rattler. She had rallied from the first shock of the poison, but her whole forearm was one mass of ulcerous sores. She said she would get well "bi-um-bi," but I never saw her again. The copperhead I have not seen since I left "the States," but as I remember him he is a short snake, two feet to three feet long, of a dull, dusky, reddish-spotted color, with a flat, triangular skull of cupreous hue. He is a sluggish, hissing serpent; so little inclined to move that I once came near picking one up from among the leaves and grass, in Ohio, when I was reaching about for a stick to throw at an owl. Had I picked that serpent up, these remarks probably never would have been written, for the copperhead is generally a dead-shot. The small dark-brown snake in Nevada, of which I have spoken above, resembles a copperhead, and may be of that species modified by environment, though it is much smaller; yet the Shoshone Indians say it is more deadly than the rattler. In fact, I incline to the belief that all the snakes which we call adders, vipers, upland moccasins, and copperheads, including the little brown snake in Nevada, belong to one family, modified by environment. The cotton-mouth and water-moccasin belong to the Southern States, and are found in swamps and low grounds.

It is a vault of the societies to prevent cruelty to animals that the rattlesnake always gives warning before he strikes. Another error. He generally does give warning, but often he does not. I have come upon rattlesnakes in the desert, and have annoyed them with tufts of bunch-grass, coach-whips, or long-handled shovels until they would strike blindly at the empty air all about them, but never a rattle could I get out of them. Others again would rattle when they heard hoofs coming within twenty yards of them. A friend and prospecting "pard" of mine was the owner of a lively young sorrel pack-mule. This friend and myself, and two men and the mule, were steering one summer night by the stars, through the sage-brush in the desert. The mule was a length ahead, when a rattlesnake in front of him sprang its whizz-z-z-z. That mule snorted and jumped to one side, where he stirred up another whizz-z-z-z. Then he went to "bucking"—not because the "bucking" would help the case any, but because that was his style of meeting all difficulties. Then there was music under the silent stars in that lonely desert. Such a kicking, and bucking, and snorting, and whizz-z-z-zing, and scattering of picks and shovels, pans, blankets, and grub, I have never witnessed before or since. It was the only time I ever fully realized what the Western hunter means when he shouts, "Wake snakes and come to judgment!"

So endeth the lesson.

J. W. GALLY.

An Ancient Letter.

The following is a copy of an ancient letter written by Richard Harlshorne, a prominent man and a large proprietor of land in East Jersey, addressed to his friend in England. The descendants of the Harlshornes are still landholders in Middletown. Captain Harlshorne, of San Francisco, is a descendant of the writer of this letter. The farm is still in possession of the family; the adjoining property was owned and is still in possession of the Throckmorton family, one of whom, Mr. S. R. Throckmorton, is now a resident of our city. We reprint this letter as affording a curious glimpse of those primitive times.

"DEAR FRIEND: My love is to Thee, and thy wife, desiring your welfare, both inward and outward; and that we may be found steadfast in that truth which is saving, for the welfare of our immortal souls. And, dear friend, the desire of my soul is, that we may know true love; and I should be glad to see thee and thy wife. I have partly a remembrance of thy wife. And I have thought of thee many times with tears in my eyes. The Lord has done wonderful works for me; unto Him I return thanks and praises, who is God over all Blessed forever. Now Friend, I shall give thee some information concerning New Jersey, but time will not permit me to write at length. Thee desireth to know how I live. Through the goodness of the Lord I live very well, keeping between 30 and 40 head of cows, and 7 or 8 horses, or mares to ride upon. There are seven towns settled in this Province, viz: Shrewsbury, and Middletown, upon the Sea Side, and along the River side, and up the creek there is Piscataway and Woodbridge, Elizabethtown, New Coake, and Bergen. Most of these towns have about 100 families; and the least 40. The country is very healthful. In Middletown, where I live, in 6 years and upwards, there have died but one woman about 80 years old, one man about 60, a boy about five years old, and one little infant or 2. There are in this Town, in twenty-five families, about 95 children most of them under 12 years of age, and all lusty children. The produce of this Province, is chiefly, Wheat, Barly, Oates, Beans, Beef, Pork, Pease, Tobacco, Indian corn, Butter, Cheese, Hemp and flax, French beans, Strawberries, Carrots, Parsnips, Cabbidge, Turnips, Radishes, Onions, Cucumbers, Water-mellons, Mushmellons, Squashes; also our soil is very fertile for Apples, Pears, Plums, Quinces, Currans red and white, Gooseberries, Cherries, and Peaches in abundance, having all sorts of green trash in the summer time. The Country is greatly supplied with Creeks and Rivers which afford stores of Fish, Pearch, Roach, Baste, Sheephead, Oysters, Clams, Crabs, Sturgeon, Eels, and many other sorts of fish that I do not name. You may buy as much fish of an Indian for half a pound of powder as will serve 6 or 8 men. Deer are also very plenty in this Province. We can buy a fat Buck of the Indians much bigger than the English Deer for a pound and a half of Powder, or Lead or any other trade equivalent; and a peck of Strawberries, the Indians will gather, and bring home to us for the value of 6 pence.

"Our Beef and Pork is very fat and good. The naturale Grass of the country is much like that which grows in the woods in England, which is food enough for our Cattle; but by the water side we have fresh meadows, Salt Marshes. We make English Bread and Beer; besides we have several sorts of Drink. In travelling in the country, and coming to any House, they generally ask you to eat and drink, and take Tobacco, and their several sorts of drink they will offer you as confidently as if it were Sack. Here are abundance of Chestnuts, Walnuts, Mulberries and Grapes, red and white, our Horses and Mules run in the Woods, and we give them no meal Winter nor Summer, unless we work them; but our cows must be looked after. Our Timber stands for fences about the land we manure; we plough our Land with Oxen for the most part. Husbandman here and in old England is all one, making most of our utensils for Husbandry ourselves, and a man that has three or four sons or servants that can work along with him will down with Timber, and get corn quickly. The best coming to this country, is at the Spring or Fall. We make our soap and candles, and all such things ourselves. In the Winter we make good fires and eat good meat; and our Women and children are healthy; sugar is cheap, venison, Geese, turkeys, Pidgeons, Fowls and Fish plenty; and one great happiness we enjoy, which is we are very quiet. I could give thee more information concerning this country but time will not give leave. In short, this is a rare place for any poor man, or others; and I am satisfied that people can live better here than they can in Old England, and eat more good meat. The vessel is going away, I have no time to copy this over; therefore take the sense of it. My Love salutes thee. Farewell. RICHARD HARLSHORNE.

"New Jersey, Midleton, 12th of the 9th Month, 1675."

Somebody is always making trouble for mankind. Now an epicure says that oysters are not fit to be eaten until they are at least three years old, and we suppose we'll have to look into every oyster's mouth before we swallow it to see if it has arrived at the proper catable age.

If men who belong to churches would not be so particular about carrying their umbrellas into the pews with them, but would leave them out in the vestibule, they would show more faith in those who attend the same church. As it is, there is little encouragement to a poor man to try and accumulate an umbrella.

CHIPS FROM OTHER BLOCKHEADS.

"James, my boy," called Mr. Tilden to his private secretary, "James, my boy, isn't it about time the announcement was made in all the newspapers that I am about to lead to the altar a beautiful and accomplished young female of Kalamazoo or some other seaport? And see here, James," called Mr. Tilden after the retreating secretary, "suppose you add this time, by way of variety, that the World has been bought by the bonanza Californians in order to advocate the nomination of Judge Field."

A house that's founded on a rock
Will stand;
A ship that's founded on a rock
Will strand;
If you were found dead on a rock,
We'd think
It owing to the rye and rock
You drink.

One of the children, who had an open Bible on his knees, said: "Well, I should like to sit on the roof all my days and have nothing to do, just like Joseph in Egypt." Very naturally the attention of the family was excited by the remark, and the boy was asked to explain himself. He turned over the leaves of the book, and triumphantly read the passage which aroused his envy: "And Pharaoh put Joseph over his house." "There," he said, "that's what I would like, to sit on the roof and have a large salary."

The man who invented "Boom"
Should be flung in a cold, dark room,
And over his head
A blanket spread,
As a hint of his coming doom.

The Senate of Maryland has passed a bill prohibiting swearing by fine and imprisonment. Maryland's debt is pretty big, and it was necessary to do something to wipe it out. But unless there comes a freezing rain, so that a man may sit on the icy sidewalk on the back of his head, the sum accruing from fines will not be large enough to erect new jails to accommodate the offenders.

Which he was a small heathen Chinese,
With a grin that was frightful to see;
His labor bore fruits
In the shape of cheroots,
So quite up to snuff was Ah Lee.
"The Chinese must go," was the cry;
No heathen cigars would they try;
"Me fixee Kear-nee,"
Said that wicked Ah Lee,
"Bet makee sand-lottee man buy."
And his grin it was frightful to know,
And his queer little eyes were a show,
While, as sly as a fox,
He labeled each box
Of cheroots with "The Chinese Must Go."

A wag says of a toper: His nose has passed the rubicund

A London journal, in an endeavor to describe a good neighbor, says: "His chief merit lies in his unobtrusiveness, and we love him less for what he does than for what he leaves undone. A childless married couple or a maiden lady are generally good neighbors, provided they are not fanciers of pet animals. Lonely widows may be desirable, but there is always the risk of their having grandchildren to stay with them during the holidays!"

And shall old Tilden dye?
And shall old Tilden dye?
Then twenty thousand bald-head men
Will know the reason why!

"Procrastination is the best card in the pack. If I'd gone in at my usual hour to dynamite, my obituary would have pleased the country ere this."—Czar of Russia.

She archly bent her queenly crest,
And gently rubbed her shapely nose—
Then said: "We girls do not propose
To pop the question. It were best
Such timid, bashful, backward beaux
As thou art, should fain hearts disclose,
And speak the words that interest."
Then, blushing to the very roots
Of hair as Auburn as the town
Where once a Seward gained yennow,
And where they clothe in striped suits
The men on whom the law doth frown,
He muttered: "Tow the sweat pours down—
She makes me tremble in my boots."
Seeing his plight she 'gan to pout—
When he, most wretched coward, said:
"I had a notion in my head,
But have forgot what 'twas about."
Quoth she: "Of all the fools 'twas read,
Or seen, or heard, or quick or dead,
You are the sickliest!" He popped—out.

Charles Reade says that all children should be taught to have presence of mind. But haven't they got it? Catch a boy in the sugar-box, and isn't he looking for flies?

Let's muzzle
The puzzle
Inventor.
Let's take him
And shake him
Instantly.
Let's break
All his bones,
Let's make
What he owns
Of intellect twirl
In perpetual whirl,
As our Mind power
Is hurt by this mean
Eternal
Gem puzzle machine.

The boarding-house keepers are comparing notes. "It appears to me, Mrs. Niggles, that your chicken salad is never found out—leastways, I never hears none of the boarders complain." "Well, you see," explained Mrs. Niggles, "I allus chops up a few feathers with the veal."

Krupp has invented a needle-gun warranted to kill two hundred men per minute. In case the American Association of Amateur Poets carries out its expressed intention of holding a convention in Chicago next summer, Mr. Krupp's business will receive a boom.

THE END OF THE SEASON.

Remember you? Pray, would you have me believe
You mean all you say when you look at me so?
You are fair, O Louise! you're a siren, I know—
Do you lure me with words that are meant to deceive?

You simulate wonder and wounded pride—
Are you less cruel than you would seem?
If one should choose to forget a dream
Can one be sure that its spell has died?

I will not look in your treacherous eyes—
Maddening sweet, and fair as a star!
Where the sky leans down to the waters far
I gaze, and I speak as my thoughts arise.

What hour, do you think, of the dead, dead past
Is stamped most deep on my memory?
You dream perhaps of some hours when we
Were walking or dancing, and time went fast—

Of some rose-scented night, when you leaned so near
I thought your lips were the reddest rose;
Or that other time, when I held you close
As the boat went down, to still your fear;

Or that moment you lay within my arms,
With wave-wet tresses and tender brow,
Knowing me then as well as now,
But softly fluttered with womanly charms.

Not so, Louise! it is none of these—
Their spell was broken one bitter day
When I learned your faithless treachery.
For you had a lover across the seas!

I did not tell you I knew it then,
But I watched you closely with scornful eyes;
And I gave, for your sweet words, short replies;
And you called me a cynic above all men.

But women like cynics. I, too, grew wise,
And fenced you and foiled you at your own play;
But I hated the hour and I cursed the day
That ever I looked in your maddening eyes.

Your lover will cross the seas some day,
And clasp and kiss you unrelucting—
A change in the face he left this spring—
You are unworthy, but go your way!

Not all the time that is yet to come
Could restore my faith in your constancy.
He never will know beyond the sea,
And I shall have vanished ere he come home.

Now, would you have me remember yet
The annals of these few months we've passed?
The summer has come to an end at last—
Remember? O God, that I could forget!

NORTH COLUMBIA, March 8, 1880. MAY N. HAWLEY.

CUPID—DECEASED.

CHAPTER I.

CUPID.—In the planet Earth, January 1, A. D. 1900, of an overdose of German metaphysics, Cupid, beloved son of the late Mars and Venus, aged 5,904 years.

The above notice appeared in the morning papers. The world read it at the breakfast table. Cupid died! How absurd—the idea is simply preposterous! And yet there it is in black and white. There can be no mistake as to identity; there is but one of the name who could answer to the above description. This truth being incontrovertible, no argument is advanced. So, amid loud lamentation, weeping, and wailing, the announcement is accepted as a fact.

A pall falls upon the earth. From pole to pole, from sea to sea, the dark shadow extends. This beautiful planet of ours—this lovely world, of which we vain mortals are so justly proud, which we are so loth to leave—has been metamorphosed. Wiseacres, who ere now have decided the nation's weal or woe, shake their heads over the problem of the day. They are nonplussed. How to remedy the evil—which has shaken the earth to its very centre—is the question which now agitates the public mind. Valentine & Co. have closed their doors. This is the first disastrous result of Cupid's untimely death. The failure of this firm, of world-wide celebrity—a house whose branches have extended to the uttermost parts of the earth—has thrown thousands out of employment—men, women, and children; artists, limners, poets, stationers, printers. And this is but the prelude to an awful dirge, to be chanted on the world's grand stage.

The keynote of harmony has been lost—without it art is dead, poetry hushed. Signs of communism prevail. Such a revolution is threatened as the world has never yet witnessed—disaffection which originates in the higher ranks of life. In a frenzy of despair musicians throw down their instruments—they can not interpret their masters, much less follow in their footsteps. The natural result follows: melody dies—not at once, but by slow degrees fades into a lost art. Then comes a terrible crash in the business world. The ranks of the unemployed swell into a vast army—from the north and the south, from the east and the west they muster. And belles-lettres? The patrons of this art, Calliope and Erato, are absolutely deaf. They can not be bribed, coaxed, or threatened. Love alone can appeal to their hearts, and Love is dead.

The disciples of Clio are more fortunate, inasmuch as she furnishes them with facts; but what are facts without fancy? what is history without romance? and romance is love. The publishing houses are desperate, the great presses are starving. "More, more!" they cry—with avidity they swallow the meagre supplies. Finally, they resort to new editions of old works; but this pitiful subterfuge fails. The public libraries can more than supply the demand, for the mystic spell is broken which once wove an indefinable charm around the creation of fancy.

"Tis Love that makes the world go round."

Unless the "Sisters Nine" can be appeased, for it is evident that their wrath has been kindled, the world will stop in its orbit. Euterpe, Clio, Erato, and Calliope are obdurate; can Melpomene and Thalia be conciliated? Man can at least drown his sorrows by escape from the realistic into the ideal world. But who is hazardous enough to portray the passions and emit love? Who will undertake to interpret Shakespeare and exclude Cupid? Alas! there are none. With tears in their eyes newspaper reporters plead with Terpsichore. In vain—the lady will venture nowhere without her bold archer. Philosophy could still hold her own, but Science deems "discretion the better part of valor," and insists that, for the present, she hold her peace instead. Strange! in all Germany no man will claim to have administered the dose by which Cupid met his death.

CHAPTER II.

Something must be done; and the wise men of the world meet together in solemn conclave. Mark Twain, who is present, suggests that the money subscribed some twenty years ago toward Adam's monument, which fund has all this time been accruing interest, be diverted from its original object, and appropriated for a monument to Cupid. Thus a double end will be attained—the wrath of the gods appeased and work provided for the unemployed, for with the amount in hand a monument could be erected to the god of love equal in size and magnificence to the Great Pyramid itself. This motion prevails. A committee is appointed to make the necessary arrangements. Now comes under discussion the location of aforesaid monument. "Aye! there's the rub." Each committee-man claims the honor for his own country, the result of which discussion is, that either the whole project must be abandoned, or the corner-stone divided into several parts; the latter not being altogether feasible, the motion is reconsidered and rejected.

A member of the council now rises and addresses the assembly:

"The case stands thus: After a period of nearly six thousand years, we have succeeded in creating for ourselves a purely material world. Love, being essentially spiritual, it has been done away with, as having no part in our philosophy. The heart, as a vital organ, is absolutely necessary to our state of being, but what have we to do with its passions? The little god, who from time immemorial has held sovereign power over the universe, which power has been recognized alike in palace and cottage, whose sway has been undisputed since he 'ruled the court' in Paradise, has been deposed. After all these years we suddenly awoke to a realization that King Cupid was a tyrant. We have elected unto ourselves a new ruler, King Midas; but we find the latter a harder task-master, for his partiality has sown jealousy and discord; whereas King Cupid distributed his favors alike to rich and poor, to high and low. 'Tis the old story: 'Oh, Jupiter, take away King Stork, and restore to his penitent subjects King Log!' Now we have no positive proof that Cupid is dead. There is certainly no doubt that he has left us, frightened away by a cold philosophy. The question is, where has he hidden himself? It is my opinion that he has been spirited away by the Muses.

"Be it, therefore,
"Resolved, That an embassy be sent to Mount Olympus, in search of the missing god.

"Resolved, That the ambassadors be selected from all the world's great powers, to carry to the Muses (being women) a propitiatory offering: the incense of flattery.

"Resolved, That, woman being more accessible under the influence of a lete-a-lete, each ambassador select his Muse, and direct his whole attention to her exclusively. Thus each one being busy about her own concerns, danger of interference from the other eight will be obviated."

These resolutions adopted, the following selections were made: England, with characteristic modesty, claimed both history and the drama; but, objection to this being offered by the other powers, she finally decided upon Clio, leaving Melpomene to France. Here arose another discussion. Melpomene and Thalia always go hand in hand; to separate them now would create dissension between the fair sisters, and that must not be. There is no help for it—France must be allowed two ambassadors. Greece, in virtue of her ancient fame, chose for herself Calliope. Germany's right to select Euterpe was unquestioned, as was also America's choice, Erato. Italy claimed that without Urania she was powerless. Terpsichore fell to the lot of Spain; but Polymnia there was none to claim—it was she who held "the last chord," the key-note of Harmony. And here Ireland claimed a voice: "Be jabers, an' it is meself as will restore peace to the wurld!" A laugh was here raised at Paddy's expense, but it was unanimously agreed that he would be paying a lawful debt.

CHAPTER III.

Reception day on Mount Olympus. The nine ambassadors pause on the threshold of the celestial world. For once the lords of creation are abashed, and well they may be. Here they stand, vain mortals, at the fountain-head of literature, art, and science. The Muses, shrewdly suspecting their errand, cast around them the spell of silence. So astonished are they at finding themselves bereft of audacity that it is a question whether they would ever have recovered speech but for the opportune arrival of the clerk of the weather. Him Ireland accosts: "An' it's purty warrum ye've bin after making the climate for us below!"

The spell is broken. In a hody the ambassadors approach the Muses. Without difficulty each recognizes his "ladye fayre," and straightway applies the "flattering unction." The charm succeeds. First, resentment dies and is succeeded by rancor. Assisted by Momus, the god of wit and ridicule, the sisters drive the petitioners to the verge of despair. Now they deliberate; but in spite of the adage they would not have yielded had not Cupid (whom these ladies really had hidden) seen before him too fair a field to resist. If the truth must be told, the little god had wearied somewhat of heavenly bliss, and was all too ready to return to the mundane sphere from which he had fled in affright. But preparatory to taking his departure, he bends his bow and aims his arrow direct at Germany's heart—this in revenge.

Fatal arrow! it hits the mark, passing thence into the heart of Euterpe. Again he takes aim—

"Insatiate archer! could not one suffice?
Thy shaft flew thrice"—and thrice, and thrice!

SAN FRANCISCO, March 12, 1880. S. R. H.

Edith and Mabel had just put their dollies in their little crib when Edith, with the expression of one who has had a weight lifted from her shoulders, said: "There! I'm thankful we've got the children to bed! We shall have a little peace now!"

OUR BITTER HALVES.

There will be some fun for the wicked this summer. The sight of a Boston woman arrayed in one of the new surtout overdresses with open seams, and struggling up Winter Street in an east wind which blows each breadth in a different direction, will be enough to reconcile one to losing the winter ulster.

The Jersey City Journal asks: "Why should it be necessary to kiss pretty women in order to preach the gospel?" It isn't. There would be fewer editors and lawyers if it were.

"Lenten sewing classes" they are called. The ladies meet and are supposed to sew for the poor, from seven to nine in the evening. Then gentlemen are admitted, and the dancing begins. A "class" of this kind will undertake to clothe one poor child during the season—excepting the flannel petticoats; those are too coarse. The gentlemen "chip in" and buy them.

Lavender would like to know why it is that the simplest of women can rout any book agent in a minute, while the most clever of men will struggle for an hour with the loe and then yield.

Rosalind May, in her fashion letter, says "the cashmere craze is extending even to stockings." We shall probably see more of it during the windy March days.

An unexpected pleasure. Beloved but unresponsive fair one—"So glad to see you, Cousin Charley, and so kind of you to drop in! Now, you'll sit a couple of hours with grandmamma, won't you, just to amuse her while Arthur and I take a stroll in the garden? And be careful to speak as loud as you can, for she is very, very deaf, poor dear!"

New York city seems to have produced a new and startling point in the much-discussed question of female industry. This new departure is the detection of a band of garroters formed of black women! It is not as bad as it might be, though. They only choke and rob; they do not kiss.

She was my idyl while I wooed,
My idol when I won,
My ideal when, in after years,
Ways idle she had none.

A magazine writer says he has been astonished to find "how superior women are to men in the vividness of their mental imagery." Women are sometimes surprised at it themselves. When a mouse makes its debut in a room containing three or four ladies, there will ascend frightful shrieks, and the fair creatures will clamber on the chairs and tables in a highly sensational manner, all the time imagining that the innocent little rodent is a monster with eleven heads, fiery eyeballs, and horns a foot long. A man's mental imagery is not equal to such things unless it is assisted by whisky.

The glory of a woman is her hair.

A town-bred philosopher says he can not understand why a woman always ducks her head when she crosses the street. If he had ever seen a hen run into a barn, he wouldn't make such silly remarks.

"So many San Francisco girls forgot to stamp their valentines that hundreds went to the dead-letter office." This is untrue. Frisco girls sent no valentines this year.

Mrs. Livermore informs the Chicago Tribune that all the "cream of the East has moved West," and all that remains in Massachusetts is "the two extremes, the best and the stupidest." This mixture of metaphors may befog some of those that are left until they can not tell to which class they belong.

A Frenchman has discovered that the skulls of men are, on the average, one hundred and seventy-two grammes heavier than those of women. This will explain why the average man will permit a woman to stand in a street-car, and why, also, so many of them marry and compel their wives to support them. Their skulls are not only heavier, but thicker; but no more so than that of a mule.

He is a brute who doubts the patent fact that originally woman was man's sequel.

"What do you think of my new shoes, dear?" said she, the other evening after tea. "Oh, immense, my dear, perfectly immense!" said he, without looking up from his paper. Then she began to cry, and said she thought if he thought her feet were so dreadfully large he needn't tell her of it.

There was a young man of Morenci,
Whose mind was so stupidly dense, he Could never see why
"She" played "Sweet By and By"
When she wanted the youth to go hence, see?

A husband and a wife the other day were overheard conversing with a friend on the street cars as follows: She—"Husbands do get so inattentive and careless after they've been married a while." He—"Yes, you run and call and halloo and whistle when you want to catch a street car. When it stops, you take it easy and dismiss the anxiety from your mind."

Minerva won the prize on the horse question, but a little girl discounted the old lady in the very first sentence of her composition on the all-absorbing topic of "The Cow." She opened: "The cow is the most useful animal in the world except religion."

Cetewayo's three daughters are now on exhibition in London. Their names are Unolala, Unqmadloza, and Unozendaba. There is some talk of—

Every man who has become President of the United States has been elected during a leap year. This is something for the girls to wonder over.

Belle—"This holly in my hair wants a little relief—it's too red." Aunt—"Well, why not put in a sprig or two of mistletoe, dear?" Belle—"Nonsense, aunt; why, I should have all the young men kissing me!" Aunt—"Indeed, no, my dear; they'd do nothing of the kind. I've

The fan is an indispensable article for no, know any longer how to blush.

THE BIRTH OF SAINT PATRICK.

[An Irishman, who is not ashamed of his own country, nor resolved upon the destruction of this, sends us the following rhymed version of a good story, which he has "copied from memory."]

On the eighth day of March it was, some people say,
That Saint Patrick at midnight he first saw the day;
While others declare 'twas the ninth he was born,
And 'twas all a mistake between midnight and morn;
For mistakes will occur in a hurry and shock,
And some blamed the baby, and some blamed the clock;
Till, with all their cross questions, sure no one might know
If the child was too fast, or the clock was too slow.

Now the first faction fight in old Ireland, they say,
Was all on account of Saint Patrick's birthday;
Some fought for the eighth, for the ninth more would die,
And who wouldn't see right, sure they blackened his eye!
At last, both the factions so positive grew
That each kept a birthday—so Pat then had two,
Till Father Mulcahy, who showed them their sins,
Said, "No one could have two birthdays but a twins."

Says he, "Boys, don't be fighting for eight or for nine,
Don't be always dividing—but sometimes combine;
Combine eight with nine, and seventeen is the mark,
So let that be his birthday." "Amen," says the clerk.
"If he wasn't a twins, sure our history will show
That, at least, he's worth any two saints that we know!"
Then they all got blind drunk—which completed their bliss;
And we keep up the practice from that day to this.

THERE BE LAND RATS AND WATER RATS.

In the discussion and settlement of the water question there are certain things that must not be lost sight of. We take it for granted that there is no power that can compel the Spring Valley Water Company to extend its works, enlarge its mains, or increase its reservoir supply. Conceding, then, for the purpose of this argument, that the Board of Supervisors has the legal right to fix rates to private consumers, and to compel the company to furnish the municipal government with free water, and that the Board is disposed to fix these rates at an inadequate and unremunerative price, it will be most assuredly conceded that there is no power in either the State or the municipal government that can compel the company to additional expenditure in order to enlarge its works or increase its catchment of water. Then the time will come, if it has not already come, when the city will have a scant supply of water: not enough to give its customers what they demand, and to give the city what it needs for sprinkling streets and parks, flushing sewers, and for fire purposes.

Of course the consumers must have, for domestic, manufacturing, and other requirements, what they pay for. We may endure the inconvenience of dust; we may risk epidemics from uncleansed sewers; we may submit to the discomforts of uncleanness. But how about fires? We demand of our "conscript fathers" what answer will they make to the demand for water to put out conflagrations? Water is not over-abundant for that purpose now; the mains, in some places, are too small. The President of the company, Mr. Howard, and the Engineer, Mr. Schussler, admit this scarcity and the existing danger; and, like prudent men, they desire to remedy it.

It will cost an additional million of dollars to place the twelve million (daily) gallons of the Crystal Springs Reservoir at the disposal of the present means of distribution. From two to four millions of dollars will bring the reserved capacities of the Calaveras Valley to San Francisco—enough to supply a city of a million of inhabitants. By the expenditure of say twelve millions more, making the Spring Valley Works cost in the aggregate twenty-eight millions, enough water can be introduced into San Francisco to supply a city of five millions of inhabitants. The Croton Water Works of New York have already cost forty million dollars, and it is now proposed to expend the additional sum of fourteen millions to secure the water demanded by the population of that city, which is now only three times greater than that of San Francisco.

The present necessity—which the character of our seasons and the material of our buildings demand—is enough water, to give us reasonable protection against fires. Our seasons are wet and dry. Our long series of months with diurnal winds, and no rains, renders this city above all others liable to a devastating conflagration. We have a hundred million dollars of insured property. We have another hundred millions of property uninsured. It is perhaps safe to estimate the value of the buildings and personal property of this city at three hundred millions of dollars. In view of this fact, considering our diurnal winds and the presence in our midst of a turbulent and dangerous criminal element, we ask our Supervisors if it is prudent or wise for them, by any illiberal and pinching process, to binder the operations of this water company, and prevent it from enlarging and extending its works as fast as the growing population and increasing necessities of our city demand?

The demagoguery that harps about "dear water," "water more costly than bread," "water the free gift of God," is worse than arrant nonsense. The facts are—and all the sophistry of the Bulletin and all the logic of the office-seeking swimmers can not hide them from the sensible people of this city—as follows: First—The city owns no water works. Second—The Spring Valley Water Company does. Third—The revenue from water rates must be remunerative, or the company will not increase its capacity of supply. Fourth—The city demands increased capacity to protect it from fire. Putting aside all other arguments against the justice, honesty, and policy of fixing unremunerative rates, of putting the whole burden upon seventeen thousand consumers, there is no answer to the broad proposition that the city needs more water for fire purposes, and that there is no place to get it except from the Spring Valley Water Company—that there is no way to get it except by a contract to purchase water of that company, and no mode under the sun to force the company to add to its capacity and means of distribution, except by paying interest on the increased expenditure incurred by the company for that purpose.

We have not the figures at command to show how many hundreds of thousands of dollars are annually paid in San Francisco for fire premiums, most of the profits of which go to the fire insurance companies. If there was more abundant, these premiums, now so exorbitantly high, would be lowered, and saved to our citizens. European and Eastern cities pay very much less than we do to be insured against fire risks. Fire insurance is one of the heaviest burdens that our property-owners pay. It is next to taxes, and in many instances insurance costs more than taxes. It is the height of folly, it is the madness of fools, to spare any reasonable effort, at any reasonable cost, to protect this city against fire. It is unjust to impose all this burden upon consumers. It is just and fair to fix a tax, either upon hydrants, or by some other device, to make all the property within the city and county pay its just proportion. The man who owns an unoccupied lot upon the San Bruno road, on the border line of the county, should pay a water tax, to protect San Francisco against fire, and to preserve its health, promote its comfort, and enhance its beauty; because without San Francisco his lot would be valueless. The Spring Valley Water Company's works have cost more than sixteen millions of dollars, as is asserted by disinterested and competent experts, who have given the matter careful investigation; and when we consider the amounts expended by other cities, and measure them by comparative results, this may be regarded as a very reasonable expenditure. We must consider, also, that like the base of a pyramid or the foundation of a structure, large amounts have been laid out that do not make a show.

We could not find a better simile to illustrate this idea than in the dam at the Crystal Springs reservoir. At its base it is a thousand feet in width, solidly anchored to the bed-rock; costly in structure, but decreasing in width and diminishing in cost as it increases in height, till the upper part is only forty feet in width. Yet the last and most inexpensive foot of dam holds as much water as the same height at its more costly base. The company has struggled through all this costly beginning, and laid deep and broad the foundations of a water system for San Francisco that will endure for all time. The completion of this system; the connecting the Crystal Springs reservoir with its present works; the bringing in of the catchment of the Calaveras Valley; the bringing in of the various other streams of the Santa Cruz range, all work into the present system; and while the expenditure of sixteen millions of dollars does not give an over-abundant supply of water to three hundred thousand people, the expenditure of twelve millions more will give water in abundance to a city the size of London, with its four millions of inhabitants.

These are matters which the Supervisors must consider. It was this line of argument that induced the early promoters of the water enterprise to invest their money. They saw a growing city. They looked forward to its increase of population, and its growth in wealth. There will be in time one million of people, from among whom this company will have not seventeen but seventy thousand consumers—not three hundred millions of wealth, but three thousand millions to tax. Then these burdens will fall lightly on all. London has six water companies that have cost many millions of pounds sterling, and has by no means as good water as San Francisco has. In view of the health, beauty, comfort, and safety of this city, there should be such an arrangement between the contracting parties as will enable the water company to have a fair compensation for the use of its property, and enable it to extend and enlarge its works as fast as the growth and expansion of our city demands. It is to the last degree important—it is, in fact, indispensable to our safety—that these negotiations should speedily place our town beyond the danger of destruction by fire. A sweeping conflagration, with half the city in ruins, would not be an agreeable spectacle to anti-monopoly demagogues, to the Bulletin readers, or to those Supervisors who, in fear of political or journalistic criticism, made the calamity possible. This is a question of dollars and cents, of precaution and safety. The Supervisors are the agents of our people. They are negotiating for the benefit and protection of our property. They are the agents, not of the sand-lot mob, that has no property and does not wash; not of the political demagogues who make pretense of serving the public but who pay no taxes; not of the Bulletin which has a personal quarrel with the water company; but of the seventeen thousand water-consuming tax-payers, and that class of citizens which is interested in cheap insurance, because it has houses and merchandise to insure against the risk of fire. We confirm our figures and argument by the following extract from an official communication by Mr. Charles Webb Howard, President of the company, to the Chairman of the Fire and Water Committee of the Board of Supervisors:

"The company has never valued its property and works at less than the amount they have cost, viz: sixteen million dollars; and it fails to see why it is not entitled to an income on the said cost of at least nine per cent. per annum, in addition to its operating expenses, estimated for the coming year at three hundred thousand dollars. It is true that in 1877 the company proposed to accept from the city for its property and works the sum of thirteen and one-quarter millions. That proposition was not based on the company's estimate of their value, nor was the sum named at all commensurate with the real value. It is a notorious fact that at that time the city government had assumed an exceedingly hostile attitude toward this company, by reason of which fact other kindred water schemes and projects were originated and temporarily popularized, and, under powerful influences, offered for sale to the city. In a spirit of natural selfishness and business rivalry, the projectors of these schemes made seemingly liberal proposals for the city's favor. The city had even taken decisive steps for the acquisition of one of these properties, to wit, the Blue Lakes. The situation assumed a threatening aspect to the prosperity of the Spring Valley Company. Under such circumstances, it was but a step of prudence on the part of this company to assent to a sale involving a loss, rather than to risk the result of hostility which might utterly destroy or at least seriously cripple it.

"Since that time this company has expended in further improvements fully half a million dollars. The outlays of this company, amounting to fully $16,000,000, have been judiciously and prudently expended in laying the foundation for supplying water to the present and future city of San Francisco. For that purpose it has acquired resources which will enable it, at comparatively small cost, to adequately supply five millions of people with pure, fresh water, equal if not superior in quality to that supplied to any city in the world. An expenditure of $16,000,000 has thus been incurred in supplying the first three hundred thousand people. An additional expenditure of $4,000,000 in extending the present works will make them fully equal to the requirements of a million inhabitants. Thus, $20,000,000 will cover the cost of the water supply to a million people in San Francisco. To reach that result, and for a like number of inhabitants, New York City expended $40,000,000; and that city is now advised by its Board of Public Works that an expenditure of $14,000,000 is necessary to provide for the demands of the city in the immediate future. The Spring Valley Water Works can, by an expenditure of $12,000,000 in still further developing its resources, making, say, $28,000,000 in all, amply supply five millions of people; while New York, in meeting the necessities of three millions, will have expended $54,000,000."

THE TRUTHFUL STORY-TELLER.

"Deadwood?" said the stranger, putting down his half-eaten slice of lemon-pie and taking a long pull at the milk, "I went there when the first rush was made for the Hills. Rather a rough town, the first lot, you bet; more wholesome now. When I got there I was dead broke—didn't have a dollar; didn't have a revolver, even, which a man'll often need out there worse'n a meal's vittles. I was prob'ly the only man in the Hills who didn't carry a firearm, an' I was some lonesome, I tell you. The only weapon I had—I'm a blacksmith—was a rasp, a heavy file, you know, 'bout eighteen inches long, which I carried down my back, the handle in easy reach, just below my coat-collar. Understand? Like the Arkansaw man carries his bowie-knife. I'm not exactly a temperance man. I just don't drink an' don't meddle with any other man's drinkin'—that's all.

"One day—I hadn't been in Deadwood more'n a week—I was sittin' in a s'loon—only place a man kin set to see any society—when a feller come in, a reg'lar hustler, with his can full and a quart over. Hed a revolver on each side of his belt, an' looked vicious. Nothin' mean about him, though. Askt me to drink. 'Not any, thank you,' sez I.

"Not with me! Me! Bill Feathergill! When I ask a tender-foot to drink I expect him to prance right up, an' no monkeyin'! You h-e-a-r me!"

"Well, when his hand went down for his revolver, I whipped out my old file quicker'n fire'd scorched a feather, an' swiped him one right across the face. When he fell I thought I'd killed him, an', the s'loon fillin' up with bums, I sorter skinned out, not knowin' what might happen. Purty soon a chap in a red shirt came up to me. Sez he:

"You the man as ke-ard Bill Feathergill? 'Cos, ef so be as you are, ef you don't want ev'ry man in the Hills to climb you, don't try to hide yourself. The boys is askin' fur you now."

"It struck me that my friend had the idee; so I waltzed back, and went up and down before that s'loon for nigh three hours. I'd found Bill wasn't dead, and was bad medicine, but it wouldn't do to let down. Purty soon I see my man a-headin' for me. His face had been patched up till it looked like the closing-out display of a retail dry-goods store. There was so little countenance exposed that I couldn't guess what he was a-aimin' at, so I brought my hand back of my collar an' grabbed my file.

"Hold on there, hold on," sez he; 'gim me y'r hand. I'm friendly—I've got nothin' agin yo', not a thing; but—you'll pardon my curiosity, but what sort of a d-d weapon was that, stranger?"

The dead-beat permits nothing to get ahead of him except a funeral procession. Yesterday, a seedy-genteel, who seemed to be greatly excited, rushed into a place on Woodward Avenue, and wildly inquired if they had a telephone there. Being answered in the affirmative, he rushed to the instrument, threw his hat on the floor, and called out:

"Hello! Central office—for heaven's sake, hello! hello!"

"Is there a fire?" asked the merchant.

"Fire! keep still—wait! Oh, heavens! why don't you answer me? Hello! Central office! Ah, I have them! Connect me with sub-office on Duffield Street—quick—life depends!"

"Somebody dying?" asked the merchant.

"Keep still—for your life, keep still! Ah! sub-office! Connect me with No. — Cass Avenue as soon as you can! Hello! hello! Mary! Ah, it is her! Mary, your mother has been run-over by a street-car on Jefferson Avenue, and will die. I'll bring her up in a carriage. Get everything ready. Send James for the doctor—good-bye!"

"Somebody hurt?" asked the merchant.

"Somebody hurt? No! Yes! I'm half crazy! I must get a carriage. Ah! left my wallet at the office down the river! I'll tell Mary—no, I'll ask you for two dollars until I come down after dinner."

The merchant looked at the fellow for a few seconds, and then walked to the telephone. The sub-office was saying:

"Who was getting off that rigmarole to Mary, and who was Mary? We don't connect with No. — Cass Avenue! If you don't stop your nonsense, we'll cut you off!"

The merchant turned to overhaul his customer, but shabby-genteel had slid. Perhaps he took his poor mother up on a wheelbarrow.—Detroit Free Press.

"Hi, sonny," said a keen-looking Chicago business man; "what are you looking for? Let me see that letter."

"No, I can't let you have that letter; there's bonds in it."

"Why, I've been waiting for you this half hour, to bring me those bonds—I bought 'em of what's his name."

Upon this the lad took out a big envelope marked "J. Smith, Esq., Present;" in the upper corner, "$2,500 U. S. 5-20s," and in the lower corner, "Commission due, $5. Please remit by bearer."

"That's all right, sonny," said the keen-looking business man, as he halted out a scantily furnished purse, gave the boy a five-dollar bill and a quarter, and said: "There, sonny, that quarter is to reward you for your cleverness and fidelity;" and putting the envelope in his breast-pocket, he walked leisurely round the corner, and, hailing a car, was whirled away at a comparatively lightning speed. Not till he had reached Union Park did he draw the precious envelope from his pocket and tear it open. He then found that the envelope contained a copy of the Chicago Times, which he could have purchased at the office for five cents.

"The fish is biting very numerously to-day!" said "sonny," taking another big envelope from his pocket.

A Detroit grocer had a patent money-drawer attached to his counter the other day, and it was no sooner in working order than his clerk tendered his resignation.

"I don't want to stay where a person has lost confidence in me."

"Do you refer to that new till?"

"Yes."

"Well, you are very foolish. I haven't lost the least bit of confidence in your honesty; but I simply argued that if you had less change to squander outside I could have more of your time in the store. Loss of confidence! The idea is absurd."

The satisfied clerk took off his hat and returned to duty.

THE SAND-LOT'S LAMENT.

Oh, the bumble-bee sighs on the western wind,
And the tumble-bug's voice is still;
And the mangy cur and the spotted cow
And the wiggle-waggle are sad, sonchow,
And droop by the warbling rill.

The sand-lot sleeps in the mellow light,
And the riff-raff gather there,
And the great unwashed, and the unemployed,
And Mrs. Smith. And I am annoyed
At the stillness everywhere.

"What means," I ask of a weeping tramp,
"Thy sorrowful, briny grief?
Has the bloated holder of bonds once more
Been sitting upon thee, I implore—
Or was it some other thief?"

He rose in haste from beneath the fence,
And his face was wild and wet:
"Young man," he said, "I must caution thee:
Don't use that word, out of love for me,
Or they'll fitter your gosling yet."

He turned, and pointed to where the stand
Rose silent and stripped and bare;
"You know," he said, "that our little chief
Once called a Christian a knock-kneed thief,
And, behold, he is not there!"

"But where," I asked, "is the gallows tree
He builded upon the sand?
And where the graves of the Chinese slaves
He slaughtered on every hand?
And where the gizzards, the hair and gore,
The blood and blarney and rant and roar?
I'm just from Shasta, O tramp divine;
Speak out, and shatter these doubts of mine."

"Fair youth," he said, and his pea-green eye
Grew mellow with trickling brine,
"The voice of Kearney is heard no more.
He sleeps to-night on a prison floor,
And dreams of a cruel fine."

"He sleeps to-night in the darksome jug,
And the Council mutters low;
And the Chinese leper shuffles by,
And cocks his treacherous oblong eye,
And winks; but he does not go!"

"O youth," he said—but I moved along,
For my heart was overflowing.
And lo! the grass on the sand-lot springs,
And the buttercups are blowing.

MARCH 16, 1880.

D. S. RICHARDSON.

From One Who was not Hit.

BENICIA, March 17, 1880.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—You have evidently mounted your Pegasus—or historic mule—and given some of us a black eye, which we do not propose to restore to its normal condition by the usual external application of raw beef.

In your issue of the thirteenth instant you say: "The sand-lot thinks that a set of nondescript immigrants from Ireland, Nova Scotia, and the Rhine have an exclusive right to the control and direction of our politics." Now this sweeping innuendo means—if it means anything—that Nova Scotians form the second most important element of your graceless sand-lot rabble, that has so long been permitted to disgrace San Francisco and the State of California.

Now, sir, there are about forty of us here, men and women, who first saw the light in Nova Scotia, every one of whom is engaged in legitimate business. Some of us have records in the archives of the State and nation, in a military as well as a civil capacity, of which we are justly proud. We number among us some of the most energetic, enterprising, public-spirited, and successful business men of this community; and, so far as I have yet learned, not a single native of our little peninsula has made application for any part of your eleemosynary funds. Many of us take and read the Argonaut, and have a just appreciation of your earnest and honest intentions; but we believe that you have been misinformed when you publish such a wholesale fling at a large class of our fellow-citizens in this country. We claim that our women are virtuous and intelligent, and that our men have ever stood in the front rank of peaceable, law-abiding, order-loving, and industrious citizens of this State and nation. As I have said, there are some forty of us here, and not a sympathizer among us; and I believe the same to be true of Nova Scotians generally throughout the State. But should there be in San Francisco a few simple or vicious enough to have joined the "gang," it is to be hoped that you will concentrate your fire on them.

NOVA SCOTIAN.

What Smith Knows about Legislation and Art.

SACRAMENTO, March 10, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—This burgh is at present troubled with an affliction—a grave affliction: our population is being (figuratively) decimated. It is not enough affliction that poor Sacramento is situated in close proximity to a lot of law-making dervishes, misnamed a Legislature; but an "art wave" must sweep over this ill-fated city, and our people go aesthetically mad.

I was born in a country where art is the nation's pride, and thereby have an inherent love for things artistic; but this apish affectation of the Bohemian, this ridiculous subservience of rational actions to a puppy-dog dawdling with art, makes me unwell. Our young ladies all paint (i. e. not their faces), and fondly imagine themselves embryo Rosa Bonheurs. Our matrons have just discovered that their voices possess extraordinary purity and compass, and only need cultivation to bring them out; and even our grandmothers have again taken up their music, that they relinquished as a bad job forty years ago, when they strummed "Old Hundred" on the spinet. Then we have "Betsy and I" in the Argonaut, with their society notes and more "culchaw." May the gods deliver us!

They are agitated in the Legislature about the Normal School. Would it be out of place for an obscure individual to suggest that they create a school wherein California statesmen be taught grammar and gentlemanly deportment—a sort of preparatory course, wherein little Israelites be taught manners, and deep-chested politicians that leather-lunged eloquence is not the acme of parliamentary excellence? I am an unhappy foreigner, and sorely do I grieve for the outrageous antics of my countrymen of the sand-lot; but I will say for them that, in rhetoric and parliamentary deportment, they more than compare with our neighbors on Tenth Street.

Speaking of the sand-lot, what an amazingly philanthropic people you Americans are! The "noble red man" swoops down on the frontier settler, murders him and his family, devastates his home; and lo! a generous government rewards the red devil with a winter's rations, a warm blanket, and a brand-new rifle wherewith to pick off United States troops when spring relieves him of the fear of starvation. Again, a gang of unwholesome men, aliens principally, band together for unholy purposes. They parade your streets, and flaunt in your faces banners bearing blasphemous and treasonable mottoes. They threaten pillage, murder, and other unpleasant things. By these actions they paralyze business, cripple enterprise, drive capital from your midst, and in general cause a very undesirable state of affairs; yet with marvelous patience you tolerate even this. Will your bald-headed philanthropists never learn that philanthropy's best ends are sometimes attained by apparently the most merciless of measures? That to save the patient the doctor must sometimes apply the knife. The Revolution of 1789 was not merciful, but it gave France a hope; Sir Harry Havelock was cruel, but he saved the richest gem in England's crown. Yes, you are a humane people—decidedly humane. As a people, you are hugely tickled at the peculiarities of foreigners—you take exceptions to the size of Paddy's mouth, you are amused at the cut of Johnny's clothes and at his annihilation of the letter h, you reflect on the color of Sandy's hair, and wind up by being remarkably well satisfied with yourself. Well, that is hardly to be wondered at in a people that possess the finest buildings, largest ships, greatest warriors, greatest statesmen—but nom de Dieu!—I'm forgetting all about Sacramento, and my time is up, yet I must say that I wish I was the Himalaya Mountains that I might sit down on Americans for their good opinion of themselves.

SMITH.

The social dullness continues. I have never known so many important houses of both Liberal and Tory families, to be let or closed. Lord Salisbury has returned to town, and is able to transact some business. He sees Lord Beaconsfield and the Foreign Office subordinates, but there will be no parties at Arlington Street before Easter, and it is doubtful whether there will be any before Whitsuntide. Lady Salisbury, heretofore the leading hostess on the Tory side, has no substitute. There are some ministerial dinners, but they are mostly solemn affairs. No political salon is now open, but receptions continue weekly. Those of Lady Cork and Lady Stanhope were well attended, but the company was miscellaneous. Lady Granville declines to resume her informal bi-weekly parties, which were interrupted last year by the fire at Carlton House Terrace, alleging that the non-invitation system was misunderstood, and many persons took offense. Lady Cook, trying a different plan, succeeds in giving brilliant parties, but has failed hitherto to assume social leadership. Devonshire House gives only dinners before Easter. Nobody replaces Lady Waldegrave. Lord Derby's dinners at St. James's Square are attended by many prominent Liberals.—Mr. Smalley's London Letter.

To comfort the Queen and Lady Salisbury the writer has mailed to each of the distinguished society leaders a copy of the social supplement of last Tuesday's Call, with the following paragraphed passages carefully marked: "The Hon. Mrs. Bunbiter—whose husband is doing such excellent service at Sacramento—will give a drum-kettle at No. 9909 Tehama Avenue yesterday week." "Mrs. Major-General Mc-Muttonhead, of the Tenth Ward Rifles, will receive at her city residence—over the Kilkeny Retreat—some evening next year." The effete London journals may now make a counter showing, if they can.

SCENE: THE MARE'S NEST. [KALLOCH seated. Enter KEARNEY, breathless.]

DENIS—"Give me a bowl of wine;
I have not that alacrity of spirit
Nor cheer of mind that I was wont to have."

KE—"Those liuen checks of thine to fear are counsellors.
The devil damn thee black, thou cream-faced loon!
Where got'st thou that goose look?"

DENIS—"Sweet Isaac, say me softer, I am spent.

The great Rex—Rix—had at me fierce and long;
And out of time I tumbled prone, and fell,
Dewing the sand-lot with my misery."

KE—"Of all base passions, fear is most accurs'd—"

DENIS—"And yet, sweet master, men do say of thee—"

KE—"What do they say of me?"

DENIS—"That thou, at heart, art craven e'en as I."

KE—"They lie! It is an odious, damned lie;
Upon my soul, a lie; a wicked lie!"

[Enter an OFFICER.]

Well, knave, how now?"

OFFICER—"A warrant for your worship—here's the charge."

[KALLOCH reads, and turns pale. He and KEARNEY exchange looks.]

KE [feebly]—"Is it a noose I see before me?"

[Clutches at empty air, and falls in a dead faint; KEARNEY ditto.

Curtain.]

The California Architect and Building Review for March is an interesting number. The following shows that it is on the right side, and is not afraid to say so:

"While the great majority of people in San Francisco are groaning under the terrible pressure of dull times, such as were never known or experienced on this coast, the intelligence received from all other quarters of the United States represents a widely different condition of things. From every section of the land the echoes of business activity are heard and the song of prosperity sung. Under this aspect of affairs it is proper to inquire as to the cause, and in doing so the reasonable answer is at hand. The tendency of political turmoil has been to drive capital away from us and stay the hand of enterprise. We, as a people, have either been guilty of acts of cruelty to our own interests, or have remained quiet and unmoved while others have hewn away at the root of the tree of our prosperity. In the meantime, capital has silently spread its wings and flown to more congenial climes, or nestled away in secure hiding-places, leaving its revilers to cry for bread, while with indifferent concern the golden bird has rested upon its secure perch, or gone where open hands and hearts bid it welcome."

CXXI.—Sunday, March 21.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Vermicelli Soup.
Bass à la Buena Vista.
Potato Croquettes.
Broiled Chickens.
Tomatoes. Oyster Plant.
Roast Lamb—Mint Sauce.
French Artichoke Salad.
Orange Ice. Jelly Cake.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Bananas, and Oranges.

Bass à la Buena Vista is a souvenir of the Mexican War, and in the time of General Scott and his famous "hazy plate of soup," the dish made a figure at the Union Club of New York. The fish is to be stewed in a thick, highly-seasoned gravy, with port wine and onions, and should be garnished with tomatoes, peeled and baked.

CURRENT COMMENT.

Macaulay's overworked New Zealander reappeared in the Senate recently (says the World) being introduced by Senator Voorhees, who took occasion to describe the feelings of the aforesaid New Zealander when in future ages he should uncover the ruins of the Capitol and find the frescoes of the late Signor Brumidi. It may be that the work of Brumidi was very good indeed, and it may be conceded, also, that the Government has not been so generous to the talented artist as it might have been. Nevertheless, although Mr. Voorhees's possible and coming New Zealander might be profoundly stirred by the discovery of the frescoes of Brumidi, centuries hence, let us hope, for the credit of the country, that the far-faring visitor from the antipodes will not disturb the ruins of the Capitol. If he shall know enough of art to appreciate the frescoes, what will be his sensations when he stumbles upon some of the stone images which have been set up by order of the American Congress?

The proposed reiteration of the Monroe doctrine by Congress at this time will meet with hearty approval all over the country. No project more dangerous to our safety could be conceived than the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus under the control of a foreign corporation and the governmental protection of a foreign power. The principles of Monroe's declaration have acquired a firm hold upon the people of this country, and they are not disposed to accept any adverse doctrine, even in the sugar-coated form in which it is advocated by De Lesseps.—New York Truth.

The New York Hour says: "Professor Rudolph Falk, a distinguished German savant, who is staying in New York on his return from a scientific journey of several years' duration in South America, lately delivered an interesting lecture. In concluding his lecture with his theory of the future of our globe, the lecturer contended that, in consequence of the immense attraction of the sun, all planets gradually approach the great centre, and will finally again be absorbed by their parent. The moon gets nine feet nearer the sun each year, and the earth is also on her way to her primitive home. But, long before she is absorbed, all her life will be extinguished by the ocean, which, in consequence of the approaching moon, will break over its bounds and destroy everything."

I see by the newspapers (says a writer in the Republic) that Bret Harte, at present representing his country at Creteil, Germany, is coming home. He is said to be in bad health, and the German climate has not agreed with him. Mr. Harte has not been over-well for several years. In his charming sketch entitled "Five o'clock in the Morning," he says: "I have always been an early riser. The popular legend that 'Early to bed and early to rise' invariably and rhythmically resulted in healthfulness, opulence, and wisdom, I beg here to solemnly protest against. As an unhealthy man, as an unwealthy man, and doubtless, by virtue of this protest, an unwise man, I am, I think, a glaring example of the untruth of the proposition."

While famine is raging in Ireland: while the civilized world, roused in her behalf, is giving her all possible assistance; while her emissaries are in this country appealing to the national benevolence; while boxes throughout the city solicit charity for a starving land—the dispatch from Rome, published the other day, that the Bishop of Kilmore and the Archbishop of Armagh had sent £850 as Peter's Pence to the Pope, must surely strike many hearts that have warmed toward the suffering island with an unpleasant chill. This tribute to the Roman Pontiff has been much increased of late in Ireland. She has never been too poor—and extreme poverty has always been her normal condition—to send money to the church, the mother beggar of all time. Peter's Pence are, like all funds contributed to the priesthood, wrung out of the poorest of the poor by constant kindling of their superstitious prejudices. This is, indeed, a strange time to be extending pecuniary aid to the Pope, who simply serves as a pretext for incessant mendicancy. It is, to say the least, very impolitic just now to be sending money to Rome from Ireland, when everybody is urged to send money to Ireland to buy food. Any one might think the Irish prelates would remember that charity begins at home, particularly when charity is so eagerly solicited from foreign lands. If they have any money to spare, they should give it to the ragged, hungry, homeless wretches by whom they are surrounded, instead of dispatching it to the comfortable and pampered minions of the Vatican. This is more than robbing Paul to pay Peter. It is actually snatching bread from the mouths of the people to put gold into the purse of the prince. We may well wonder how the bishops can have the temerity to do this thing, under the circumstances, or how the Pope dares to receive such money. Having received it, how can he keep it? It is not only a disgrace to the name of religion, it is a disgrace to humanity. And he, the head of the so-named Eternal, Universal Church, the high priest of Christianity, the purest and loftiest exponent of goodness and charity, taking golden pounds from a famished land, to which generous souls of every nation and every creed are sending bread. What a venomous stab at charity! Truly, this is stealing from starvation to enrich superstition.—New York Times.

The New Orleans Democrat says: "The notorious Reverend Delamatyr, of Indiana, has been renominated for Congress by the Greenbackers. The Convention, it is said, was a very ridiculous one, many merchants and business men who were opposed to Delamatyr going to it because the railroads allowed half rates to delegates. The resolutions adopted by the Convention were several columns in length, being manufactured out of the reverend Congressman's speeches. The nomination amounts to nothing at all, as the Greenbackers have few votes in the district, and Delamatyr owed his election in 1878 to the endorsement of the Democratic Congressional Convention, which will scarcely be guilty of this mistake again. Delamatyr is very ambitious, it is said, and aims to figure on a Presidential ticket with his reverend political brother of San Francisco, J. L. Loch."

AFTER THE HANGING.

The Ghastly Aftermath of a Public Execution.

At eleven o'clock on a certain June day a great crowd of gaping Mississippi country folk thronged the sloping sides of a hollow that, with the exception of a natural outlet on one side, converged to a small circular plat in the centre. Upon this spot had been erected a frame-work of beams, posts, braces, a platform, and a trap-door. It was the gallows—that grim monument to the majesty of the law. The hollow was a vast earthen bowl; the gallows, a lump of sugar in the bottom; the crowd, a swarm of prowling ants that crawled around like a pestilence.

For be it known that this was the first execution that had ever occurred in Kemper County.

If there is one thing more entertaining than a hanging per se, it is the variety of effect produced by the ghastly spectacle upon the faces and manner of the assembled witnesses. The majority were present because they had never seen a hanging; others went to gratify the natural vengeance of outraged humanity; a moiety went in the interest of "science," hoping to hear the snapping caused by the sundering of the spinal ligament.

They assisted the trembling, faltering footsteps of the victim up a ladder constructed with the finest ingenuity of awkwardness; stood him on the trap like a wooden soldier that was to be shot down with tin cannon and cork ball; and with exquisitely polite condescension, invited him to feed the assembled multitude on the philosophic loaves and fishes of the hangman's prestidigitation. And yet no tickets had been sold to that rare banquet.

A pretty, dimpled, rosy lass from the country—barefoot, and arrayed in a yellow calico dress and a white sun-bonnet, and pervaded by an odor of fresh butter and milk, and wild violets and innocence—stared horror-stricken at the awful preparations. The bright roses soon fled, and refused longer to play hide-and-seek with the dimples; and the large blue eyes overflowed with tears.

The cap was drawn; the loop was adjusted. The girl buried her face in her gaunt old mother's bosom, and gasped:

"Are they nearly ready?"

"Very nearly."

"Who is that talking?"

"The priest."

"Praying?"

"Yes."

There was a pause.

"What are they doing now, mother?"

"They are tying the man's feet and hands."

"Do they tie his hands before or behind?"

"Neither; to his sides."

"Oh, mother, mother!"

"What, my child?" and the older voice began to quaver.

"Poor fellow! poor fellow!"

The girl sobbed pitifully. She buried her face deeper, and clung closer to her mother's neck.

"What are they doing now, mother?"

"The sheriff is getting down."

"O, me! Can I hear it, mother?"

"What, my dear?"

"When it drops."

"I think you can," and the older heart throbbed wildly.

"What are they doing now, mother?"

"The sheriff has a long, bright knife."

"What for?"

"To cut the string," so faintly that it is a whisper.

"And now, mother?"

"My—God! my—child! I don't know—I can't—look—any—longer!"

[They say that in the course of events the girl married and became a mother. Quite natural. They further assert that her first-born came into the world dead, with its neck unnaturally stretched, and its head bent far to one side.]

There was another interesting group, composed of boys between the ages of four-and-a-half and seven years. One was a negro named Tony, six years old, black as tar, homely as an ape. The others were all white. One of these, "Buck," was a chubby boy of five, with freckled face, red cheeks, and white hair. These two and the five or six others were standing or sitting in every imaginable posture indicative of awe, interest, and fear. Tony was dressed simply in a pair of his father's pantaloons cut off at the knees. Consequently the waist-band came quite under his arms, dispensing with the necessity of a shirt; and the buttons in front were connected with those behind by short strings, that served as suspenders. He was quite small and weazened. Buck, on the contrary, was large and strong; his general manner was nearly like that belonging to the advanced years of a patriarch.

After the body had been placed in a coffin, Tony wriggled to his feet and swaggered pompously up to Buck, and burying his skinny arms deep in his vest pockets, demanded:

"Wha' what yer suckin' yer thumb fer?"

Buck snatched the thumb from his mouth, and looked ashamed. Tony pursued his advantage by remarking, tauntingly:

"You was skyerd, too!"

"I wasn't," protested Buck.

"Yas you wuz, wh-when he chopped de string!"

"I wasn't; but you was, though."

"H-how?"

"Seen you?"

"Seed me?"

The white boy nodded. He never wasted words.

"Seed me, d.d yer?"

Buck did not deign a second nod.

"Wnat yer see?" persisted Tony.

The white boy took the thumb from his mouth—it had again found its way there—and answered:

"You got pale."

The absurdity of the idea was so apparent that even the slow penetration of the little black imp was not long in detecting it.

"Me got pale?"

"The thumb prevented utterance."

"You knows?"

"Seed me?"

A nod.

"H-h-how kin yer see me git pale wb-wh-when I's black?"

Now, kin yer answer dat?"

Another nod.

"Y'ever seed er nigger git pale?"

Nod.

"H-how?"

"You know them little red streaks in the white o' your eyes?"

"Yas."

"That's how you tell when a nigger's pale."

"H-how?"

"Cause the streaks turns white, an' you can't see 'em."

Having delivered himself of this startling physiological truth, the young man rose to his feet, and he and the negro trotted off to regain their companions, who were already several rods away, deep in a discussion of the scene they had just witnessed.

"I wonder if it hurt him."

"Course it did!"

"How do you know?"

"Didn't you see him doin' his shoulders this way, and sorter reachin' out his feet before him?"

"Why, I've seen 'em do like that in the circus."

"What do you think about it, Buck?"

"Nothin'."

"Would you like to be hung?"

Buck shook his head.

"Why?"

"Hurts."

"How do you know?"

"Dunno."

"I wouldn't mind it!" exclaimed the boastful Tony.

A peculiar and mischievous look came into Buck's face.

He asked Tony:

"You wouldn't?"

"No! Shaw! why doan my daddy heff me up by my hade clar o' de groun' mos' ev'ry day, to see London?"

"Don't it hurt?"

"No!"

"What does they hang people for, Tony?" queried a cross-eyed little wretch.

"Wh-why, ter see London, course!"

"What, with a rope?"

"Oh, er rope!"

"Yes."

"Waal, doan yer know?"

"No."

"Den I ain't er-gwine to tell yer!"

Buck had developed an idea.

"Let's hang Tony," he said.

The proposition was hailed with delight.

But numerous obstacles presented themselves—there was no material for building a scaffold, no carpenter's tools; Buck solved the problem by suggesting a tree. There was no rope: Buck stole an old, partially decayed clothes-line.

They soon found an appropriate spot for the execution. It was at the head of a deep and shady ravine, walled in on three sides by precipitous bluffs. Ascent or descent was extremely perilous, as it could be accomplished only by clinging to the stems and roots of bushes that lined the walls in many places. The boys clambered down, and discovered a tree on which could be successfully tested the efficacy of capital punishment. It was a stunted, crooked magnolia, leaning far to one side, and having a branch that ran out horizontally, about eight feet from the ground. They danced around the tree in the highest enjoyment of the delightful preparations, which were conducted by Buck, Tony, and two or three others—none more happy than Tony himself. They tied one end of the rope to the limb, and secured the other around Tony's neck.

A tremendous obstacle now obtruded itself. They had no trap. The improvised gallows was a failure.

"Now, look-a-hyar," said Tony, "I don't want ter be h-hung in dis byar style. Ef I ain't er-gwine ter drap, dey ain't no fun."

"You can jump off'n the limb," suggested Buck.

This solution of the difficulty was received with the most demonstrative joy. Tony sat upon the limb, the rope around his neck.

"All right, Tony," said one of the leaders; "but wait till you say everything. Now, make a speech, you know."

Tony grinned and cleared his throat.

"Ladies 'n gembles!"

"There ain't no ladies, Tony."

"Waal, doan I has ter say h-hit anyway? Ladies 'n gembles! I wants ter dress yer wid er few las' words. I's er mighty big sinner. A-hem! Wh-what did he say?"

"Talked about his mother."

"Oh, yas! An' wh-when I was er little bit o' chile, dest about so high, an' use ter go an' git de ole 'oman switches—"

"No; when she used to pray with you."

"Yas. An' she would tol' me ter be er mighty good chile, an' min' her wh-when she holler at me; an' ef I didn't git down awn dem marrer-bones 'n say dem prayers quick, she'd make er flo'-cloth out'n me, an' tie me ter de well-bucket fer er sinker; an'—an'—"

"Advisin' 'em, you know."

"An' ef yer ever does anything wrong, an' dey catches yer 'n hung yer, wh-why, den, look out! Now, wh-who's er-gwine ter pray?"

But the prayer was dispensed with, as was also the blind-folding and the tying. One boy armed himself with a stick, which he made believe was a knife, and gave Tony particular instructions to drop at the moment the knife struck the imaginary cord that held the imaginary trigger. The boy then looked around solemnly, made a grand sweep with his arm, and, with a strong blow upon the trunk of the tree, sprung the trap.

True to the working perfection of the machinery, Tony was launched into space.

A strange and unaccountable thing had happened. Tony found himself sprawling upon the ground. He scrambled to his feet with a look of triumph that ill-accompanied the astonishment visible in the faces of the spectators. They had committed the error of allowing too much rope for the distance.

"H-bit doan hurt!" exclaimed Tony.

"Cause you ain't hung," Buck quietly remarked.

This abashed Tony, when he had realized the situation. He crawled upon the limb again, and they contracted the length of the rope.

All ready again. The knife fell.

Tony slipped from the tree; the rope tightened, stopped the upper part of his body with a jerk, and then snapped and threw him violently upon the ground. He slowly and with difficulty raised his head and looked around, as though his neck was stiffened painfully with a cold, his eyes staring as if he had seen a hideous spectre, his mouth drawn with pain, and the tears trickling down his cheeks.

"Confound that rope!" exclaimed a boy.

Buck regarded Tony silently.

"What's the matter, Tony?" asked another boy, as he noticed the remarkable expression in the negro's face.

Tony was sitting on the ground, carefully feeling his neck all around, and was unable to speak for the suppressed sobs that choked him. He rose to his feet, looking ruefully about, the boys enjoying his discomfiture immoderately.

"Let's try it again," said Buck.

"No, you don't!" screamed the colored boy, with a determination the firmness of which could not be doubted. He was as fierce as he was frightened, and occupied himself with rearranging his suspenders, which were on the point of slipping from his shoulders.

"Why, Tony?"

"Yer plays too rough. Dat's why, now!"

"Did it hurt?"

"Course it did!" he said, with a look of contempt.

They insisted; Tony refused. One little fellow caught forcible hold, but Tony threw him off and bounded into the brush. They pursued him, captured him, and brought him back, crying and struggling fiercely. Finally they succeeded, after the greatest difficulty, in lifting him from the ground, while Buck could climb the tree and tie the rope. There was no ceremony about the affair then. The work was done silently and in dead earnest. The unfortunate victim yelled, but the boys were not to be cheated out of the fruits of the first grand lesson they had learned in the economy of government, the protection of society. They had seen a thing about which a great popular commotion had been raised—a simple thing: a beam, a rope, and a man. What prevents a frequent repetition of this phantasmagoria from the magic-lantern of the law? Surely not the popular taste. It is true that the magic-lantern is, as it were, a species of reserved and exalted privilege; but the slide on which the ghastly picture is painted can be removed, and utilized in an improvised magic-lantern sometimes vulgarly called a mob. But this, also, has a flame, a reflector, and a magnifying lens. It answers for all practical purposes. It is an off-pring of necessity.

The rope was at length securely tied. The cries of the unwilling victim were suddenly checked, as his weight was gradually allowed to fall upon the rope, strangling him. They were determined that a sudden jerk should not again frustrate their plans. Throwing his liberated hands wildly about, he clutched a boy by the hair, and made him yell with pain. It required strong efforts to release him. Then they all withdrew to a short distance.

Not a sound of any kind escaped the hanging child. The boys looked on silently, and with grim satisfaction. He vainly endeavored to reach up and catch the rope that was choking out his life; but there seemed to be a weight upon his arms, and he could raise them no higher than his shoulders. He kicked to the right and to the left, and squirmed and twisted. The knot was behind his neck, and the rope fell directly across the windpipe and great arteries. The boys watched the contortions of his face with absorbing interest, and a few became somewhat pale with an excitement tinged with anxiety; but they possessed too much stoicism to betray their feelings by any overt act, while the younger boys—and especially Buck—looked on with such calm courage.

"I wonder if it hurts him much?" queried a boy. There was no reply.

Buck, on being asked the question, nodded; and, with his thumb in his mouth, never removed his gaze from the suspended Tony.

"Well, we'll take him down after awhile. I wonder why be don't say something, Buck?"

"Can't."

"Why?"

But Buck merely shook his head, and said nothing.

The poor little hanging wretch grew more and more quiet as the moments flew by. His teeth were shut close, but his lips were slightly parted, and his eyes stared with a dumb, beseeching, horrifying agony. After the lapse of a few minutes his struggles ceased, and the body turned slowly from side to side. Then there was a slight shivering; the eyes rolled upward, and became fixed.

Said a boy: "I'll bet you he won't go around any more, blowing about it's not hurting him."

Buck looked at the speaker, and then at the swinging body. He told them to hold Tony while he climbed the tree to untie the knot. They did so; but through a little carelessness and ignorance they allowed the body to lunge to one side, and it fell to the ground like a log. They stared at it, and a boy asked:

"Why don't you get up, Tony?"

"What are you doing your eyes that way for?" asked another.

"Ain't he still?" remarked a third.

"Do you think he is putting on?"

"I don't know. Here, you take hold of that other arm, and help me pull him up. Tony!"

He was lying on his back. They raised him by the arms to a sitting posture; but as soon as they released him he toppled to one side and forward, and one of the eyes was buried in the dirt. The boys were thoroughly alarmed. They felt that something awful had happened, but they were ignorant of its nature.

"What's the matter with him?"

No answer.

"Does anybody know?"

Still no answer.

"Do you, Buck?"

A quiet nod.

"What is it?"

"Dead."

OAKLAND, March 10, 1880.

W. C. MORROW.

THE PROSPECTOR.

"The night is near, the trail is dim,
With chaparral o'ergrown;
Till morning stay, go not that way
Alone."

"Day after day, year after year,
I'm like a dry leaf blown
By the shifting gales o'er hills and vales,
Alone."

"And wintry storms have o'er me lower'd,
And snow-flakes round me flown,
As nights I lie beneath the sky
Alone."

"And summer's days have seen me oft
Where the sun has fiercest shone
O'er burning sands, on desert lands,
Alone."

"Far in the mountains gleams a light
That guides me on and on;
I follow its gleam, through forest and stream,
Alone."

"'Tis Fortune's beacon guides me on;
O'er yonder bluff it shone.
Ere falls the night I'll scale the height
Alone!"

Over the bluff, in the deep ravine
With sage-brush all o'ergrown,
Lie a pick and a pin, and the bones of a man Unknown.

WILMINGTON, March 1, 1890.

ED. HOLLAND.

Mind in Scientific Persons—Evidences that They Have It.

Learned dogs, cultured pigs, and accomplished mules, says the New York Times, are by no means infrequent. What is still more remarkable is the fact that animals can teach a variety of things to scientific persons, and that the latter unquestionably possess instinct which is susceptible of cultivation, and which gives us a right to consider them as differing from animals only in degree. There are scores of interesting facts which support these assertions, and which ought to be collected and published by some judicious literary dog.

For example, there is the anecdote of the scientific person who was taught to speak the cat language. He was of the small French mathematical breed, and of great intelligence and activity. He was once matched against a wiry Scotch mathematician to extract cube roots, and won in twenty minutes and three seconds, having at the end of that time extracted fifty roots, to his antagonist's thirty-four. The cat, who was a remarkably accomplished animal, with an especial fondness for scientific persons, taught the French mathematician to converse fluently, not only in the classical cat language, but in the difficult and little-known tortoiseshell and Maltese dialects. The two would frequently sit up on end on the front piazza, and converse with an evident enjoyment which excited the envy of the neighbors. The cat testifies that the mathematician displayed in conversation a degree of intelligence upon rat, bird, and other important subjects which is unusual even among well-informed cats, and that his accent, except as to a few difficult syllables, was unexceptionable. It is painful to be compelled to say that the French scientific person's morals were not cultivated by the cat, who was, unfortunately, an avowed atheist. He took his pupil with him on midnight excursions, and introduced him to the dissolute and musical circles of the back fence, where a bullet from a revolver put a premature end to what was certainly a most interesting and valuable experiment.

Only less remarkable was the English scientific person, who was taught to sit with his mouth open in hot weather, and pant. He was the property of a respectable mastiff, who treated him with great familiarity. By bribing him with small mineralogical specimens, which the mastiff found and brought home in his mouth, the scientific person was gradually taught to sit up and hang out his tongue precisely like a dog, and to pant with an ease and perfection which could not be surpassed. The scientific person was evidently quite vain of his accomplishment, and found it a great relief in warm weather. His example, however, was never followed by others of his kind, and in some cases even seemed to excite the anger of his less intelligent acquaintances.

That scientific persons really possess instinct has often been claimed and is often denied—the assertion being made that what observing dogs mistake for instinct in scientific persons is only reason simulating instinct. But there is evidence to the contrary that can not well be resisted. There was a scientific person in New Jersey of the Positivistic species, who was accustomed to break into yells of rage whenever he heard a church bell. Now, this was evidently not a reasonable act. He knew that he was not compelled to go to church, and that the church could not go to him. The sound of the bell was not intrinsically unpleasant, and did not do him any possible injury. His rage, then, was not reasonable, but instinctive, and was a clear proof that he was possessed of genuine instinct.

These incidents sufficiently prove the propositions that scientific persons are possessed of instinct, and that their minds are susceptible of cultivation. Hundreds of other incidents of the same general nature might be mentioned, did time and space permit. Nothing can be done, however, within the limits of a newspaper article with such a subject except to call the attention of intelligent and observing animals to it, in the hope that it will be taken up and investigated by our learned dogs with the care and fullness which it deserves.

A lady tells something which ought to have remained a secret with her sex. It is, that a woman in choosing a lover considers a great deal more how the man will be regarded by other women than whether she loves him herself.

It is said of Sir Isaac Newton's nephew, who was a clergyman, that he always refused a marriage fee, saying with much pleasantry, "Go your way, poor children, I have done you mischief enough already, without taking your money."

TOPICS FOR LEAP-YEAR AND LENT.

A Russian countess parades the streets of Nice escorted by three large bloodhounds of quarrelsome disposition.

It is decided that rosebud dinner parties are proper in Lent. The girls are supposed to be too young to be wicked.

The young daughter of Mr. George H. Pendleton is one of the few ladies who in this age cultivate the charming old fashion of harp-playing.

Rose-juice is the name of a new color, which looks as if produced by crushing a blush-rose petal. It is not pretty, for it inclines too much to soferino.

"If girls intend to take advantage of their leap-year prerogatives, they should be careful to act like gentlemen." They have started in the right direction: they dress as near like gentlemen as possible.

White pansies make exceedingly pretty flower-knots for the necktie during Lent, but they are principally in demand for the weddings of persons who, like Queen Victoria, see no reason why one should not be married out of the season as well as in it.

Prettiest of all the embroideries for gowns are the little brown twigs of the flowering almond, or the peach-tree, with their pale pink or rosy blossoms; and the girls who have stolen the design from the Royal Art patterns, and are using it, are making themselves the most elegant of gowns.

A Frenchman has invented a new dish, and Paris has gone crazy over it. Take a head of celery, and boil the heart in vinegar-water for a quarter of an hour; wipe it dry, and place it in a sauce made of sugar flavored with lemon-juice. Serve it cold at dessert. It is called crystallized celery.

It is said that in fashionable circles in England dancing parties no longer open with a waltz, but with a quadrille, in order that the young people may become pleasantly acquainted. A better way still is to precede the dancing by a reception, in which everybody shall be introduced to everybody else, and thus anything like awkwardness or unnecessary formality is avoided.

Madame de Lesseps went to a fair for the benefit of the St. Vincent Orphan Asylum in New York, and gave her fan to the managers, who immediately sold two hundred shares in it at one dollar apiece. Then the Vicomtesse de Lesseps turned flower girl and sold roses at one dollar each, and altogether showed that a French woman with a title is a valuable accession to those who are engaged in charitable works.

Sarah Bernhardt is described as suddenly taking into her head the resolution to become a sculptor. She began at one o'clock in the morning, just after returning from the theatre, and for a model she took her old aunt, Madame Bruck, who was roused, grumbling, from a sound sleep to sit until six o'clock, having her ancient features put into clay.

The tall, fair, and fragile looking Princess Blanche d'Orléans is going to marry the Prince de Ligne, who, although not of royal birth, is allied to several reigning families. Princess Blanche is the second daughter of the Duc de Nemours, and is the frequent companion of her father in Paris society. She is the only remaining unmarried granddaughter of Louis Philippe.

A Philadelphia girl is already disgusted with leap-year. The other evening as she began "Will you—" her young man, without waiting to ascertain whether or not she was going to propose, sprang from the sofa, rushed off, and has carefully avoided the house ever since. And yet, aware that she possessed a very large mouth, she was merely about to ask, "Will you please shut your eyes while I yawn?"

A female journalist on the Chicago Inter-Ocean told a reporter that she was out all hours of the night, went straight along, and was never meddled with. She carried a pistol for a time, and learned how to use it, but finally threw it aside, thinking the men of Chicago were so tame and gentle that they did not need to have it drawn on them. Presence of mind, she says, is more protection than a pistol, anyway.

"Oh, mamma doesn't allow me to dance with midshipmen," was the response of the daughter of a high functionary to a gallant young middy on one of Queen Victoria's ships, when asked for a waltz. But the young woman—who has Indian blood in her veins—relented when she found he was a nobleman as well as a middy, and claimed him for a partner. "Oh, mamma doesn't allow me to dance with squaws," was the boy's reply, as he moved away.

The new lisle-thread stockings are the "beautifullest" as yet. They are quiet in effect, and combine often two colors in hair-line horizontal stripes, like crimson and blue, gold and black, black and white. They are clocked with the brightest colors. Then there are the ribbed plain colors; the plain with silk embroidery, in a single contrasting color, on the instep; the unbleached shades, with perpendicular lace ribs and lines of color half way up the leg; and the spun silk plain, with the clocks in another shade or hue.

It is young ladies of whom Olive Logan is raving now. It is Emily Von Schaumburg whose classic beauty she compares to that of Cleopatra; and Mattie Mitchell, daughter of the ex-Senator from Oregon, of whom she says that she speaks French with a "certain dainty and somewhat hesitating precision that is nothing short of kissable whenever heard." That is a pretty way of excusing stammering French, isn't it?

In Washington, the recurrence of the Lenten season has a most marked influence upon social life. The receptions go out and the lectures come in, while various forms of "improving" mental entertainments are cordially welcomed to fill up the gap caused by the sudden cessation of livelier amusements. Especially, as it is no longer correct to eat good things, the ladies of fashion find time to go to cooking school, and store up wisdom as to the ways and means of providing good things for the future.

Muslin dresses are to be very simple this summer, it is said. Simple skirts with one flounce, fan waists, ribbon belts or sashes, little shoulder capes with the ends fastened at the belt, make up the prospect with which some dressmakers are terrifying their customers. "Single skirts," cry the girls, who never have known what it is to move without having a mass of drapery about them. "Single skirts! Mamma, mayn't we go to some actress and learn how to walk?" Mamma had better send them. It isn't easy to be graceful in simple robes.

The Pall Mall Gazette says that the marked superiority of women over men is in few points more remarkable than in their superior powers of smelling and tasting. A woman will detect the faintest odor of tobacco when a man, even though a non-smoker, often fails to discover any symptom of it. As with smell so with taste. Women are marvelously acute and fastidious in the matter of sauces and all flavoring ingredients.

"Leap-year gives young ladies a gentleman's privileges in making love." Perhaps it does. But no respectable young man, says an able Western journal, will have anything to do with a young lady who takes a position on the street-corner and winks at the gentlemen as they pass by. Nor would it look well for a dozen or more young ladies to loaf around in front of a church an hour and a half on Sunday nights, sparring and knocking one another's hats off, and dancing a tralla-la on the sidewalk in order to kill time until the congregation is dismissed, and then buckle up to a young man and escort him home. Not any.

A novelty has recently appeared in a Boston ice-cream saloon, in the shape of a girl who sets a table instead of dropping things on it, who takes an order courteously, and, in short, shows that she deserves the title which the most incapable of her sisters most strenuously insist upon—that of "lady." Nobody has yet been able to decide exactly how to treat her, or to determine whether it is best to try to keep her humble and gentle by snubbing her, or to bow down and worship her; and so the ordinary customer simply stares in astonishment and gratitude, and resolves to haunt the saloon in future in order to enjoy the sensation of being served by her.

A wedding-party had gathered at Belvidere, Wis., and just as the clergyman was about to commence the service, the floor gave way in the centre and sank about three feet, mixing bride, groom, clergyman, and spectators in one common mass. The lights were extinguished, fortunately, without any damage, and for a few minutes confusion reigned supreme. It was soon ascertained that nobody was hurt, and no damage, except that to the floor, sustained. The lamps were relighted, the bride and groom again took their positions, the guests being this time arranged on a sliding scale, and the ceremony was conducted without further interruption. Had there been a cellar under the floor the consequence must have been disastrous.

Philip (of the Boston Courier) has invented an improvement on the device for dropping members of the orchestra who play false out of sight, and for silencing characters in the theatre. It is simply a pair of gigantic tongs, governed by machinery under the control of the usher. The instant that symptoms of the last scene begin to appear, and Rusticus and Suburban arise to put on their overcoats, these tongs drop from the ceiling, catch them up by the collar, and deposit them in the lobby in less than three seconds, choking them on the way, so that they can not make any disturbance. This is what is needed to accommodate gentlemen in a hurry to catch a train, and loth to disturb their neighbors. They need only to stand up, and they will be swept away with the greatest precision.

As this is the season, especially during the sudden changes we have had recently, when we are all exposed to colds, it may be comforting to hear that we need not take cold if we do not want to; that taking or not taking cold depends mainly on the will. A very high medical authority so declares, and adds that we know very little of the forms of disease, even the commonest. Cold-taking seems to be the result of a sufficient impression of cold to reduce the vital energy of nerve-centres presiding over the functions of special organs. It is easy, then, to see why a strong fit of sneezing rouses the dormant centres, enabling them to resume work, and avoid evil consequences. This explains why the worst effects of a cold do not usually follow a chill which excites much sneezing. Shivering is a less positive convulsion to restore the paralyzed nervous energy, though it may in less degree serve the same purpose. The shivering that proceeds from the effect of poison is totally different. We refer to the quick muscular agitation and teeth-chattering which occur when the body is exposed to cold, and no ill results supervene. The natural indication, therefore, to ward off the consequence of a chill, is to restore the vital energy of the nerve-centres, which restoration may be insured by a strong, sustained effort of will. Experiments often made attest the truth of this theory, which is well worth trying. If all a man need do to prevent a cold is to resolve not to have one, he should be ashamed of a cold, which, it would appear, is not only an annoyance, but a confession of mental infirmity.

Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton has recently printed some reminiscences of the late Mr. Hepworth Dixon, in the course of which she says that he was exceptionally fortunate in his domestic life. His home was one of the pleasantest in London. Once in a conversation with him I asked whether he thought the majority of marriages were happy or unhappy. "Happy, certainly," was the reply. "I think most men marry for love, and get the right woman, with whom they are perfectly satisfied through life. Of course, however, there are wives who fail to hold the hearts of their husbands."

"Will you tell me," I said, "in what you think is the secret of a woman's lasting power—what quality it is in her which makes her hold her husband's heart forever?"

"That she should be a pillow," answered Mr. Dixon seriously. "I mean that in her, as on a pillow, her husband must find repose. He gets hard knocks enough in the world—people stick their sharp corners into him—they hurt his pride or wound his sensibilities. Let him be able to go home feeling that there, at least, is some one who believes in him utterly. He has no need to tax himself, if he is tired. She will be contented even if he does not tell her his best stories, or tells her the old ones three times over. She asks nothing of him but that he will be himself. Do you think years make such a refuge of less worth? No, never stay long away from such companions—cerest flattery, the most perfect rest."

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served at 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1880.

OPEN LETTER TO THE "COUNCIL."

Will the Executive "Council" indulge the Argonaut in saying that the intelligent people of this city hope there will be no compromise with the revolutionary element that has for more than two years disgraced this city? We have endured the insolence of this criminal mob till endurance has ceased to be a virtue. Just as public opinion becomes ripe for an old-fashioned vigilance committee, that would make swift work with such cowardly villains as the sand-lot leadership has developed, certain of you very rich men step to the front and assume direction of events. This is becoming, provided you do not compromise the dignity, manliness, and self-respect of your fellow-citizens. If you compromise with these villains you disgrace every brave and honest man in San Francisco. Demand of these wretches that they turn their arms over to the authorities, and if they refuse, fight them. Demand that there be no more meetings upon the sand-lot; if they refuse, disperse them. Demand that there be no more threats; and if they refuse, choke them. Let yourselves be assured that you will be supported by the moral sentiment of this community, and be upheld by a discriminating and intelligent public opinion throughout the United States. This revolt is mostly confined to criminal and ignorant aliens, and it carries with it the elements of danger to Republican liberty. To temporize with it is to encourage it; to show fear of it is to make it perpetual and formidable. Be assured, gentlemen, that for you there is but one honorable, consistent, and manly course to pursue, and that is to stand bravely up to the law, and to the maintenance of all the legal rights of all the citizens of San Francisco.

Peace hath her victories no less renowned than those of war. Kearney has thrown up his tail and bellowed. If this was the result of an honest conviction that his course had been an injurious one to the community in which he lives, and to the class to which he belongs, and not the result of cowardice, we should accept it, and give to him the credit that attaches to the meanest criminal when he confesses his crime and promises amendment. Regarding his present attitude as one resulting from cowardice, as a square back-down in the presence of a danger he dare not face, and on the eve of a conflict he had not the courage to engage in, we are not disposed to accord to Mr. Kearney any other virtue than that of prudence. This newly assumed position saves the city from a conflict, and saves us from whatever disgrace may have followed the bloody and forcible suppression of a mob of foreign knaves and villains, who have made menace, blasphemy, and blackguardism their trade for now more than two years. We are not pleased that this question should have had a peaceful solution, because we regard the kind of agitation we have so long endured as the beginning of an evil that is only eradicated by being killed. However, we accept the situation, and we shall not be unmindful of the lesson it has taught us. It has disclosed the existence of perils that were hidden. It has warned us of dangers that we hoped did not lurk within our political system. It has put all thinking and patriotic persons—native and foreign-born—upon the inquiry how best to guard against these dangers, and ought to bring into party alliance all foreign and native-born who love the country of their birth and the home of their adoption. We shall not be deceived by this cowardly and politic truce. This exhibition of the white flag is not for surrender, but for opportunity to manoeuvre, and for the enemy to rest upon its arms and gain strength, till at some later time it can strike society a foul and more effective blow. In the meantime there should be no relaxation of vigilance. The arms placed in the hands of citizens in aid to authority should be kept bright. The secret corps that with its Winchester repeating rifles struck terror to this crazy Richard should be maintained, and the regiments should be filled to their full quota, and kept in effective condition; and the organization of citizens that has given expression to this public opinion should not be disbanded. The greatest care should be exercised in the choice of our new policemen, and no one should be given the "star" who can not be vouched for by well-known and respectable citizens as law-loving, patriotic, brave, and in earnest sympathy with good government. Out of this agitation there should grow an "American" party, composed of the respectable of all nationalities. It should be called and known as "American," and the foreigner who has come among us and is not willing to join an American party, let him join the enemy, composed of the treasonable, the ignorant, the vicious, and the idle.

This raid of the ragged has demonstrated to capital the desirableness of its being upon friendly terms with labor; and has illustrated the indispensable necessity that labor should be in friendly cooperation with capital. This relation has been understood by intelligent persons in each class. The intelligent working class has not participated in this raid, but it has been the first to catch the boomerang in the face—the first to be wounded by the recoiling weapon. Up to the time of the inauguration of this agitation there was abundant labor at remunerative wages. An honest day's work commanded an honest wage. Since two years ago money has hid itself, capital has withdrawn, and labor has experienced a pinching time. This has put the better class of working men upon reflection, and each one has had the question fairly presented: "Is it better for me to be in political or social sympathy with the men who have money, or with those who have none?" The answer has come in practical form. The gaunt guest has come to their dinner-table, and they have had an appeal taken from the councils of the corner grocery to the fireside and the home. The eloquent agitation that comes from the low-browed and brutal and blasphemous blackguards of the sand-lot has been answered and its logic refuted by the wives and babies at the hearth-stone. And the mute appeal of hungry loved ones is more pathetic and powerful than the boisterous blasphemy of the selfish political agitators. It is self-apparent, clear to the dullest comprehension, that the laborer, the mechanic, the manufacturer, and, indeed, the worker in all kinds of industry, mental and physical—all who earn salaries or sell the productions of their handicraft, or receive daily wages—can alone prosper when confidence prevails, and enterprise is stimulated by the hope of financial reward. The lesson taught has been a hard but useful one. It will not have been taught in vain if the wealthy shall become somewhat less sordid and selfish, and the poor less jealous and vengeful.

Whether this agitation is ended or not, there is the ever-present, and, so long as it exists, the ever-disturbing question of Chinese immigration. This agitation, now transplanted from the sand-lot and remanded to the national councils at Washington, must not be lost sight of, and the effort, by legal and peaceful endeavor, to arrest the incursion of these Chinese barbarians must not be relaxed. Our laboring population has a right to demand of the political power of the Government its best and most earnest effort in this direction. It is a proposition as clearly demonstrable as any problem in mathematics, that the American or European can not compete with Chinese labor and live. The conflict is an unequal one, made so by conditions that no statesmanship can vary or change or modify. There is but one peaceful remedy, and that is for the Congress of the nation to check Chinese immigration. The only other remedy is a bloody one, brought about by the inevitable collision of two forces that can not live in harmony with each other—two races having nothing in common, and that can not exist side by side in peace. The slogan of the sand-lot that "The Chinese must go" was as brutal as it was impudent. The Chinese among us are protected by law. There is no mode of resisting a law except by a revolution, and it does not become one class of foreigners to make a revolution in order to drive out another class that has the same legal right to be in the country as it has. American-born people—and foreign-born who comprehend the spirit of our laws and the genius of our institutions—would, in the event of unlawful demonstration, be compelled to fight in their defense. The same man who would spare no exertion to arrest Chinese immigration would arm himself to protect the Chinese among us. This ought to be understood at the East. It seems a willful determination on the part of the Joseph Cooks, and Henry Ward Beechers, and other long-haired humanitarians of the sentimental and, we believe, hypocritically pious class, to misunderstand and misrepresent public opinion here upon this question. The question is a burning one. Wealth and labor, intelligence and stupidity, industry and idleness, all classes, all parties, all religions are united in the desire to have this question promptly disposed of. The labor class is not more interested than the wealthy in the speedy solution of this problem.

The great evil that underlies our Government, and that threatens its prosperity, is found in the principle that invites all nations to send their overflowing peoples to our shores, and, when here, clothes all the adult males of the white races with the elective franchise. From nearly every State in Europe we are receiving an ignorant, criminal, and pauper immigration. The Russian Nihilist who fails to burn a palace, the Spaniard who fails to kill his king, the Englishman who is under police surveillance for cracking a crib, or the Irishman who does not succeed in murdering his landlord, comes to America, and upon the hour of his landing becomes a politician. The Socialist, who thinks property a theft and accumulation a crime, or the Communist, who would divide and take to himself that which he has not earned, is the natural ally of the office-seeking party politician who regards the loot and plunder of office more desirable than the earnings that result from toil or the savings that result from self-denial. Had we eliminated the lurking elements of political discord, taken from Kearney and Steinman and Wellock and Cannon, and the other naturalized citizens that had come to us from foreign countries, the right of the elective franchise, there would have been no agitation in our city, or, had it occurred, it would have been promptly suppressed. There would have been no piece-clubs to have given birth to the organization of the sand-lot. There would have been no element of irresolution with a Democratic Mayor. Robert Ferrall as a criminal judge would have been impossible. Trials by jury, with only the American-born upon them, would be a different institution from that composed in part of the foreign-born who are in sympathy with the class whose crimes they are called upon to decide. Desmond would not be the Sheriff of this county, and would not have been in a position to bail Cannon, charged with violating the law, or, in event of Kearney's conviction, to extend to him the hospitalities of the county jail. We should not have a clerical demagogue filling the executive chair of our city, leaving the City Hall to stir dissensions upon the sand-lot and move discontent to open violence. Legislators would not pass laws to "conciliate" law-breakers. Judges would not be compelled to adjudicate for the popular sentiment before which they must go for reflection, and public opinion might be a healthy, national, and patriotic sentiment, instead of a passionate class agitation.

Repeal of the naturalization laws becomes an imperative duty in the presence of the perils that to-day threaten our republic. This repeal would not affect present citizens, but would limit any further advance in this direction. It would prevent us from receiving some good citizens from other lands, but it would prevent a multitude of bad characters from becoming citizens. Such a law would commend itself to a majority of the better class of adopted citizens, and ought to become the unanimous sentiment of all native-born who are not politicians of the demagogue stripe. This is not Know-nothingism, because it denies to no foreigner any privilege now enjoyed by him. It is not the result of any narrow bigotry. It is simply patriotism, in providing against a danger that none are quicker to see, or more anxious to avert, than our better class of foreign residents. The intelligent, honest, and thoughtful German fully understands this argument. The educated and well-disposed Irishman appreciates the suggestion. The well-disposed men of family and property who are born abroad would rather deny themselves the elective privilege than to share it with the evil-disposed of their own countrymen. The argument that addressed itself to our forefathers, and that was a strong one in the last generation, has no longer any force. The conditions that existed half a century ago no longer continue. A broad empire and a sparse population, sailing ships that made but occasional voyages across the sea, might well have convinced our early law-makers that invitation to the immigrant from foreign lands would only be accepted by the provident, the adventurous, and the desirable. A population of fifty millions closing in upon the vacant places of our continent, the disturbed condition of Europe, the cheap-carrying, swift-steaming vessels, admonish us that our invitation has been too broad, our continent too narrow. We are in danger of being overwhelmed with an inundation of undesirable people. Paupers and criminals from Europe, and slaves from Asia, threaten to engulf in the whirling eddy and maelstrom of their violent conflict the Government that gives them asylum—the European immigrant to overturn and destroy the laws that control society, the Chinese to eat up as locusts the substance of the land. This remedy, viz: a repeal of the laws extending the franchise to men of foreign birth, or conferring it alone upon Congress, is possible whenever there shall arise the "American" party, embracing the native-born and the respectable foreign-born, which shall have the bravery and the patriotism to avert a national peril by a heroic remedy.

When Danton was executed, he said: "We fall the victims of contemptible cowards, but they will not long enjoy their victory. Robespierre follows. I drag him after me." History says that Robespierre witnessed the execution gleefully, rubbing his hands. "Next gentleman" is the Baptist preacher. We hope to see him come to the guillotine of Judge Rix's tribunal before long. He is singing very low just now, trying to keep step to the tune of the Bulletin's hand-organ.

AFTERMATH.

On Sunday evening of last week, at the Metropolitan Baptist Church—owned, we believe, by a very wealthy Jewish gentleman named Lankershim, who, having seen the error of his ways, has turned from Judaism to become a Baptist deep diver—the reverend hard-shell Baptist, who, by the kind intermeddling of the devil, has become Mayor of San Francisco, preached his usual screed. He mixed his religion, his politics, his personal quarrels, his vanity, his blackguardism into an olla-podrida of blasphemy and nonsense. To this delectable feast of slobber and flow of idiotic slush he charged an admittance of ten cents—money-changers in the temple!—and here, sweating and smelling bad, the admirers of this foul-mouthed and vulgar blather-skite listened for an hour. He compared himself to Moses, Aaron, and Joshua; the likeness would have been more striking if he had confined the illustration to some of the peculiar weaknesses of Solomon, and David, and Uriah Heep. He complimented Moses and Lewis Kaplan; the one as the great lawgiver, and the other as the fittest man to run an American register of voters. He abused a writer upon the Argonaut, for this has now become one of his themes. It draws—it draws ten cents. This is religion. This is one of the meek and lowly men of God. This, a preacher of God's Word. This, the exemplar of the life of Christ. This, the teacher of holy things. This, the man—one of the men—whom an organized Christian church has licensed to preach the Gospel, to warn sinners to repentance, to lead by his example in the straight and narrow path. Isaac Kalloch in the City Hall is a politician, and for his political acts has a right to be measured as other men are measured; but when he drags his politics and his personal blackguardism into the pulpit, and there exposes the wounds upon his person and the scars upon his moral character, he becomes a target at which the shafts of exposure may be safely directed.

When the warden has put on the muzzle,
Kindly send Denis this puzzle;
For—in the snug House of Correction—
He'll have leisure for solid reflection:
14, 15, 13.

After all, trial by jury is not an unmixed evil. For once, at least, in San Francisco this bulwark of liberty has proven no defense for sand-lot threats. Twelve good and true men have found the agitator Gannon guilty of using incendiary language. At the present writing it is impossible to determine whether the meshes of locally administered law are loose enough, and large enough, to permit the comfortable wriggling through, into liberty and license, of agitator Gannon and his more notorious chief. The arrest, trial, conviction, and almost certain imprisonment of Denis Kearney gives the law a triumph, and in a small way vindicates its supremacy. Some there will be who will regret that there could not have been a different trial of conclusions between the agitators and society. Whether there has been or is to be any compromise between the Council and the criminals we are not advised. We hope not. We may, however, accept the decision of the courts as evidence that the law is not yet powerless when behind it there stands a healthful and earnest public opinion. The case of Tweed illustrated the power of law and popular opinion, when united. In spite of his political position (deemed impregnable), in spite of the popularity that made him State Senator after indictment, and in spite of his six millions of criminal accumulations, he was driven to exile, brought to imprisonment, trial, and conviction, and died a pauper at Blackwell's Island, abandoned by all but his immediate relations. It now remains to be seen whether the boastful friends of this criminal will rescue him with the strong arm. We do not believe they will attempt it. We wish they would.

Said Mr. Pickering: "We
Have reason to think we see—
By certain infallible signs,
Which, like the flavor of wines
That are better than wines less good,
Are commonly misunderstood—
That the sand-lot is, as it were,
Prepared for a while to defer,
That is, to continue to not Decide to get itself shot."

The Bulletin of Monday contains the following editorial: "It occurred to some good people in this city whose names are Pickering and Fitch, and who have endeared themselves to this community by the manly, heroic, unselfish, and patriotic course exhibited by them in conducting the Call and Bulletin, to compound a felony between the two 'most prominent criminals that have ever disgraced this city.' We suggested this cowardly and infamous proposition of compromise to leading members of the citizens' organization. The result has been that certain members 'of the committee (whose names we suppress, because this is a lie made out of whole cloth) have had the shamelessness to interview the political Baptist, with a view to 'induce him to call off his dogs, from which it is hoped 'much good will result. Anxious to save the commercial business of respectable people, and the small advertisements of Irish servant girls, we sincerely hope that the city of San Francisco may not be unwilling to sacrifice its "dignity, its manhood, and its self-respect by compromising 'with the demagogues, idlers, tramps, vagabonds, and criminals who for two years have menaced the lives of citizens 'and threatened the repose of the community.'" Or words to that effect.

Perhaps one striker in ten thousand knows something of the statistical side of the wages question. This one man has commonly some reason outside of present necessities which impels him to join or lead a strike. He may be an honest fanatic, believing in agitation and abstraction as the great cure-alls of modern social inequality. He may believe in socialism as thieves and incendiaries do. But in either case he knows that facts and figures argue the certain defeat of his cause, whatever may become of him. He knows that the wages lost in every long strike outweigh the greatest possible pecuniary good which may accrue to the individual striker in half his working lifetime. At the present writing the skilled workmen of the Eastern States are striking right and left; which may be good for their children's children, but which can not but be bad for themselves.

We have been endeavoring to introduce the head of John the Baptist into our columns, making the historical incident illustrate what ought to be done with the Reverend Isaac. The head of John the Baptist on a charger! We have studied up the case so far as we can, and have analyzed the motives of Mr. and Mrs. Herod, and Miss Herod—or Miss Herodias, as she is called—but we can not find any way to get Isaac's head on to the "charger," except by cutting it off; and to suggest that might incite (or tend to incite) a riot; and, as we have no confidence in Judge Rix, we are timid about a too free indulgence in this kind of joking. So we have determined to offer a reward for any conundrum, metaphor, poem, or story that shall introduce and dispose of this perplexing difficulty. One year's subscription to our valuable and widely circulated journal as a prize to any one who will cut off Kalloch's head and bring it to us on a charger.

A beautiful calm rests upon the surface of musical society, and the muffled boom is stealing westward. In New York there are lock-outs in the piano factories. In Washington nihilism of melody has stolen into the social atmosphere in the guise of banjo-playing beauties. In Chicago, recently, ten young men were fined ten dollars each for whistling Pinafore at prayer-meeting. Near New Orleans, last week, a negro was hung for setting the Exoduster to music. And in San Francisco the departure of Wilhelm and his J is being followed by the Eastern flight of Ah Sin with his mandolin.

K. K. K.—THE EVIL TRINITY.

There are three things which seem to me
Unutterably vile;
But when I question, musingly,
Which is the vilest of the three,
I am perplexed the while.

Perhaps, however, I may rank
These creatures thus—at best:
And if I err I humbly pray
That you will class them any way
Your fancy may suggest.

The first, and least obnoxious thing,
(Already on the shelf)
Is Denis Kearney. I opine
That he was made like "doctored" wine,
And could not help himself.

The next is Kalloch, man of God—
Who, from his high estate,
Stoops down to pander at the feet
Of dirty rables in the street,
And deal in billingsgate.

The last, and vilest of the vile,
The type of things that crawl—
Of pride and manliness bereft—
With not a spark of honor left
Is this: The Morning Kall.

FORS HORATIONI—In re Kearney and Kalloch, et id genus omne.—Virtus (the intelligence of this State) repulsa nescia sordide (too long careless about the demonstrations of the sand-lot) nec summit (has at length awakened to the situation), aut ponit (and is about to purchase) secures (some hemp) arbitrio (being well advised in the premises) popularis aura (and hang—and—and—and—
T. T.

The extreme "American" sentiment against the inter-oceanic canal is quoted in another column. The sensible, conservative opinion of our best men seems to be that such fears as are outlined in the paragraph quoted are groundless. The distinguished gentleman whose name is representative of this scheme is now in this city. We trust he may make himself thoroughly understood by our ablest and most wealthy citizens before he takes leave of us.

There is a merchant in this city whose place of business is the most convenient street corner, whose stock in trade consists of a blackboard, a bit of crayon, a bundle of pamphlets, and a box of patent pens. "One of the great unwashed," one might reasonably think, after a casual glance in passing, for he wears ordinary clothes and his face gives no patent indication of either settled respectability or positive intelligence. "He belongs to the sand-lot," one might reasonably say, in classing him for future possibilities. Yet the other day this man preached as good a sermon as it has ever, been the writer's good fortune to listen to, and preached against Kearneyism at that, and in the open air. It is impossible to reproduce even half that he said, and if it were possible the language without the oratory would lose half its value. But one central idea, the "Golden Text"—as they say in the Sunday-school lessons—may be paraphrased as follows, and it is very well worth remembering:

"My friends—This California that you are abusing is God's garden. In it there is every needful fruit of the earth, every useful beast of the field, every palatable fish of the sea. Here is a climate where none need freeze, nor live in dread of sun-stroke, nor cringe at sight of a frothing cur. Here are all things which man has needed in the past to make mankind good for something, and yet 'ye stand all the day idle,' waiting for something to turn up." My private opinion, publicly expressed, is that you would rather loaf and lie and drink beer, than work and save and wear clean shirts; and I think the sooner you stop sniveling about hard times and go to work at a dollar a day in the park, or wherever you can find a day's work to do, the sooner you'll have a chance to do something better."

Says the chief society carpenter of the Call: "Efforts were made to keep the affair a profound secret, but the matter is gradually leaking out." This in an appendix to a detailed account of "An Affair of Honor on the Cliff House Road." The appendix was inspired by Mr. Irwin's ruthless chief, and was designed to assure the gentlemen interested that the Call would not needlessly give them away. Mr. Irwin's initial version—in verse—was cruelly suppressed by Mr. Pickering. It is reproduced below:

They met upon the Cliff House Road—
Love's husband and Love's thief.
Each tried, according to the code,
To fill the other's beef
With lead enough to plant a lode:
The husband came to grief.
And Love's life—mended a la mode—
Turned over a new leaf.

The good God sent us one of his timely showers. The earth was dry after the north wind; parched and thirsty, it drank in the genial rain. Not only did it do the country good, rejoicing the hearts of the farmers, but it prevented the Paddies' parade. Saint Patrick's procession miscarried, and during all the seventeenth of March our eyes were not offended with harp or shamrock, or with a wild Irishman on horseback or a priest in open brouche. Nor did we see the green above the red, nor hear the "grand old national songs," nor see the offensive exhibition in our streets of soldiers in a uniform that does not belong to our nation, nor wince to see a foreign flag take the honored place of our stars and stripes. The famine in Ireland—which we are sorry for—and the rain—which we are thankful for—did us the good turn to spare us a most un-American exhibition.

There is a society in this city called the Theanthropic Society—a society which, we presume from its nomenclature, deals with such topics as are supposed to bear relation to both Deity and man. This society holds weekly reunions of a Sunday, at a public hall, which are attended by those searchers after truth who adorn and grace this cosmopolitan community. A subject of very grave importance is under discussion at present, and has been for the last two Sundays: no less a one, in fact, than the character of David—the David—the David of history; the man of genius as well as the "bad" man. He is prosecuted with vim and animosity by white-bearded atheists; defended with spleen and enthusiasm by red-faced parsons and moderate rabbins. On the whole he gets what is called, in colloquial parlance, a "pretty rough deal." The Theanthropic Society have played a good card in David. The fact that he played the devil with the decalogue is alone sufficient to draw a good house. The house last Sunday was crammed—five hundred men and four ladies. When a certain reverend doctor, in the heat of zeal, employed a very cogent ad hominem argument in the case of Bathsheba, the five hundred men roared, and three out of the four women shook the sawdust from their feet and tramped majestically out. Nature triumphed, but prudery was dissatisfied. Alas! poor David.

SECTION 423. Any person who shall, in a public speech, in the presence of twenty-five or more persons, use any profane or obscene language, or who shall, in such speech, advise or encourage any act of criminal violence against persons or property, or who shall, in such speech, advise or encourage the forcible execution of any law except by the regularly constituted authorities charged with that duty, or forcible resistance to the proper execution of any law, or who shall, in such public speech, advise or encourage any person or persons to molest or interfere with any other person in the lawful enjoyment of his property or in the carrying on of his lawful business, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished accordingly. This Act shall take effect immediately.

The foregoing section, prepared by Assemblyman Tyler, is on its face a clear and unequivocal phrasing of a necessary protective measure. Some such law ought to have been on our statute-books long ago. Such a law, rigidly enforced, would have made Kearney impossible. If we had been so governed a year ago, Kalloch would now be devoting his entire attention to preaching—"and sich."

"Love your enemies; bless those who curse you, and do good to those who despitefully use you and persecute you." Vide the following letter:

DAVID BUSH, Esq.—Dear Sir: The Chinese residents are not unmindful that there are many honest work-people here that have families who are in need of the necessities of life to keep hunger from their homes; and while we are aiding our own distressed countrymen to reach the same end your noble efforts are aimed at, not desiring to be exclusive in aiding the distressed, we enclose a check, the amount to be expended in the good work as your judgment directs, with great respect,
Yours, respectfully, CHINESE

CERTAIN PHASES OF THE CHINESE QUESTION.

From "The Californian" for March.

(The able article by General John F. Miller, discussing certain phases of the Chinese question, is herewith reproduced from the March number of the Californian. The paper has attracted considerable attention in the Eastern States, having been extensively reviewed by the newspapers, and sought for in all quarters as a plain, truthful, straightforward, and most temperate statement of the social features of the Chinese problem. The article will be particularly interesting to the believers in the "man and a brother" doctrine.)

In the discussion of this question, it has been asserted on the one side with much apparent confidence—and as vehemently denied on the other—that the opposition to Chinese immigration is confined to political demagogues, ignorant foreigners, and the vicious, unlettered element of California society. While this contention is of but little importance in the process of solution of the main question, which must be settled from considerations higher than are to be found in the character of the advocates upon either side, still it was deemed expedient to make an attempt to eliminate the question of character from the discussion by definitely showing what proportion of our people, honest or dishonest, were for Chinese immigration, and what proportion were against it. To this end, the people of this State were recently requested, by a statute law, to express their opinions upon the main question by ballot. The response was general; and when the ballots were counted, there were found to be 883 votes for Chinese immigration, and 154,638 against it.

This action will probably be regarded as decisive of all it was intended or expected to settle, but this is not all. California has, with surprising unanimity and supreme earnestness, after exhaustive discussion and passionless deliberation, declared, by this, the best method known to a free people, in favor of a policy of exclusion toward certain classes of Chinese immigrants. What shall be the influence of this declaration—so deliberately made—upon the minds of those who are charged with the ultimate solution of the great problem, is a question which must bide its time for answer. It may be important to note, however, that this action is taken by a people who are not unmindful of the spectacle which they, in themselves, present. This stand is taken in plain view of all mankind, and is maintained without a blush, in the full blaze of the civilization of the nineteenth century. Is it the attitude of ignorant defiance of the world's opinion? or is it the earnest, dignified protest of a spirited people? Does it display base motives, an illiberal, unreasoning spirit and temper? or is it the expression of honest, intelligent men, who believe they are in the right, and realize what they are doing? These questions must be answered sooner or later; California must yet be justified in this position, or stand abashed and humiliated before the civilized world. The situation is interesting, if not dramatic, and challenges the attention of American publicists and statesmen. Such an attitude would never have been assumed by any people of average intelligence without some good reason, and it is to be presumed that some individuals of the one hundred and fifty-four thousand who voted for Chinese exclusion, are able to give their reasons for this action. Many of these reasons have been given, and repeated in almost endless forms of reiteration, until it is perhaps impossible to present anything new, either in fact or argument, upon the subject. Some of the reasons which have been given are founded upon considerations of public policy, others upon moral duty, others upon principles of economic science; but the general foundation of all is, perhaps, in that higher law, which is the oldest of all human laws, the law of self-preservation. The people believe themselves to be engaged in an "irrepressible conflict." The two great and diverse civilizations of the earth have finally met on the California shore of the Pacific. This is a consummation which was prophetically seen by philosophers long ages ago, and which was expected to mark a most important epoch in the history of mankind.

Speaking of this event in the United States Senate, session of 1852, William H. Seward characterized it as "the reunion of the two civilizations, which, parting on the plains of Asia four thousand years ago, and traveling in opposite directions around the world, now meet again on the coasts and islands of the Pacific Ocean." He then adds: "Certainly no mere human event of equal dignity and importance has ever occurred on the earth." In this connection he made the prediction that this great event would be "followed by the equalization of the condition of society, and the restoration of the unity of the human family."

The first fruits of this process of "the equalization of the condition of society" are now visible in California, and the public judgment is, that this equalization of condition and the "restoration of the unity of the human family," so far as it relates to the antipodean peoples who have here met, will be effected—if at all—at the expense of the life of Anglo-Saxon civilization. The two civilizations which have here met are of diverse elements and characteristics; each the result of evolution under contrariant conditions—the outgrowth of the centuries—and so radically antagonistic that any merging together or unity of them now seems impossible. Experience thus far indicates pretty clearly that the attempt will result in the displacement or extinction of one or the other. They can no more mix than oil and water—neither can absorb the other. They may exist side by side for a time, as they have endured here for nearly thirty years; for let it be understood that there is a small but growing province of China on the Pacific Coast; and that in the very heart of our metropolis there is the City of Canton in miniature, with its hideous gods, its opium dens, its slimy dungeons, and its concentrated nastiness.

The Chinese have existed here for more than a quarter of a century, in an organization as complete as any among men—displaying every characteristic of Chinese civilization; subjected all this time to the influence and example of western civilization, modern thought, American laws, and Christian teaching, and they have remained changeless and unchangeable; as immutable in form, feature, and character as if they had been moulded like iron statues when made, and never "of woman born"; as fixed in habit, method, and manner as if, in their daily lives, they were but executing some monstrous decree of fate. With their beathen temples, which they have here set up, they brought also a code of laws, which their chiefs enforce upon their people with relentless ferocity, under the sanction of penalties the most dreadful, imposed by secret tribunals, who are enabled, under the concealment of an unattainable dialect and other hidden ways, to execute their decrees in the very shadow of our City Hall—within pistol-shot of the office of our Chief of Police. They exist here under a Chinese system of government not unlike that under which they lived on the banks of the Se-Keang; and this in spite of American laws, and in defiant contempt of American police. Thus far, no visible impression has been made here upon the Chinese, or their peculiar civilization. Their modes of life are the same that they and their ancestors have for fifty centuries pursued, in their fierce struggle with nature for subsistence. Here we have found the Chinaman utterly unable to emerge from the character which has been stamped upon him and ground into him by habit and a heredity as old as the records of man. He seems powerless to be other than he is, and he would not be other than he is if he could.

It is a fact of history that wherever Chinese have gone they have taken their habits, their methods, their civilization with them, and have never lost them. Other peoples go abroad, and sooner or later adopt the civilization and habits of those by whom they are surrounded, and are absorbed in the mass of humanity with which they have come in contact. The European immigrants, within a short time after their arrival in America, become Americanized, and their descendants are genuine Americans. The Chinese are always Chinese, and their offspring born on American soil are Chinese in every characteristic of mind, form, feature, and habit, precisely the same as their ancestors. We have not only our experience of thirty years with the Chinese, but numerous historical examples of like character, all tending to prove that the Chinese are perfectly unimpressionable; that no impression has been or can be made upon the civilization which here confronts ours.

These questions here arise: If we continue to admit this immigration until the Chinese form a considerable part of our population, what impression will they make upon the American people? and what will be the effect upon Anglo-Saxon civilization? Can the two civilizations endure side by side as two separate forces? If not, which will predominate? When the end comes for one or the other, which will be found to have survived? All these queries presuppose that the present unique experiment will be permitted to proceed. But it is not probable that the American will abandon his civilization and adopt that of the Chinese. It is quite as impossible for him to become such a man as the Chinaman is, as it is improbable that the Chinaman will become such as the American is. Nor is it probable that the American will abandon his country and give it up to the Chinaman. Can these two meet half-way? Can a race half Chinese and half American be imagined? A civilization half Anglo-Saxon and half Chinese? It is possible that the experiment now going on will be brought to a halt before it comes to that point. This attempt to take in China by absorption is likely to result in an epidemic of "black vomit." Is it not manifest that at some time in the future—should Chinese immigration continue—a policy of exclusion toward these people must and will be adopted in the fulfillment of the law of self-preservation? Why not adopt it now?

It is said in answer to all this that the Chinese do not come in sufficient numbers to in any way disturb the equilibrium of American society or threaten American institutions; that there is no danger of any large immigration of Chinese; that they have a right to come under treaty stipulation; and much more which involves considerations of moral and religious duty, and which the limits of a single article forbid us to mention or discuss.

That an exodus from the province of Kwang Tung in China has begun can not be denied, and that more than enough of these adventurers to form the population of a new State of the Union are actually in the United States will not be disputed. They have entered California because it is the nearest of all the States, and most accessible. They would thrive just as well in any of the States of the Union, and this they are rapidly finding out. They are coming in numbers exactly proportionate to the openings for them, and those who have been here the longest, and are the most intelligent and opulent, are engaged in creating new openings. At first nearly all who came were mere laborers of the lowest order, men who only sought labor under the direction of superiors. The American was then the superior who directed their labor; but now there are thousands of Chinese proprietors and managers in California who direct the labor of their fellows as skillfully and successfully as ever the Americans were able to do. These have entered into competition with American employers, and thus not only furnish labor for their countrymen, but force the American proprietors to employ labor of the same grade. Many American proprietors have refused and still refuse to give employment to Chinese, but it is found that this practice of self-denial for the common good is at the cost of fortunes, and that it has no appreciable effect upon Chinese immigration. It only serves to multiply Chinese proprietors and new openings, and the Chinese continue to pour in as before.

All the Chinaman needs to make him an employer is capital. The accumulations of past years are now being used as proprietary stock, and the disposition to so use them is rapidly growing. Skilled in handiwork, they have only to learn how to apply it, and they are as competent to direct labor as any proprietors. For example, they learned at low wages the whole business of making American shoes and cigars. Now the shoe-factories and the cigar-factories of San Francisco are, for the most part, carried on by Chinese, and their former employers are driven from the business. Having been trained at home in the art of wrestling from the earth the largest possible production, and seeing here what sorts of the earth's produce are of greatest value, they have become the autocrats of the garden, and our markets teem with the fruits of their tillage; none but a few Italians being left to contend against them in gardening. They have, in the same way, come to understand the intricacies and the whole art of field husbandry, and now they begin to appear as farmers and landed proprietors. Even the American who employs the Chinese as laborers finds that he can not compete with these, because the Chinese farmer brings raw recruits from China for his farm, by a process unknown to the American; and, being bound to him by contracts, made in China, for a term of years—which to break involves more to them than life itself—they gladly and faithfully work for three dollars a month. This statement can be easily verified. It is asserted by those who know, that there are many young Chinese now working for Chinese employers on the low lands bordering the Sacramento, for three dollars per month, under contracts such as are described above.

Practically, China is the great slave-pen from whence laborers for this country are being drawn; and there are myriads now ready, and only stand waiting for the beck and sign of Chinese chiefs, to come and toil like galley-slaves for wages upon which an American laborer would starve. Even here, in this sparsely settled region, successful competition by white men with Chinese, either as laborers or proprietors, is found to be impracticable, in all the employments and industries involving manual labor in which the test has been made, and particularly in all light employments hitherto filled by women and young people. The immediate effect of this is seen in the tardy increase of our white population. The ratio of increase is not now equal to that of natural increase without the aid of immigration. White immigration to California has ceased, or if not entirely stopped, it is more than balanced by emigration. It is open to observation that thousands of our white laborers are quitting California to escape Chinese competition, and are moving upon the northern Territories, where but few Chinese have yet penetrated; for the Chinaman is not the fearless pioneer who first subdues the forest or makes the desolate plain to blossom. He waits until others have won the conquest of nature, and then he comes and thrives in the contact with other men. The process of the displacement of the Caucasian and the planting of the Chinese instead, has here begun, and it is going on, slowly it may be, but steadily, with the silent, inexorable movement of time. And this process will continue until a crisis is reached and passed, and a new departure is made in our civil polity as respects immigration.

How the Chinese are able to thus supplant white men in their own country has often been explained. Volumes have been printed illustrative of the phenomenon, and explanatory of the possibility of a thing which at first would seem improbable. The clearest and most satisfactory exposition of this branch of the subject which has yet appeared, perhaps, is by an able writer in the North American Review for June, 1878—Mr. M. J. Dee. He shows, by scientific reasoning and fact, that it is not the highest, most vigorous, or enlightened type of man that always survives in the struggle for subsistence: "He may conquer an inferior people, and govern them for a time, but if they can produce as much as he by their labor, and are content to live on much less, he will either become like them in course of time, or disappear." Applying this to the Chinese, he shows that it is their revolting characteristics which make them formidable in the contest for survival with other races of men: "His miserable little figure, his pinched and wretched way of living, his slavish and tireless industry, his indifference to high and costly pleasures which our civilization almost makes necessities, his capacity to live in swarms in wretched dens where the white man would rot if he did not suffocate." The method of the Chinese is also graphically described by Hon. A. A. Sargent, in a speech delivered before the United States Senate in March, 1878: "The Chinese work for wages that will not support a white laborer's family, being themselves well fed on a handful of rice, a little refuse pork and desiccated fish, costing but a few cents a day; and, lodged in a pig-sty, they become affluent according to their standard on wages that would beggar an American."

In the long warfare of his race for the means of existence the physical character of the Chinaman has become adapted to the very smallest needs of human life, and with a capacity for the largest labor. He is a man of iron, whom neither heat nor cold seems to affect; of obtuse nerve, and of that machine-like quality which never tires. His range of food is the widest of all known animals—embracing as it does the whole vegetable kingdom, and including every beast of the earth and creeping thing, and all creatures of the sea, from the tiny shrimp to the great leviathan of the deep. He can subsist on anything, and almost upon nothing. He has brought with him the Chinese science of sustaining human life, and he shows no disposition to lose it. The white man can not acquire it and does not want it. He could only get it by an experience such as the Chinese have gathered in the long ages of their history. This represents in some degree the advantages which the Chinese have over our race in the battle for the "survival of the fittest." When we reflect upon the time it has taken the Chinese to train their bodies down to their present state, in which they possess the capacity for labor and the power of endurance equal to that of the most stalwart races, at the same time possessing such a marvelous vital organism and digestive machinery that they are enabled to subsist on less than half the food necessary to sustain life in other men, we begin to see the impossibility of the American Caucasian ever coming to the Chinese standard in these respects; and when we think of what that training has cost—of the pinching hunger, ceaseless, grinding toil, the human misery, the unspeakable horrors of that long, doleful agony of the ages, which has made the Chinese what they are—the mind shrinks from the contemplation of the possibility of such a fate for the Anglo-Saxon race on this continent.

Those who affect to believe the territory of the United States sufficient in extent and fertility to afford a home for all mankind, and stretch forth their arms in generous invitation and welcome to all sorts of people, have probably never thought much of the future of their country, nor considered well the interest of posterity. Suppose all immigration to be now stopped, how long a time would elapse until the United States should be, by natural increase alone, as densely populated as any European State? Malthus cited the United States as an example in which the natural increase of the human race is in a geometrical ratio, fixing twenty-five years as the term in which the population doubles itself. Macaulay approves this estimate. Adam Smith wrote that "in North America it has been found that the population doubles in twenty or twenty-five years." The general estimate, by those who have given the subject attention, is, that a healthy, vigorous population will, under favorable conditions as to food, climate, and space, double itself by natural increase every twenty-five years. Our census returns do not probably prove the exact correctness of this statement, if applied to the United States, but the estimate is not far out of the way. Taking, then, thirty years as the term in which the population of this country would double, without the aid of immigration, we should have in sixty years one hundred and eighty millions of people. Permitting immigration, but limiting it to European peoples alone, we should unquestionably have that number within sixty years—perhaps within fifty years. Supposing the territorial area of the United States to remain the same it now is, long before the second centennial year the question of subsistence will have become the "burning question" of the time. The grandchildren of many who now so benevolently invite Chinese immigration may find it difficult to obtain a homestead, even upon the bleak, gravelly plains of the great "American Desert."

It is perhaps an open question now, whether the United States as a nation has or has not come to that condition, in which invitations and inducements to immigration from any quarter are unnecessary and mischievous. It is certain that immigration is not a necessary aid for the settlement of the country embraced within the present national boundaries, for by natural increase alone of the present stock this area will, within a century, become so crowded that the conquest of the whole continent will be regarded as a necessary measure of relief. Since it is clear that the country is not large enough, and can not be so extended (without making republican government impossible) as to accommodate a moiety of the human race who desire to come, is it not time to begin a rational discrimination among the varieties of men who are crowding in upon us? Or is it to be said that there is no choice among the races of men, and that all immigrants are equally desirable? Or, if it be admitted that some sorts are more desirable than others, has the nation no power of discrimination? After what may be considered a patient trial, the Americans of the Pacific States are of the opinion, that there is a vast difference between the varieties of men who come to the western shore, and that of all the bad sorts who have come and continue to come, the Chinese are the worst. They believe also that the nation has the power to discriminate against these, and that the time has come to exert that power.

It ought not to be forgotten, in considering this subject, that man is in a certain sense an animal—that there are different types of men as there are various breeds of a particular kind of animal, and that from climatic causes, the character, quality, and variety of food, the influence of employment, of care, shelter, particular habits, and other causes, some of these types in the process of evolution have attained to a higher plane in life than others, just as some breeds or strains of the same kind of animal are found to be better than others; that the lower types of men, as in the case of other animals, generally under like conditions, increase most rapidly, and that the tendency is therefore toward a predominance in point of numbers of the lower types, where there is no intelligent interposition or restraint. It has come to be regarded as axiomatic that the increase of animal life, including man, within any particular environment, is limited only by the means of subsistence.

In considering the question of moral duty in the alleviation of the distress which has resulted in China from overpopulation, by inviting immigration hither, it is well to remember that the Chinese have abundantly illustrated the foregoing axiom. They are a type of humanity who have increased and kept up to the utmost limit of the means of subsistence, never practicing any intelligent restraint, but just as fast as the pressure of want has been relieved by emigration to this and other countries, or in any other mode, the measure of increase has been again filled; so that, in fact, emigration is but a temporary relief to those who remain at home, and furnishes to such a people no permanent alleviation. The emigrants are alone benefited, and this, as we have seen, is at the expense of our own people. If twenty million Chinese were to emigrate to America as fast as ships could be found to carry them, their places would be again filled in China by natural increase within a short period, and the immigrants would supplant an equal number of white people in this country. The benevolence which prompts the unlimited admission of these millions into our country is misdirected, for the effect of it is simply to aid the increase and distribution over the earth's surface of an inferior variety of man, and to check the increase and distribution of a superior type. It makes China the breeding ground for peopling America, and that, too, from a bad and scrub stock. The effect of this proceeding upon our own race and people, and the institutions they have here established, is the matter of supreme importance. "Charity should begin at home."

Not are we alone to consider the immediate effect of the presence of the Chinese as a part of our population, but we must look beyond that, and think of the elements which they will infuse into our society as progenitors. With that heredity which moulds and forms and directs the Chinaman, which is his life and being, and from which he can never escape, it makes no difference whether the child of Chinese parentage is born in the United States or in the Mountains of the Moon, he will be a Chinaman still. It is in the blood. There can be no mixture of that blood with the Caucasian without the deterioration of the latter race. At present there does not seem to be very great danger of the mixture, but should the Chinese continue to come as they now come, it will in time take place. It is not the fault of the Chinese that marriages with whites have been so rare. In their civilization woman is a chattel. The Chinaman's title to his wife is "title by purchase." Numerous attempts have been made in California to acquire this title to white women, but generally without success. While Chinese women in California bring, in the Chinese market, for wives, from five to six hundred dollars, as high as three thousand dollars is known to have been offered by Chinamen for a white woman as a wife, and frequently one thousand to fifteen hundred dollars. These are the most notable examples of Chinese extravagance, for they are singularly economical in all else.

Whenever the Chinaman becomes a citizen (and this must follow logically from a policy of unrestricted admission into the country), when he begins to vote and hold office, it is probable that it will not be so difficult to find a wife in the country of his adoption.

But it is vain to pursue this line of inquiry further. The infusion of such an element, whether by one mode or another, into American society, places republican government and free institutions in the face of new dangers. A people who boast a civilization more than six thousand years old, and who have not yet advanced in the evolution of conduct to the conception of moral principles—whose highest achievements in ethical science culminate in the Confucian maxim, "honesty is the best policy," and in whom not a trace of, nor even a substitute for, the moral sense or conscience ever appears—give no promise of attaining to that enlightenment which qualifies a people for republican government and the appreciation of American institutions. If the Chinese came with arms in their hands seeking a conquest of this country by force, what a magnificent spectacle of martial resistance would be presented to the view of an admiring world! The motive and effect of the present peaceful invasion is the same as in the case of an invasion by force. The method by which the conquest is to be accomplished differs, but the result is the same. Resistance by force to one of these modes of invasion would be applauded as the exhibition of the loftiest patriotism and the strongest devotion to the great interests of mankind. Those who should conduct such resistance, and make successful defensive war, would be named the patriots and heroes of the nation.

Why, then, is peaceful resistance to a stealthy, strategic conquest, without force, characterized as illiberal and morally wrong? The motive for resistance is the same in the one case as in the other. It is to save our country from the contaminating influence of the Mongoloid and his civilization. It is to preserve this land for our people and their posterity forever; to protect and defend American institutions and republican government from the Oriental gangrene. And this is the duty of every American citizen. In the words of Cardinal Manning: "It is the duty of every member of a commonwealth to use his utmost power to hinder all evil, and to do all good he can, to the State or people to which he belongs. These are positive and natural duties which he can not fail to discharge without culpable omission, or rather without a dereliction and betrayal of the highest natural duties, next after those which he owes immediately to God." We of this age and country hold republican government and free institutions in trust for Anglo-Saxon posterity. If this Oriental invasion continues by our permission, the trust may be betrayed.

JOHN F. MILLER.

Laundry Reform.

While nearly all kinds of labor have been reduced in price from fifty to nearly a hundred per cent., the charges for laundry work continue to be exorbitant, and they appear even extortionate to the arrivals from other countries. To render matters worse, the odious Chinese have almost a monopoly of this lucrative branch of industry, and, on coming hither, it does not take them long to forget that clothes-washing is done in most parts of China for about twelve cents a dozen, counting large and small pieces promiscuously. We are aware that Asiatic labor—in Asia, not out of it—is the cheapest in the world. The writer, on arriving in Calcutta a number of years ago, and after a long voyage requiring to send some hundreds of articles to a laundry, was asked and gave only two rupees—about a dollar—per hundred pieces for having them washed and ironed. Although the charge was but a cent apiece, he considered that the work was better done than similar work is in San Francisco. Here shirts, for example, are so bestreached as to make the wearer feel like one of Falstaff's "men in buckram," while the manner in which buttons are plowed off with the smoothing-iron is anything but conducive to smoothness of temper. Cleanliness is declared to be next to godliness; but it certainly costs much more in this city to keep the body clean than the soul. Of course, it is not to be expected that laundries should be as free as the seats in some of the churches. Neither should the former be so expensive as to drive a man of small means to hide a garment, which has long lapsed from its immaculate purity, by wearing a scarf which develops from his neck into the elaborate proportion of his chest. Such dodging of dirt is nearly as reprehensible as dodging the "seventeenth" of a prosy preacher. It may be some satisfaction to be able to shake a paper collar—which never has been much of a success from the wash-tub—in the face of the laundryman and say, "You rascal, I've got you here." But no philanthropist has yet invented paper shirts, paper drawers, paper socks, and paper handkerchiefs. What a refreshing thing it would be, and how economical, if, after having done good service to the mind, an Argonaut could be made to do good service to the body! What local Edison is prepared to immortalize himself by inventing a solution from which paper, if immersed therein, would emerge of the consistency and durability of muslin or calico? Seriously, the local laundry-charges are grossly exorbitant. In most parts of Europe such work is done for a shilling—twenty-five cents—a dozen; and, the high price of Spring Valley water to the contrary notwithstanding, there is no valid reason why we should pay nine hundred per cent. more for laundrying than is paid in India or China, and from four to five hundred per cent. more than is paid in Europe. As Denis Kearney and his sand-lotters object to work for a dollar a day, let them supplant the Chinese as laundrymen, and fight shirts (without the disadvantage of there being men inside them) at fifty cents a dozen, and they would make much more than they will get out of the Bush fund.

The lamp-shade fever rages almost as fiercely in Boston as it did in Vienna and London, but ladies seem slow to learn how the pretty things are made. Everybody learns to fold the square twice, into a little square and to cut out a small central square, and then to press the paper through the hands again and again until it is limp and looks like crape, but comparatively few know that a little wringing is what is needed to produce the best effect. The prettiest way to make the double shades is to use cranberry and rose-sublime or light and dark purple paper, and cut the lightest colored paper large enough to fall below the top of the lamp-shade, and to make the dark-colored paper fit tight about its upper rim, and only fall a short distance below the top of the light-colored. The upper squares can be made from the strip left on each sheet of paper after cutting off the large squares, and if the corners be cut from the lighter square used for the shade, the whole, when the gas is lighted, will look like a large morning glory.

That which most flatters the self-esteem of a woman is for a man to love her without daring to tell; provided, always, that this silence is not eternal.

ARTICLES DE PARIS.

"Little Annie, of the Délassements," said the old baron, reflectively, "was the handsomest woman I have ever seen. In her day, when I first remember her, I mean, because since then she has aged a 'good deal'; indeed, for the past two years she has even been dead."

A woman is surprised by her husband reading Dumas's book, The Divorce Question, and closes the book, blushing so that her face does not match with her dress.

"Oh!" she exclaimed hurriedly, "don't think I would; indeed, I give you my word of honor I skipped all the passages marked with galaxies of asterisks in the reviews."

A young woman in mourning passes on the boulevard. Friend (to Calino)—"Young widow, very likely. Do you think there's anything so nice to see as a pretty young widow?"

Calino (with conviction)—"That depends. If she isn't one's own widow, I grant it. Otherwise——"

Local item from the Figaro:

Yesterday, towards three hours, the horse of a vehicle of master, having broken his shafts, was running through at the gallop the street of the Peace. He upset one dame aged, who was transported as soon in a pharmacy. The horse, having traversed the place Vendôme, was seized at the nostrils by a passing at the entry of the street Castiglione, but he could not be mastered until the moment when he was turning in the street of Rivoli. The citizen courageous, of whom the blood-cold had hindered the beast furious to cause maybe several graves accidents, is withdrawn himself to the felicitations of the throng without having made himself acquainted.

There is nothing new under the sun, especially on the stage. In Daudet's play, Le Nabab, "Monpavon," the gommeux, who is afflicted with loss of memory to the very verge of imbecility, calls every one "Thingummy" or "Whatshisname," even alluding to Voltaire as "Chose."

This, after all, was one of the habits of no less potent, grave, and reverend a person than Montesquieu, who burst out one day with: "Where's Thingummy—you know Thingummy as well as I do—Thingummy that used to teach Whatshisname?"

"Thingummy" in this case was the Prime Minister, Cardinal Fleury, and "Whatshisname" was the king, Louis XV., whose instructor the cardinal had been.

Talleyrand's talent for saying an impertinent thing neatly was frequently exercised at the expense of the sovereign he had restored—Louis XVIII. He had sent his wife, from whom he was separated, to England. Under the Décazes Ministry she returned to France in spite of their compact, an event which her husband did not fail to attribute to royal inspiration. The king, with malice aforethought and a touching display of innocence and solicitude, asked the grand chamberlain at his lever if it was true Madame de Talleyrand had returned.

"Perfectly true, sire. It is my little 20th of March," replied Talleyrand.

On still another occasion, Talleyrand cast up to Louis his flight from the Tuileries on Napoleon's return from Elba. He had in the Chamber of Peers opposed the Spanish expedition with such warmth as to fall into complete disgrace, and the king resolved to give him the broadest of broad hints to leave the court.

"Are you not thinking of leaving Paris?" said the king. "No, sire, unless your majesty should be going to Fontainebleau, when I shall have the honor of following, to discharge my duties near your majesty's person."

"I mean," said the king, "do you know how far it is from Paris to Valençay?"

"Sire, it is just fourteen leagues further than from Paris to Ghent."

And when Charles X. said to him on the eve of the Revolution of July: "A sovereign who is menaced has to choose between the throne and the scaffold."

"Your majesty forgets the post-chaise," politely said M. de Talleyrand.

A young lady in Keokuk, Iowa, beautiful, attractive, and daring, received calls from three gentlemen one evening last week, and exerted herself to the utmost to entertain them. The time was spent most agreeably, and in the course of the evening the question of matrimony and leap-year privilege was broached, and culminated in a proposal from the young lady in question to a young medical student. Of course it was made in a jocular manner. They agreed to be married at once, and one of the gentlemen present was called upon to perform the ceremony. It happened that the gentleman who was called upon to tie the nuptial knot was a clergyman, and the groom threatens to place the marriage on record, while the young lady feels so badly over the matter that she has left the city for the West on a visit among friends. She will probably return when she finds out that a marriage is invalid in Iowa unless a license is taken out in advance.

Mr. Beecher does not favor the use of adjectives. In the Christian Union he is reported as saying: "Barrow is the one solitary man speaking the English tongue who was a master of adjectives, and could use them endlessly and never once amiss; for to a large extent adjectives are like leaves on a switch: they make it look pretty, as a branch, but they prevent it striking tinglingly when you use it. They cover up and smother the sense, and a style that is choice in its adjectives is far preferable to one that abounds in adjectives. I recollect a case in which my father, at a public meeting, was appointed to draw up an article. He had written one sentence, 'It is wrong.' Some one in the meeting got up and moved, in his enthusiasm, that this be corrected, and that the sentence read, 'It is exceedingly wrong.' My father got up and said, in his mild way, 'When I was writing into this resolution, in its original shape, the way I wrote it; but, to make it stronger, I took exceedingly.'"

Miss Morris's "Camille," which was given for Mr. Maguire's benefit on Thursday evening, has heretofore been fully noticed in this column. The Two Orphans is rather more suggestive as a peg to hang a screed upon.

When Mr. Wilkie Collins obliges us with a new novel, those who are wise will hasten to put themselves into the proper mental attitude for devouring it, buy a copy (in paper cover—price 75 cents), square away for a long evening's read, finish the volume in the small hours, and shy it into the wood-box. We have had our money's worth. And so long as Providence shall continue to bless us with faculties undimmed and digestion unimpaired, we want never to see that work again. Yet it was clever in its way—really, very clever; the plot is ingenious, the interest quite absorbing. We track this to the end of the book, and—shy it into the wood-box. For the plot was all there was in it, and in solving its conundrums we pick the nut. The Two Orphans is a specimen of a kind of plays out of which one may in like fashion get a remunerative share of pleasure and profit—once. A clever plot; dramatic development; picturesque setting and dressing; episodes both stirring and pathetic—in fact, a line of sustained pathos; respectable dialogue: the whole play is at once pleasing to the outward eye, while keeping alive, without any flagging, the interest awakened in its opening scene. But so also did Mr. Collins's novel, which possessed, in its different way, even superior merits, and which we consigned to the wood-box. Shall we do otherwise with the play? And yet on this performance they have thrown away at Baldwin's—actually tossed away by handfuls—more good acting than would have been carried a first-class comedy: excellent, admirable, "way-up acting"—done to empty seats and echoing walls.

There is a deal of comfort in making one in an audience of six-and-twenty: stage-boxes empty, two lonesome females and a peppering of men in the orchestra, nine strays in the circle, and some dejected cherubim aloft. Here you may settle to a thorough, selfish enjoyment of the play. You seem to come into a sort of personal relation with the players; you know how they feel up there, and you feel a thin glow of friendliness stealing on. How sympathetically you follow each performer through his part, and warm to his successes, and condone his shortcomings. They are only small shortcomings—errors of the head, not heart; he means well—oh, excellently well—the rogue. Even the stick—the man who doesn't know quite what to do with his hands—awakens an unresentful interest; you watch those hands, and would not have them one whit less big or useless than they are. There is something pastoral in the moral atmosphere of a lighted, empty theatre. It is not lonely, any more than the woods and glades are lonely. Even in the odors of the place there are faint balsamic hints, beguiling you to commune. To allay his surging passions, young John Chivery used to withdraw amidst the linen on the clothes-lines; it reminded him, he said, of "groves." That's the idea—Groves. That's the way we enjoyed the Two Orphans at Baldwin's.

There appears to be an actress coming on at Baldwin's—a plump and pleasing person. With Miss Baudet's advantages in this way, it does not call for much of an actress to be a good deal of a success. The young lady is giving an amount of promise that has got to be interesting. Any answer to the question, Have we an actress among us? is more momentous than most people are apt to think.

"David Garrick," originally personated by Mr. Sothern, is an admirably finished piece of work. Just how his best effects are produced, it would not be easy to define. The actor stands there in propria persona, is seen to catch the clue to the old father's dilemma, throws himself into the spirit of his own plot, and carries it through to its not tearless climax with thoroughly honest and gentlemanlike feeling. This is what the "Garrick" of the play is meant to do, and what Mr. Sothern appears to do. If the part gives the impression only of a thoroughly wrought, and not of a brilliant one, one reason is, because Mr. Robertson was not Sheridan—to say nothing of Mr. Sothern's not being Garrick. The comedy is a fairly clever fancy, neatly worked out, and owes quite as much to the actor as to the author. The one old objection to it can never be subdued. We all know Garrick so familiarly that it is out of the question to lend one's self to any sense of reality in what is going on. You might as well have a play marrying Dr. Goldsmith to Mrs. Clive: it would be quite the same thing. (Not a bad notion—that! but no need play "Clive"? Might not David Garrick do better if it were called Barry, the Actor, and Spranger made the hero instead of David? The change would be reasonable. Certainly more women did fall in love with the handsome Barry than with the brilliant Garrick. As a lady who acted with both has told us—"In 'Romeo' she thought Garrick would have leaped into the balcony to her, while she felt that she must leap out of it to Barry." True, "Evelina" confesses that she herself longed to rush on the stage to Garrick—or in words to that effect. But really something ought to be attempted to relieve this pleasing comedy of its hopeless and oppressive unreality.

All Mr. Robertson's work is comedy of manners, and of good manners; most of it is also comedy of mere manners. To this rule David Garrick is the only exception, in so far as its theme is one of the perennials—viz., a girl falling in love with an actor. We fall in love with actresses, and if the inducement suffice, they espouse us. Witness, Her Grace of Bolton, the Countesses of Derby, Essex, Harrington, and Craven, Ladies Bacher and Thurlow, Mistresses Coutts, Martin, Sartoris, and the rest of that long list; or else they are good enough to produce noble lines of Fitz-Clarences, or even a Canning—last of English statesmen. Beauty being their prime qualification for this elevation, the effect produced on the stock of an opulentocracy should be inestimable. And the actors who fascinate girls commonly possess the same valuable qualification, but the dear creatures are restrained from yielding to their passion. The actor may be bought off, like John Kemble, who also got huddled out of the price; or if he marry, like "Gentleman" Smith, finds his wife dropped by the family. However, the essence of the theme of Mr. Robertson's play is not the matrimonial climax (which may or may not ensue), but the falling in love by an individual in front of the stage with another upon it: that is perennial, and will be found as green and hale a century hence as it is to-day, and was a century ago, when Garrick and Barry, Pope and Bellamy inflamed the hearts of the inimical sex, and brave old Johnson forsook the green-room, where "the white bosoms of your actresses, Davy," assailed his rugged rectitude.

But the language of this comedy is not the language of the people personated at the period assumed. If it were, we should not tolerate it. What such language would have been, may be read in "Evelina's" account of the Branghton family. The language in the play is the language of our own day and generation fitted on people of that, and Mr. Sothern should tone down the acting of his party of cits to fit it; or else, let him shave his own mustache! If verisimilitude be the object in view, the manners they portray are probably no exaggeration; but if verisimilitude be the aim, let Mr. Sothern shave his mustache! The make-up of the party is admirable, and their reproduction of a lost form of vulgarity is doubtless a just one; but this appears as much an anachronism on our stage as their lost lingo would be. A propos of which, it was fascinating to hear the lady who did "Araminta" introduce the word "botany" into her speech—a word which it is fairly certain that a woman then in "Araminta's" walk of life would have never heard; and further, had she meant to use its equivalent, she would have spoken of "her berhal," and pronounced it "arbal." It is safest in these matters to assume that Mr. Robertson was aware of all that his characters had any need to speak. No: reflection only makes it more plain, that the imperfect and defective archaism of the dining party will bear toning to a more recent pitch. We need not go in too vehemently for the congruities till "David Garrick" shaves his—shaves his—O Lord, "David Garrick" with a mustache!

Well, it is likely that David Garrick will continue to be played when Ours shall have become strange and tame, and Caste and School successively, though perhaps more gradually, dropped. Doubt it? Why are my lord "Poppington" and "Letitia Hardy" played no more? There is more meat on either of the two comedies in which they figure than on all of Mr. Robertson's pieces de resistance. But those, like these, are essentially comedies of mere manners, and not of manhood; they have fallen musty with the fashion they reflected, and we do not want them any more. While, on the other hand, David Garrick, as a comedy of life, may remain fresh and sweet for the delectation of our grandchildren.

Home, in which Mr. Sothern is the original "Captain John White," will hardly survive any of Robertson's more ambitious work. Like all the rest, it is quite charming as played, on account of some love-making—chiefly mute, and portrayed in explicable dumb-show. Granting that your love-making in real life hath always been of this ancient and fish-like fashion—for

"The mute I'll fish, Though they can't speak, they wish—"

yet your older dramatist thought needful to voice his love volubly. If now, scenes of passion and tenderness are to be languaged in two ejaculations and an "aside," employed to punctuate protracted "business" of spilling the music-sheets and assuming to blush, it is obvious that the future will command its own dramatic talent adequate to the production of its own comedy. Granting this, in turn, why should Home be played in the year 1900? There is one reason, and just one, viz., that some duffer will then be giving his copy of Sothern's "Captain John White."

And however many good new things they may be having A. D. 1900, it is likely that few of them will be better than that duffer's second-hand Sothern. This reflection is commended to the thoughtful attention of professional duffers, now young.

Worshipful Sacramento.

SUNDAY, March 14, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—We wonder if it will be breaking the Sabbath if we gossip to you, and that gossip concern our good churches?

We never owned a pew, we do not attend any church in particular, nor with regularity. The fault is in ourselves; we are blind to our own good. It's generally the way with all of us: stupidly, obstinately blind to what are our own benefits, we invariably tread the path that leads us to sorrow, when the pathway of contentment is just as handy, just as inviting. We invariably choose the friends that will betray, and snub those who would be true. We invariably look at the crooked, mysterious side of religion, and overlook all that is plain and beautiful.

But we heard Dr. Dwinell to-day—the pastor who has presided over the Congregational church for seventeen years. He told us how nearly nature is allied to God; and looking at him, we wondered why we all could not be as good and true to our better natures as this venerable, white-haired old man. I saw in the audience the calm, white face of an elderly lady; the kind, blue eyes looked so trustfully up at our minister; the white hair was smoothed so placidly over the brow; and this made another problem: had life gone smoothly, evenly with her? Her face said so; but we don't believe it had. We think she was one who has had the fortitude to bear his burdens bravely, and has trusted in something higher than pigmy man. We have the best choir in the city at this church. Four young, good voices sing praise. Godwin McNeill, bass; Jennie Woods, contralto; Mary Milliken, soprano; and Mr. Crandall, tenor. We think if we could always watch Dr. Dwinell's good face, and this quartet would forever warble their sweet strains in our ears, heaven wouldn't be so hard to gain.

Professor Maxham and Rev. Mr. De Witt are making a stir at the Baptist church this month, aided, of course, by its minister, Rev. Mr. Frost. They are holding revivals, and if any one could tempt one to embrace the good side it's Pastor Frost. He looks to be such a hearty, healthy representative of religion. You know, perhaps, he's the very largest man in town, perfectly grand in his proportions, and he talks so earnestly and frankly, as if he believed every word he said, and was determined upon making you believe also. And then he is assisted now by this Professor Maxham, who sings exquisitely, and who draws crowds every night to bear his tenor singing. He sings during the services charming little solos, which, if they are religious in tone, and might not please the popular taste as well as "Bahies on our Block" are unusually fine, and affect one strangely.

Heigho! Monday morning, with all the bustle and business of the week commenced anew! Work rushes, men push, children laugh and scream, and one hundred chances to one, if the good resolutions of peaceful yesterday aren't forgotten in the pell-mell of hasty to-day. We are all so fickle; 'tis so easy to do the right thing, surrounded by right influences, and so easy to so humanly err, when every day, with all its glare and self and temptations, crowd on you. Well, enough for moralizing—we can afford that once a week; but friend, you know, one never says on Monday what one says on Sunday; one never says in broad noon what one does in languorous moonlight!

There's a musical society here, called the Philharmonics. Perhaps a hundred voices have joined, and occasionally they give a public concert. We attended one last week, which was certainly very creditable, and showed marked progress in music. 'Tis so very pleasant, having these literary and musical and artistic societies; it tones down and smooths out the rough edges of life so!

And, indeed, every one you meet nowadays has some hobby or other. Either they are head over heels in painting, and filling their homes with all those pretty artistic things, or they are working hard in music, and occasionally a would-be prima donna comes out; or they are studying French, or German, or Spanish, and throw foreign idioms at you promiscuously; or they are embroidering every article of wearing apparel in chenille; and all the ladies, and some gentlemen, have some such thing to engross their spare moments. It's perfectly astonishing how industriously every one is becoming.

"'Twas whispered one morning in"—the school-room, that some half-a-dozen of our lady teachers are to tie themselves in the nuptial knot at the end of the school year; and we wish them as much success in their new school as they have gained in the old.

But, au revoir; this letter is bidding fair to be perpetual.

BETSY AND I.

Music may be defined as the science of accords, but it proves in actual fact to be the science of discords—one of the last great rows is in Cincinnati, between Theodore Thomas and Nicbols.

Alphonse Karr—Love is a bird which sings to the heart of woman.

THE PIPER.

CONTEMPORANEOUS HUMAN NONSENSE EXERCISED UPON AN UNCIVILIZED SORT OF SIMPKINS.

The following suggestion for a new libretto—so very new that its freshness suggests the emerald—is one of the best of many recent clever skits at the class of work which libretto writers so persistently foist upon a long-suffering public. For this example the ballad man of the New York World is responsible:

Simple Simkins, simple piper,
Pipe no more—your art is vain;
I have climbed to 'ther, riper
Music, and I hate that strain.

Any piper born would botch a symphony;
Tityrus himself, though bright the day,
Though he lent to either laughing nymph a knee,
Made but squalid music, I dare say.

Is it lies, you ask the poets,
Tell of simple strains like those?
Why, of course, you goose, you know it's
Bosh, or else it would be prose.

Tell me, Simkins, would you take your clothing off,
Deck your old and baldish head with greens,
Sit on saw-logs—buss I know your loathing of—
And be happy? Not by any means.

Like to see your legs in marble,
Do you think? and talk with gods?
Drop, fat Simkins, drop that hor'ble
Pipe, and talk to me. What odds?

I can do a lot of things that Zeus couldn't,
Hoary, clumsy heathen that he was.
Hairy Pan his whistle there's no use tootin',
When Apollo would be dumb with us.

Tears, soft Simkins? Tears are idle
Salt and water things, you know;
Up to Color's fountain side,
Drop them there and let them flow.

It is bad political economy
To produce and not to market tears.
Hear me howl so that the meek shall honor me
For melodious anguish all my years.

CATALEPSY—A HOWL IN CORPSE-COLOR.

Music—Piccolos, violins, and trombones.

And must I leave thee, Paradise?

I would not die, not yet;

But grievous 'tis to open placid eyes;

Once more upon a world of discontent,

Once more my soul, the cloistered penitent,

To thrust into the fever and the fret—

I would not live—not yet.

Yet into life ye hurry me—

Nay, I'll not go—not yet!

All I've forgot will rise to bury me

With clods of earthly, weary woes and strife.

Ye dig my peace a grave and call it life!

Death I would rather choose, did death forget—

I will not live—not yet.

Sweet sickness, from thy mastery

Loose me not yet, not yet!

Enwrap I've lain in this soft mystery

As one unborn, as unconceived, undreamed;

Serene, apart, another's soul I seemed

Till, half-awaked to longings and regret,

I can not wake—not yet.

Grim Pain, I had forgotten thee;

Wistest thou for me yet?

Black Care, how long since I had thought on thee!

Stern Hate, stained Love, vain Hope—why, all are here!

I live, then! Had I died! I was so near.

But, as it is, good nurse, some breakfast get—

I would not starve—not yet.

Among the curious and interesting spectacles now offered by the theatres of Paris, the performances of the Spanish dancers at the Théâtre Taitbout may be cited as the most singular and characteristic. Though these dancers failed in London, Paris accepts them. They are some of les vrais Espagnols of which the Marquis de Campo-Tasso sings in Offenbach's opera of Les Brigands. The songs, the costumes, the dances, and above all the great liquid eyes and white teeth of the female performers are all genuinely Spanish. Some of the dances are Oriental in character, and show the influence of the Moorish occupation of Spain. A very curious and interesting scene is that wherein one of the danseuses, dressed as a bull-fighter, reproduces the various phases of a bull-fight: the waving of the cloak to attract and infuriate the animal, the throwing of the bandilleros, the attack, and finally the dealing of the death-stroke. The manoeuvres with the cloak are remarkably graceful. The leading dancer, Mlle. Gomez, is an accomplished artist, and performs her various national dances with an immense amount of dash and vivacity. She bears a strong resemblance to Mrs. Hoey, late of Wallack's Theatre, New York, which is to say that she is a very pretty woman.

Dr. Carver is astonishing the Parisians at the Folies Bergères. His rifle brings him in twenty-five hundred francs a week. He dashes on the stage, mounted on a Mazeppa-looking steed, suddenly wheels and hits two balls tossed toward the ceiling, first one and then the other. Again, holding a mirror in his hand, he hits the mark behind him. A commendable feature of the doctor's performances is that he attempts no shots which endanger life. The Folies Bergères, by the way, is what would be called in America a variety theatre, but it gives a vastly more entertaining programme than the American variety theatre has offered its patrons in recent years. It is at this bouse that the Hanlons—or Hanlon-Lees, as they are now known—always appear when they are in Paris. The place, indeed, depends very much upon England and America for its performers. There are ballets, solo singers, and acrobats; while everybody in the audience smokes and drinks. Unlike the American houses of similar rank, it is handsomely, even luxuriously furnished. On the second floor there is a large space for promenade, with numerous small tables and chairs scattered about.

The churches and the theatres of Washington, D. C., are alike troubled with pickpockets.

We are not in the habit of making editorial mention of patent medicines, but in case of Hop Bitters feel free to do so, because their merits deserve to be known.

A writer in Forney's Progress says: "A French dyer, in business in Moscow, has a charming daughter, but she is as cold as she is beautiful. She not only will have nothing to do with any of the legion of young men who would pay their court to her, but if they write to her she shows their letters to her father, who has not the best of tempers, as may be understood upon reading what follows: A Russian lieutenant fell in love with the young lady, and asked for a rendezvous. When he went to keep the appointment he met the old gentleman, who forthwith dipped him in a large tub of blue dye. He brought the dyer into court, and there that personage swore that the blue was a preparation of his own invention, and could not be removed. He expressed his willingness, however, to dip the lieutenant again in some other color—which might or might not take effect—giving him his choice of shades, but regretted that it was entirely out of the question to restore the natural hue of the average man. The lieutenant has the severest attack of blues ever reported."

"EPILEPTIC FITS"

ST. PAUL, MIN. January 4th, 1878.

JAMES I. FELLOWS, ESQ.

DEAR SIR:—I have deferred writing to you ere this that I might be able to give an account of the effect of your medicine. I can now safely say that it is undoubtedly the best I ever tried, as there can be no doubt that my little girl is in a fair way of recovery, and you must bear in mind that this is a very bad case, and I do honestly believe that had I not given it to her she would have been dead ere this; now she eats hearty and is gaining in flesh, the fits are only partial, and the action of the heart is less terrible. I am, sir, yours very respectfully,

D. WALTER OAKES.

The custom of sending illuminated cards at Easter seems to be getting as popular as is the same at Christmas. The novelties in this line exceed those published during the Christmas holidays. Without doubt the largest as well as best collection of these goods is to be found at Snow & Co.'s, 20 Post Street.

Commerson—Women mistrust men too much in general, and not enough in particular.

French, Spanish, and Italian Conversational Lessons, practical method. Post-office box 1574.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery St.

Hackett & Dean, Dentists, No. 126 Kearny Street, Thurlow Block.

MORSE'S PALACE OF ART, 417 Montgomery St.

GRAND CONCERT BY THE LIEDERKRANZ
At Platt's Hall, April 10.

A. C. EIMER'S "SYMPHONIC"
Mass, under the direction of the composer. Select Soloists, Grand Chorus and Orchestra. Admission, $1. Concert to commence at 8 P. M. sharp.

THE BALDWIN THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER,
R. M. EBERLE.....STAGE MANAGER.

This (Saturday) evening, March 20, and every evening until further notice, production of the most successful comedy of the day,

THE TWO ROSES,

As played at the Vaudeville Theatre, London, over 500 nights.

A VERY POWERFUL CAST

....BY THE....

GREAT BALDWIN COMPANY,
Including Messrs. James O'Neill, Lewis Morrison, J. W. Jennings, C. B. Bishop, and A. D. Bradley.
Misses Jeffreys-Lewis, Eleanor Carey, Jean Clara Walters, etc., etc.

FIRST TWO ROSES MATINEE

This (Saturday) at 2 P. M.

In active preparation,

FRENCH FLATS.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR AND MANAGER.

LAST WEEK BUT ONE OF

MR. SOTHERN

And his

COMPANY OF COMEDIANS.

this (Saturday) and to-morrow (Sunday) evenings, matinee to-day at 2 P. M., last three performances of Robertson's sterling comedy called

HOME,

OL. JOHN WHITE.....MR. SOTHERN.

To conclude with the eccentric comedy,

A REGULAR FIX

UGH DE BRAS.....MR. SOTHERN.

Mr. Sothern in both pieces.

ositively last week of Mr. Sothern, commencing Monday, March 22, and production of Byron's new comedy, called

A HORNET'S NEST,

In 2 Buzzes and a Stinger.

Seats secured one week in advance.

Grand Spring Opening of the Latest Styles of Imported Bonnets, Hats, and Millinery Goods, Tuesday and Wednesday, March 23 and 24, at MADAME SKIDMORE'S, No. 1114 Market Street, between Mason and Taylor.

STORES AND PRIVATE RESIDENCES.

PROTECT YOUR FRONT DOORS AND CARPETS FROM THE SUN by getting

AWNINGS

—AT—

E. DETRICK & CO.'S, NO. 123 CLAY ST.

Call and examine our NEW STYLES for 1880. TENTS and CAMPERS' OUTFITS. Tents let for the Season.

WHITE LEAD.

Use "ATLANTIC" brand, the STANDARD NEW YORK LEAD. Stipulate for it in all your contracts. Do not permit any other to be employed.

Property owners are cautioned against the substitution by Painters of cheap, low-grade Leads, which, owing to inferiority, can be bought for considerably less than the cost of Atlantic brand.

C. T. RAYNOLDS & CO., Sole Agents.

PRANG'S ELEGANT EASTER CARDS

Can be found at
EDWARD T. MARTIN'S,
No. 5 Montgomery Street.

TRADE

MARK

HULLED, CRUSHED, STEAM-COOKED AND DESICCATED AMERICAN

BREAKFAST CEREALS.

A B. C. WHITE WHEAT. A B. C. WHITE OATS.
A B. C. BARLEY FOOD. A B. C. MAIZE.

The most Nutritious, Palatable, and Easily Digested of all Cereal Food.

A Necessity for the Rich, a Luxury for the Poor.

CAN BE PREPARED FOR THE TABLE IN TEN MINUTES.

FOR SALE BY

C. J. HAWLEY & CO.,

BENJ. SCHLOSS & CO.,

LEBENBAUM & CO.,

BOWEN BROS.,

And all first-class groceries. The trade supplied by

JOHN T. CUTTING & CO., Sole Agents,
407 Front Street.

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,

COAL DEALERS.

Office and Yard, 14 Post Street.

Store Yard, 718 Sansome Street.

BRANCH OFFICE.

J. Middleton & Son, 419 Pine Street,

Opposite California Market.

All kinds of coal at lowest rates. Orders may be sent by telephone through any of the company's offices free.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., March 2, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 13, of Seventy-five (75) cents per share, was declared, payable on FRIDAY, March 12, 1880, at the office in this city, or at the Agency of the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, in New York. WM. WILLIS, Secretary. Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE.—THE TRADE AND THE

Public are informed that we receive the Genuine LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAMPAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular Invoice. Each case is marked upon the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRAY & CO.,

Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

SPRING STYLE HATS

NOW INTRODUCED BY

HERRMANN

THE HATTER,

336 KEARNY STREET,

Between Bush and Pine Streets.

BRANCH, 910 MARKET ST., ABOVE STOCKTON.

As regards beauty and number of styles, Herrmann still leads.

Spring Catalogues now ready. Send for copy.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—ESTATE

of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator, at No. 327 Pine Street, in the city of San Francisco, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California. HENRY A. NEWTON, Adm'r of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, Deceased. Dated at San Francisco, March 10, 1880. SAFFOLD & MEUX, Attorneys.

HARLEQUIN PLAYING CARDS

"GEM" PUZZLE!

TWO PUZZLES IN ONE. SOMETHING NEW!

C. BEACH

107 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Etchings and Rare Engravings.

W. K. VICKERY INVITES ATTENTION to his large collection of the above, which includes fine original Engravings from the great Paintings of Europe. Rare Portraits, either in collection or procured. A large number of fine Etchings in stock. Hours: 1 to 5 o'clock.
126 KEARNY ST. (Thurlow Block), San Francisco.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—MARCH STYLES.

Send Stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

REMOVAL.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.

Have removed to

UNION BUILDING,
JUNCTION MARKET AND PINE STREETS.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.,

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S. Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt.

C. F. SHEPHERD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

PACIFIC

SAW MANUFACTURING CO.

17 AND 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

SAWS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

on hand and made to order. Agents for C. B. Paul's Files.

Repairing of all kinds done at short notice.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,

J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

TABER, HARKER & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco.

H. L. DODGE.....L. H. SWEENEY.....J. E. RUGGLES

DODGE, SWEENEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS,

Wholesale Provision Dealers,

....AND....

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Nos. 114 and 116 Market, and 11 and 13 California Sts.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.,

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR

Street.

Liberal advances made on consignments.

J. C. MERRILL & CO

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANT

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON F

LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. San Francisco.

THE GRAPE AND THE ORANGE.

Facts and Figures Regarding their Culture in California.

A valuable essay was read by Mr. De Barth Shorb, of San Gabriel, at the Circus Exhibition at the Riverside Colony. We wish we could reproduce the entire essay with its full argument, instead of the few facts and figures to which our space confines us. The wine interests of California originated with the early missionary fathers at the Mission of San Gabriel in 1772-73; there was planted the first vineyard, and from it were distributed the first vine-cuttings—hence the name, "Mission Grape." "In 1855," says Mr. Arpad Haraszthy, "there were in California 1,500,000 vines; in 1857, 2,250,000; in 1859, 4,000,000. The number of vines now growing in California is estimated at 45,000,000, with 5,000,000 to be added this year." In 1875, Mr. Charles Wetmore says, France produced, of wine, 190,000,000 gallons. The area of land in California, adapted by soil, climate, and conditions, is more than ten times greater than the vine-growing area of France. Our lands are virgin, and practically inexhaustible in extent. The phylloxera is the disease of old age in vines, and it is subject to demonstration that new vines, produced from wild varieties or from the seed planted in new ground, are not liable to this parasite. The consumption of wine is practically unlimited. The world is its market, and ten times 190,000,000 gallons of wine might be sold if California could produce it. In France, the average consumption of wine is about 40 gallons per capita. In America we have 50,000,000 people; to furnish them wine at 40 gallons each would require 2,000,000,000 gallons, and last year California had only 6,000,000 gallons for sale in foreign and Eastern markets. Mr. Shorb makes this estimate of the profit of vine-culture at San Gabriel, where the value of land is from $50 to $60 per acre: "Grape vines, ordinarily pruned, should yield about 8 pounds per vine, or say 8,000 pounds per acre. The cost of pruning, cultivation, picking, and delivering, at convenient distance, should not cost more than from $18 to $20 per acre. I have done the work for less than $18 per acre. I have contracted it done by others for less than $20, and had a faithful performance of the contract. Estimating the cost, therefore, at $20 per acre, and the yield at 8,000 pounds, sold at 1 cent per pound, or $20 per ton, and you have the result of $50 per acre. These figures relate exclusively to the Mission grape. When other varieties are found to be more valuable for wine purposes, as many of them are known to be now, a better price and higher profits will, of course, accrue. I wish also to be understood to refer to the vineyardist's profits only, without regard to the profits of the manufacturer." Vines may be grown in any part of our State, and there are millions of acres of good vine-lands to be purchased for less than $5 per acre.

Mr. Shorb quotes from the Riverside Press and Horticulturist the following tables—for the correctness of which he vouches—regarding the profits of the raisin culture. There is no labor in making raisins that may not be performed by women and children; and there is an unbounded empire of land in the San Joaquin Valley, well adapted to raisin-making, that can be bought (with water) at $20 or $30 per acre:

A correct statement of the raisins made by A. P. Combs from the grapes off Shugart & Waite's vineyard of 890 vines:

275 boxes London layers, at $2.....	$550 00
4 boxes London layers, at $2 50.....	10 00
50 boxes London layers, in hf at $2.15.....	107 50
3 boxes London layers, in hf at $3 00.....	9 00
50 boxes London layers, in qr at $2.35.....	117 50

382		$794 00
CASH PAID OUT.
Grapes.....	$211 25
Teaming.....	10 00
Picking.....	28 00
Boxes.....	52 00
Paper.....	12 10
Inspector's fees.....	5 77
	319 12

Net profit.....$474 88

Mr. R. H. Henderson submits the following as the result obtained by him from two acres of vineyard. The vines were rooted one-year-old slips, planted in the spring of 1877. The crop of raisins made in 1878 was 140 boxes. The crop of raisins made in 1879 was 475 boxes, of which

400 were London layers, sold at $2.....	$800 00
75 layers at $1.50.....	112 50
	$912 50

EXPENSES.

Boxes and paper.....	$63 25
Pruning and watering.....	18 00
Cultivation.....	15 00
Picking.....	35 00
Packing in boxes.....	40 00
	171 25

Net profit.....$741 25
Or, $370 62 per acre.

We will at some other time follow Mr. Shorb into his figures concerning the orange culture, which, in his judgment, is a local industry, and confined to the southern portion of our State. We will venture to express the opinion that the area of land where the orange may be successfully cultivated is much greater than Mr. Shorb believes. The writer has a small orange grove in Marin County that has not been injured by this winter's unprecedented frosts. His limes that were in bearing condition were injured; of his lemon trees only four were injured, and they not badly. The orange trees are promising, bearing their fruit to perfection. Marin County is not as cold in its winters as Naples or Sorrento, where the orange flourishes; and it is our opinion that if the young orange tree is protected beyond its babyhood that it becomes a hardy tree, and will produce fruit in any of the coast or valley counties of our State.

Mr. Shorb gives as the result of his own experiment in growing oranges upon seven acres, for 1877-78, a profit of $8,210 through his commission merchants in San Francisco, Messrs. A. Lusk & Co. This he admits to be an exceptional profit, but says: "I do believe that, by growing good fruit, when the trees have acquired an age of from ten to fifteen years, for all good fruit sold, a result of from $250 to $500 per acre, net, may be obtained."

When the idlers who now throng our cities and clamor for unearned bread shall be willing to go out to the country and labor, there will be no necessity for sand-lot profanity against God, or complaint of unjust laws. Mr. Shorb concludes his address by saying: "From the limited area on which the orange can be successfully grown, and from the fact that the consumption will exceed the supply by the enlargement of our markets, my opinion is, that with us the orange interest will always pay more than the grape interest per acre. For the State, and nationally considered, the grape will become the great overshadowing interest, dwarfing in its great results the orange, cereals, and bullion yield combined. I believe this will occur before the close of this century. When all our warm valleys are planted in orange, lime, and lemon, when all our sunlit hills are covered with the graceful vine pouring forth rich treasures into the lap of the individual owner, county, State, and nation, then will you have heard the last murmurings of discontent and communistic threats—all this will be hushed; the cry of want will give way to the notes of joy and thanksgiving arising from happy homes and contented firesides throughout the land; cities will be drained of their tramp element, the laws will be better observed, and society saved."

What They Know About Everything.

Two gifts, perforce, He has given us yet;
Though sad things stay and glad things fly,
Two gifts He has given us: to forget
All glad and sad things that go by,
And then to die!—Swainburne.

Everything good in man leans on something higher.—Emerson.

Formerly they languished, they burned, they died for love; to-day they chatter about it, they make it, and more often they buy it.—Joyce.

The desire of being pitied or admired is commonly the true reason of our confidence.—La Rochefoucault.

The sword of a woman is her tongue, and she never lets it rust.—Chinese Proverb.

If kissin' wasna' lawfu'
Lawyers wadna' allow it;
If it wasna' holy
Ministers wadna' do it!—Burns.

Experience and enthusiasm are much like the two huckets of a well: as the one rises the other sinks, and they are found only for a moment together.—Robert Dale Owen.

We rarely like the virtues we have not.—Shakspeare.

The bravest are the tenderest; the loving are the daring.—Bayard Taylor.

It is easier for a woman to defend her virtue against man than her reputation against woman.—Rochebrune.

A mask of gold hides all deformities.—Decker.

Cursed be the social wants that sin against the strength of youth!
Cursed be the social lies that warp us from the living truth!
—Tennyson.

The most brilliant qualities become useless when not sustained by force of character.—Segur.

Live with your friends as if they might some time become your enemies, and with your enemies as if they might some time become your friends.—Talleyrand.

One breast laid open were a school
Which would unteach mankind the lust to shine or rule!—Byron.

Power does not consist in striking strongly or often, but in striking justly.—Balzac.

Sorrow makes us very good or very bad.—Georges Sand.

All this boasted knowledge of the world
To me seems but to mean acquaintance with Low things, or evil, or indifferent.—Bailey.

The most manifest sign of wisdom is continual cheerfulness.—Montaigne.

While we are reasoning concerning life, life is gone.—Hume.

Time wasted is existence; used is life.—Young.

We love the evil we do until we suffer for it.—Ben Jonson.

To me the meanest flower that blows, can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.—Wordsworth.

How disappointment tracks the steps of hope!—Landon.

How little do we know that which we are; how less what we may be!—Byron.

Of all the ruins of the world, the ruin of a man is the saddest to contemplate.—Théophile Gautier.

N. B. S.

Love in a hut, with water and a crust,
Is—Love forgive us—cinders, ashes, dust.—Keats.

When crime weighs heavily we throw it, at hazard, upon other heads; and when the truth gives it back again, and we are compelled to keep it, we then reclaim it and try to make it a fit subject for pride. This is the last subterfuge of conscience—the last evolution of crime.—Lamartine.

There is no such coward as the woman who toadies to society because she has outraged society. The bully is never brave.—Outida.

While many admit the abstract probability that a falsity has usually a nucleus of reality, few bear this abstract probability in mind when passing judgment on the opinion of others.—Herbert Spencer.

To know how a bad man will act when in power, reverse all the doctrines he preaches when obscure.—S. Montague.

The human mind is like a drunken peasant on horseback—prop it on one side, and it falls on the other.—Luther.

Our very worst passions will often produce sublimer effects than our best.—Bolingbroke.

Learning without knowledge is but a bundle of prejudices: a lumber of inert matter set before the threshold of the understanding, to the exclusion of common sense.—Buwer.

FAG, M. P.

BITS OF VERSE.

Plays.

Alas, how soon the hours are over
Counted us out to play the lover!
And how much narrower is the stage
Allotted us to play the sage!
But when we play the fool, how wide
The theatre expands! Beside,
How long the audience sits before us;
How many prompters, what a chorus!
—Walter Savage Landor.

The Gone Before.

I fling my past behind me, like a robe
Worn threadbare in the seams, and out of date.
I have outgrown it. Wherefore should I weep
And dwell upon its beauty, and its dyes
Of Oriental splendor, or complain
That I must needs discard it? I can weave
Upon the shuttles of the future years
A fabric far more durable. Subdued
It may be in the blending of its hues,
Where sombre shades commingle, yet the gleam
Of golden warp shall shoot it through and through,
While over all a fadeless lustre lies,
And starred with gems made out of crystallized tears,
My new robe shall be richer than the old.
—Ella Wheeler.

Mind Thine Own Aim.

Life is too short to waste
In critic peep or cynic bark,
Quarrel or reprimand;
'Twill soon be dark;
Ay! mind thine own aim, and
God help the mark!—Emerson.

From a Counting-House.

There is an hour when first the westering sun
Takes on some forecast faint of future red;
When from the wings of weariness is shed
A spell upon us toilers, every one;
The day's work lags a little, well nigh done;
Far, dusky lofts through all the close air spread
A smell of Eastern bales; the old clerk's head
Nods by my side, heavy with dreams begun

In dear dead days wherein his heart is tombed.
But I my way to Italy have found;
Or wander where high stars gleam coldly through
The Alpine skies; or in some nest perfumed,
With soft Persian luxury set round,
Hold out my arms and cry, "At last!" to you.
—H. C. Bruner.

The Singer.

While with Ambition's steadfast flame
He wastes the midnight oil,
And dreams high-throned on heights of fame
To rest him from his toil—

Death's Angel, like a vast eclipse,
Above him spreads her wings,
And fans the embers of his lips
To ashes as he sings.
—J. W. Riley.

The Age of Wisdom.

Ho! pretty page, with the dimpled chin,
That never is known the barber's shear,
All your wish is women to win;
This is the way that boys begin—
Wait till you come to forty year.

Curly gold locks cover foolish brains;
Billing and cooing is all your cheer;
Sighing and singing of midnight strains
Under Bonnybell's window-panes—
Wait till you come to forty year.

Pledge me round, I bid ye declare,
All good fellows whose beards are gray:
Did not the fairest of the fair
Common grow and wearisome, ere
Ever a month was passed away?

The reddest lips that ever have kissed,
The brightest eyes that ever have shone,
May pray and whisper, and we not list,
Or look away, and never be missed,
Ere yet a month is gone.

Gillian's dead—God rest her bier—
How I loved her twenty years syne!
Marian's married, but I sit here,
Alone and merry at forty year,
Dipping my nose in the Gascon wine.—Thackeray.

Trust.

A picture memory brings to me:
I look beyond the years, and see
Myself across my mother's knee.

I feel her gentle hand restrain
My selfish moods, and know again
A child's blind sense of wrong and pain.

But wiser now, a man gray grown,
My childhood's needs are better known,
My mother's chastening love I own.

Gray grown, but in our Father's sight
A child still groping for the light
To read His works and ways aright.

I bow myself beneath His hand;
That pain itself for good was planned
I trust, but can not understand.

I fondly dream it needs must be
That, as my mother dealt with me,
So with His children dealeth He.

I wait, and trust the end will prove
That here and there, below, above,
The chastening heals, the pain is love!
—John G. Whittier.

My Dear.

O wind of the west that bringest
O'er wood and lea
Perfume of flowers from my lady's bowers
And a strain of melody,
While soft 'mid the bloom thou singest
Thy songs of laughter and sighs,
Steal in where my darling lies
With a kiss on her mouth from me.—Leonard Joyce.

"DOMESTIC"
THE LIGHT RUNNING
SEWING MACHINE.
It is PERFECT in every feature, and COMPLETE in all its details. It embodies all of the MODERN improvements that are of PROVED VALUE.

J. W. EVANS,
No. 29 POST STREET (MECHANICS' INSTITUTE BUILDING).

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

HOME INDUSTRY
MUSIC OF THE HEMMER & LONG
FIRST CLASS PIANOS
PRICES LOW
431
DUPONT ST., S.F.

CHICKERING
PIANOS AT COST.

PIANOS
NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.
These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

WANTED!
Nos. 1 (March 25), 4 (April 15), of Vol. I of the ARGONAUT for 1877. Twenty-five cents will be paid for each of the above numbers at the ARGONAUT office, 522 California Street.

English and American BICYCLES.
KEPT IN STOCK
And imported to order.
Prices only $5 over those in Boston.
LORING CUNNINGHAM
No. 206 Sansome Street, office of Macondray & Co., S. F.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED, DO hereby certify and declare that we have formed a partnership, under the firm name and style of the OAKLAND PAC MANUFACTURING COMPANY; that said partnership has for its object the manufacture and sale of all kinds and descriptions of jute fabrics; that its principal place of business is the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, having its works and factory in the City of Oakland, County of Alameda, State of California; that the names in full of all the members of such partnership and their places of residence are as follows, that is to say: WILLIAM SCHOLLE, residing at Number Twelve Hundred and Thirty-four Post Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California; ISRAEL CAHN, residing at Number Eleven Hundred and Twenty Post Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California; and JOSEPH BRANDENSTEIN, residing in the Town of Alameda, County of Alameda, State of California. Dated March 16, 1880.

WILLIAM SCHOLLE,
ISRAEL CAHN,
J. BRANDENSTEIN.
STATE OF CALIFORNIA, }
CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, } ss.
On this Eighteenth (18th) day of March, A. D. One Thousand Eight Hundred and Eighty, before me, James Mason, a Notary Public in and for said city and county, personally appeared William Scholle, Israel Cahn, and Joseph Brandenstein, known to me to be the persons respectively named and described in, and whose names are subscribed to, the within and foregoing certificate of partnership, and they severally duly acknowledged to me that they executed the same respectively.
In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal the day and year in this certificate first above written. JAMES MASON, Notary Public.
(NOTARIAL SEAL)
Endorsed—Filed March 18, 1880.
WILLIAM A. STUART, Clerk.
By J. WHALEN, Deputy Clerk.

$72 a week. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit sent. Address TRUE & CO., Augusta, Maine.

OFFER EXTRAORDINARY!
THE
Automatic
THE ONLY LIGHT RUNNING AND NOISELESS SEWING MACHINE made. It has no Bobbins, no Shuttle, no Tension. It is sold wholly upon its merits.
We hereby offer to parties who have owned an Automatic for Six Months and are dissatisfied, a New Machine of any other make, on even exchange. No other Company dare make such an offer.
WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
124 Post Street, San Francisco, and 361 Twelfth Street, Oakland.

The ARGONAUT is Printed with Ink Manufactured by
SHATTUCK & FLETCHER,
520 Commercial Street, San Francisco.

THE CALIFORNIAN.
— THE —
NEW WESTERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
A SPLENDID NUMBER FOR APRIL.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.

CONTENTS:

SAND. Chapter IV.....	J. W. GALLY.
THE STORY OF AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND.....	R. E. DESMOND.
THE HERMIT OF TREASURE PEAKS.....	SAM DAVIS.
PALLAS.....	CHAS. H. PHELPS.
SHEPHERDS AND SHEEP-HERDING II.....	ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.
AT AGUA TIBIA.....	AGNES M. MANNING.
AMERICANISM IN LITERATURE.....	EDGAR FAWCETT.
CAPTAIN MOLLY.....	E. M. LUDLUM.
THE ETHICS OF SUICIDE.....	ALBERT WILLIAMS.
OUR OPHIDIAN FRIEND.....	JOHN VANCE CHENEY.
NOTABLE AUTOGRAPHS.....	POURQUOI.
RUBY.....	J. H. S. BUGEIA.
ARIZONA.....	JAMES WYATT OATES.
A GLIMPSE OF THE UNUSUAL.....	W. C. MORROW.
OUTCROPPINGS.....
About Pets.—Waiting for the Galleon.—Pencil Shavings.—Ike Gives his Opinion on Total Depravity.—A Stroll Through Chinatown.—A Vaquero's Love Song.—Under the Smilax.—Winter Rain.—The Voice of the Sea.—Elsie.

One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages.	Twenty-five Cents.

SEE THE APRIL NUMBER OF THE CALIFORNIAN!

FOR SALE BY NEWSDEALERS AND THE TRADE GENERALLY.

THE ONE PRICE DRY GOODS HOUSE,
42, 44, AND 46 THIRD STREET.
KID GLOVES A SPECIALTY.
6-Button, first quality.....$1 75 | 3-Button, first quality.....$1 40
4-Button, first quality.....1 50 | 6-Button, second quality.....1 50
4-Button, second quality.....$1 25.
Lace-top Lisle and Silk Gloves, from 50 cents and upwards. Our Kid Gloves are the best fitting and most durable. PEIXOTTO & SILVERMAN, Importers.

LADIES
All know how unsatisfactory Foreign Black Silks are in both cutting and wearing shiny. We give you a reliable test below that will give you a perfect guide in selecting silk material for actual wear.
JOHN D. CUTTER & CO.'S
RAVEN BLACK AMERICAN SILKS are now being retailed by the following established firms:
Doane & Henselwood, San Francisco.
M. W. Henderson, Portland, Oregon.
O. A. Hale & Co., San Jose.
H. C. Taft & Co., Oakland.

THE TEST.
Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulteration, and will either cut or wear shiny.
Cutter's Samples for the trade.
ALLEN O. REID & CO.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.
A. J. PLATE & CO.,
No. 325 Montgomery Street,
Opp. Fellows' Hall.

J. A. HUNTER, M. D.,
No. 321 Sutter Street, devotes Special Attention to
Catarrh, Deafness,
Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, and all ailments of the Throat, Lungs, and Heart.

SCHOOL AT DRESDEN.
MRS. AURELIA BURRAGE, LATE
Principal of the School at 850 Van Ness Avenue, has opened a School for American Girls in Dresden. Terms $50 per month for board and tuition. For particulars apply to Miss West, 2001 Sutter Street, or address Mrs. Burrage, care of Dresden Bank, Dresden, Saxony.

DANIEL GIOVANNINI,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
dealer in Wood, Coal, Charcoal, and Coke, 816 Pacific Street, between Stockton and Powell.
Charcoal Depot.—Charcoal for sale in lots to suit, from 1 to 10,000 sacks.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF
the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room No. 37, San Francisco, March 15, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 53) of Thirty Cents per share was declared, payable on SATURDAY, March 20, 1880. Transfer books closed until the 2nd inst.
P. JACOBUS, Ass't Secretary.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING
Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth (8th) day of March, 1880, an assessment (No. 62) of Two ($2) Dollars per share was levied upon the capital stock of the Corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the tenth (10th) day of April, 1880, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the twenty-eighth (28th) day of April, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.
E. L. PARKER, Secretary.
Office, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.
$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine.

The Argonaut.

VOL. VI. NO. 13.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 27, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE STORY OF A GARTER.

CHAPTER I.

Did you ever watch the mouth movements of a choir singer? Did you ever mentally wonder how much of the lip contortion was caused by the necessities of the hymn, and how much by the affectation of the singer? The sunshine of a Sabbath morning was streaming into the village church at Brighton, when thoughts somewhat in this wise filled the mind of a very proper person—a very methodical bachelor, with calm eyes and square back—who stood up in his pew, giving praise to some Lord in his imagination; but in reality quietly and intently regarding the not unhandsome mouth of the soprano.

His own face unwittingly took the shapes that hers did, as he devoutly followed the words and music. Some bugles and other dangling ornaments that trembled on the soprano's bonnet served to draw his eyes thither, as objects in motion always will; he found it somewhat annoying to try and watch both her mouth and the vibrations of the bugles at her summit.

George Woodward Fenton, which is a much better sounding name than his really was, had come to Brighton for the purpose of building a bridge across East River. He was a civil engineer, of modest fame, but undoubted ability; he had a good head on his shoulders, despite the fact that he looked like a minister; the worst that was said against him was that he had experienced religion, but this fault was condoned by the man he knocked down the second day he was in Brighton—said man having incautiously remarked that George looked like a "damned Bible-pounder."

Fenton did everything slowly and sedately, but then he had a knack of being sure of what he was about. The town trustees had looked askance at his spectacles; his air had a tinge of stupidity about it; they were inclined to sneer at his plans, his specifications, and his arguments. They had been used to contractors of the florid style: who would invite all hands to drink when the meeting adjourned, who estimated their day's work by the amount of cursing bestowed on their men. Fenton coolly impressed upon them that they did not know what they were talking about; that he did; that he was prepared to do the work perfectly; that if his terms were not satisfactory, it was of no consequence—he would immediately return to New York, whence he had been imported.

From a position of arrogant indifference, the trustees gradually bent a listening ear; the very independence of this young man seemed to work in his favor; with becoming dignity they awarded him the contract, which he accepted with becoming carelessness. For his imperturbability really became George—there was an indefinable charm about his half-stupid manner; you felt, somehow, he was not such a fool as he looked. For a slow man, he was remarkably brisk in the way he brought forward his material, and pushed the work of the bridge; the trustees eyed him still more askance; but when they said "Good morning, Mr. Fenton," now, the tone was mollifying and respectful. It was plain, from the start, he would finish the work for much less than the appropriation, giving the trustees a "chance" on the "extras" that might be added.

This was the state of things on this particular Sunday morning, when we find our religious bridge-builder intently surveying the interior of the soprano's mouth, whether with the eye of a civil engineer or not, it would be rather ungallant to remark. Perhaps he did not take enough notice of the young woman that chanced to occupy the same pew. If he had done so, his mechanical eye would have been delighted, for even a mechanical eye has some sense of harmony. He would have noticed that she was perfectly attired; that her cheek was round and plump, and destitute of toilet accessories; that her eyes were brown and mild—in fact, reader, he would have shared her hymn-book, offered in the early part of the service, instead of possessing himself of one from the seat in front. I can only account for his short-sightedness by the thought that in looking at distant objects we neglect those which we might touch.

For her part, she seemed cognizant of no neglect. Being alone, she neither giggled, ate candy furtively, nor followed in other ways the beaten path of young ladies at their divine worship. No doubt all these sins would have been hers, had she but had companions to share them with. I shall, perhaps ungraciously, give her no credit until I find she in truth deserves it.

The preacher had said, "in conclusion" for the third and final time, the Doxology was sung, a sea of bald heads and bonnets bowed to receive the gentle patter of the benediction; the service was over. People rushed toward each other to converse in whispers, as though the pews were very ill, and anything above a modulated religious lisp would be fatal to them.

Our civil engineer, having nobody to rush toward, looked longingly at the door, and then despairingly at the crowd that intervened, and while ruminating on the slowness of an outgoing congregation, he placed his foot on my story. Stooping down, he picked up the Thing, and with one quick glance threw it down again. Ashamed of his cowardice he again bent down, and hurriedly possessed himself of the Thing, which he crushed into his hand, whence he placed it in a safe place of concealment.

When I say that it was only a common lady's garter,

I mean "common" in the sense that it was an article of utility in very general use—this particular one was not a common one among its fellows. This last fact, however, was totally lost on our friend Fenton, who now had all he could do to preserve the innocent expression habitual to his face. He had all the sensations which we imagine a pickpocket ought to have, and which the light-fingered gentry no doubt would have were they honest men. His complexion, at all times a clear one, now showed an alarming increase of color, which he both felt and cursed. The fact of merely having picked up a stocking-sustainer would not have moved him so, but when it touched his palm it had felt warm; and from that sensation of warmth did he date his feeling of guilt.

Once in the open air, everybody did not seem to be looking at him—the fresh air was grateful; he felt that he had made a fool of himself. Still, the garter lay like a load in his pocket; if it had been a stolen bird's nest, he could have accounted for his feelings. I regret, both for my own and the reader's sake, that the supersensitiveness of Mr. Fenton should cause us all this trouble. I am sure we could find garters, every day and by the dozen, without being disturbed much, either in mind or body. But this engineer, who had great executive powers with his men—who, in case of necessity, was not deficient in the art of bringing them to terms with a muscular force that not only surprised but convinced them—this man with men was completely put out by a little band of silk and elastic, that now nestled cosily enough in his pocket.

The beauty of that peaceful Sabbath afternoon, its calm restfulness and balmy air, were perhaps partly lost on him, as he wandered with uncertain step toward the suburbs. Like a true workman, blind instinct brought him to the bridge he was building. Looking into the water that flowed beneath him, he was struck all of a sudden with the absurdity of his past sensations, which now appeared to him in such a ridiculous light that he laughed and laughed again.

That laugh seemed to make him brave, for, with an air of lazy interest, he drew the Thing from its hiding-place and examined it. It was a dainty affair, he had to admit—the groundwork was in pale-blue silk, worked with satin of a darker shade; it had a large rosette to match, and the clasp, a very unique device, was certainly silver. The clasp was further made interesting by having engraved on it, in fairy script, the name "Lally." He first read it "Sally," but the disappointment which this name unconsciously caused him was removed on closer scrutiny.

"Lally," he repeated, speaking to the bridge, "the last name ought to be 'Gag.'"

With this remark he put the subject of it away, and devoted his attention and the rest of the day exclusively to a calculation concerning his bridge-making.

CHAPTER II.

Mr. George Woodward Fenton—I give you his full name, to prevent myself from slipping into his real one—dined at the best hotel in Brighton. He did not lodge there, however, but had found a room to his taste, near the scene of his labors. This room was peculiarly adapted to his purpose; it was an addition to the original building, with an entrance on the street. With no desire or cause for secrecy, it was yet pleasant for him to feel that he could enter and depart at will, without making the fact known to the other occupants. These latter consisted of a highly respectable widow and her daughter—a daughter who insisted on taking extraordinary care of Fenton's "den," carrying her duties to the extremity of replenishing his towels, matches, etc., while he was poring over his plans. These interruptions, while they were noiseless, and evidently intended to be unobtrusive, nevertheless annoyed him. He was not a nervous man, but a woman "fussing" around him when he was at his nightly tasks did not add to his powers of concentration.

This girl—whose name, by the way, was Harrisonia Muggs—was an anomaly to Fenton in many ways. She was by no means unprepossessing; she had good features, good eyes, and dazzling teeth; she had all these, and a plump figure, always well displayed—yet, seemingly against all reason, she was not attractive. At least, so Fenton thought, but in this he differed from the young sprigs of Brighton. 'Sonja, as she was called, was in a chronic state of being courted. Fenton began to believe that the neighboring towns, also, sent in their quota of white vests and prominent watch-chains to worship at her shrine. When the evenings were fine he frequently kept late hours, in enjoying either long walks under the stars, or an occasional game of billiards at the hotel. At such times he rarely came home without interrupting the dismissal of one of 'Sonja's slaves.

The Sabbath-day on which Fenton has been brought before the reader proved a most eventful one for him. He had attended church in the evening, indulging in a long ramble afterward, and was returning home. The night was starry, and rather dark. As he approached his doorway, the form of a person, or of a pair of persons, became dimly outlined; his indifferent eyesight led him to conclude it was 'Sonja saying the last word to her company.

On a nearer approach, however, the object took the shape of a woman, alone, and, as it proved, very ill. She raised a face so pale and wan that, even in that indistinct light, Fenton saw and was moved by its misery. In trying to answer to his offer of help, she made an inarticulate sound; unversed as this bachelor was in women's ways, he knew that he held a fainting woman in his arms. They were strong arms, too, and showed none of the sensitiveness that their owner had that day. In an instant she was lying on his bed; he lit a lamp, and forced brandy between the closed lips. She recovered, sighed, and fainted again. A woman in distress needs a woman. Fenton went to the door to call, when, at the threshold, a thought held him back. How could he explain this strange situation to a woman? Something must be done, and that quickly; he was perfectly cool, but the thought of just what to do made his temples throb painfully. One more look at the white face of his unknown visitor determined him to go for a doctor.

That worthy was fortunately up and dressed—Fenton almost dragged him to his room. The man of medicine made a hasty examination. Then he turned to Fenton:

"Your wife, I suppose, sir?"

The patient had been groaning when they came in; she continued, as though in great pain.

"No," said Fenton.

"Where is her husband?"

"Her husband?"

"Yes."

"I don't know that she has one," and, not satisfied with the look on the doctor's face, Fenton briefly explained matters.

The physician's face cleared a little, as he said gravely: "This young woman is about to have a child." Then he added, in an almost griefed tone: "I hope you have told me the truth."

Fenton had served in the army, but this was the heaviest fire he had ever stood under. The doctor mistook his emotion for an evidence of his guilt. Seeing this, brought the engineer to his senses. His face had its old expression when he spoke—"It is as I have said. If you do not believe me, there is the door."

The doctor only smiled good-humoredly. "Your anger is honest," he said.

CHAPTER III.

It was a fortunate thing for after-comers that the hotel-keeper's wife was a good soul, much given to gossip. Otherwise they might not have heard how "late one Sabbath night, the only carriage in the village had brought to the hotel the village doctor, the bridge-contractor, and a pale young woman; how she had to be carried up-stairs, and the best room made ready for her; how the bridge-contractor had appeared much concerned, and paced the hall for two hours; that his spectacles were on upside down; that he wiped his eyes suspiciously when he thought himself unobserved; that he laughed heartily to himself, and slapped his thigh almost while he wept; how the doctor had come down the stairs rubbing his hands in glee, and saying that all had gone well; that they had gone away together, but not before leaving word that every comfort should be given to the poor sick lady, the same to be charged to Mr. Fenton." Here, at the money part, the good woman always came to a fitting conclusion.

Fenton was neither romantic nor imaginative. As he went to his room at gray dawn, the affair appeared to his practical sense a very serious one. A woman, unknown, with her babe, had suddenly appeared, and made him, in spite of himself, a man of family. So far as responsibility went, he was in every way a husband and father; he could get no other view of it, whichever way he looked at it. According to his idea, it never once dawned on him that this matter would bring him any more trouble than the temporary care of the two helpless ones, until their friends should appear to relieve him.

But the unfortunate woman had already disturbed his peace in another way. She had given him a problem to solve. In the carriage she had murmured "Lally." Uncertain that he had heard aright, his waiting ear had caught the name a second time more distinctly. His mind was prone to dispose of things—a conclusion arrived at, the thing worried him no more. But he must have the conclusion. The monetary difference this event would cost him he had disposed of, and now this "Lally" must haunt a mind that loved to be unhaunted.

He took out the garter and looked at it, and I guess he damned it a little. He never allowed his religion to interfere with the proper expression of his feelings. But for this little band of silk, satin, and silver, he could go to his bridge and be content; but he knew that the beating of the hammers and the grating of the saws would both keep time to that refrain: "lal-la-ly—lal-la-ly—lal-la-ly."

Then, having a revulsion of feeling, he began to wonder who "Lally" was. Was it a man or a woman? It must be a woman; yet the name of her husband, or worse, her betrayer, would naturally be the one that a woman's lips would utter, under such circumstances.

The morning sun streaming into the room cut short his meditations. A summons from Mrs. Muggs warned him that his coffee was ready. Breakfast is rarely a social meal. Fenton relied on this fact, I think, when he made this the only one he took at home. On this occasion he was too much absorbed in his own thoughts and the toast to notice that the expression on the widow's face was hauled a little tighter fore and aft, and that her nose had found an angle. 'Sonja, too, graced the table with her presence, and, in a condescension, acknowledged by Fenton by the nodding of bows. His interest began and ended by unforeseen occurrence had brought her regal form to light at least three hours earlier than usual; for until nine o'clock 'Sonia's being alive was a mere matter of speculation. Unlike her mother, she wore a "willing to forgive" aspect, which evoked as much emotion from the sugar-bowl as it did from the culprit.

But he, poor fellow, was calmly innocent of having done any wrong, besides being certain that his presence of mind in removing the poor woman had prevented at least two of her own sex from being her judges. With this consoling reflection did he fold his napkin and depart. Had he listened to the conversation that began in his absence, he would have learned to what extent windows and keyholes had been utilized, by a pair of night-robed females in shivering dishabille. The hauled-taut expression transferred itself from the widow's countenance to 'Sonia's.

"Mother!"

"Well?"

"Did you ever see such impudence?"

"No."

"Do you intend to stand it?"

"Well, 'Sonia, my child—"

"Don't child me—if you intend to remain passive, I assure you I don't!"

"But we can't afford—"

"To have our reputations ruined for ten dollars a month," broke in 'Sonia, while she continued excitedly: "It's just this, ma, if he don't leave, I will. I'll go off with Charley."

Mrs. Muggs was completely crushed. The threat had frequently been made, and had never failed to strike terror to her heart. The numerical strength of Charley had something appalling about it; a single elopement might be followed by a penitent return; but the poor widow had only an indefinite idea of how many of Charley there was; if 'Sonia went off with them all, she might as well bid good-bye to her forever. The prospect of having no one to save and slave for, to scratch and scrimp for, was, indeed, a gloomy one.

"He shall go," said she in a weak voice.

The civil engineer, among his men, and busy in the sunshine, felt like Fenton again. The still, small voice drumming "Lally" in his ear was, after all, entirely absent. His mind was filled with naught but his work until the sun was low in the heavens. Thanks to his indifferent eyesight, his sensitive nature was spared the looks that some of the men's faces wore. They had nothing against a man's getting into a scrape of that kind, but the fact that he was "one o' them church-goin' fellers" made them feel the imposition. Their conscientiousness, however, did not reach their pockets: they gave no visible offense.

But the bridge-builder was now a marked man in Brighton, and sooner or later he must become aware of it. As he ascended the steps of the hotel, the suggestive interest of the crowd of loungers did not pass unnoticed by even his defective vision; it caused him a pang, and spoiled his supper; contrary to his habit, he worried over it a little; he felt this was but the beginning, and he could not clearly see the end. Open insults he could have met with blows, but a man's looks are his own, as are also his knowing smiles; a man certainly can have the disposal of his own features. The doctor, with the true story, had championed Fenton's cause, but his delivery at second-hand lacked the impressiveness that Fenton would have given it. He would have seen the village in perdition before he would open his mouth. He had strictly forbidden his name to be disclosed to the unfortunate woman; fearing her gratitude more than the contumely of all Brighton. Poor thing! she lay there blessing him, happily unconscious of the gossip she had caused.

In no enviable state of mind did Fenton reach his lodgings that night. The world had him foul; he was too proud to explain, and angry at being misjudged. An envelope on the table attracted his eye. He knew the superscription; he had frequently mailed 'Sonia's letters. She, with her reputation trembling in the balance, had put the culprit's dismissal on paper. She well knew that her mother's courage could never be screwed to the sticking-point of a verbal dismissal. The poor widow was in some remote corner of the house, bemoaning the loss of Fenton's ten dollars. He read his sentence:

"MR. FENTON—Dear Sir:—It appears strange to two lone women, who have nothing in this world but their good names and a scanty pension, that you should seek their fireside to bring disgrace upon them. After last night's shocking proceedings, we can afford you the comforts of a home no longer. This is a sad duty, but you can leave the seven dollars due on the washstand. We might have believed your story to the doctor, but for that souvenir from her which hangs on the wall. It shows too plainly the character of your relations. Yours obediently, MRS. JOHN MUGGS, per HARRISONIA MUGGS."

This missive was almost fatal to Fenton. But when he had recovered from the fit of laughter it caused, he was more kindly disposed toward the injured 'Sonia than he had ever been. "'Sonia," said he, apostrophizing the note, "I thank you. You have found me my temper. And as for you," he continued, taking down the unlucky garter, "I shall never lose it with you again; since you have parted me from such scum, you and I shall part no more."

CHAPTER IV.

Three weeks passed. As to go to the hotel was out of the question, the doctor, with some crowding, had kindly made room for the outcast from Muggs's. Brighton's nine days' wonder had in a manner subsided, but Fenton's feelings as to how he was regarded remained the same. He worked harder than ever at the bridge, which was rapidly approaching completion. Though he was unaware of it, a reversion of opinion had taken place in the village. Fenton had a personality that could not long remain under a cloud; his treatment of the sick lady, and his delicate consideration for her feelings, was not lost on those who noticed it.

But there had been growing within him a strong sensation of curiosity to know who and what she was—to learn her story and its connection with "Lally." He shrank from the idea of intruding upon her with questions; he thought of addressing her a carefully worded note, but the latter plan seemed like a subterfuge. He gave up the idea with a sigh, and determined to let matters swing along as they chose.

One forenoon, however, while he was at work, a sudden inspiration determined him to go and see her. It was a delightful sunny morning; she would be in health and spirits on a day like this, he thought. It also pleased him to think that he was about to present himself to her in his working garb; it would place her more at her ease than if confronted by a fine gentleman. He framed several sentences that were to dispel at once all constraint in this first interview.

The hotel he never reached. A messenger, hot and panting, met him half way, to say that the mother and child had disappeared. The chambermaid had found the room empty—the bed undisturbed. Fenton actually forgot to give the boy a quarter, as he took a note from his hand, and, in much amazement, opened it. The lad, who had run very hard, for he knew his man and was sure of a tip, turned on his heel, somewhat chagrined. The note was addressed—

"TO MY UNKNOWN FRIEND:—My coming was unhappy; my going is ungrateful. But a miserable woman, who can bless but not reward, prays that God may do both to you. I would like to see you, but am not sure that the sight of me would be pleasant. Never till this night did it occur to me in what false position I may have been the unlucky means of placing you. My going will at least remove the cause. Bless you again, and so—adieu."

There was no signature. He absently turned the paper over in his hand. Then he softly whistled a low refrain. Raising his eyes, he saw the boy a short distance away, kicking up clouds and looking sheepish. "Oh," said Fenton, and threw him a coin. The lad was the happier of the two then. Well, she had gone away with her child. Fenton was conscious of a great disappointment, yet mixed with his varied feelings was one of relief. A thing of that kind, like all things, must end some time and in some way; perhaps it was best now, and in this way. When he struck the matter-of-fact vein in his composition, this civil engineer always found comfort. He turned—a little thoughtfully—and walked back to the bridge.

And were it not for "Lally," he might as well walk out of the story. As I am here relating rather indifferently what really occurred very interestingly, the reader will share my chagrin when I tell him that I can not stop this story in the genuine stereotyped style. Had I my way (which, alas, I have not) I should send Fenton in search of the woman he had befriended; he should find her, make love to her, and marry her. But Fenton—though he had a noble nature—was a man of plans, estimates, and specifications; as he walked back to the bridge, now about completed, he calculated his profits thereon. He roughly estimated what the hotel and doctor's bill would aggregate; and, feeling that he would soon leave it, he summed up what Brighton had cost him, and what he had cost Brighton.

Nor was it with many regrets that he boarded the train (after cashing his check at a humorously small bank) and watched the green hills of Brighton gradually disappear. He spent six years in New York working at his profession. Sunning himself in Central Park one day, he met a little girl in great distress. On asking the cause of her grief, she said she wanted "Lally." It gave him a start, even after six years, to hear that memory revived.

"Who is Lally?" he asked.

"My aunty," sobbed the little one, "and I've lost her."

"Well, don't cry, we'll find her."

"But where is she?" inquired the child, as they walked along.

"I've got her at home, I guess, in my trunk," ventured Fenton, with a wise air.

The child held up a puzzled face, but he never smiled.

"Oh!" she said, her tears breaking into smiles, "there she is!" There came toward them a lady, still young, with mild brown eyes and a pretty face; six years before she had offered a hymn-book to Fenton in the church at Brighton. As for him, he knew this might be the owner of his garter; he regarded her with a little more attention than was perhaps polite. She had the advantage; she knew him; she had been to Brighton, and there got his full name and description from the doctor. He would have raised his hat and departed, but she detained him.

"Your name is Fenton," she said, hesitatingly. "You were my sister's friend. I—would—like to—to—to know you," she added, turning crimson and then white.

No, reader, you are wrong, they did not marry. But she got so that she called him "George," and was not afraid to say "garter" right out before him. They may have got married after they got out of this story. He learned in time how her sister had been betrayed, had returned with her child and her story, and since had died. "Lally," or Alice Browning, was in Brighton on a visit that Sunday, little dreaming she was so near her lost sister, whose child eventually found Fenton in the park.

George and Alice and little May were in Brighton not long ago. They crossed the bridge that he had built, and found the village now a town. He saw something familiar in the thin face of a woman they met. It was Mrs. Muggs. He spoke to her kindly, and inquired for 'Sonia. The widow burst into tears, but managed to articulate "She's gone off with Charley!"

JOHN C. CHALMERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1880.

The old theory which allowed a blonde to wear only blue flowers and ribbons, and consequently made her look insipid, has been very nearly extinguished during the last half dozen years, and the fancy for Jacqueminot roses may utterly destroy it. These sumptuous blossoms are beautiful when worn by a brunette who knows how to make them contrast with black lace, but they are at their best when they adorn a blonde who chooses to array herself in a robe of creamy crape, draped with antique grace, and to relieve it with great clusters of Jacqueminot buds and half-opened blossoms placed at the belt and high on the side of the square opening at the throat, and gathered at the belt. The single rose that nestles among the puffs on the top of her head brings out the gold of her hair, intensifies the coolness of her gray eyes, and makes her one of the prettiest pictures ever seen at a dinner party.

The porter of a Danbury shoe store was dusting out the place of business on Monday morning, when a ruralist straggled in. He wanted a pair of shoes.

"What number is it?" queried the porter.

"Thirteen, fourteen, fifteen," said the man, with an absent look on his face.

"Holy Moses!" gasped the porter. "Three legs and no two mates!"

OUR OPHIDIAN FRIEND.

From the "Californian" for April.

Cylindrical thing
Without leg, without wing.
Glazed membrane stuffed with motion,
I hold the heretical notion
That because you crawl
Is no reason at all
For laying such odious stress
The whole length of your lowliness.
A walk and a glide,
A stride and a slide,
A trip and a slip,
A skate and a skip,
Are equally proper, for all I see,
Sly, India-rubber iniquity!

I learn, in buildings with bell and steeple,
That you are abhorred by exemplary people
Because in your skin did a villain deceive
The lady initial—ingenious Eve.
Now take it for granted the story is true,
The fellow inside was the culprit—not you.
But you're mischievous still, at this distant day:
You wheedle lean children's last doughnut away;
And innocent birds, on a tour from the South,
You entice, in a trice, down your murderous mouth.
The sparrow, wee wren, and canary,
A-whistling their solos, unwary;
Bobolink to begin it,
The lark and the linnet,
Bluebird and robin,
Together go bobbin'
To twiddle and spindle,
To diddle and dwindle,
To prance it,
To dance it,

To hop up and pop up and die
'Neath the gaze of your glittering eye.
If this be the case, I am happy to say
That you kill in a very considerate way.
Would man might as gentle be,
Lithe, odizing oddity!
Limp reptile, with head so close to the heart,
How can conscience and reason be counseled apart?
In view of so serious organic confusion,
'Tis idle to censure slight moral obtusion.
After all that I've heard, imagined, or read
Of the woman's seed and the serpent's head,
I can't be convinced that 'twere best to inveigh
Against a creature that harmlessly garters my way,
Or, armed with cudgel, from bickory hewed,
To beetle its limber longitude.

Abused, abjured Ophidian,
Bask on in peace meridian;
The more of the tale of the tempter they make,
The more I shall hold to the tail of the snake.
JOHN VANCE CHENEY.

Violets.

All flowers are sweet; but those my heart doth love
The best,
Bloom where the eyes are closed and hands are crossed
At rest.

All flowers are sweet; but these fair blossoms spread
With dew,
Call back the mother-eyes, so sad, so sweet,
So blue!

To-day I feel a breath; the curtains swing
Apart,
And memories, like silver mist, float round
My heart;

I hear the echo of a song sung long Ago,
As 'mid the nestling leaves it wanders to
And fro.

The while the perfumed dew falls on my heart
Like rain,
And scent of violets—she loved them so—
Gives pain.

CLARENCE T. URMY.

A Portrait in Water-Colors.

What doth she lack? Why, surely, naught.
She's womanly down to her finger-tips;
With a dainty, feminine "trick of thought,"
And decorum that never trips.

And the subtle flattery half untold,
That thrills like a perfume or swift caress,
You would almost swear it was virgin gold,
And you dare not wish it less.

Her speech is strung with pretty things,
As rose-hips are strung on the grasses sweet,
And their glossy beauty a glamour brings
Whenever we chance to meet.

And yet, I wonder what comes between
When I touch her outstretched finger-tips?
I wonder what shadow, never seen,
Lies on her upturned lips?

Something—"a rift within the lute,"
On the waxen fairness a speck of dust,
A bitter tang to the perfect fruit—
Shall I say it?—a vague distrust.

She's a charming friend for sunny days
When buds and blossoms and south winds blow;
But for sorrow that walks in sodden ways
She'd have but a decorous "Oh!"

She quotes the charmingest bits of lore,
With quotations that always are a propos;
She has knocked a little at every door,
But their secrets she'll never know.

She gives me more than I would claim;
She gives me, she says, her very summer;
But it cloy, for I know she'll give the same
Each hour, to the latest comer.

I like her—at least, our likings blend;
We are friends? Oh yes, for she told me so;
But if she forgot to be my friend,
Would she make a generous foe?

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1880.

KATE M. BISHOP.

A class in journalism is to be established in Cornell University, in deference to the wishes of many of the student

THE CHARLEMAGNE CROWN.

Translated from the French of Henry Murger.

Toward the close of December the letter-carriers of the Bidault administration were charged with the distribution of about a hundred copies of a letter of invitation, of which the following is a certified copy:

M. ———:—MM. Rodolphe and Marcel pray you to do them the honor of coming to pass the evening with them, Saturday next, New Year's Eve. There will be laughter.

PROGRAMME OF THE ENTERTAINMENT.

I.

At seven o'clock, opening of the parlors; bright and animated conversation.

At eight o'clock, entry and promenade in the parlors of the intellectual authors of The Mountain in Labor, a comedy rejected by the Théâtre de l'Odéon.

At half-past eight o'clock, M. Alexandre Schœnauer, distinguished artist, will execute upon the piano an imitative symphony, The Influence of Blue in the Arts.

At nine o'clock, first reading of a memoir on the abolition of trouble in tragedy.

At half-past nine o'clock, M. Gustave Colline, philosopher supernatural, and M. Schœnauer, will begin a discussion of philosophy and metaphysics compared. In order to avoid all collision between the two antagonists, they will be tied together.

At ten o'clock, M. Tristan, man of letters, will describe his first loves. M. Alexandre Schœnauer will accompany him on the piano.

At half-past ten o'clock, second reading of the memoir on the abolition of trouble in tragedy.

At eleven o'clock, narration of a cassowary hunt, by a foreign prince.

II.

At midnight, M. Marcel, historical painter, blindfold, will improvise in white crayon the interview between Napoleon and Voltaire in the Champs-Élysées. M. Rodolphe will also improvise a comparison between the author of Zaire and the author of the Battle of Austerlitz.

At half-past twelve o'clock, M. Gustave Colline, modestly undressed, will imitate the athletic games of the Fourth Olympiad.

At one o'clock A. M., third reading of the memoir on the abolition of trouble in tragedy, and collection for the benefit of the tragic authors who will one day find themselves out of employment.

At two o'clock, commencement of games, and organization of quadrilles, which will be prolonged until morning.

At six o'clock, sunrise and final chorus.

During the whole of the entertainment the ventilators will play.

N. B.—Any person who attempts to read or recite any verses will be immediately put out, and delivered into the hands of the police. All are requested not to carry off the wax-candle ends.

Two days after, some copies of this letter were in circulation on the third floor below literature and the arts, and occasioned there a profound sensation.

However, among the invited guests there were some who questioned the splendors announced by the two friends.

"I mistrust much," said one of these skeptics; "I have been sometimes to Rodolphe's Wednesdays, Rue de la Tour d'Auvergne. We could not sit down, except morally, and we drank filtered water in eclectic pottery."

"This time," said another, "it will be very solid. Marcel has shown me the plan of the entertainment, and it promises a magical effect."

"Will there be any ladies?"

"Yes; Phémie la Teinturière has asked to be queen of the feast, and Schœnauer ought to bring some ladies."

This is, in few words, the origin of this entertainment which caused so much astonishment in the Bohemian world. For about a year Marcel and Rodolphe had announced this sumptuous gala, which was always to come off the approaching Saturday; but painful circumstances had forced their promise to make the tour of fifty-two weeks, and they could not take a step without running against some irony of their friends, among whom were even found some inconsiderate enough to make energetic complaints. The thing beginning to be a bore, the two friends resolved to put an end to it by fulfilling the engagements which they had undertaken. Therefore they had sent out the above invitation.

"Now," Rodolphe had said, "we can no longer retreat; we have burned our ships. There remain before us eight days in which to find the hundred francs which are indispensable to do the thing well."

"Since we must have them, we will," Marcel had replied; and with the insolent confidence they had in the goddess Chance, the two friends rested easy, convinced that their hundred francs were already on the way—the way of the impossible.

Nevertheless, two days before the one designated for the entertainment, as nothing had yet turned up, Rodolphe thought it would be, perhaps, more sure to assist Chance, if he did not wish to be left in humiliation when the hour for lighting the lamps should arrive.

To facilitate matters, the two friends modified progressively the sumptuous features of the programme which they had prepared; and by modification after modification, by much striking out from the article "Cakes," by carefully reviewing and diminishing the article "Refreshments," the total expense was found to be reduced to fifteen francs. The matter was simplified, but not yet settled.

"Now," said Rodolphe, "we must do our utmost. In the first place, we can not postpone it this time."

"Impossible," replied Marcel.

"How long is it since I have heard the story of the Battle of Studzianka?"

"Nearly two months."

"Good! Two months is a respectable delay. My uncle will not complain. I will go to-morrow to make him relate to me the Battle of Studzianka. That will be five francs, surely."

"And I," said Marcel, "will go to sell an 'Abandoned Manor' to old Médecis. That will make five francs also. If I have time enough to put in three turrets and a mill, that will go, perhaps, at ten francs, and we will have our budget."

And the two friends went to sleep, dreaming that the Princess of Belgiojoso begged them to change their reception days in order not to take away her habitués.

Awake early in the morning, Marcel took a canvas and proceeded quickly to the construction of an "Abandoned Manor," an article which was in particular demand from him by a second-hand dealer in the Place du Carrousel. On his side, Rodolphe went to pay a visit to his uncle Monetti, who excelled in the recitation of the retreat from Russia, and for whom Rodolphe procured, five or six times a year, the satisfaction of narrating his campaigns, in consideration of a loan of some money, which the veteran dealer in stoves and chimneys did not often refuse when one knew how to show great enthusiasm in hearing his recitals.

At two o'clock Marcel, with head lowered and carrying under his arm a canvas, encountered, on the Place du Carrousel, Rodolphe, coming from his uncle's; his attitude announced bad news.

"Well," said Marcel, "have you succeeded?"

"No; my uncle has gone to the museum at Versailles. And you?"

"That animal Médecis will not have any more ruined chateaux; he wants a 'Bombardment of Tangier.'"

"We are lost in reputation if we do not give our entertainment," murmured Rodolphe. "What will our friend the influential critic think, if I make him put on a white cravat and yellow gloves for nothing?"

And they re-entered the studio, suffering the liveliest anxiety. At this moment a neighbor's clock struck four.

"We have only three hours before us," said Rodolphe.

"But," cried Marcel, approaching his friend, "are you sure, quite sure, that there is no money about here?"

"Neither here nor elsewhere. From whence could it come?"

"If we search under the furniture—in the chairs? It is claimed that the émigrés concealed their treasures in the time of Robespierre. Who knows? Our easy-chair has perhaps belonged to an émigré; and then it is so hard that I have often had the idea that it contained something metallic. Shall we make an autopsy?"

"This is child's play," replied Rodolphe, in a tone of severity mingled with indulgence.

All at once Marcel, who had continued his rummaging in all the corners of the studio, uttered a shout of triumph.

"We are saved!" cried he. "I was very sure that there was something of value here. See there!" and he displayed to Rodolphe a piece of money as large as a crown, and half corroded by rust and verdigris. It was a Carolingian coin, of some numismatic value. Upon the inscription, fortunately well preserved, could be read the date of the reign of Charlemagne.

"That! That is worth thirty sous," said Rodolphe, casting a disdainful look on the coin.

"Thirty sous, well employed, will make a fine effect," replied Marcel. "With twelve hundred men Bonaparte made ten thousand Austrians lay down their arms. Skill equals numbers. I will go and change the Charlemagne crown with Father Médecis. Is there not something else to sell here? Hold, I will take along the cast of the tibia of Jaconowski, the Russian drum-major. That will make bulk."

"Carry off the tibia. But that is disagreeable. There will not remain a single object of art here."

During the absence of Marcel, Rodolphe, fully decided to give the party anyhow, went to find his friend Colline, the supernatural philosopher, who lived two steps from him.

"I come to entreat you to do me a service. In my position as master of the house I must positively have a black coat, and I have none—lend me yours."

"But," said Colline, hesitating, "in my position as invited guest I need my black coat myself."

"I will allow you to come in an overcoat."

"I never had an overcoat—you know it very well."

"Well, listen; that can be arranged. You can stay away from my party, and thus loan me your coat."

"That is disagreeable. Since I am on the programme, I don't want to be missing."

"There will be many other things missing," said Rodolphe, with a sigh. "Lend me your coat, and, if you wish to come, come as you choose—in your shirt-sleeves. You will then pass for a faithful servant."

"Oh, no," said Colline, coloring. "I will put on my brown coat. But still, it's very disagreeable." And, as he perceived Rodolphe, who was already possessed of the famous black coat, he cried to him: "Wait a moment! There are some little things inside."

Colline's coat merits mention. At first this coat was completely blue, and it was through habit that Colline called it his black coat. And, as he was then the only one of the band possessing a dress-coat, his friends had also the custom of saying, in talking of the official garment of the philosopher: "Colline's black coat." Moreover, this celebrated garment had a particular shape—the most fantastic ever seen: the tails very long, attached to a waist very short; possessing two pockets, veritable gulfs, in which Colline had the habit of keeping about thirty volumes, which he carried eternally with him—which made his friends say that, when the libraries were closed, the scholars and men of letters could seek information in the tails of Colline's coat, a library always open to readers.

That day, strange to say, Colline's coat contained only a quarto volume of Bayle, a treatise on the supernatural faculties in three volumes, a volume of Condillac, two volumes of Swedenborg, and Pope's Essay on Man. When he had unloaded his library coat, he allowed Rodolphe to put it on.

"Hold on," said he, "the left pocket is still quite heavy. You have left something."

"Ah," said Colline, "it is true; I forgot to empty the foreign-language pocket." And he drew out of it two Arabic grammars, a Malay dictionary, and a Chinese work, The Perfect Ox-Drive—his favorite reading.

When Rodolphe returned home he found Marcel, who was pitching quoits with some five-franc pieces, three in number. At first sight Rodolphe repulsed the hand which his friend held out to him: he believed that friend had committed a crime.

"We can go ahead," said Marcel. "We have the fifteen francs required. I'll tell you how: I encountered an antiquary at Médecis's. When he saw my coin he almost fainted—it was the only one that his cabinet lacked. He had sent all over the country to fill this gap, and had lost all hope. So, when he had carefully examined my Carolingian crown, he did not hesitate a single moment to offer me five francs. Médecis nudged me, his look completed the rest. What he meant was: 'Share the profit of the sale, and I will bid over him.' We ran it up to thirty francs. I gave fifteen to the Jew, and here is the balance. Now our guests can come, and we will dazzle them. Hallo! you have a dress-coat!"

"Yes," said Rodolphe, "Colline's coat." And as he fumbled in the pocket to get his handkerchief, Rodolphe let fall a little volume, forgotten in the foreign-language pocket.

The two friends instantly proceeded with the preparations. One arranged the studio; the other made a fire; a canvas-frame, garnished with wax candles, was suspended from the ceiling, by way of a chandelier; a desk was placed in the middle of the studio, to serve for the orators; they placed before it the only easy-chair, which was to be occupied by the influential critic; and they arranged on the table all the volumes—romances, poems, stories—whose authors were to honor the party with their presence. In order to avoid all collision between the different bodies of literary people, the studio had been disposed in four compartments, at the entrance of each of which, upon four signs, hastily manufactured, could be read:

POETS.	ROMANTICISTS.
PROSE-WRITERS.	CLASSICISTS.

The ladies were to occupy a space in the centre. "Ah, but we want some chairs," said Rodolphe.

"Oh," said Marcel, "there are plenty on the landing, hung along the wall. If we could gather them!"

"Certainly, we must gather them," said Rodolphe, going for the chairs, which belonged to some neighbor.

Six o'clock struck; the two friends went to dine in all haste, and came up again to proceed with the lighting of the parlors. They were dazzled themselves. At seven o'clock Schœnauer arrived, accompanied by three ladies who had forgotten to bring their diamonds and their hats. One of them had a red snawl, spotted with black. Schœnauer designated her particularly to Rodolphe.

"She is a highly respectable lady," said he; "an Englishwoman, whom the fall of the Stuarts forced into exile. She lives modestly by giving English lessons. Her father was a chancellor under Cromwell; she has told me all about it. You must be very polite with her, and not be too familiar at first."

Steps were heard on the stairs; they were those of the guests arriving. They appeared astonished to see a fire in the stove. The black coat of Rodolphe bowed before the ladies, and he kissed their hands with a regal grace. When they had a score of people, Schœnauer asked if they should not have a round of something.

"Presently," said Marcel; "we await the arrival of the influential critic, to light the punch."

At eight o'clock the number of guests was complete, and they commenced to execute the programme. Each number was alternated by a round of something—they never knew what.

Toward ten o'clock appeared the white vest of the influential critic; he only remained an hour, and was very abstemious in his drinking.

At midnight, as there was no more wood, and it being very cold, the guests who were seated drew lots to see who should throw his chair on the fire.

At one o'clock everybody was standing.

This remarkable party was during eight days the subject of the gossip of the quarter; and Phémie la Teinturière, who had been queen of the feast, used to say, in talking of it to her friends:

"It was remarkably fine; they had wax candles, my dear."

March 20, 1880. T. F. ROBERTSON.

Two—Too Brief—Poems.

[The two examples of obituary verse which appear below are selected from the columns of our esteemed contemporary, the Daily Morning Call. We are urged to this act of journalistic friendliness by a desire to rescue these scintillant examples of pathos from the rut of business-burdened commonplace. And so we place them—as only we may—upon Parnassus.]

O Allie, our darling, that we have loved so dear,
You have gone and left us to weep bitter tears;
When we look at your school-books and your sweet little slate,
We sit down at the table, see your vacant seat,
Both morning and evening, we can't you forget;
We will remember the day you drew your last breath,
That dear little beauty and sweet little pet,
Just died like an angel, we can never forget.
We were all standing round her, with eyes full of tears,
And her sweet little lips up to mine I did squeeze;
She went to the Market grammar school, and had never lost;
Her teacher said she kept ahead of her class;
The teacher and schoolmates they all said the same,
But that sweet little beauty with them could no longer remain.

Our darling little Katie, she took her long sleep;
She, going to her grave, leaves her parents to weep.
We gave up our dear darling to the heavens so high!
Her brothers and sisters all around her did cry;
They went on their knees, and for her said prayer;
They cut off a little curl to save some of her hair.

The correct get-up of a fashionable French dandy of to-day, the Parisian tells us, consists of a long black overcoat reaching to the ankle and ornamented with fur collar and cuffs, chevrot tweed trousers, high waistcoat showing one black pearl stud in the shirt, the collar upright and meeting in front, yellow gaiters over very pointed shoes, chamois gloves stitched with blue, woolen gauntlets, low-crowned silk hat with a narrow brim, and a cane with a steel or silver knob. Men who respect themselves do not wear flowers in their buttonholes. For evening dress, the bow of the cravat should be horizontal, the trousers wide at the bottom, patent leather shoes should be worn, very open at the instep and ornamented with a bow or silver buckle, and the wearer should endeavor occasionally to show his dark silk socks—maroon, blue, brown, or black, with tiny colored spots.

Somebody spoke angrily before one of our richest bankers of a poor wretch who had stolen a pocket-handkerchief. "Eh! mon Dieu!" said the banker, good-naturedly, "we must not blame him too much. We all began with small things."

"Mamma, what are twins made for?" Her precocious brother replied: "So that cannibals may eat philopœnas."

The courts have decided that a railroad ticket is good until used. This is not true of eggs.

Cetawayo says he never shall forget the Washington, as he never knew what it

CHIPS FROM OTHER BLOCKHEADS.

The darkest hour is generally just after the gas company sends in its bill.

"Sweet are the uses of a university," said a girl when a senior asked her to go to the concert.

Candidate mumbles in his sleep: "Convention—Cincinnati—fraud issue. Happy thought! Get nonunion; buy a large majority!"

It is now asserted by a prominent dentist that the only true way to clean teeth is to bite into a raw potato three or four times per day.

The house-fly, if in good health, can lay twenty thousand eggs in a season. Inventors are figuring ways and means of grafting the fly on the hen.

A Tennessee man can so perfectly imitate the sounds made by two dogs engaged in fighting that he can call a Memphis congregation out of church in three minutes.

An old bachelor, who particularly hated literary women, asked an authoress if she could throw any light on kissing. "I could," said she, looking archly at him; "but it's better in the dark."

Mrs. Partington—Well, I declare! Here's an ingenious young man who has invented an arrangement by which the deaf can see and the blind talk. Such talons as his should be reorganized by a statute.

Professor Proctor says there are no cats in heaven. The fact that all angels are represented without wearing boots or shoes proves the absence of such midnight howlers in the better world. No boots, no bootjacks; no bootjacks, no cats.

Go up, old bald-head, and look for capillary attraction—go to the ants, the sisters and cousins and ants, if necessary, and learn wisdom. If you can't find it there, subscribe to this paper, and we'll teach you enough in one month to make your head swim.

In response to a fond mother's query: "How are you, dear boy?" the dear boy writes back from Leadville: "I am pretty well, mother; getting along first rate. Have gained twenty pounds since I have been here, in half-ounce installments. Have not yet been shot in the head."

An Indiana man has sued for a divorce from his wife on he ground that she whistles while he is reading the Bible. If he had been a Connecticut man he would have kicked her down two flights of stairs and then chased her into the woodshed and locked her out. Connecticut folks insist on having religious exercises respected.

Little Birdie Blue-eyes

Sitting in the sun,

While her older brother

Fooleth with a gun.

Soon a loud explosion

Wakes the echoing wood—

All that's left of Birdie

Is her worsted hood.

"Am I tired of life?" said a cheerful old man the other day, in reply to the question. "Not a bit of it. I remember landing in this town with a chip hat and a hickory shirt and a pair of breeches. I've been way up, and I've been flat on my back, yet I'd like to begin and go it all over again—chip hat, shirt, breeches, and all. Why? Well, you see, when you come to the end you don't know what's beyond. I'm dead sure of this other thing; and, on the whole, this world just tickles me to death."

Professor—"What method does man employ to express his thoughts?" Scholar—"He habitually employs speech." P.—"Right; but when he can not employ speech, what does he do, eh?" S.—"He—P.—"See here! Suppose you were a hundred miles away from some one you wanted to say something to, what then?" S.—"I would—I would—" P.—"Suppose you had to announce to your father that you had been plucked—had failed in your examination—what would you do, eh? How would you announce it?" S.—"Oh, I'd write him a letter." P.—"Go and write him one then."

He was bald-beaded, he had colossal feet, his ulster was apart, and there was a hazy look, like a mackerel sky, in his blue eye. He was braced up in a corner of the saloon, and he regarded everybody who came in with an imbecile smile. "S-say," he gasped, catching at a lead-pencil speculator who was vending pencils at two for five cents, "why'm I melancholy?" The riddle was too much for the lead-pencil speculator's mind. He gasped for breath. "Because," continued the conundrum propounder, as he placed his knife rakishly in his mouth and tried to light it with a toothpick, "because I'm mor'n full!"

They say the Czar sleeps in a feather-bed, and a while ago he jumped into it so hard that the ticking hurst, and the air was full filled with feathers; and when he opened his mouth and drew in his breath to yell, he found out how eider-down tastes, and the more he struggled the more the feathers flew, and he had a terrible time; and when, aroused by his cries, the servants came in with lights, and after groping about in the cloud found the old man and hauled him out, it took four hours to convince him that it wasn't the most horrible attempt yet made on his life, and twenty servants have been at work for the last two weeks trying to get the feathers picked up in that room.

Scientists—very useful people they are, too—tell us that the slightest displacement of air causes a commotion in the atmosphere that never ceases. Think of this, ladies, when next you throw an old tin pan after the cross dog who is stealing the bones from the backyard rubbish. The effect of the throw, especially if it is a hard, womanly throw, is felt far beyond the limits of the neighborhood. It goes on and on, till it gets beyond the confines of this world, and affects the movements of the planets in their orbits; it is liable to jar the moons of Jupiter, shock Mars, leave an abrasion on the nickel-plating of Saturn's rings, and to throw the handle of the "Dipper" and the tail of Ursa Major all out of true. Hesitate long before you throw away an old tin pan. The children might like it to make mud cakes in, and to your poodle's tail.

SENSE AND SENTIMENT.

Slander is the foulest whelp of sin.—Pollock.

Instruct thy sorrows to be proud.—Shakespeare.

To be suspicious is to invite treachery.—Victor Hugo.

Nature does never wrong; 'tis society that sins.—Bailey.

Pleasure's a sin, and sometimes sin's a pleasure.—Byron.

He makes no friend who never makes a foe.—Tennyson.

The temple of our purest thoughts is—silence.—Mrs. Hale.

It costs more to satisfy a vice than to feed a family.—Balzac.

They never taste who always drink,
They always talk who never think.—Prior.

The heart that could not love was the first atheist.—Mercier.

Beauty without grace is a hook without bait.—Ninon de l'Enclos.

A woman is too slight a thing
To trample the world without feeling its sting.—Owen Meredith.

Forgetfulness is a flower that grows best on graves.—Georges Sand.

Whilst the heart keeps desire, the mind keeps illusion.—Chateaubriand.

Our sweetest songs are those which tell of saddest thoughts.—Shelley.

Much learning shows how little mortals know;
Much wealth how little worldlings can enjoy.—Young.

What a reasonless machine can superstition make the reasoner man.—Miller.

There's not a string attuned to mirth but has its chord of melancholy.—Tom Hood.

If thou hatest a man, do not kill him; let him live—that is hard enough.—Japanese Proverb.

We are by no means aware how much we are influenced by our passions.—La Rochefoucault.

I've seen your stormy seas and stormy women
And pity lovers rather more than seamen.—Byron.

Experience is the name that many men give to their follies and their sorrows.—Alfred de Musset.

I love men, not because they are men, but because they are not women.—Queen Christine of Sweden.

Of all demoralizations, the greatest is that which is confined to the respect accorded to riches.—S. Guinand d'Epéry.

The writers against religion, whilst they oppose every system, are wisely careful never to set up any of their own.—Edmund Burke.

The way to conquer men is by their passions. Catch but the ruling foible of their hearts, and all their virtues shrink before you.—Tolson.

Blasé, of course, everybody is. But there is always some ammonia to wake us up. When we're young, the ammonia is coquetry; when we're old, it is scandal.—Ouida.

N. B. S.

Success is a rare paint—hides all the ugliness.—Suckling.
Life hath no blessing like a prudent friend.—Euripides.

It is worse than useless to deplore the irremediable.—Symonds.

Moments make the hues in which years are colored.—Bulwer.

It is the nature of man to reason from himself outward.—Winwood Reade.

But past, who can recall, or done undo?
Not God omnipotent, nor fate.—Milton.

Whole communities may be insane as well as individuals.—Bishop Butler.

He who lives without folly is not so wise as he thinks.—La Rochefoucault.

Vanity makes a man show much that discretion would conceal.—Boulainvilliers.

The end of man is an action, and not a thought, though it were the noblest.—Carlyle.

The individual soul should seek for an intimate union with the soul of universe.—Novalis.

There's nothing of such infinite vexation as one's own thoughts.—Vittoria Colonna.

When we can do nothing else against a man we hate, we can at least paint his effigy as the devil's.—Bulwer.

Advice, to be useful, must be adapted to the character of the person to whom it is given.—Madame de Rémusat.

The object of ambition, unlike that of love, never being wholly preserved, ambition is the more durable of the two.—Bolingbroke.

Married people, from being so closely united, are but the apter to cease loving, as knots, the harder they are pulled, break the sooner.—Swift.

Divorce is the simple separation of the body. It is like the book to the manuscript, and you can have as many editions as you choose.—Dumas, fils.

The vainest woman is never thoroughly conscious of her own beauty till she is loved by the man who sets her own passion vibrating in return.—George Eliot.

The secret of man's being is still like the Sphinx's secret: a riddle that he can not read, and for ignorance of which he suffers death—the worst death, a spiritual.—Carlyle.

The existence of a principle of evil is the necessary incident of the existence of a principle of good, as a shadow is the necessary incident of the presence of light.—Draper.

FAG, M. P.

RANDOM RECOLLECTIONS.

The unenviable distinction of having been the noisiest theatre in the world will be readily accorded to the Theatre-Royal, Dublin—recently destroyed by fire—by those who remember the opera nights in that building. On those occasions the top gallery, familiarly known as "the circle of the gods," was wont to be filled with undergraduates from the university, who made it a point of honor to go to no other part of the house when the lyric drama was presented. If one of their number made his appearance in the dress-circle, arrayed in swallow-tail and white necktie, he was made the subject of playful and unfeeling remarks by his friends in the upper tier.

When the curtain was down, the students enacted uproarious interludes; at times singing in full chorus of about three or four hundred voices, and again listening while one of their number gave them a solo. On one memorable occasion a time-honored Dublin practical joke received a new commentary; they stuffed a dummy straw man and smuggled it past the ticket-taker. Between the acts a furious mock struggle was got up around the dummy, with sticks brandished and yells of "Throw him over." The pit began to grow seriously alarmed, for, unlike Danza, they were not anxious to have a god showered into their laps. When the struggle was at its height, and the straw man about to be launched on his airy flight, one of the boys, or "men," as they insisted on being called, yelled, "Don't waste him! Kill a fiddler with him!" Amid a deafening roar from the whole house, the flimsy fabric was thrown over; but it resolved itself into a shower of straw and cast-off clothes in the fall, and nobody was hurt.

Dublin audiences used to be exacting in the matter of encores, and the writer has seen Madame Trebelli-Bettini compelled to repeat three times the famous brindisi from Lucresia, beginning "Il segreto per esser felice." Sims Reeves was, perhaps, the only singer who successfully rebelled against this barbarous custom. He once called for a chair from the wings, and calmly sat down before the footlights, amid a storm of hisses and yells. After an uproarious half hour, he conquered.

The late Theresa Tietjens was an especial favorite in Dublin, and on those nights when she interpolated some one of Moore's melodies—generally "The Last Rose of Summer"—in Marta, the enthusiasm was wont to rise to its highest point; and the students frequently unharnessed the borses from her carriage and dragged her home after the conclusion of the opera. Ilma di Murska was the recipient of a similar honor on one occasion, and, after she had reached her hotel, the mob of undergraduates would not go home or be comforted until she sang one of Moore's melodies from the balcony. Naturally enough, she was hoarse for a week afterward.

Charles Kean liked Dublin well. It was there that, after long, patient toil, he achieved his first success; for at the outset of his career, and for a long period afterward, he was a complete dramatic failure. Naturally of mean and insignificant physique, ugly of feature and weak of voice, he was an example of what can be done on the stage by work and study. In those heroic parts which call for a noble, commanding presence, like "Hamlet," "Macbeth," or "Othello," he was not a pronounced success; but in the pathetic rôles, "Richard II.," "Wolsey," and "Lear," he was great. There was a rare note of true pathos in his voice, and during his delivery of Wolsey's farewell, even the stolid pit was wont to feel very damp. But his great part was "Louis XI." There was a certain fiendish, sardonic malignancy about his conception of the part that made it a complete, accurate, and intense historical portrait. Physically, the rôle suited him. At the opening of the play, as Kean gave it, a party of children were discovered, playing noisily and making a fearful racket. When Kean entered at the back of the stage, he ran down to the front in the peculiar, undignified, unconventional manner of his original, took one of the boys by the ear, turned a glistening, piercing, bitter stare upon him for some seconds, and then released him completely cowed into trembling silence. Not a word was spoken, but "Louis XI." stood revealed, selfish, malignant, and careless of forms, not the king of inches, but the king of brains.

"King John" was one of Kean's successful impersonations; and the murderous whispered instructions to "Hubert" were delivered with excellent force. It was once the writer's ill-fortune to see that exquisite scene completely spoiled. One of the constituents of the gallery—not on that night filled with undergraduates, who only went there on opera nights—failed to hear the beginning of the speech, and interrupted two or three times by shouting, "Spake up!" until Kean completely lost his temper, broke down, came forward to the footlights, and, almost tearfully, explained that a whisper was a dramatic necessity of the passage. He was evidently greatly distressed, and his mind was out of joint for the remainder of the night.

The incident serves to emphasize one of the defects of the Theatre Royal. It was too large, there having been but one larger theatre, as distinct from the opera houses, in the three kingdoms. "Old Drury" is somewhat larger, and of late years it has been chiefly abandoned to spectacular and lyric drama. The age of large theatres has gone by, and of the many theatres built in London of late years, few are much larger than the Bush Street Theatre in this city. The saying of Charles Mathews about a certain large theatre in Philadelphia might have been applied with justice to the Theatre Royal of Dublin: "It only needed two things to make it perfect—that every spectator should be furnished with a telescope, and every actor with a speaking trumpet." The old tradition of a democratic pit was always preserved in this theatre. The modern London practice of dividing this classic ground into stalls was never adopted, and to the end "the front row of the pit" remained the emphatic stamping-ground of persistent play-goers and the nursery of dramatic critics.

E. F. CAHILL.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 20, 1880.

"Let me look at a revolver," said a man who walked into a store at Sandstone, Mo., and a weapon was shown him. "Show me the cartridge," he added, and carelessly loaded one of the chambers. "Excuse me for using this a minute," he further remarked, and shot himself through the brain. Some people have a great deal of cheek.

THE PERFECT DINNER TABLE.

In reply to the query: "Can any one give the description of a table set for a fashionable dinner party?" an Eastern contemporary says: It is purely a question of aesthetics. Good taste will do what too much money would spoil. First, the linen must be perfect. Sprawling figures on a table-cloth are not desirable. A centre figure is excellent, with a small pattern following as to the border. Small napkins are shabby things. Very generally in the United States we skimp such things. A French napkin is large enough to cover the knees. Of course, you do not want to tuck it around your neck, but you might do so if you wished to, and it would still keep your gown, if you are a lady, from being soiled. Red monograms on napkins, recalling clots of blood, are ugly. Too much embroidery on a napkin is in bad taste. Such linen as serves for actual use loses character when it is paraded. A nice thing—nice is exclusively feminine in this sense—is to place on the wood of the table a covering of Canton flannel. This makes a pleasant, soft landing-place for dishes, and, besides, prevents the mahogany from being stained or burned by a hot dish. Table-mats are de rigueur. Perhaps the most approved are made of Chinese or Japanese straw. Wooden folding ones are apt to clatter and to become soiled, but it is that noisiness in folding up which is disagreeable.

A volume might be written on the china. There used to be in olden times certain parade sets, which were only brought forward on state occasions; but these, mostly of elaborate design and gorgeous decoration, are out of fashion to-day. A clear white china, ornamented with a line or two of gold, is fine enough. Monograms on china are not in good taste. All these letters stuck on plates are quite as readily purchased by a hotel as by a private individual, and the distinguishing elegance of a chiffre seen under gravy is never very startling. Glass? Why, only have the plainest. Cut-glass, with sharp points all over it like a chevaux de frise or a porcupine, are disagreeable things to handle. We have before this inveighed against the littering of the table with too much glass. A goblet, one wine-glass, one small goblet, and a champagne-glass suffice. These already, with their round bases, take up fully twelve square inches. If more glasses are wanted, fresh ones should be brought. As to cutlery, only white ivory handles are permissible.

Silver! Why, here there are innumerable differences of taste. Remember that we lead the world now in our silver furniture. You can have spoons and forks of Japanese or Etruscan, Russian, or other patterns, as you want them. The old paddle pattern is now in the background. Still, we have a sneaking passion for the old order of things. Any day you may see at the great silversmiths' in New York dozens on dozens of plain, honest old spoons and forks going into the melting-pot, to be born again into the newer style. It is true that in many of the spoons, on the left-hand side, where the metal has touched the lips of generations of soup-eaters, the silver has been worn to a knife-edge. In the forks the tines are attenuated; of course, they are useless now, but still the writer has a reverence for these old wares. Not more than one spoon and fork, with knife, should be placed before each plate. We write this, because there is sometimes seen a "doubling-up" process, so that the table recalls a cutler's show-case.

The water question at table is another mooted point. The French carafe system seems à la mode. In New York, there is a regular business done in having water frozen in carafes for dinners. The ice-pitcher, which has to be carried around as glasses are to be replenished, is inconvenient. Of salt-cellars, one small one before each guest is excellent. No caster on the table, if you please. The American caster is an abomination, and should be hurled from our dinner-tables. On the sideboard it has its place. Did it ever strike you that people never want mustard on their beef at a dinner party? It is the centre of the table, and ill decoration, where good taste is wanted. We have before written in regard to the false taste displayed in the éponge business—how these most ungainly things, worse in style, more shocking in taste than the typical fireman's horn of forty years ago, are often to-day placed on a table. There are works of art, which are in the possession of some few people, which are delights to look upon, but they are exceptional. If in a handsome salver, in a large, ample vase, there be a wreath of flowers, the effect is charming. This centre may be relieved by baskets containing fruit. On a French table, the cake, the dessert, is often placed where it remains in permanence during the dinner. In France they have, too, at times, a habit of making an immense display with hors d'œuvre, which fringe the table. There is butter, radishes, pickles, anchovies, olives, tunny, caviare, and no end of things. It is in bad taste, and confuses the symmetry of the table.

We are asked "whether lamps with tinted shades are ever used at dinner?" We never heard of such a thing. Fancy an odor of kerosene or of best sperm oil mingling with the fragrance of a roast canvas-back, or the lustre of blue or pink lights making spinach look purple, and the stewed celery like beets! Some people eschew gas, and will not dine comfortably unless in dress-coats and by the flicker of candle-light. This is a remnant of that protest which the candle-makers threw down fifty odd years ago to the gas companies. There is a fragment of some little good sense about this candle-light. If not as brilliant as gas, candle-light gives out a purer-colored flame. There is a yellowish tinge about gas which mars a delicate complexion. The sex is not as handsome by gas-light as by candle-light. For a long time, people who gave feasts kept on burning their candles at dinners, and some do it to this day. But a well-lit gas chandelier, nicely hung, well-shaded; has, even among the most prejudiced, long ago supplanted candles. As to menus to be set before each guest, though stationers have endeavored to urge this fashion, it has been coldly received, because it gave the dining-room a restaurant appearance, and the idea is a just one. It would be uncomfortable to have one's guests more engaged in reading their bills of fare than in general conversation. But cards with the names of the guests, placed alongside of each plate, are necessities. Flowers may or may not be distributed; but to hand them about after dinner, demolishing the centre-piece, is rarely done. A pretty little bouquet beside each lady guest may be an elegant compliment; but still, a bouquet at a dinner-table is rather in the way than not.

THE HOLY MARVEL OF EASTER DAY.

"You have heard, my boy, of the One who died,
Crowned with keen thorns and Crucified;
And how Joseph the wealthy—whom God reward—
Cared for the corpse of the martyred Lord,
And piously tumbled it within the rock,
And closed the gate with a mighty block.

"Now close by the tomb, a fair tree grew,
With pendulous leaves and blossoms of blue;
And deep in the green tree's shadowy breast
A beautiful singing-bird on her nest,
That was bordered with mosses like malachite,
And held four eggs of an ivory white.

"Now when the bird from her dim recess
Beheld the Lord in his burial dress,
And looked on the heavenly face so pale,
And the dear feet pierced by the cruel nail,
Her heart now broke with a sudden pang,
And out of the depth of her sorrow she sang.

"All night long, till the moon was up,
She sat and sang in her moss-wreathed cup
A song of sorrow, as wild and shrill
As the homeless wind when it roams the hill;
So full of tears, so loud and long,
That the grief of the world seemed turned to song.

"But soon there came, through the weeping night,
A glimmering angel, clothed in white;
And he rolled the stone from the tomb away,
Where the Lord of the earth and the heavens lay;
And Christ arose in the cavern's gloom,
And in living lustre came from the tomb.

"Now the bird that sat in the heart of the tree
Beheld the celestial mystery,
And its heart was filled with a sweet delight,
And it poured a song on the throbbing night;
Notes climbing notes, still higher, higher,
They shoot to heaven like spears of fire.

"When the glittering white-robed angel heard
The sorrowing song of that grieving bird,
And heard the following chant of mirth,
That hailed Christ risen from the earth,
He said: 'Sweet bird, be forever blest—
Thyself, thy eggs, and thy moss-wreathed nest.'

"And ever, my boy, since that blessed night,
When death bowed down the Lord of light,
The eggs of that sweet bird change their hue,
And burn with red, and gold, and blue;
Reminding mankind, in their simple way,
Of the holy marvel of Easter Day."

FITZ JAMES O'BRIEN.

Notwithstanding Edison's delay in perfecting the electric light, it is now extensively utilized in San Francisco and other American and European cities. Hitherto it has, for the sake of display, been chosen for the most part for sidewalk illumination. But lately it has by no means been so restricted. The Public Library, the Baldwin Hotel, and other local institutions are using the electric light, wholly or partially, for illuminating the interior of the buildings. Gas companies nearly everywhere are in as bad odor as their gas, and the question will probably soon arise whether the public will fare better at the hands of electric light corporations. The electric light has by no means produced such a furor as was occasioned by the discovery of gas for lighting purposes. Many will probably remember the first appearance of the following lines:

"I thank my God the sun and moon are both hung up so high
That no presumptuous hand can reach and pluck them from the sky;
For if it could, I do not doubt but some reforming ass
Would move that they be taken down, and light the world with gas."

As a corporation is said to have "neither a body to be kicked nor a soul to be damned," our faith is not boundless in either gas or electric light companies. The day may arrive when people will manufacture their own gas as cheaply as it is done in the neighborhood of the sand-lot.

At last there has been a move at Washington in the matter of the Chinese question, and the President has appointed James B. Angell Minister to China in place of Seward (recalled), and John F. Swift of California and William H. Trescott of South Carolina to constitute, with the new minister, "a commission to negotiate and conclude, by treaty, a settlement of such matters of interest to the two governments now pending between the same as may be confided to it." Notwithstanding our wishes to the contrary, this is the best we can get—a minority of one in the settlement of a question so vital to our local interests. Mr. Swift, however, has the ability to carry all the responsibility of his position, and the merits of the question to take him squarely to the front in the deliberations.

Problem: to make an absolutely honest man of a street-car conductor. The bell-punch seems good. The Clay Street people think they have found something better. How would it do to give conductors a place to sit down for an occasional half block? It might help the conductor to think over his sins. Perhaps, too, if the horse-car driver were given a seat he would not ask the conductor to divide. Possibly better pay and shorter hours might mend matters.

Beecher, in one of his late sermons, said that Christianity was "heavenly drunkenness." On the same basis we suppose Sin would be designated as hellish sobriety. And yet temperance is the longest and strongest shout of the "Salvation Army."

Mr. Crane informs us that the true pronunciation of the word "dynamite" was discovered by an Irishman immediately after the attempt to blow up the Czar with it. It is called, by this mute inglorious Webster, "dam-nigh-it."

It would be well if the fashion of supper after the theatre for theatre parties superseded altogether that of late company dinners, immediately before the play. People who dine quietly en famille before going to the theatre are not apt to chatter like so many magpies while the performance is in progress, and make of themselves such nuisances that if they were not dressed in silk and broadcloth, they would certainly be asked to keep quiet, or leave the house.

SUNDAY ON THE PRESIDIO.

The topographical advantages of this peninsula are not half understood by our citizens generally. Few cities crowd into so small a compass so many, so varied, and such surpassing beauties of outlook. That San Francisco is builded just within the Golden Gate, and upon one of the most beautiful of bays; that, a few miles west of the busy city's throbbing life, the blue Pacific is chafing against the broken shore-line, and tossing its crested billows far beyond the farthest horizon; that the "Old Man of the Mountain" is looking down from his throne on towering Tamalpais in perennial grandeur; that the harbor has its picturesque islands, and the eastward landscape its rampart of lofty hills—these, and a hundred other facts about our city, we know in a general way, yet we do not realize how much it might mean to us if we knew them better. Nothing makes this fact clearer than a stroll along the crown of the hills north and east of the cemeteries. There is now under consideration by Congress, agreeable to a suggestion by General McDowell, a proposition to make a public park in a portion of the Presidio Reservation. No other spot on the peninsula offers so many advantages. Unlike the neighboring land to the immediate south of the reservation, there is little or no sand on the tract; and the soil of the gulches and little valleys, opening northward and running down to the harbor, is a deep black loam, obviously adapted to the growth of many of our most beautiful trees and shrubs. Yet were the future of this reservation of no promise, the locality has beauties of position which are in themselves so well worth attention that one wonders the spot is not already better known. The completion of the California Street Road to First Avenue has made the spot easily accessible, and during the past ten days many have visited it. Leaving the cars at the present terminus, First Avenue, one walks north a few blocks and enters the reservation over a most romantic old English stile. "But where is the park?" one asks involuntarily, for the first sensation is one of disappointment. There is a little strip of sand just within the reservation line, and, crossing that, one enters a bit of upland prairie, that at this season is carpeted with springing grasses and fantastic flowers. In its soil and botanic growth the major portion of the reservation is in almost exact contrast to the park proper, a mile to the south. But, as one goes on a little way, the verdure under foot ceases for the moment to attract, for, on reaching the crest of the ridge, the neutral bit of bay just inside the Gate bursts into sudden, almost startling, view—a picture that has scarcely its Western equal. It is not alone the picture itself, although it holds not a bit which is not in some degree beautiful or picturesque, but there is besides that the suggestion of beauty unseen beyond the beauty seen—"A new world beyond the new world," as Canon Kingsley said, in opening his first lecture in Platt's Hall. The garrison quarters are in the foreground, their red chimneys lowering under the gray sky, or gleaming in the sunlight. Trees and flowers and neatness and floral profusion there, and around them circle the green-brown, cheerful-sombre hills and winding drives and meandering, treeless gulches. Away to the west is a quadrant of tossing sea, with the fog-clouds hovering above the far, flickering horizon. Directly in front are the narrows of the broadening bay. They are beautiful in all weathers—passing beautiful, with their shifting colors, as the rifted clouds hurry away to the north, and the long lines of sunlight are crossed by bars of shade. Sometimes the tossing white-caps break the direct rays of the sun into fragments of yellow glint, and one can see little patches of clear sea, like the sheen of a woman's veil with bright eyes flashing behind it. Here, at least, our bay is always beautiful; and beyond that the Saucelito hills rise from the water—at first the sheer cliffs, then the climbing hills, and at last the peerless sky-line of old Tamalpais. It was a pretty sight, last Sunday, to see this pleasant upland thronged with people—hundreds, perhaps thousands, of men and women and "young people" and children. Not all of them—perhaps a very few of them—appreciated the full beauty of the panoramic scene. Yet all of them could enjoy the magnificent sensation of freedom, the glorious privilege of being in the country and among the free flowers, that this situation holds in its free gift and bids us all accept. All of which is in charming contrast to the necessary straight-lacedness of the other park.

"Where painted placards warn from off the grass,
And civic rules deny one little flower."

The California Street Road—we have this officially—will soon be completed, with steam dummy and full line of cars, to Sixth Avenue; thence south along Sixth Avenue to Golden Gate Park, terminating opposite the entrance to one of the principal park drives. When our citizens come to realize that they may thus visit these two chief points of interest within the city at almost the same time, they will "learn something greatly to their advantage."

The Californian grows apace, and its brief history has been a story of continuous improvement. The number for April—just out—is in very satisfactory fulfillment of the promise made by its sponsors. It is good for three reasons: it is readable, it is stimulating, and it is clean. Sam. Davis contributes a characteristic story. An anonymous somebody, who has evidently been in "mighty good mental company," furnishes an interesting chapter on "Notable Autographs." The "Outcroppings"—in large type in the present number—are a deal richer than outcroppings generally. Fifteen articles—exclusive of the departments—are given in this number.

CXXII.—Easter Sunday, March 23.—Bill of Fare for Eight Persons.

Eastern Oysters. Amber Soup.
Baked Scalloped Prawns.
Potatoes à la Maitre d'Hotel.
Beefsteak Sauté, with Mushrooms. New Potatoes.
Green Peas. Stewed Celery.
Roman Punch.
Roast Turkey—Cranberry Jelly. Lettuce—Egg Dressing.
Strawberries and Whipped Cream.
White Sponge Cake.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Oranges, and Bananas.

To SCALLOP PRAWS.—After boiling the prawns, shell them and put them in a saucepan with a can of French mushrooms, a pint of béchamel sauce reduced with oyster liquor; thicken with the yolks of four eggs; season with salt, red and white pepper, and some chopped parsley; put in a baking-dish; sprinkle fine white bread-crumbs over; put a lid on the top, and bake twenty minutes. Squeeze the juice of a lemon over, and serve in the same dish.

THE SHORT WOOL-CLIP.

MISS LAURA NEWTON TO MISS GRACE APPLEBY.

LOS ANGELES, April 4, 1879.

MY DEAR GRACE:—I told you in my last letter that I would never write to you again unless you promised to come and make me that little visit I have been looking forward to so long; and yet here I am, like a loving old schoolmate, sitting down to send you another letter before I have seen so much as a scratch of your graceful pen! But how can I be resentful toward my Grace? And how could any one but the most stony-hearted resist the sweet influence of this lovely day, as I swing in my hammock and watch the hazy outline of the San Gabriel Mountains, the air soft and sweet as a dream of love, and all nature about me in a state of perfect, blissful rest?

I write to you to-day, dear Grace, merely to urge you again, with all the pleas which I can summon strength to make, that you come and make us that long-promised visit. And I make my plea especially strong, I hope, by adding that my cousin, Hugh Benedict, is just in from Arizona, stopping with us for awhile, and I think it would be pleasant for both of you if you could come. The dear boy has been running the greatest risks in the world on his Arizona ranch—fired on again and again by Indians, hothered by his Mexican herders, and altogether playing the hero that he is; and I know you would enjoy, as I do, hearing him relate all his wild experiences, describing horrible hair-breadth adventures, and then smiling, in his quiet, nonchalant way, as though it were all the most natural thing in the world. Do you remember him? He lies in an easy-chair not far from me, as I write, smoking a wonderful pipe, which he treasures as if it were the most precious thing in the world; and as I tell him that I am writing to you, and ask if he has any message, he says, the saucy boy, "Yes; ask her if she remembers the time that I broke her doll's house, when we were children together, because she said she wouldn't marry me. And tell her she'd better come down to Arizona. Women are a pretty scarce article there!" Isn't he an impertinent fellow? Now he wants to take back his message, when he hears how rude it sounds all written down; but I tell him no, it must go now, as I am at the end of my paper almost, and I can not rewrite a whole sheet. You'll forgive my sending such a message, won't you, dear Grace? I know he only meant it in fun, for he's the largest-hearted, noblest of fellows; and ever since Uncle Harry adopted him he has been the dearest, most devoted of cousins. You know that uncle gave him his choice between going to college or starting in business, letting him choose his own style of business; and the plucky fellow said that college was all very well for weaklings, but he would prefer to strike out for himself, and take nature at first-hand. So he chose to forswear civilization and become a sheep-raiser; and Uncle Harry bought him a splendid ranch in southern Arizona, stocked with sheep, and Hugh has been "roughing it"—as he expresses it—for three years, having some old chums of his with him till just now. They have recently left him, and he feels lonely; "so lonely," he said to me a little while ago, when he could spare a few minutes from that precious pipe, "that I declare, Laura, if I thought any woman would have me, I have half a mind to marry, and have somebody to cheer me up when the wool-clip is short." So now, Miss Grace Appleby, a word to the wise. You know how I love you both. Bless you, my children! Do come. No more room to write a word. Lovingly, your LAURA.

P. S.—Can you read this scrawl, where I have written across the lines? Papa is always scolding me for it. Oh, what a lovely sunset!

MISS GRACE APPLEBY TO MISS LAURA NEWTON.

SAN FRANCISCO, 6 April, 1879.

DEAREST LAURA:—It is very kind of you to keep insisting on my paying you a visit in your lovely little corner of the world. But how can I do it, dear Laura! I am just beginning to reap the reward of my long patience, and have actually five little music scholars, who absorb nearly all my time, and heaven knows how much of my vitality; and it would be positively wrong for me to run away from the life I have set for myself, and go to my dearest Laura.

You know how I hate this music-teaching, this constant drumming over and over of the same monotonous scales and exercises, trying to make the stupid little fingers of my stupid little scholars comprehend the mysteries of the pianoforte. But how can I escape it! And what have I to look forward to in my life but a long vista of piano-fortes, with a cheerful variety of black and white keys, and a long procession of stupid little scholars, marching up with stupid little smiles to play their stupid little exercises—occasionally, heaven be praised! depositing a stupid little pittance for me, their awe-inspiring teacher, their Rubenstein, their Clara Schumann, their—bah! how I hate it all!

You will forgive my meeting your cousinly enthusiasm with indifference, or worse than indifference, my dear Laura; but candor compels me to say that if any one thing were needed to keep me away, very far away, from Los Angeles, it would be the news that your saucy Cousin Hugh was with you; for a more disagreeable, harum-scarum (gracious, how is that spelled?), and thoroughly unruly boy than he was when I knew him, I must say that I have never met. He may be large-hearted and noble. I trust he is. There was considerable room for improvement. And, to tell the truth, I never knew him or met him except for those two weeks that I spent with you in Boston, when we were all children together; but I have a vivid recollection of a broken doll-house, an army of mutilated dolls and dresses, and a particularly roguish cousin of somebody's standing by and grinning like a young demon. Now, don't go and read him all this rubbish, dear Laura, promise me; but say that I do not thank him for his message, that I do remember the time of which he speaks, and that I am not going to Arizona, whatever the market there. But enough of your cousin. Let him return to his muttoms. I simply can not go down just now, dearest Laura, much as I would like to; and we must content ourselves with visiting on paper for a while longer, as we have been doing for two long years now.

Now, don't laugh at me, my dear old Lamkins, and don't say I'm growing romantic in my old age; but I have some- tell you. The fact is, Laura dear, I have been for many days now under the most wonderful spell and fascination that mortal can conceive of. I hardly know where to begin, I hardly know what to say, I hardly know what to think of myself, that I should be so worked up about a man whom I have never really seen, and yet whom I see constantly, every evening and far into the night; a man whose name even I do not know, and yet whose face I gaze at by the hour, often losing myself as I sit at my window, late in the evening, and waking from a nap in my chair only to find the wonderful face still before me, as noble, as fascinating, as sadly, mournfully attractive as ever. Do you think I am raving, dear Laura, or that I am about to have another of my brain-attacks, such as I had in dear old Florence so many years ago? No, no—but listen.

In the first place, there is a wonderful young artist—Arthur Thistlewaite; but he's not the man. Mr. Thistlewaite has rooms directly across the street from me. Mr. Thistlewaite has hosts of friends, whom I have seen coming and going at the door of his boarding-house. Mr. Thistlewaite has a fashion of leaning out of his window, in the evening, after his laborious artist-labors are done for the day, and of smoking a long-stemmed pipe (like your saucy cousin's, perhaps!) while he gazes upward at the stars, or down into the quiet street, as a passer-by attracts his attention, or abstractedly into space, as his artist-fancy may lead him.

But it is not Mr. Arthur Thistlewaite (whose name I learned from my boarding-mistress), or his wonderful pipe, or his long evening reveries, when the light of his pipe shines like a glow-worm in the darkness—it is nothing about Mr. Thistlewaite personally which has fascinated me and put me under the spell I have mentioned. Neither is it his crowd of merry friends by whom I have been attracted. It is one face only from out of this throng that has riveted my attention and is the cause of all my excitement, which is far greater, my dearest Laura, than I dare avow to you, for you would think me crazy, I fear.

Having said this much, how can I attempt to describe a face which I have never seen at a nearer distance than the width of a street! How, at any rate, could I give you, with these flat words and this cold ink, any idea of the calm, sad profile, the earnest, steadfast look, the head slightly bent forward, as if peering into some dark mystery of the past or future! I can only say that I am fascinated, spell-bound—in love, if you will—with whom, I do not know.

I have never seen him (the unknown) enter Mr. Thistlewaite's lodgings, or leave them; although I have watched an entire day, "from morn till dewy eve," and on into starry night. He never appears with the throng of merry loungers, brother-artists, and friends, who come rapping so many times a day at his lodgings. From this I conclude that he either lives in the house, or gains entrance by some rear passage. And, from all the signs, I conclude that there is some dark, brooding mystery over his life, which calls for concealment from men. But no—this can hardly be, for now I remember that, while I have never seen him entering the house with the artist's friends, I have often seen him in the rooms with them, as they moved about Mr. Thistlewaite's quarters, inspecting his pictures, smoking—well, doing I don't know what. But always there was the same quiet, sad air, the same noble look, as if he did not share in the joys of this world, but had another world of thoughts, pleasures, and anticipations. Ah! there he is this very moment, as I write!

Mr. Thistlewaite has drawn his red curtains. His noble-faced stranger-friend sits not far away, the light of a flickering fire falling full on his face. His shadow I see perfectly outlined against the thin curtains. Mr. Thistlewaite is talking with him. I can see his figure also, occasionally, as he rocks forward in his rocking-chair. If I could only hear what they are saying! If I could only penetrate the mystery which surrounds them, and which seems to call for these secret nightly meetings with drawn curtains! Perhaps he is some old friend of Mr. Thistlewaite's (in disgrace—who can not be abroad in the day-time). Perhaps he is some brother-artist, in distress, with a wife and some little—no, perish the thought! He shall not have a wife! He shall not have any little—oh, Laura, I can not write any longer this evening. I am on fire with excitement. I look across the street at those two figures behind the red curtains, and I can hardly see them for the blind whirl into which I am thrown.

It is two hours later. All this time I have been alternately sitting at my window, watching those two earnest talkers, and pacing my room in a fever of excitement. Aunt Lucy has come in several times to see why I was up so late and walking the floor so constantly. I have told her (what a fibber I am!) that I am thinking out the plot of my story for the Argonaut, and poor Aunt goes away quite satisfied, only begging me not to sit up "too very late."

The light across the way has just gone out. Mr. Thistlewaite opens the window, and for a few moments I see the light of his pipe, as he sits smoking his last smoke, leaning out into the darkness. I am glad he smokes in this way, just before he retires, and after his nightly interviews with his friend. It seems to cool me down and quiet my nerves, after their intense strain while I am watching the two figures.

I must close now. I am utterly worn out, and so are you, too, dear Laura, with this tremendous epistle of mine. Forgive me, won't you, Laura dear? I do not know what I would do if I had not you to come to with my troubles—for troubles I am almost inclined to call these curious sights and feelings and forebodings of mine. I do not know what is to come of them; something quite important, or quite dreadful, I feel certain.

One thing, dear Laura: of course you will say nothing of all this to your cousin. It is between us two. I would never forgive you.

Good night, and pleasant dreams! What my dreams will be it is hard to say! Always affectionately yours,

GRACE.

MISS LAURA NEWTON TO MISS GRACE APPLEBY.

LOS ANGELES, April 10, 1879.

MY DEAR GRACE:—

And now as to what you call your "trouble," and your "curious sights and feelings." Why, my poor little pussy-wussy, what is the use of going and falling in love with a man's shadow, or working yourself up into such a froth of excitement over somebody who is you don't know who? It may be your artist-friend's tailor, coming nightly to dun him, with a bill for the manufacture of the velvet jackets and gorgeous waistcoats which he undoubtedly wears! Or it may be some poor relation from Oakland, whose coat is a little too threadbare for daylight exhibition to the critical city's eye! Or his landlady's gawky son! Or almost any one but the sadly, mournfully fascinating individual that you imagine.

No, no, dearest Grace, do not worry yourself over such a needless worryment. Either draw your own curtains resolutely, and shut out the "two figures behind the red curtains" and the "glow-worm" pipe and the nocturnal artist leaning out of his window (how shameful of you to watch him at such a time, you naughty, had girl!), or make a hold push for liberty by bribing your landlady or one of your "stupid little scholars," or somebody, to find out who your disturbing young stranger may be, that seems to be making such a lunatic of you again—pardon me, dear Grace, for saying "again," but you ought to remember how "lunatic" you were in Florence just four years ago this month, and all because of that ridiculous little Frenchman. But I will not remind you of all that terrible time, dear Grace.

If you had only come down to peaceful Los Angeles, and my hammock and saddle-horses, as I have you, all this would have been avoided, my dear Grace. But now I fear it is out of the question, since you say that you are going along so swimmingly with your music scholars. Heaven prosper you, and send you "no end of lucre," as Cousin Hugh says à propos of his last fall's wool-clip; for you deserve everything that is good, dear Grace, and much better luck than the long, dismal vista of white-and-black-keyed piano-fortes which you seem to see before you.

Good-bye now, dear. We are all off for a long horseback ride to Santa Monica, and I must put on my habit.

If you have time to get those little things at the White House of which I wrote several weeks ago, I wish you would send them, please. Los Angeles is such a poor place to shop! By-bye. Toujours à toi, LAURA.

P. S.—Cousin Hugh left suddenly yesterday. How could you think that I would read him anything about your "troubles" and so on? For shame! Such a lovely, perfect day as it is! Do come and join us—eh?

MISS GRACE APPLEBY TO MISS LAURA NEWTON.

SAN FRANCISCO, 14 April, 1879.

DEAREST LAURA:—It is all very well to tell me to draw my own curtains, and shut out the figures over the way; and all very well to advise me to bribe some rattle-tongued individual to find out who my wonderful stranger is. But how utterly impractical you are, you dear old, hammock-swinging, horse-riding, novel-devouring girl of the Angel City! Imagine me, a woman, with all the foibles of the sex properly developed, and especially that propensity which we are supposed to possess above incurious men—imagine me pulling my curtain tight, and foregoing this sight across the way, night after night! Not if it kills me! And you would do exactly the same as I, you easy preacher you! You know you would.

And as for bribing some one to find out who he is, I admit that that might be attempted, perhaps; but what a risk I should run! And what a scandal might be created if it were known in polite San Francisco that Miss Grace Appleby, spinster, music-teacher by profession, hitherto believed to be of sane mind and body, had been detected in an attempt to learn, by means of a bribed emissary, the secret of one Arthur Thistlewaite, artist, whose misfortune it was to inhabit rooms across the way from that prying spinster aforesaid! No, no, dear Laura, it might be done; but I dare not try it. I would rather "suffer and be strong."

But what a mockery it seems, this "to suffer and be strong"! "Suffer"—yes. "Be strong"—I fear not, dear Laura. Not that I want to worry you needlessly, and not that I am in any such danger as you apprehend, you poor goosey. But no one can endure such suspense long, and especially I; nervous and delicate as I am. And yet what can I do? I can not run away. My funds would just about carry me to the farther edge of Oakland, and there leave me, a candidate for the poor-house. I can not change my quarters. Auntie has rented the house for a year, ending next December. I can not make Mr. Thistlewaite drive away the fascinating stranger. I can not see any way to end this exciting mystery. And besides, I like it!

I can begin to understand the fascination which various wicked things have for their votaries; really I can, dear Laura—though I know I am shocking you. I know this excitement is not good for me. I know this sitting up till past midnight every night, burning with curiosity, is not good for me. I know that after my hard day's work with my little scholars, I need absolute quiet, dear Laura. And yet I can not resist. I look at my watch a hundred times a day. I trudge from one house to another, giving my stupid lessons, thankful that each one given brings me nearer evening and my mystery. I return to my room toward dusk, and sit silent and alone at my window, thinking, as the shadows creep upward on the steeple at the corner, how all the world seems at rest, and only I am tortured with a sickening anxiety! And now the dark house opposite, with its old-fashioned windows and mysterious air, will soon show a lighted window and a pair of red curtains; and a little later, Mr. Thistlewaite and my wonderful stranger, talking together, the one so quick and impulsive in all his movements, the other so quiet, so severe, so impressively mournful in his mood. All the fatigue and turmoil of the day seem to be left behind me, and I sit there on fire with a new life, waiting—ah, for what, dear Laura? Why was I born to be such a mystery to myself?—to be so romantically sensitive? And yet I know that that sad face which I shall so soon see against the curtain yonder, is bound to exercise a great, a moving influence on my life, for good or for evil, some day. For evil? No, it can never be. No evil could result from so noble a face. It must be, therefore, for good. But what good? And when? And how?

MIDNIGHT.—It has been an eventful evening in my life. I tried to obey you, dear Laura. I shut my blinds, firmly resolved to be good. I even went to Aunt Lucy's room, and astonished my aged relative by the exceeding quiet of my manner, and my interest in a forlorn pair of old gloves that she was mending. I came back to my room, intending to retire, when I heard music—a piano and voices. You know how fond I am of music. I was conquered. I threw open my blinds, turned down my light, and saw, as well as heard, that the music came from Mr. Thistlewaite's. Evidently a party of his friends, making the evening merry for him. I did not see my stranger. I feared I was going to miss him. Several men were leaning out of the window, smoking and talking. Occasionally I could catch a word or two of what they said. It was naughty, Laura, but it was very nice! I had to be very careful, as the moon was shining full into my window, and the opposite house was in shadow. After a while the window was vacated, the curtains were drawn close, and I saw my stranger again. The whole party seemed altered the moment his face appeared among them.

This was about nine o'clock. There was a sudden ring at our door-bell. Who could it be at that hour? Everybody had, fortunately, retired. Aunt Lucy is a famous sleeper. I crept down stairs, trembling with excitement. The stairs seemed to creak preternaturally. I asked through the door who it was. "Messenger boy." What did he want? "Have something for young lady," was the answer. I opened the door cautiously. A box was put into my hands. The boy was asking me to sign something, but I slammed the door in his face, and, climbing quickly to my room, I opened the box, and found the loveliest, sweetest mass of rose-buds, violets, heliotropes, every flower I love—but not a sign as to the sender. I examined the box. It was a gentleman's hat-box. "Herrmann, San Francisco," was marked on it. I knew that that was the famous hatter on Kearny Street. But who could have sent it? Was it really for me? Yes, there was my name and address in full. I placed the flowers in vases all about my room, and returned to my window.

But why, dear Laura, shall I tire you with all this? I am simply beside myself with curiosity, anticipation, yes, love—anything that you will, and I do not know how I can endure the strain much longer. I have hung about my window the whole evening, I have watched the face against the curtain opposite, I have petted and caressed my lovely flowers as though I might coax their secret out of them—but I know absolutely nothing more than I knew last evening, except that I am the more completely in the power of this my mysterious stranger, who seemed to move among all this gay party as sad and reserved and majestic as ever.

Dear Laura, I must say good-night. I am again completely exhausted, as always after these midnight vigils.

Good luck for me seems to be increasing. I have already six new pupils, all of whom have come to me within three days. Can there be any connection between my new pupils, the flowers that I received this evening, and the stranger in the artist's room? Who knows? Ah, Laura, things turn out very strangely sometimes!

And I am to have such a lovely time on Thursday evening, at the Art Reception! The Silvermans have invited me to join their party, and I am going to wear my pink silk, that I wore last at your Santa Monica "german," you remember. I will tell you all about it. Fortunately, no one up here has seen my pink silk.

Yours, with love, GRACE.

MISS LAURA NEWTON TO MISS GRACE APPLEBY.

LOS ANGELES, April 26, '79.

DEAREST GRACE:—What in the world has become of you? Have I done anything to offend you? Surely you could not have been provoked at my making fun, in a light way, of your "troubles" and your face across the way! But now nearly ten days have gone by since you sent me your last, and you have not given me a word about the great Art Reception, of which you promised me a long account. I have been waiting anxiously every day for your letter, as I know you must have had a lovely time. Who was there? and how did my Grace look in her pink silk.

Now, dearest Grace, do sit right down at once and give me a full account of yourself since your last letter. Los Angeles is so quiet and dull! We had a pleasant little "german" last week at Union Hall; but I was not very well, and I quarreled fearfully with Jack Wright, my partner; he was so provoking, I never knew him so stupid.

And do not imagine, dear Grace, that I meant to make fun of your fascination for the mysterious stranger. Really I did not. And stranger things have happened than that you should find that he was really somebody whom you could love and who could love you in return. It would be odd, though, would it not? To fall in love with his shadow, then with the man, then he with you, then—oh, Grace, I grow quite excited myself as I think of it all. And it would not be anything unprecedented, after all. You remember that Carrie Pinkerton fell in love with her husband's back-hair, in the American Chapel at Dresden, long before she knew him, or his name even; and she told me she used to "worship" it almost, to use her emphatic word. And I am sure they have always been happy together, very.

FRIDAY, April 27.

I have been interrupted several times already, dear Grace, and here another day has gone by, and yet my letter is not finished. I am expecting the Whitneys every moment, to drive me out to San Gabriel; so that, for fear of being delayed again, I am going to close this at once, and be sure of its going to you, although I know it is not a letter at all, compared with the delightful long ones that you send me—or used to send me, you bad girl!

By-bye. Write at once, and do not forget to tell me everything.

Hastily, but with all the love in the world, your

LAURA.

MISS GRACE APPLEBY TO MISS LAURA NEWTON.

SAN FRANCISCO, 3 May, '79.

DEAR LAURA:—I have not written to you before for reasons that will be apparent when you have read this letter. I wished to give you a little lesson in contemporary history; and I delayed writing in order that I might give it in one chapter, without a break, as I felt sure I could be able to do. I can now do it.

To begin: Mr. Arthur Thistlewaite and I have been fast friends for several weeks now; how fast friends, I may tell you very soon.

About the first day of April—a day sacred to certain pranks not unknown to you—Mr. Thistlewaite suggested that we should play a little joke on my good friend, Miss Laura Newton, of whom he had heard me speak so often and so warmly—please blush! Very well! What should it be? I suggested to him that a certain marble bust in his rooms had a fashion of casting a shadow on his red curtains which bore a striking resemblance to a living and breathing mortal.

"Capital!" he said; "it shall be the bust of my old school friend, Hugh Benedict. You shall weave a romance around it for your old friend in Los Angeles. We will enjoy the sport here."

This romance we were just about commencing, when your letter came announcing your cousin's presence in your house, and giving me his polite messages regarding the population of Arizona and the comforts which he proposed for himself in the event of a short wool-clip.

"Capital, again! quite à propos. Mr. Hugh Benedict shall be treated to a share in the joke."

Then came my first letter to you, describing my terrible anguish of soul over the mysterious stranger in Mr. Thistlewaite's room. Oh, how I worshiped my mysterious stranger! How my days and nights were racked with the thought of who he was, and how I loved him!

I told you to say nothing of this to your cousin, knowing well enough that you would tell him everything. Then came yours, saying that you had told him nothing; from which I knew that he had read every line of my letter. Mr. Hugh Benedict then left you suddenly, and as suddenly appeared in the rooms of Mr. Thistlewaite, his old friend. He arrived at noon. I learned of it an hour later.

Miss Appleby had chosen to speak slightly of him, and he had come up here to teach her a lesson! In fact, he was going to teach her a lesson that she would never forget. This he told his good friend, Mr. Thistlewaite; this Mr. Thistlewaite, my good friend, at once communicated to me. Capital, again.

But she had written to Miss Newton about some handsome fellow or other that she had seen in Mr. Thistlewaite's rooms. This fellow must be got out of the way before he could begin action. "But, man alive," said Mr. Thistlewaite, when he had read my letter to you—which your cousin carried in his pocket, as he now carries every letter that I have written to you since the first of April—"man alive, this must be my bust of yourself that she has fallen in love with! The description is perfect: 'the calm, sad profile; the earnest, steadfast look; the head slightly bent forward, as if peering into some dark mystery! How fortunate! Just the thing, my boy! Yes, we'll teach her a lesson, as you say! Nothing could be more opportune!' Result, a close compact and an alliance offensive and defensive between Mr. Hugh Benedict and Mr. Arthur Thistlewaite, a still closer alliance between Mr. Arthur Thistlewaite and Miss Grace Appleby, spinster aforesaid.

The rest is quickly told—how I fell deeper and deeper in love with the noble, sad face behind the red curtains opposite; how I wrote it all out to you, you sent my letters to the gallant Benedict, the gallant Benedict read them aloud to Mr. Thistlewaite, Mr. Thistlewaite in turn communicated their contents to me, making the circuit perfect, you see, as it should be. The plans of Mr. Benedict are progressing famously; the plans of Miss Appleby are progressing with equal success.

Finally the Art Reception came on, and now Mr. Benedict was to see with his own eyes how abject a slave Miss Appleby had become to his very marble image. Miss Appleby, spinster aforesaid, in lovely pink silk, is promenading on the arm of Mr. Augustus Silverman. Quite as if by chance Mr. Arthur Thistlewaite appears, is presented to Miss Appleby by their mutual friend Mr. Silverman, and presently asks: "Will Miss Appleby promenade with him? Will she look in at the statuary room?" Miss Appleby accepts, with the proud and dignified grace for which she is famous. They enter the statuary room.

Suddenly she is transfixed with amazement. She stands, with dilated eye, before a marble bust, with "calm, sad profile" "the head bent slightly forward." She can hardly speak. She points with her gloved finger ever so politely and gracefully to the marble bust, with an appealing look to Mr. Thistlewaite. She sees the marble presentment of all the noble traits which have fascinated and bewildered her for so long. She appears as if she would swoon. She asks, with palpitating voice: "Who?" And, as Mr. Thistlewaite says, quite unconcernedly: "Mr. Benedict, old friend of mine," she faints, my dear Laura—faints with the most faultless grace in the world, arranging her pink silk about her in becoming folds; and being scarcely aware, as she is hurried to her carriage, that another gentleman, who is addressed by Mr. Thistlewaite as "Benedict," or "Ben, old fellow," has flown to them, when she fainted so becomingly, and is helping the poor unconscious girl to her carriage.

Miss Appleby was a very lovely invalid for a week or so—such a terrible shock had this sight of the marble bust given her! And, having given up music-teaching, and dismissed all her stupid little scholars, because of a contemplated change in her life, she had all the more time to receive and appreciate the devoted attentions of Mr. Hugh Benedict, lately of Boston, now of Arizona, and also to enjoy the lovely and all too costly presents with which he showered her. Oh, how she grew to love him, and how she doted on wool and the sheep trade and the darling little lambs!

Last evening, about eleven-thirty by the clock (he is a tireless visitor), as he knelt with inimitable grace on the carpet at my feet and mumbled something that was probably Arizona dialect for a proposal, I bade him rise, and explained in a word my April-fool joke with his cousin, Miss Newton; bidding him return to his dear little muttons, and wait till women were not so scarce in Arizona. As he dashed out of the door, the noble fellow, I think—I will not be positive—but I think I heard him say: "Sold, by Jove!" But whether he meant himself or his other sheep in Arizona, I can not pretend to say.

Mr. Arthur Thistlewaite and I have been engaged since the 22d of March. We are to be married next week, Thursday. Won't you come, dear Laura? We think of making our bridal tour to Arizona, to see how long the wool is this spring!

Devotedly yours,

GRACE.

LOS ANGELES, March, 1880.

M. S. S.

INTAGLIOS.

Delirium.

My heart is drunk with the bliss of loving,
Held in a passionate dream of bliss;
While yours is dumb with the weight of proving
How much of heaven lies in a kiss.

Oh, sweet, dim stars, float on thus forever,
Soft-eyed night hold the moon in eclipse;
Let my soul lie steeped in this bliss forever,
Drunk with the breath from thy passionate lips.
—Mrs. M. B. Hewett.

I Love You.

Beloved, the briefest words are best;
And all the fine euphonious ways
In which the truth has been expressed
Since Adam's early Eden days,
Could never match the simple phrase:
Sweetheart, I love you!—Elizabeth Akers Allen.

Still Waters.

I do not love as others do, you say;
Because I do not woo you in their ways,
With many love-words, and much honeyed praise.
Nay, darling, but I love you more than they.
For light emotions we find easy speech;
But for the great, the joy that grows to pain
In its intensity, we seek in vain
For any voice or language that can reach
Unto its height or depth. I do beseech
You to believe what I do here maintain—
That ready speech would come were you less fair;
Swift, empty words for lesser love would come;
Your very loveliness is my despair—
It is my mighty love that makes me dumb.
—Carlotta Perry.

About Kissing.

Little child, when twilight shadows
Close the western gates of gold,
Then the loving arms of mother
Tenderly about thee fold.
Over lip and cheek and forehead,
Like a shower, caresses fall;
For a mother's kiss at twilight
Is the sweetest kiss of all.

Pretty maiden at the gateway,
Shy sweet face and downcast eyes,
Two white trembling hands imprisoned,
How the golden moment flies!
Lips that softly pressed thy forehead,
All the rosy blushes call;
For a lover's kiss at twilight
Is the fondest kiss of all.

Happy wife, thy noble husband,
More than half a lover yet—
For those sunny hours of wooing
Are too sweet to soon forget—
On thy smiling lips uplifted,
Full of love his kisses fall,
For a husband's kiss at parting
Is the dearest kiss of all.

Weary mother, little children
With their dimpled hands so fair,
Passing over cheek and forehead,
Soothe away all pain or care;
Lead your doubting heart to heaven,
Where no dreary shadows fall!
For the sinless kiss of childhood
Is the purest kiss of all.

The Proudest Lady.

The queen is proud on her throne,
And proud are her maids so fine;
But the proudest lady that ever was known
Is this little lady of mine.
And oh! she flouts me, she flouts me!
And spurns and scorns and scouts me!
Though I drop on my knees and sue for grace,
And beg and beseech with the saddest face,
Still ever the same she doubts me.

She is seven by the calendar—
A lily's almost as tall;
But oh! this little lady's by far
The proudest lady of all!
It's her sport and pleasure to flout me!
To spurn and scorn and scout me!
But oh! I've a notion it's naught but play,
And that, say what she will, and feign what she may,
She can't well do without me!

For at times, like a pleasant tune,
A sweeter mood o'ertakes her;
Oh! then she's sunny as skies of June
And all her pride forsakes her.
Oh! she dances round me so fairly!
Oh! her laugh rings out so rarely!
Oh! she coaxes and nestles and peers and pries,
In my puzzled face with her two great eyes,
And owns she loves me dearly.
—Thomas Westwood.

Fallen Flowers.

One of the workers of the world
Living toiled, and toiling died;
But others worked and the world went on,
And was not changed when he was gone,
A strong arm stricken, a wide sail furled;
And only a few men sighed.

One of the heroes of the world
Fought to conquer, then fought to fail,
And fell down slain in his blood-stained mail,
And over his form they slept;
His cause was lost and his banner furled;
And only a woman wept.

One of the singers among mankind
Sang healing songs from an o'erwrought heart,
But ere men listened the grass and wind
Were wasting the rest unsung like a wave;
And now of his fame that will ne'er depart
He has never heard in his grave.

One of the women who only love
Loved and grieved and faded away—
Ah me! are these gone to the God above,
What more of each can I say?
They are human flowers that flower and die,
This is the song and the end of them.
—Arthur.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served at 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1880.

The Council of Two Hundred are not doing the work which was expected of them, but the work they are doing is good of its kind. It is important that San Francisco have a good charter, and that the sand-lot element have nothing to do with contriving it. In uniting all respectable electors in support of a non-partisan, anti-sand-lot ticket, the Council have, we hope, secured that end. The fifteen gentlemen whom it has persuaded, both Republicans and Democrats, to accept as candidates, are men of character, brains, and social worth. We think we could mention the four who will make the charter, and the eleven who will assent; but when we reflect that the Declaration of Independence was mainly the work of Thomas Jefferson, and that Congress merely concurred, this arrangement does not strike us as particularly objectionable. Most of our laws are the work of fewer heads than four. It is now the clear duty of every man who wears clean linen—whether he own an Alderny cow or not—to stand in and vote for the Citizen's Ticket, not hoping too much from success, nor fearing too much from defeat. No kind of charter is going to spare us a conflict with the mob, nor save us from future misrule when the spirit of senseless discontent, stimulated by immigration of foreign paupers and criminals, shall again have made head; but next to a speedy solution of our present monstrous difficulty the best attainable government for our city is what we most need; and to that, such a charter as will be devised by the gentlemen nominated by the Council will materially assist us. Absolutely good government would be possible only among a people good enough to need none, but in this faulty world and these ailing times it is no small advantage to head off the Sand-lot, even at the ballot-box. The malcontents will show their full numerical strength; unless we show ours we shall lack the means of a comparison which it is now most important to make.

Two weeks ago a correspondent of this journal, writing over the signature "Vigilante," made an unconsidered protest against the shuffling policy and hesitating half-measures of the Council of the Citizens' Protective Association, predicting nothing but unwise action from its talk, and nothing from its unwise action but augmented disorder, characterizing its method as mere intimidation, describing its declared resolution to work "within the law" as infantile, and censuring its personnel as lacking backbone. We thought at the time that these criticisms were not justified by events, and that, wanting such a basis, they were at least premature; to-day we are constrained to confess that our correspondent's judgment is apparently in process of vindication, and his predictions in imminent peril of fulfillment. The Sand-lot is more menacing than ever, the just indignation of decent people more powerless than it was before, through having ceded its control to those who, in the plenitude of their prudence, have decided that it shall move, not when it will, but when they will—not with the formidable effectiveness of its own righteous promptings, but within the sinuous lines that have all along restrained its speed and consumed its power. We really did not need an organization unknown to the laws to strengthen our hands in obeying those which we had not broken. We did not require a council to repeat the story of our danger, and apprise the enemy of our forbearance—to confirm our apprehensions, pledging us to non-resistance—to comfort us with assurance that our cause is just, and warn the wicked that we will not fight. These services we could have performed for ourselves. No question is here raised as to the motives of the eminently respectable and conservative gentlemen who have come forward to assume control of this movement. It is their movement, as yet, and they may properly guide it in any direction which may seem to them most likely to lead to a lasting result; but we submit that the present aspect of affairs is not encouraging to one who does not wish to die in strict conformity to law—the hostiles of the Sand-lot freshly war-painted and digging up the hatchet, only the more deeply to bury it in our skulls, and the Council of Two Hundred solemnly smoking the pipe of peace and making a slate for a charter election! We venture to suggest to the lawyers and politicians who are heading this crusade against the enemies of God, that, having brought us face to face with the foe, it will be prudent for them to stand aside and let him have a fair fling at us. "Savans and jackasses to the rear!" thundered Napoleon on the eve of an engagement. In the dark hours between lawset and manrise there will be opportunity for statesmen and attorneys to inspect our line of retreat.

We do not, we think, exaggerate the importance of the situation. It is at least important enough to be understood. It is of the nature of insurrections to come when most threatened and least expected. During the few years immediately preceding our civil war, the Southern States had, in every direct and indirect way, declared their intention to ruin if they could not rule. Their every utterance was a menace, their every act a preparation; yet the North was well assured that nothing would come of it. Secession came at last as a surprise, and war as an amazement. In France, the year 1788 did not expect the year 1789, and even the bared arms of '92 had not prepared the public mind for the red hands of '93. Here in San Francisco we have alternately trembled and laughed at the cry of "wolf," and despised the howling of the pack and the gleam of their uncovered teeth, even now our language is more guarded than our throats. For this false feeling of security—this childlike reliance upon a something called, variously, the "intelligence of the masses," the "public spirit of our citizens," the "patriotic common sense of the American character," and similar witches' horse-shoes that we nail above our doors—the Argonaut confesses itself somewhat to blame. We have ourselves at one time denounced the sand-lot mob as dangerous, and at another ridiculed it as harmless. After crab-salad, truffles, and a break in stocks, Kearney, and his ugly following of long-lipped and flat-browed aliens, have stalked before the eyes of our imagination as malign and dismal demons, breathing fire and slaughter; when the victual has been humane and the wine Christian, the capering of these unhandsome louts has entertained us no end, and we have come near to loving them. This, in all penitence, we admit to be wrong; they are either dangerous or harmless. They are not a peril one week, and a diversion the next; and with a juster sense of our responsibility as the only journal in the city that, with whatever variation of mood, has been consistently their enemy, we shall not fail henceforth to point out the peril of the situation so long as we conceive it to exist, and demand attention to the crimes and deserts of those who prolong it. The torch is kindled for our homes, the knife whetted for our throats; we know that there is a resolute intention to apply both. We know that these miscreants "mean business"; that murder is in their minds, and the means of murder in their hands. We know that their loud talk is not empty declamation; that they have the confidence of ignorance and the courage of confidence; that they will fight well and die hard. If we do not attack them they will attack us, and their disregard of the law gives them that most precious military advantage, the initiative—an advantage that is not decisive, for we shall beat them, but one which, if we suffer them to grasp it, as it seems we must, will enable them for a time to do the thrusting while we parry. Even this is better than to twiddle our thumbs and tap our toes in the courts while Clitus Barhour is saving from the prison scrubbing-brush the necks that are due to the lamp-post. It is a thousand times better than revising lists of candidates for municipal office, or hatting ballots at a caucus. It is even better than enrolling as "special constables" to back up the police in arresting Mrs. Smith for carrying a concealed weapon.

But the Sand-lot will not give us even the satisfaction of immediate resistance. It threatens all the time, but it will strike only when it is best prepared and we are least aware. It holds its murderous designs in terrorem over our homes and families. It goes from house to house, intimidating our women and children. It prowls about our gates at dead of night. It compels us to make arsenals of our banks, stores, offices, and residences, loopholes of our windows, and sentry-beats of our garden walks. Whoever has the misfortune to have a fortune, the disadvantage of a wife and children, and the vulnerability of an unstained reputation, must sleep with one hand upon a weapon; going to his business, must leave his family exposed to insult at his own door; and can not open his newspaper without the apprehension that he will find himself to have been publicly defamed. The thing is become intolerable, and there is apparently no hope of its mitigation by peaceful and legal methods. The judge who sentences a Kearney and a Gannon one day must submit to be publicly reviled by them the next. In any civilized country they would be re-arrested with the curses still hot upon their lips, and summarily consigned to a cell for contempt of court. In England, where justice between man and man is more nearly perfectly administered than anywhere else in the world, and whence we derive whatever of good is in our judicial methods and whatever is noble in our legal traditions, no man dares publicly to impugn the motive of a judge, nor publicly to assail the justice of a sentence, even when passed upon himself. Here, in the interval between his sentence by one court and his discharge by another, any foul-tongued miscreant may snap his dirty fingers at his judges, and cast such discredit as he is able on the one institution upon whose purity, power, and good repute the existence of organized society depends. The rascal's utterances are privileged, for they go to make up a part of that public opinion which is superior to law, religion, and reason. His vote has helped to make the judge who tries him; it logically follows that if dissatisfied with his creature he shall be permitted to undo with his tongue what he did with his hand. If he can not depose he may at least defame. Two or three years of experience ought, we should think, to be enough to convince us that the laws are powerless for our protection when large bodies of voters choose to move against our property and persons. With a Bench largely occupied by creatures of the Sand-lot, with a Mayor who is at once their tool and their chief, with a militia in whose weakness and worthlessness lies our only hope, for we are concerned lest they join our enemies, what, we ask in all seriousness, have we to expect? The moment we are sufficiently aroused to make a dumb, blind effort in the way of organization, the politician and the lawyer come to the front to misdirect it. The former, true to his instinct and the stupid traditions of his craft, throws himself into the imminent deadly breach between two political parties, and proposes to give us a new set of municipal office-holders; the latter gives legal advice gratis, and suggests an amendment to the proposed city charter. And behind these tom-fools, with their quack remedies, twenty thousand manly hearts beat impatiently for action, and forty thousand broad palms are itching for the feel of that which the Sand-lot has so long been dangling before their eyes.

We do not counsel violence; we do not counsel anything. We describe the situation as, with some knowledge of the subject and some previous connection with related events, we perceive it to be. If advice is wanted, the spokesmen of the Council of Two Hundred are competent to give it, and enough of it. They are charged to the lips with wisdom, and discretion, and secret information, knowledge of the ropes, and how to pull the wires—with methods of organization and plans of action. They are charged with everything but action. And at the last they will burn in their beds, and the little Kallochs and Kearneys and Gannons will cobble their charred bones into kennels for cats. No; violence is not a thing to be advised. It would be useless to advise it if we wished; men who take the sense of the press before acting do not act. Short, sharp, and decisive action is of spontaneous growth and instantaneous manifestation. The opportunity that hesitates is lost. It is touch and go; when the cloud and the earth are sufficiently full of electricity there is lightning, that is all. And when our social atmosphere is sufficiently charged by the friction of our political machinery, the flame will leap out and the thunder follow. We could not hasten this condition, and the Council of Two Hundred can not much retard it. We are not admirers of lynch law; it is ugly and repulsive. It hangs without suitable inquiry—always the right man, it is true, but never at the right moment; commonly it could with distinct public advantage have hanged a good deal sooner. We are opposed to hanging, anyhow, but then if we or Kearney and Kalloch are to hang, we have a natural preference for them. We are opposed to bloodshed; blood is nastily warm, and has a smell that sickens. But the blood of a sand-lotter would be less offensive to us than our own. Taking life is a disagreeable necessity, but losing it is worse, and there is coming an opportunity to choose between these evils. It is useless to argue that if the law-abiding part of a community would do its duty the necessity for Judge Lynch would not arise. This may be true or not; it is at least certain that it would not arise if the other fellows would do their duty. We do not care to bandy arguments; we are not didactically inclined, either. We admit that we are imperfect; that we are children of error and sons of darkness; that we have not properly protected the purity of the ballot-box from the machinations of the Democrats; that we ought to have put up a stronger man against Kalloch; that so many of us should not have gone to the Cliff House instead of voting two or three times each against the new Constitution. We confess we ought to have done more to purify the judiciary by stuffing the ballot-box against Judge Ferral. All the same, we think we have the right to live as long as the Sand-lot; that we have a right to keep our property as long, and hug it as tight, as they their poverty; that our wives and babies have a right to protection from the domiciliary visits of tramps and ruffians. And if there is left among us any spirit, any manliness, any courage, and any care to regain the good opinion of the brave women who have learned to despise us, these rights we will instantly assert in the most effective manner that is left us. The hour is in labor with the man—"savans and jackasses to the rear!"

AFTERMATH.

Governor Perkins accompanied his approval of the Revenue Bill with a message of disapproval. He found the bill good enough to sign, but bad enough to enforce attention to its defects. In his message he uses the following language: "Failing to find in it any constitutional inhibition to justify the interposition of an executive veto, and not deeming myself at liberty to disagree with the Legislature on a question of merely public policy as involved in a revenue bill, especially when the sentiment of the people appears to favor the measure—for I heartily subscribe to that which has been so pointedly said by another, that 'the Executive should have no policy or plan to enforce against the expressed will of the people'—I have, therefore, reluctantly given the bill my official signature." In this explanation, we think, Governor Perkins has gone wrong at several points. In the first place, he should not have signed the bill: every reason justifying his "reluctance" would have justified his refusal. If he does not feel himself "at liberty to disagree with the Legislature" on a matter of raising revenue, it is difficult to believe he would feel at liberty to disagree on any. Is it because a revenue bill is so important or so trivial? We take the ground that Governor Perkins has no right to sign a bill for any other reason than that he believes it just and wise—a good bill. In giving the Executive the veto power, the Constitution bestows upon him a distinct legislative function; he becomes a part of the law-making machinery, and, as a legislator, is as much bound to give effect to his opinion as is any member of either House. His duty of private judgment is even more imperative than theirs, for his action is more important. He has no right whatever to subordinate his opinion to theirs, for their action in any particular instance is no more "the expressed will of the people" than is his. The people have put him where he is, in order to judge of the soundness of what comes before him for signature, so that in case of doubt it may be returned to the Legislature for reconsideration under harder conditions of passage. Nor has he the right to consider whether or not the "sentiment of the people"—aside from its partial expression in Senate and Assembly—appears to favor a certain measure. Neither he nor any member of the Legislature is the people's delegate. We have elected them to use, not our judgment, but their own. That is why we chose such wise and virtuous gentlemen as we know them to be. It is the business of a representative of the people to do for the people, not what they wish done, but what, according to his own judgment, they need done. No other theory of representation is tenable, and all others are mischievous. If we were Governor or President we should veto every measure that did not meet our approval; but those that we signed we should stand to, not adducing excellent reasons why we ought to have done differently. We do not think we should have too little legislation in this country even by compelling the "expressed will of the people" in every instance to take the form of a two-thirds vote in the Legislature.

Gentlemen of the sand-lot, stand up. Do you know where New Zealand is? Do you know that it is a big, fertile, comparatively new country? Well, it is all that and more. But it took the bull by the horns, years ago, and there Chinese immigration is limited, regulated and kept well in check. Yet the latest advices tell of hard times and labor troubles and almost the devil to pay in that big, fertile, comparatively new land. Is it not just possible that labor has itself made mistakes and neglected opportunities? If in New Zealand, why not in California? Come, now, what answer?

"A native-born American citizen," writing in the first person singular, and like a band of music, on the question, "Shall Americans govern America?" says: "Having just read in your last issue an article on naturalization, I can not resist the impulse of expressing my own ideas on the subject. First, the sentiment, not new but eminently sound, that no foreigner should be allowed to vote who has not been here long enough to know something of our institutions and laws, meets my views. Twenty-one years was my term of probation. Second, no foreigner should be allowed to become a citizen of the republic without having first obtained, from some responsible authority in the country from which he emigrated, acceptable proof of his respectability and good character. For why should America be made the receptacle for all the scum and offscouring of Europe? Why should outlaws, ex-convicts, and criminals from foreign lands be accorded, without limitation, all the rights and privileges enjoyed by honest and respectable native-born? Why should this free land be made a nest for snakes? Third, no man, native or foreign, should be allowed to vote who is not able to read and write. Such a one is unable to appreciate the value of the ballot. In his hands it generally becomes a commodity for sale to the highest bidder, and has no significance beyond its money value. So long as an individual remains tied to the leading-string of ignorance, and is entirely dependent upon others for his opinions of government and politics, he is as ignorant as a child, and entitled justly to the same consideration as a minor. Ignorance breeds a very large proportion of our political troubles, and it is quite time 'the bull was taken by the horns.' Good government, in order to be enjoyed, must be understood, and the privileges of our noble system should be allowed to no man who is totally incapable of appreciating them. Everything worth enjoying in this world is worth working for, and I see no reason why this rule, so generally accepted, should be less applicable to law and government than to property and money. Extreme liberality regarding citizenship we, as a nation, have thoroughly tested, and its disadvantages are becoming more and more apparent. Give ignorance power, and it becomes tyranny. Treat rascals as honest men, and you only enlarge the sphere of their villainy. Remove the dread of the gallows, and you convert cowards into braggarts. Our present troubles in California illustrate all these theories, and it is time they were understood, and an effective remedy applied. The respectable foreign-born, as well as the native element, are equally awakening to the necessity of putting on the brake. The people are ready, and what is required now to set the ball in motion is thorough organization, backed up by an honest, independent, fearless press."

The New York papers point out discrepancies in the prices of mining shares, as sold there and here. The difference, they say, is sometimes as great as ten points. Naturally, and pardonably, they draw the inference that the San Francisco brokers are making "wash" sales, "and the same with intent to deceive." It may be, it may be, but really the innocents of the New York market—Keene, Roberts, Dorsey, Gashwiler, and similar babes—ought not to expect our old hands at the business to keep them posted in the correct values of stocks. They must learn by experience, these callow fledgelings; they must observe—and endure—the methods of our elder birds.

"Who would have thought the old man had so much blood in him?"—Shakespeare. Who would have thought Treasurer Shaber had so many bondsmen?

Kearney, like the man who was incredulous when told that he had been talking prose all his life, would probably be amazed if a bloated schoolmaster, or lecherous editor, were to tell him that he had been making use of logic in his speeches. But it is so; he is an unconscious logician. Last Wednesday evening he said: "The votes in favor of Chinese immigration were 223, and the Citizens' Council consists of 223 members. These Chinese-lovers meet in secret, with barred doors." The insinuation is beautiful extremely, and logical no end. It is that particular thing which in logic is known as suggestio falsi. Kearney long since learned the principles of suppressio veri, and is one of the greatest living masters of assertio damboshi.

AN INTIMATION.

Respectfully Commended to Some of Our Esteemed Contemporaries.

When Baron Munchausen's postillion
Emptied his cheeks in his horn
To sound an alarm, of a million
Breaths not a note was born.

In vain to his lips he applied it;
But later, when hung in an inn,
The sounds that were frozen inside it
Thawed out with a terrible din.

Thus vainly our sand-lot fellows,
Exalting the trumpet of fame,
May crack their ambitious bellows
And the world not hear a name.

But when their antics shall alter
Our coldness to heat, and we choose
A suitable beam for the halter,
A suitable neck for the noose,

That tube will begin to clatter
The name of each rogue to guide
Our choice; and then little 'twill matter
That he long ago laid it aside.

That the law debarring corporations of this State from employing Chinese should be declared unconstitutional is what any except a mere tyro in the legal profession must have anticipated. In meditated legislation it never does to "make the wish the father of the thought," at least unless the "wish" has a constitutional prop. All good citizens of California wish to place as many obstacles as possible in the way of the Mongolians obtaining a firm foothold in our State, but a great deal more than "wishing" is necessary to get rid of this most undesirable class of immigrants. There is a right and there is a wrong way of banishing them from our soil. The one is by the slow and tedious process of constitutional reform; the other, by taking the metaphorical "bull by the horns," and, in defiance of law, driving the Chinese like so many swine into the sea, or across it in ships. This unreasoning, sand-lot policy can scarcely find endorsement on the part of our reputable citizens. As a rule, men who bave everything to gain and nothing to lose by a disturbance—for the bringing on of which the presence here of the Chinese is their alleged excuse—care little for the law. When such a course is attempted, or even threatened, the majesty of the law should be invoked to assert itself in its greatest potency. That the decision in question should prove disappointing, if not positively aggravating, to the masses of our citizens is only to be expected. But no feeling of this nature should interfere to prevent the law, as expounded by the tribunals appointed for the purpose, from being obeyed to the letter. It often takes a long time to retrieve a great mistake. It was a great mistake to encourage the Chinese to land here in the first place, and a greater mistake to permit and encourage them to acquire almost equal rights with those of American citizens. Reasons then existed, which no longer prevail, for keeping Mongolians out of the land. Americans and Europeans were not permitted to penetrate into China, and therefore it would have been perfectly just to say: "As you will not allow us to pass into the interior of your country, you shall not put foot on the shores of ours." But now the fact is patent that they are not only here by invitation, but that they have acquired a positive right, by a constitutional amendment and the Burlingame Treaty, to remain here. All this can not be easily undone. There are few things more difficult than to take a backward step in legislation. Nevertheless, it would be weak and idle to contend that no solution can be found for the Chinese problem. We apprehend that the solution must be discovered by Congress; and, as Congress is seemingly with us in the matter, it will be well to practice for a time, in this connection, the virtue of patience.

About the meanest kind of intimidation is that attempted in the financial column of the Bulletin by trying to throw discredit upon the mines which will not furnish the editor with a monthly statement of their product. Because they do not choose to take the trouble to gratuitously supply such information about their private business as this enterprising journal finds it profitable to sell, they must submit to be described as "fearing publicity," and therefore probably barren of prospect or unsound in management. We are pleased to observe that most of them endure this petty outrage with composure, and our meddlesome confrère admits that he must abandon his monthly tabulated statement of the gold and silver product, for lack of information. But surely he is too easily beaten. Has he tried defiling the graves of a few directors' fathers, or calling the wives of unreasonable secretaries an ass?

Isn't the New York Times a little unreasonable? It complains of the introduction of sand-lot rhetoric into New York—a striking piano-maker having described the manufacturers as "vile fiends, suckers, and bloodhounds, who haven't the feelings of a dog." Really, this seems to us very mild and moderate language. There may have been a time, some years ago, when we would have considered it disagreeable asperity if applied to ourselves, but now the Sand-lot has given us so poor an opinion of ourselves that we should take it as a compliment; and it is not likely that New York manufacturers are any better than we. The Times is prematurely concerned; just wait till that striking piano-maker gets his intestinal strings keyed up to the Kearney tension, and there will be music worth objecting to.

It is to be hoped the local Democracy is satisfied with its attitude on the joint Senator question; certainly the Republicans are. In approving the choice of the Sand-lot—the precocious Master Freud—the County Committee of our friends the enemy have delighted us exceedingly; if our man is to be beaten we should perhaps prefer that he be beaten by a man; but of that we have now no fear. If our opponents had divided their forces the chances would have been that of their two candidates one would have been a better man than Freud, for none could have been worse. That man might have got that half of the Democratic vote which our candidate will now secure—the decent half. The other half would have been given to the sand-lotter in any event. With reference to the Democracy the Workingmen's party is like a good-natured dog lying in the sun: his sense of dignity will not permit him to rub noses with the fraternizing kitten, but he lets her amuse herself with his tail.

Later—The respectable tail, having failed to "waggle" the Democratic dog, has broken square off at the end of the back, and the mangy body has contentedly crawled back into the sand-lot kennel where it has all along belonged. It is sad, but suggestive. The coming election will draw more than one line. But the Bourbons are broken-hearted. To have their high-toned ultimatum answered by the proclamation of the rank and file to "go to hell and nominate," is altogether too personal as to the place of holding the upper-crust convention.

The thirty days of grace granted to the Chinese to stop being nuisances expired on Wednesday last, but the Health Officer has not as yet decided what to do with them. The jails are all full of Mayor Kallach's relatives and Kearney's friends, and there is no suitable place for quartering arrested heathen. The Health Officer thinks, therefore, that he will wait awhile, and it really looks as if he would. Messrs. Gannon and Kearney, however, who have done about as much as anybody—except Judge Rix—toward filling the jails, are urging more prompt and vigorous measures. They propose to "organize."

It is not a very intelligent esteemed contemporary—formerly a tailor—who says that the capitalist who wind must expect to rip the whirlwind.

THE BLONDES MUST GO.

The blondes must go because we are weary of them; because they have been weighed in the balance and found to be anything but fine and true gold; because it is high time the brunettes were coming to the front, and, finally, because fashion wills it. And so the blonde must go. She is no longer to gild the stage and the parlor; and the sudden flood of brightness that used to be so rare, that when, once an age, a woman was born with it, painters painted her, troubadours celebrated her, and locks of her hair were handed down like a treasure—that brightness is going into eclipse; and where bleaching baths and alkaline water and annatto and orpiments and bichlorides of tin and gold powders have reigned, litharge and nitrate of silver and Aleppo galls and iron and bismuth are seizing the sceptre. No more will the lithe ladies of the spectacular and the burlesque display the new golden fleece as they dance down the boards and shake at us the wealth of their "Fine locks,

Stained like pale honey oozed from topmost rocks,
Sun-blanching the live-long summer."

No more will every damsel who patrols the avenues out-Saxon the Saxon in her braids and curls. No more will the little love-locks flutter gold-threaded round the temples, but dark and heavy braids and waves must supersede them. No more will the delicate fade colors be seen among us, pale as the early sunrise tints; but deep, rich bodies of colors, of crimson and orange and emerald and lapis blue, the only wear of your brunettes, will efface their airy softness.

And do they really suppose—the people who utter the pronouncement—that the blonde is going to cease at their dictum? The blonde who went—a nondescript, or with black hair—and sat patiently as the camels'-hair brush passed over each hair, till the black hair became brown, and the brown red, and the red gold, and the gold flaxen—that silly blonde may go, and all her glory with her. But the blonde of art and literature and history, the blonde of beauty—could all the Eugenies and Metternichs that ever ruled the court, could all the Cora Pearls that ever ruled the demi-monde, banish that blonde when nature has once given her the right to be? Did Titian paint his women with that hair to have some modiste announce the day of his destiny over, and the blonde a good-for-naught? And have all the poets that ever handled pen launched out in praise of the hair that Titian painted to have their script become a dead-letter? Shall Maud and Enid and Elaine and Guinevere depart into the world of shadows with Evelyn Hope, with the Fair Rosamond, with Gerdun, with the Lorelei, with Porphyria, with David when he went harp in hand before Saul:

"God's child, with the dew
On his gracious gold hair;"

With Sordello's boyish dream of Palma:

"How the tresses curled
Into a sumptuous swell of gold, and wound
About her like a glory!"

With Milton's fair Sahrina,

"In twisted braids of lilies knitting
The loose train of her amber-drooping hair,"

With all the array of Homer's golden-haired Greeks, with the sad old Tithonus, when he no longer took pleasure in Aurora, as in the early dawn he saw

"The dim curls kindle into sunny rings,"

With Italian Aphrodite, as she

"Backward drew
From her brows and bosom her dear hair,
Ambrosial, golden, round her lucid throat
And shoulder;"

With the Blessed Damozel whose

"Hair that lay along her back
Was yellow, like ripe corn;"

With Lilith, the first wife of Adam, according to the Oriental tradition,

"All the threads of whose hair are golden,
And there in a net his heart is holden;"

With the Venetian ladies who listened, their black velvet masks in hand, to good Galuppi's music—

"Dear, dead women, with such hair, too! What's become of all the gold Used to hang and brush their bosoms?"

How the poets used to love the yellow hair, the beautiful flesh that belongs to it, the ivory, the rose, the gold!

"His sunny hair,"

Says Tennyson, of Paris,

"Clustered about his temples like a god's;"—

While the same poet makes the lover sing to Maud,

"Shine out, little heads, sunning over with curls,
To the flowers, and he their sun!"

And another of his lovers cries,

"My ringlet, my ringlet,
Thou art so golden gay,
Now never chilling touch of time
Can turn the silver gray."

Meanwhile, Browning hardly acknowledges the possibility of any other color for the hair than the blonde; and even when he speaks of dark locks at all, it is usually that sort of which people say it is black in the shade and gold in the sun.

"Quick the round, smooth cord of gold,
This coiled hair on your head, unrolled,
Fell down you like a gorgeous snake,"

Says one of Browning's lovers, in recital of an episode of the past to his lady in the gondola. When Merton sings of Mildred, in the "Blot on the Scutcheon," it is to mention how her

"T' goes sunnier than the wild-grape cluster, Golden-tinted plenty down her neck's rose-misted marble," where you will find the poet of the "Ring and the Book" again talking of some maiden's

"Great gold hair,
Hair such wonder of flax and floss,
Freshness and fragrance—floods of it, too!
Gold, did I say? Nay, gold is dross!"

And again he describes other hair as

"unfilleted,
Made alive and spread
Through the void with a rich outburst,
Chestnut, gold interspersed."

And yet again, when hastening home, and fancying the vision there, he cries:

"Oh, loaded curls, release your store
Of warmth and scent, as once before
The tingling hair did, lights and darks
Outbreathing into fairy sparks,
When under curl and curl I pried
After the warmth and scent inside,
Through lights and darks how manifold,
The dark inspired, the light controlled,
As early art embrowned the gold!"

And so the blondes are going out! And just as Nora Perry's little Madeline Hays is stepping in, too:

"Soft, yellow silk hair, Madeline Hays,
Unrolling its lovely Greek twist,
Blowing out its golden mist—
It was this that I caught first and kissed,
My bloom-blushing Madeline Hays;
Then, through hair all a-dazzle, Madeline Hays,
Eyes and mouth, cheek and chin, too,
Out of the dazzle came glimmering through
All the love colors—red, white, and blue—
What could a man do, Madeline Hays?"

Well, if go they must, surely they have good company to go in, for what is true of one poet is true of almost all the rest in this regard, and it is a golden-haired twain of famous phantasmagoria that accompany them where they will hardly need the golden bough of the sybil to open the way for them, while they see

"The fashion of the foolish world go by."

Fantasy.

A cloudlet, dimpled in the wind's caress,
In undulate beauty stands against the sky,
All sumptuous in its airy loveliness.

The sunbeam fills its pendulous chinks with gold,
And stars its breast with quaint embroideries,
Which wantonly twist and ripple, fold on fold.

Until the downy structure breezes fray,
Dissolving it to naught, like golden hopes,
Which, when they're brightest, oft are blown away.
—R. K. Munkittrick.

On Some Lines of Lopez de Vega.

If the man who turnsips cries,
Cry not when his father dies,
'Tis a proof that he had rather
Have a turnip than his father.—Dr. Johnson.

The wife of the Chinese ambassador at Paris appeared at the recent ball in the Elysée unveiled. She tottered about the rooms on her little feet—a quaint, small woman, with her hair plastered down to the sides of her whitewashed face. Her husband consented to her appearance after a desperate struggle against his prejudices, for the Chinaman who knows that his wife is gazed upon unveiled is held to be dishonored. "It was funny," says the correspondent, "to see him trying to look the other way, so as not to incur the disgrace involved in the knowledge of her presence. One corner of an almond eye was fixed on vacancy, the other was watching the wife to see that she did not stumble as she walked about the rooms. The result must have been far more reassuring than the ambassador expected. Nothing happened. China was not scandalized. Europe was not convulsed. The sight of the Chinese beauty was a little disappointing. She was very handsome, or the reverse, according to your way of looking at it. I have heard the most contradictory verdicts from different people. Her olive skin was covered with powder laid on as thickly as if it were a clown's face at pantomime time. She tottered about the rooms for a short time on her poor mutilated feet, and then went home, no doubt to dream of what the sun and moon and the morning stars would say the next day of this awful innovation of all the Confucian proprieties.

A man out West has invented a device to prevent market-men from palming off old eggs. The invention is thus described: He proposes to arrange a rubber stamp in the nest of every hen, with a movable date. This stamp is arranged with a pad, which is saturated with indelible ink. When the hen lays an egg, as is well known, she kicks slightly with her hind-leg. An electric disk is arranged so that her foot touches it, when the stamp turns over on to the ink-pad and then revolves, stamping the date on the egg. The hen then goes off about her business, the farmer's hired girl removes the egg, replaces the stamp, which is ready for another. On each evening, after the hens have retired to their downy roost with the roosters, the date of the stamp is changed to the following day, and the good work goes on. In this way there can be no cheating. You go to the grocery and ask for fresh eggs, and the groceryman says he has some eggs of the vintage of March 1, 1880, for instance. You look at them, and there are the figures, which can not lie.

A mean man put fifteen hornets in a whisky bottle and gave it to a Texas man in the dark to take a drink out of, and though the hornets did their work as they went down, the Texan remarked that it wasn't real Texas whisky, as it lacked fire.

A visiting clergyman was just rising from prayer at a St. Paul church, when an usher strode up the centre aisle and handed him a big bouquet, just as they do in the theatre.

Editor Smith was routed out of the Albany Journal to prevent its being made a Grant paper. Editor McPherson gets his dismissal so that the Philadelphia Press may be turned into a Grant organ, with Editor Smith at the bellows.

THE TYRANNY OF TYPE.

Sooner or later we may have to consider whether freedom of expression does not tend to tyranny of expression; whether that safeguard of human freedom, the press, may not become the most irresponsible and virulent tyrant men have ever lived under. Already, indeed, the signs of our times show that this perplexing question is forcing itself not only upon thinkers, but upon the multitudes themselves, who do little more than act: How shall the press be regulated?

The respectable and time-worn assurance that public opinion will regulate the press is not so often made, nor so completely accepted, as formerly; for there are reasons to believe that in many cases the press overrides, if it does not actually manipulate, public opinion.

There is a conscious fear lurking in the community that freedom of expression can be made to mean any latitude of abuse, and often is made to mean freedom to meddle with private affairs, and to hold up to contempt and scorn and obloquy, from which there is no escape and for which there is no redress.

The press oftener boasts of its indefatigable enterprise than of its rectitude of purpose. Still oftener it boasts of furnishing to the ravening public, with untiring promptitude, much that is inconsistent with private rights. News-gathering has become not only a science but an art—not always a fine art. Where is the citizen who can say, when in his home, which was once his castle, that he is safe from the news-gatherer—more intrusive than the tax-gatherer! Will burglar-alarms protect innocence and modesty from the interviewer? Will candor and carefulness insure fairness and honesty in the printed utterance? What conspicuous public man is there who can say the public press will not manufacture its personal news concerning him, when events refuse to furnish it?

News-gathering has become, in great part, news manufacture. Scarcity of the real article in some offices is not allowed to affect the supply. And thus the lash of enterprise sometimes becomes the sting of falsehood.

News-mongery is, of all the weapons in the hands of the fourth estate, the one which is most subtle, most inexorable, most deadly, and most defiant. It is at once the wand of Prospero and the club of Ajax. It can caress or crush; it may smooth our vanity to-day and pierce us to the marrow to-morrow, and in either case we are as clay in the hands of the potter. We smile or groan at the mercy or caprice of our master. The stinging two-line paragraph of to-day bears the same relation to the ponderous editorials which were once wielded to pulverize men that the conical bullet bears to the catapult. Old Andrew Marvel was not far wrong when he said that types were more fatal than bullets. These modern air-guns touch their pellets through cuirass and corsage. They send reputation, character, and morals, and the marksman hides safely behind the answer that it is news.

Unfortunately for the system, the average man is not yet educated up to the point of submitting meekly to any rumor or insinuation or disclosure of his private affairs because his neighbors will chuckle over it. The broad principle that every man ought to sacrifice something for the good of the community does not meet with ready acceptance when the sacrifice involves privacy and social rights. Mrs. Langtry's friends in London successfully objected to the lady sacrificing her reputation in order to provide the community with something to giggle and gossip over; and the lawsuit which grew out of a libelous paragraph hothotened a strong disposition on the part of all who had reputations to lose to draw the line where news ended and scandal began.

In this country, the unhealthy demand for smartness and pungency has thrown the newspaper upon its creative resources. It can not do without a personal column, and the personal column, as a rule, is the haldest excuse for pandering to the itching desire of everybody to know what everybody else is doing. In this department of newspaperdom, all ordinary rules, even those of the prize-ring, are suspended, and to the paragraph is allowed the privilege of striking "below the belt."

It probably does not inflict any material injury upon Mrs. Delany Delroy to have it said that she "wears a profusion of paste diamonds," but there is in the Delroy breast an ineradicable repugnance to having even Mrs. Delroy's jewels appraised by a reporter; especially as there is no guarantee that he is above spite or envy or revenge.

It is interesting to inquire what can be done about this. To correct publicly is fatal. Better never to have been horn than to make the paragraph an enemy. Better to suffer in silence than to invite public attention to what may have escaped at least one-half the public.

But if the personal column is annoying, the news column is distressing. If the reverend and every way worthy Doctor Thingamy is charged by an irresponsible enemy with outrageous conduct, the click of the telegraph does not consider his life-long services, or remember the chances in his favor. The indefatigable night-editor does not weigh the record of years against the sudden breath of evil. Have we not seen spasms of rage and calls for violence in the great dailies that remind us of mob rule.

The penalty of public life is abuse; that has passed into a proverb. But it passes the understanding to explain why the free press should consider abuse a weapon of civilization.

Very curious is it to consider what effect this state of things is having upon our public men. They are slowly growing to understand the new heroism, which is silence. To be great is not to do, but to suffer. "The successful man," says an Eastern proverb, "is he with a thick skin." "Chaste as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny," ought to be worked in worsted, and put up at all nominating conventions, to deter sensitive candidates.

An able journalist, who has read the country an excellent lecture on journalism, has strangely overlooked the ethical side of it. He, too, gave all his admiration to its dynamics and its restless enterprise. But he might have told us that what it really needed was reverence—noblesse oblige—that delicate consideration of the private rights of all men which lies at the bottom of courtesy and conservatism, and that common-sense determination never to expose a great private wrong until it was perfectly plain that it is a public wrong.

TRINCULO.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

The latest wrinkle is the midnight frown.

Simpkins's wife swears at him horribly—but he says it's only her custom.

The Vassar College girl who caught cold by drinking water from a damp tumbler is convalescent.

He who Mrs. to take a kiss,
Has Mr. thing he should not Miss.

"Women are seldom deceived," says a philosopher. True. Men are constituted differently, however.

"No, Algernon, dear; I say that the boy shall not be brought up on the bottle. Look at its pap's nose."

A woman who was always finding fault with her husband slipped and fell recently, and now she is deaf and dumb and numb. She struck on her thumb.

"Minnie, I wish you would not give milk to your kitten on the carpet." Minnie—"Don't disturb her. She is on her last lap."

The Empress of Austria is said to be a reckless rider. Congress wants her to attach to an appropriation bill.

A Dakota girl has married a Chinaman. He had some difficulty in explaining the state of his heart, but she finally got his cue.

When ladies meet they always greet with kisses heard across the street. But men, more mild, don't get so wild; they meet, then part, when both had "smiled."

An Indiana girl who was suddenly kissed at a party has become insane. Such things should be talked over a week beforehand.

Diana locks are the names of new bangs introduced into fashionable circles. They are called after the arrowy goddess because they quiver whenever a beau comes around.

A dressmaker got mad because her lover serenaded her with a flute. She said she got all the fluting she wanted in her regular business.

One hug is worth a dozen love-letters, and they can not be introduced as evidence in a breach of promise suit either.

At dinner she had a doctor on either hand, one of whom remarked that they were well served, since they had a duck between them. "Yes," she broke in—her wit is of the sort that comes in flashes—"and I am between two quacks." Then silence fell.

"She had quarreled with her old hald-headed lover, and, in dismissing him, said: 'What is delightful about you, my friend, is that I have not the trouble of sending you back any locks of your hair.' His reply was: 'Had you given me a lock of your own, you would not have known whose hair you were sending.'"

The French have a saying that is good to import for circulation in this country. It runs: "The snails and their wives have always a happy household, and the reason may be that monsieur and madame never inhabit the same house." There is a half of meaning in this brief sentence.

When a Milwaukee man advertises for a lady to elope with him, it is embarrassing both for him and the woman who answers the advertisement to find that they are already husband and wife.

A Laplander does not have to go into mourning when his wife dies. He can marry while the body is still in the house, and have a second wife to ride to the grave with him. This makes things warm and convenient.

A propos of dancing, an inspired idiot propounds the following 13, 15, 14 query: "Is it womanly to allow about your waist an arm that is not the arm of brother or lover, and know that he who holds it there is, with every one of your heart-beats, learning the secret movings of your soul?" This is the most difficult conundrum we ever encountered, and we are compelled to give it up. Is it?

A Vermont woman went to a store and asked for a "cook book," and they gave her a volume of Joseph's lectures; and after she had got up a dinner by it they found it necessary to call four doctors to get the family through the night, and rival sextons roosted on the fence for two days, prepared for emergencies.

Now, this is business. Mrs. Nellie McAfee notifies the Kentucky Legislature that unless it provides for a monument for her father, Humphrey Marshall, she will build one herself and epitaph it with allusions to the base ingratitude of his State.

Philip says that there are two things of which he can never be convinced. The first is, that a girl who wears yellow flowers in a drab ulster has any sense; and the second is, that a drab-haired girl who puts on a squash-colored tie ever had or ever will have any.

Dr. Holmes, in his Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, says: "When a young female walks with a male, not arm and arm, but his arm against the back of hers, you are generally safe in asking her what she gets, and who the feller was you saw with her."

A new and interesting game has been started for evening parties. The ladies write their names on a slip of paper, wrap it up in a ball of yarn, twine, or rags, and, when they get to where the party is to be held, each lady puts her ball in a basket. Before leaving, each gentleman draws a ball from the basket and takes the lady home whose name is found in the ball. It's more fun than having the measles or falling off a log, to see them pairing off.

"How it does remind me of my courting days!" exclaimed Mrs. Goodington, remarking the blush that the delicately-turned compliment of Araminta's young man had brought to the girl's cheek. "In those halcyon days, when I was young and perceptible, how frustrated I used to feel when Daniel paid me a compliment, as he always was doing! Yes," she continued, stopping to hush off the tear that trembled at the tip of her attenuated nose, "yes, Daniel was one of a thousand. And he never changed during all of our years of matrimony."

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

13-15-14.

Little blocks shall all remind us
What block-heads are yours and mine
When we depart and leave behind us
Still unsolved the final line.

The problem that perhaps another
Donkey will, with might and main,
Sweat and toil and swear and bother,
Trying to bring right again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
Wrestle now no more with fate,
Cease the phantom gem pursuing,
Throw the — thing in the grate.

Push, brothers, push with care,
Push the 14 to the 15 square;
The 6 to the 7 and you've got it there!
The 10 to the 9, or you don't care where,
But the 15 and the 14 they will stick there.
Push, brothers, push with care,
Till your minds are a jumble, and you curse and swear.

A Solemn Fact.

The patient preacher plods along
Through theologic deeps,
The while the deacon, bless his soul,
Bows down his head and sleeps.

And when the preacher takes a rest
From theologic matter,
The drowsy deacon rises up
And passes round the platter.

And when at length he back returns
From his collecting trip,
From out his vest upon the plate
He lays a poker chip!

A Good Scheme.

There was a young girl named Kate,
Who on rollers thought she could skate;
So she went to the rink,
Dressed in blue and pink,
And came home with a lump on her pate.

Say, Succulent Sweetheart?

Straight where she strayed, with stride he strode,
Sad sighed he on the sod and said,
"Say, see I sigh and see you so"—
She had no heed, but hid her head—
Maud's mood the mud of mead made mad;
No answer knew she now but "No."

Oh! Yes There Is.

There is sleep for the eye that is tearful,
A balm for the heart that is sad—
And a calm for the spirit that's fearful,
And for every liver—a pad.

Hard After Tennyson.

Summer-time will come again,
With its softly blowing zephyrs,
Lowing kine are in the fields;
Some are cows and some are heifers.

A Tuneful Parody.

A crimson rosebud into beauty breaking;
A hand outstretched to pluck it ere it fall;
An hour of triumph, and a sad forsaking;
And then, a withered rose leaf—that is all.
An ancient tomcat on the summer kitchen;
A bootjack raised, a solemn caterwaul;
A moment's silence, and a quick departure;
And then, a wasted bootjack—that is all.

She Would Have Chewing Gum.

The bright-red sun was setting on the egg of morrow's dawn,
As a Vassar girl strolled, pigeon-toed, adown the level lawn;
And the fading rays with roses wreathed the hair of one who lay
In the gath'ring twilight lonely, filled with terror and dismay.
"She may cry and howl and kick up; but she wouldn't do my sum,
And I'll never, never, never let her chew my chewing gum!"

"Teacher," Bessie's white lips faltered, as she pointed to the maid,
"Do you hear that horrid creature? Do you know what she has said?
In her dark and gloomy pocket she has twenty sticks of spruce,
And she says that I shall have none—I! her only friend, her chum;"
And she spoke in husky whispers, "I must have her chewing gum!"

"Bessie," calmly spoke the teacher (every word froze in her ear),
"For years I've taught at Vassar, and I will not interfere;
I know the regulations, and respect the rules and laws;
I'm here to educate your mind, and not supply your jaws.
I have done my duty ever; I've been cool, discreet, and mum;
But I can't make Bertha Underwood give you her chewing gum."

Wild the girl's eyes, pale her features, as she totters up the stair,
And the dew falls in soft pity as the stars see her despair.
Not a moment stops the maiden till she gains the upper flight,
And stands out in the darkness like an angel carved in night.
Now she enters Bertha's chamber, and pants, "Now let her come!"
Still her frightened heart's wild beating, "I must have her chewing gum!"

Far out, the distant city seems a tiny, sparkling speck,
Where she well remembers often buying spruce gum by the peck.
Above, the throbbing heavens seemingly reflect her soul,
In which the spheres of vengeance their mighty music roll.
Shall she still their diapason? Shall she smite their anthems dumb?
She crushes swift the feeling; she must have that chewing gum.

Quick she strips the bed of clothing, quick she wraps her in a sheet,
And the garment, winding tenderly, clothes her from head to feet.
Then in a darkened corner, like a member of the host
Who sometimes wander back to earth, she stands, a rigid ghost.
And, panting, still she listens till she hears the fairy drum
Of Bertha's fairy footsteps, bringing up that chewing gum.

Such a yell! A quivering figure lies trembling on the floor;
The very duns stop sighing as they shrink back from the door.
Swift the ghostly Bessie steals from where the gath'ring shadows curl,
And bends in flattering triumph before the prostrate girl.
With trembling hands she searches in the pocket of her chum,
And cries out in her madness, "I must have her chewing gum!"

The pale, soft moon rose slowly; each bright star bent her head,
As the patron orb of Vassar threw her rays around the dead;
And, like another moon, the teacher climbed the winding stair,
To find fair Bertha robed in death, and Bessie kneeling there,
With no remorse on that pale face, as she whispered softly, "Come!
The angels have got Bertha, but I've got her chewing gum!"

AN EXPERIMENT IN REFORM.

The pious Mr. Alden, of the New York Times, says that there is a growing feeling among practical men that there is room for improvement in the present method of taking up collections in churches. The plate, which gives publicity to the amount contributed by each person, has driven out the old-fashioned hag with its facilities for the secret deposition of buttons and one-cent pieces, and, though spasmodic efforts to bring about a return to the hag are made from time to time, they are rarely, if ever, successful. If any reform is to be made, it must be in connection with the present plate system, and it is in this direction that the hopes and labors of practical reformers now tend.

It is generally conceded that the smallest amount which any self-respecting man can put on the plate is a ten-cent piece. He may allow his children to limit their contributions to the copper coinage of the country, and if he smiles benignantly when his little girl chips one cent on the plate, he may successfully create the impression that he is encouraging her to give of her own pittance of spending money, and that he is not personally responsible for its trivial value. He cannot, however, reduce his own contribution to an amount less than ten cents without exciting unfavorable comment from the occupants of neighboring pews. If he does not happen to have a ten-cent piece in his pocket he is in a difficult situation. Either he must give a twenty-five or fifty-cent piece, as the case may be, or he must assume the air of having forgotten his purse. The latter expedient may be permissible once in a while, but is seldom successful.

Few men, conscious of large coins in their pockets, can assume the look of mingled sorrow and indignation which ought to accompany the pretended discovery that they have left their money at home, and a quick-witted deacon can nearly always detect an imposture of this kind, and can overwhelm the unhappy perpetrator by a prolonged and significant presentation of the plate at his elbow. Occasionally, a nervous man makes the terrible mistake of contributing a gold dollar instead of a ten-cent piece. An accident of this kind is, of course, purely the fault of the sufferer himself, but it must necessarily produce in him a state of mind which renders him unable to give his attention to the subsequent sermon, and to obtain the full benefit therefrom. Almost equally unfortunate is the case of a man who really wishes to give something, and who, having no small coins in his purse, will not pretend that he is without money. There is nothing for him to do but to put his smallest coin or bank-note, whatever may be its value, in the plate. In this way many a conscientious man has been compelled to give fifty cents, or even a five-dollar bill, when he wished to give only the usual ten-cent piece. The mental anguish thus caused has in many instances been followed by prolonged sickness, and occasionally by even fatal results.

It is claimed that the first reform to be adopted should be to grant every contributor to a church collection the right of taking change out of the plate. As is well known, this is at present impossible, and whatever sum is now placed on the plate must remain there. Could a man put in, say twenty-five cents, and take out fifteen, he would never be compelled to choose between giving too much and giving nothing at all. Had the practice of taking change out of the plate been permitted in the Black Run church, the unpleasant incident which occurred a few Sundays ago would have been avoided.

Black Run, as any map may fail to show, is situated in the Colorado mining district, and the Baptist church is presided over by an able and athletic preacher. On the fourth Sunday in February last a collection was taken up for the Franz Josef Land Mission, and the plate was passed around by one of the deacons. There was present a miner from Red Gulch, who was anxious, as he phrased it, to "put up" for the Franz Josef heathen, but who had no coin smaller than a twenty-dollar gold piece. When the plate reached him, he inquired in a low tone, "How much is the ante?" The deacon told him that he could contribute whatever he chose. "Then," replied the ingenious miner, "I'll chip in a dollar," and thereupon he put in his twenty-dollar gold piece, and undertook to withdraw nineteen dollars. This the deacon objected to, on the ground that no change was given at that establishment. A struggle ensued, in the course of which the plate was upset, and the entire congregation rushed to pick up the scattered money. Had it not been for the presence of mind of the presiding minister, the entire amount already collected would have been absorbed by reckless persons eager to "jump the deacon's claim"—as the local papers subsequently expressed it. The minister, fortunately, happened to be an old Californian, who thoroughly understood the true way of dealing with a Colorado assembly. Drawing a heavy revolver, and leaning it on the edge of the pulpit, he demanded "order" in a stentorian voice. "The brethren," he remarked, "will please take notice that I've got the drop on them, and any brother who declines to go to his seat, or who touches any of that money, will have a funeral at his house to-morrow at two o'clock p. m. Our mining friend from Red Gulch will please let go the deacon's neck-tie, or he is a dead man." This address, together with the minister's known reputation as a pistol shot, instantly restored order, and the deacon, picking up the scattered money, including the twenty-dollar gold piece, resumed the collection, and the service proceeded without further interruption.

Ministers of so much presence of mind are, however, rare, and in almost any other church a disturbance like that which was so promptly quelled at Black Run would entail the loss of a good deal of money, and, perhaps, a deacon or two. Were it to be understood that change could be always taken from the plate, no such difficulty would ever occur. It is this reform which is now earnestly advocated by many intelligent men, especially in our Eastern States. Were it to be adopted, it is quite possible there would be a perceptible increase in the average amount of a church collection, since there would no longer be any temptation for a frugal man with nothing smaller than a dollar bill in his pocket to refuse to contribute anything, and to sully his integrity by feigning to have left his purse in his other pair of trousers.

The aphorism of Lavater is good: Trust him smilingly praises all alike, him less who sneeringly all alike, him least who is wholly indifferent to all.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

TOMBSTONE, ARIZONA, March 22, 1880.

My last letter from this Territory, just about one year ago, was from Texas Hill, the then terminus of the Southern Pacific road, work upon which was shortly thereafter suspended, and not again resumed till this year. On Friday of last week, finding ourselves—that is, myself and other half—resting amid the orange groves of Los Angeles, recovering from the strain of a long endurance of Kearnyism, and resting from the tension and somewhat monotonous pleasure of defending our home from the midnight attacks and surveillance of sand-lotters, burglars, and other kindred criminals, we accepted the invitation of the railroad magnates to make another excursion to this mysterious and marvelous Territory, in a special train to the old city of Tucson, the new, and only temporary, terminus of the road. I will not describe again the desolate character of the country after passing out from the groves, vineyards, and productive farms of the Los Angeles valley, nor again express my regrets that so beautiful and lovely and productive a territory remains in the ownership of such a man as Lucky Baldwin. I regret the doctrines of Harry George could not find experimental demonstration in dividing this land into small farms, and distributing them among the industrious and willing workers, who would turn them into delightful and happy homes. I will not again describe the desolate and God-forsaken country lying between Colton, the California frontier of fertility, and Tucson, the Arizona frontier of wealth and productiveness. All this may be found in the Argonaut of one year ago. Our journey, from Los Angeles at two o'clock on Friday, to Tucson, eleven o'clock on Saturday, was as delightful as a special train, forty miles an hour, a good cook, good larder, and good company could make it. Our expected arrival was welcomed by a universal turn-out of all the people of all Tucson and all the country round about; welcomed by the roar of artillery, by music, orations of welcome, committees in blue ribbons, a procession of all sorts of vehicles, from army ambulance to the most nondescript conveyances; a banquet, toasts, and speeches by the gentlemen of Tucson; a ball in the evening, where we saw ladies of dress, culture, style, deportment, beauty, and breeding, equal to anything San Francisco may present as its "best society." And why not? As we of California claim that our people were the pick of the best of all the world, now the people of Arizona claim that their Territory is settled by the fittest who have survived our early struggles for civilization, for nearly everybody in this part of the Territory is from California.

And now for Tucson and its surroundings. Out upon a treeless plain, unsheltered from the sun—without shrub or bush to hide it from sun or wind, with a few scattered and outlying patches of Spanish farms to indicate our approach to it, without a spring or stream or river to irrigate its broad mesa lands—we strike the town. Its streets are broad, and mostly at right-angles, paved with white dust. Its buildings are uniform in style of architecture—adobe-mud boxes, without ornament, style, or pretension; some windowless, pierced with small holes to admit the light; all one story in height, all of one color, white-brown—dried-mud color; no paint or place for paint; some with broad porticoes to hide the entrances from the glare of the sun, and all comfortable—just what the climate demands: cool in summer, warm in winter, and as enduring as the prehistoric remains of Casa Grande and other cities that antedate the observations of Jesuit fathers and the traditions of Indians. The city contains some eight thousand inhabitants, of whom six thousand are Mexicans. Its number of houses may be computed by remembering that all are of but one story. The area of the city may be estimated by knowing that, except on business streets, the houses are scattered. Along one side of the town runs a pretty stream, through a small, fertile valley. The town backs down upon the streamlet and valley, where a beer-garden gave the entertainment of Saturday—spacious willow-shaded gardens, a comfortable beer-saloon, a spacious hall, where we feasted and danced. In this valley, which is an oasis, and ought to be a garden-spot, we saw no fruit-trees. The town is badly supplied with pretty good water from wells. An experimental well is now being bored. Eighteen miles away from the town is a mountain spring, from which Mexican and Spanish enterprise has for more than three and a half centuries neglected to make any effort to bring water, and want of enterprise since its American occupation has made no effort in the same direction. Tucson is the shiretown of a county as large as an average State of our Union. A Federal court is now in session. The bar is composed mostly of California immigrants, and mostly of young lawyers who have been in practice in our State.

Tucson and Arizona have a most interesting history. Within the half century after Columbus discovered America, Spanish enterprise and the zeal of the Catholic Church pushed its Jesuit and Dominican fathers out into this wilderness, and extended the empire of Spain by the conquest of its armies, and the jurisdiction of its church by the blood of its early martyrs. Six miles away from Tucson stands the magnificent church of San Xavier del Bac—alone, with no human habitations around it, except those of the Papago Indians, upon whose reserve it is located, and who were converted to Catholicism some two hundred years ago. It has only an occasional service, but it is a costly and magnificent structure of pure Spanish architecture, adorned with carvings and frescoes, and has now, some years past, celebrated its centennial anniversary. Tucson was settled in 1750, or thereabouts, and contests priority with Santa Fe in New Mexico and Saint Augustine in Florida. It looks as though it might have been built, yesterday, or its appearance might indicate that it was contemporaneous with the foundations of the Seven Cities of Cibola; traditions of which were revived more than three hundred years ago by the adventures of Father Redonda and his associates. Arizona is interesting from its later conflicts with the famous Apaches, through the strongholds of whom we came yesterday, and had pointed out to us the battle-fields where the bloody Chief Cochise gave frequent evidence of his hatred of the white race. Indeed, the Apaches were the Ishmaelites of the land, at war with the Papagos, Pimas, Maricopas, and all the other surrounding tribes. They have now disappeared, or at least subsided, leading a sullen and angry life, pent up upon a reservation, and not permitted to longer indulge in the freedom of their murderous raids. And then, away back of Jesuit father, Spanish invader, or Indian, was another civilization. Its monuments are scattered over the land. In the ruins of great cities, the stone foundations of great edifices, mounds of artificial construction, caves dug in the cliffs, broken pottery scattered over the broad mesa lands, well defined irrigating canals, all indicating the certainty that this now treeless, waterless, and desolate country was once the home of a great, populous empire—an agricultural, peaceful people. What has become of them? What has become of the water that irrigated their lands? What of the trees under which we may presume they sheltered themselves? All these are interesting questions for our ethnologists, and wise men who delight in speculating in this direction. To them, Arizona will be found a field of most interesting study.

At daylight on Sunday morning we left for Tombstone, a mining camp, arriving at sundown, and writing now at ten o'clock in the evening. I have only had time to observe that this camp—of four hundred and eighty-one houses constructed, twenty-eight in process of construction, a mining population of two thousand five hundred—is a type of California in 1849 or of Nevada in 1861. Gambling, with its music and rattling dice; whisky at two bits a glass; a floating population of adventurous miners, old prospectors from California, Nevada, and elsewhere, crowding the saloons and streets; great ore wagons, as at Virginia, hauling from three mines at Tombstone to three mills twenty miles away, where water is more abundant. Here water is three cents a gallon, and only sold at retail from carts, and the town has not yet attempted to put a tariff of rates upon it for fear the hardy monopolists, who bring it in on mule-back from distant mountain springs, would fail to appreciate my friend Swift's theory that it is God's gift and should be free. Every house is a saloon, and every other house is a gambling hell, and everybody is happy. Money is not plenty, but the whole population is wealthy in anticipation. Everybody has a mine, and every mine is worth a million. I have seen the busy, bustling town, drank its mesa, but have not seen its mines. Last October there was one tent here. The town is located upon a plain or mesa; no trees, no water, but level-land slightly. It promises to become a second Virginia City in the character and occupation of its people.

To-day I shall visit the mines, and if the one-hundredth part that I hear is ever realized, then Tombstone is the treasure-hox of the world. This is not a place where idlers without money, and who are too proud to steal, will find a pleasant residence. It is a place where working men and capitalists may come with safety, I think. But of all this I shall know more when I have seen more. The stage awaits my letter, and I close in haste.

We know that if every one would use Hop Bitters freely, there would be much less sickness and misery in the world; and people are fast finding this out, whole families keeping themselves well at a trifling cost by its use. We advise all to use them.—U. & A., Rochester, New York.

The "Grand Spring Opening" is often a flat failure, because the half that is promised is not forthcoming. In the present instance, however, it is gratifying to be able to chronicle a positive success in every respect. Last Tuesday and Wednesday Madame Skidmore opened her extensive stock of Spring Millinery at her beautiful store, No. 1114 Market Street, between Mason and Taylor. San Francisco is fortunate in its tradesmen and tradeswomen; for no other boon has it better reason to congratulate itself than upon the almost perfect establishment of Madame Skidmore.

I deem it a duty to state that Mr. —, of this county, had his right lung seriously affected with tubercular deposit, accompanied with night sweats, frequent hemorrhage, copious expectoration, and much emaciation. The use of Fellows' Syrup of Hypophosphites seems to have arrested the progress of the disease almost immediately; the hemorrhage has not returned, his appetite is excellent, and he is able to attend to his business as usual.

A. SMITH, M.D., Campbelltown, N. B.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had having placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery St.

Hackett & Dean, Dentists, No. 126 Kearny Street, Thurlow Block.

MORSE'S PALACE OF ART, 417 Montgomery St.

The week has been an agreeable, if unexciting, one at the theatres—Mr. Sothern drawing full houses at the Bush Street, in "Spoonbill" (Hornet's Nest), "Fitzaltamont," and "Dundreary"; and some very good acting being done at Baldwin's by the regular company in Two Roses. This slight but rather clever play is stated to have run five hundred nights at a London theatre—a thing not difficult to imagine, for it is well worth seeing, and London contains a good many people among whom a play has to go round.

At the Baldwin, Mr. Jennings, as "Digby Grant," and Mr. Bradley as "Mr. Farnival," a lawyer, were fairly successful. The first named character appears to have been suggested by that of "William Dorrit," the Father of the Marshalsea; the parallel is not carried out very closely on the stage. The plot of the story turns on the same pivot as that of Pinafore—"I mixed those babies up!" There is a blind lover in the play (Mr. O'Neill, and good), who had been mixed up in infancy with his illegitimate brother, and who comes in for the estates—a trifle of some ten thousand pounds a year. In the last scene there is a spiritless episode of presenting a service of plate, which had better be cut for an American audience. Bishop has a good part—"Our Mr. Jenkins"—in which he is infinitely amusing. It would be a treat to see Bishop in "Launce," and leave small cause for regret that we shall never witness Backstone's. San Francisco has already seen what Bishop can do with "Launcelot Gobbo;" he owes us now only a "Launce." Of Miss Jeffreys-Lewis's Rose, it is proper to remark that her arms are really fine.

Mr. Sothern has played through an interesting range of characters during his engagement, and has added to our permanent memories of the stage. For reasons suggested in this column last week, it is likely that David Garrick will last longest as an acted play, and The Crushed Tragedian may well maintain the second place. For the interest of its theme, also, is of an enduring sort. Like Garrick, it is a play about actors, who will probably never cease to appear a sort of magical and awesome folk to the general. On the surface of their natural lives there rests an opalescent yet opaque film. When this is stirred aside, exposing the human current flowing beneath, the general eye will hasten to explore its depths with a special and eager kind of curiosity and interest. The play of The Crushed Tragedian exhibits these recondit creatures in their familiar baunts, where they are seen to go through the forms of consuming their food, loving and being loved, bating and machinating, dealing with that grewsome enigma of these waters—a manager; and, in short, exposing under plain, white daylight the intimacies of a region familiar only under an unreal aspect in the spectral glare of footlights. The subject of the play is not likely to lose this part of its charm; and aside from this, the enormous fun of "Fitzaltamont" is attraction enough.

Mr. Sothern's "Dundreary" has filled so large a segment in the sphere of public vision during recent years that the real amount, as well as the excellence, of the other work that he has been doing, is commonly slighted and underprized. Sothern may not visit San Francisco again, and it will be something for many of us to bear in mind this evening, that we shall then be witnessing our last performance from one of the first comedians of our time.

The members of the Olympic Club give three of their delightful exhibitions at the Grand Opera House on Friday evening, Saturday matinee and evening next. This club has always made a perfect success of its annual exhibitions, and this—the twentieth—promises, from the programme, to excel all previous ones. Mrs. Tobin's company sing the Chimes of Normandy much better than some of the professional companies.

Maud Granger—the emotional Maud—is married. Her true name, as it appears on the marriage certificate, is Annie Brainerd. She is the daughter of a farmer living near Middletown, Conn., and prior to coming to New York was employed in a sewing-machine salesroom in Hartford. She is said to have been employed in a printing office before that. After a residence of a year or more in New York, she made her appearance in amateur theatricals, and afterward on the stage of the Union Square Theatre. Since then she has been in the regular companies at Daly's and at Wallack's, with McKee Rankin in The Danites, and in other organizations. Her debut on the regular stage was made seven years ago. Her age was given on the certificate as thirty-five years. The groom is her junior. He was formerly employed in Frank Leslie's publishing house, but is now in the employ of that establishment.

TO THE PEOPLE OF... SAN FRANCISCO.

TICKET

Of Fifteen Freeholders, Nominated by the Citizens' Protective Union, to be Voted for at the Special Election on Tuesday, March 30, 1880:

SAMUEL M. WILSON.....LAWYER.
COLONEL J. P. HOGÉ.....LAWYER.
MORRIS M. ESTEE.....LAWYER.
CHARLES KOHLER.....MERCHANT.
RALPH C. HARRISON.....LAWYER.
A. S. HALLIDIE....CAL. WIRE WORKS.
THOMAS B. BISHOP.....LAWYER.
T. I. BERGIN.....LAWYER.
A. COMTE, JR.....BANKER.
WASHINGTON BARTLETT...LAWYER.
JAMES M. McDONALD.....BANKER.
JAMES M. McNULTY.....PHYSICIAN.
ISAAC WORMSER.....MERCHANT.
M. P. JONES.....MERCHANT.
JAMES THOMAS BOYD.....LAWYER.

We, the undersigned, a Committee acting under authority of the Citizens' Protective Union, present for your suffrages at the election to be held on Tuesday next, the foregoing names of fifteen Freeholders, who are to constitute a BOARD to prepare a CHARTER for the City and County of San Francisco in the manner provided by the Constitution of the State. The selection of these names has been made in the fulfillment of a public duty, undertaken at the generally expressed desire of the best representative men of this metropolis, and the effort has been made to rise above the bias of political partisanship, and to act solely for the public good in the performance of this duty.

We present the names of men for this most important trust who are known to all the people: men who have long been identified with the growth, progress, and varied interests of the city; men who appreciate its great advantages, know its wants, and see its perils; men who have aided in making the best parts of its history, and who have the capacity, honesty, and courage to perform the duty which shall devolve upon them, if elected. We ask all voters who desire good government, the permanence and stability of free institutions, the enactment and enforcement of just laws, peace, order, and healthful prosperity; all who take pride in the good character of our city, and who have faith in its future, to come up to the support of the ticket which we here present.

We believe that all citizens who fail now to take their places at the polls and support these representatives of the conservative power, the moral strength and progressive energies of the city, fail in the most important duty of citizenship. Such neglect of duty gives aid to the bad, unscrupulous men who have brought the greatest mischiefs upon this people, and who have done their utmost to bring this city to a condition of anarchy, unrest, industrial stagnation, and financial ruin.

The overwhelming importance of this election justifies us in asking every business man to close his place of business on the day of election not later than twelve o'clock, and that the day be devoted to San Francisco and the public good. Let no good citizen falter or fail in his duty now.

SAMUEL COWLES,
R. T. CARROLL,
E. E. EYRE,
ISAAC E. DAVIS,
WILLIAM HOLLIS,
ISIDOR GUTTE,
WM. T. GARRATT,
HORACE L. HILL,
GEORGE W. GIBBS,
STEWART MENZIES,
REUBEN MORTON,
DAVID PORTER,
J. W. SHAEFFER,
JOHN ROSENFELD,
LEVI STRAUSS,
CHARLES E. McLANE,
W. F. WHITTIER,
JAMES R. KELLY,
WILLIAM DUNPHY,
JOSEPH SEDGLEY.

GRAND CONCERT BY THE LIEDERKRANZ

At Platt's Hall, April 10.

A. C. EIMER'S "SYMPHONIC Mass," under the direction of the composer. Select Soloists, Grand Chorus and Orchestra. Admission, $1. Concert to commence at 8 P. M. sharp.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR AND MANAGER.

This (Saturday) and Sunday nights, matinee at 2 P. M., for the last times,

MR. SOTHERN,

On which occasion will be revived the ever attractive comedy of

OUR AMERICAN COUSIN,

In which MR. SOTHERN will appear in his world-famous character of

LORD DUNDREARY.

Monday, March 29, first appearance in San Francisco of

PROF. E. C. TAYLOR,

The World's Greatest Illusionist, and DR. RUTH and MRS. RUTH, Champion Rifle Shots of the World.

In Preparation—THE ROYAL MIDDY.

THE BALDWIN THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
R. M. EBERLE.....STAGE MANAGER.

This (Saturday) Matinee, March 27, positively last performance of

THE TWO ROSES.

This (Saturday) evening, March 27, by particular request,

THE QUEEN'S SHILLING.

To-morrow (Sunday), March 28, for this night only,

THE GIRLS.

Monday, March 29, first time in California of the great New York success,

FRENCH FLATS.

OLYMPIC CLUB.

Twentieth Annual Exhibition!

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

TWO EVENINGS AND ONE AFTERNOON,

April 2 and 3, 1880.

MRS. TOBIN'S POPULAR OPERA COMPANY

....IN....

THE BELLS OF CORNEVILLE.

Gymnastic and Acrobatic Exhibition
by Members of the Club.

A HOST OF VOLUNTEERS.

CHANGE OF PROGRAMME EACH PERFORMANCE.

Tickets for the three performances, $2.00. Single tickets at regular theatre rates.

Seats reserved at M. Gray's, 117 Post Street, six days in advance, and at the Opera House on the days of performance.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRENCH, GERMAN & ENGLISH INSTITUTE

FOR YOUNG LADIES AND CHILDREN, 922 POST ST., between Hyde and Larkin.

This well known Day and Boarding School, with Kindergarten, will reopen for the term on MONDAY, March 22, 1880. MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

SPECIAL ELECTION, Tuesday, March 30.

J. R. FREUD, JOINT SENATOR

....FOR....

San Francisco and San Mateo Counties.

English and American
BICYCLES.

KEPT IN STOCK

And imported to order.

Prices only $5 over those in Boston.

LORING CUNNINGHAM

No. 206 Sansome Street, office of Macondray & Co., S. F.

STORES AND PRIVATE RESIDENCES.

PROTECT YOUR FRONT DOORS AND CARPETS FROM THE SUN
by getting

AWNINGS

—AT—

E. DETRICK & CO.'S, NO. 123 CLAY ST.

Call and examine our NEW STYLES for 1880. TENTS and CAMPER'S OUTFITS. Tents let for the Season.

WHITE LEAD.

Use "ATLANTIC" brand, the STANDARD NEW YORK LEAD. Stipulate for it in all your contracts. Do not permit any other to be employed.

Property owners are cautioned against the substitution by Painters of cheap, low-grade Leads, which, owing to inferiority, can be bought for considerably less than the cost of Atlantic brand.

C. T. RAYNOLDS & CO., Sole Agents.

EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES.

HENRY B. HYDE, PRESIDENT.

Twentieth Annual Statement for the Year ending Dec. 31, 1879.

AMOUNT OF LEDGER ASSETS JAN. 1, 1879..	$34,195,368 53
Less Depreciation in Government Bonds, and Appropriation to meet any depreciation in other assets.....	296,545 79
	$33,898,822 74
INCOME	8,347,080 85
	$42,245,903 59

DISBURSEMENTS.

Paid Policy-holders for Claims by Death, Dividends, Surrender Values, Discounted and Matured Endowments and Annuities..	4,988,871 09
Other Disbursements as per extended statement.....	1,276,034 88
NET CASH ASSETS DEC. 31, 1879.....	$35,980,997 62

ASSETS.

Bonds and Mortgages.....	$10,475,062 90
Real Estate.....	8,204,796 02
United States Stocks.....	5,488,978 89
State, City, and other Stocks authorized by the Laws of the State.....	6,696,039 53
Loans secured by United States and other Stocks.....	3,673,700 00
Cash and other Ledger Assets as per extended statement	1,442,420 58
Market value of Stocks over Cost.....	$35,980,997 62
Accrued Interest, Rents and Premiums, as per extended statement.....	1,037,837 96

Total Assets Dec. 31, 1879.....$37,366,841 75

TOTAL LIABILITIES, including legal reserve for reinsurance of all existing policies.....$29,851,434.00

Total Undivided Surplus.....$7,515,407 75

Risks assumed in 1879.....$26,502,541 00

N. B.—For the details of the above statement, see the Society's "Circular to Policy-Holders," and other publications for 1880.

JAMES W. ALEXANDER, Vice-President.

SAMUEL BORROWER, Secretary.

E. W. SCOTT, Superintendent of Agencies.

WM. D. GARLAND, Manager, No. 240 Montgomery Street.

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE.—THE TRADE AND THE Public are informed that we receive the Genuine LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAMPAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular Invoice. Each case is marked upon the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRAY & CO.,

Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

$72 a week. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & CO., Augusta, Maine.

HULLED, CRUSHED, STEAM-COOKED AND DESICCATED AMERICAN

BREAKFAST CEREALS.

A. B. C. WHITE WHEAT. A. B. C. WHITE OATS.
A. B. C. BARLEY FOOD. A. B. C. MAIZE.

The most Nutritious, Palatable, and Easily Digested of all Cereal Food.

A Necessity for the Rich, a Luxury for the Poor.

CAN BE PREPARED FOR THE TABLE IN TEN MINUTES.

FOR SALE BY

C. J. HAWLEY & CO.,
BENJ. SCHLOSS & CO.,
LEBENBAUM & CO.,
BOWEN BROS.,

And all first-class groceries. The trade supplied by JOHN T. CUTTING & CO., Sole Agents, 407 Front Street.

SPRING STYLE HATS

NOW INTRODUCED BY

HERRMANN

THE HATTER,

336 KEARNY STREET,

Between Bush and Pine Streets.

BRANCH, 910 MARKET ST., ABOVE STOCKTON.

As regards beauty and number of styles, Herrmann still leads.

Spring Catalogues now ready. Send for copy.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

PRANG'S ELEGANT EASTER CARDS

Can be found at

EDWARD T. MARTIN'S,

No. 5 Montgomery Street.

HARLEQUIN PLAYING CARDS

"GEM" PUZZLE!

TWO PUZZLES IN ONE. SOMETHING NEW!

C. BEACH

107 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Etchings and Rare Engravings.

W. K. VICKERY INVITES ATTENTION to his large collection of the above, which includes fine original Engravings from the great Paintings of Europe. Rare Portraits, either in collection or procured. A large number of fine Etchings in stock. Hours 1 to 5 o'clock.
126 KEARNY ST. (Thurlock Block), San Francisco.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—APRIL STYLES.

Send Stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

REMOVAL.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.

Have removed to

UNION BUILDING,
JUNCTION MARKET AND PINE STREETS.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.,

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.

Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co. Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt.

C. P. SHEFFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

PACIFIC

SAW MANUFACTURING CO.

17 AND 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

SAWS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

on hand and made to order. Agents for C. B. Paul's Files. Repairing of all kinds done at short notice.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,

J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

TABER, HARKER & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE

GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco.

H. L. DODGE.....L. H. SWENNEY.....J. E. RUGGLES

DODGE, SWEENEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS,

Wholesale Provision Dealers,

....AND....

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Nos. 114 and 116 Market, and 11 and 13 California Sts.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.,

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR

Street. Liberal advances made on consignments.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OR

LINES

304 AND 306 CALIFORNIA ST.

DIONYSOS AND ARIADNE.

Come, Ariadne, a suitor awaits thee,
Jove-born Bacchus, a suitor divine;
Weep no more tears for the false-hearted Theseus,
Welcome the ivy-crowned Lord of the Wine,
Come, Ariadne!

Fair Ariadne, the pine-groves of Nareos
Echo the songs of a jubilant train,
Singing the praises of brave Dionysos,
Author of joy and dispeller of pain.
Come, Ariadne!

Satyr and Bacchant, in wild dithyrambic,
Greet thee as bride of the God of the Vine—
Lover most dutilful, Bacchus the beautiful,
Fair Ariadne, would gladly be thine.
Come, Ariadne!

Bind up thy golden locks, fair Ariadne,
Chaplets of roses are weaving for thee.
Queen Aphrodite regards thee benignly—
Look no more sadly on shore and on sea.
Come, Ariadne!

See, Ariadne, the waving of thyrses;
Hark to the bacchanal shout, and the beat
Of cymbals and drums, as exulting he marches,
Spoils oriental to lay at thy feet—
Come, Ariadne!

Fair Ariadne, the fates have decreed it—
Star-gemmed in heaven thy chaplet shall shine,
To mark to the wondering ages and nations
The love of the rosy god, Bacchus divine.
Come, Ariadne!

March, 1880.

OMNIBUS GATHERUM.

AN AMUSING SCENE IN A WOODMAN'S CABIN.

In the discharge of their judicial duties the early judges of the Supreme Court of the State of New York were compelled to travel, often on horseback, to the most distant counties. Their route often lay through forests, opened by no thoroughfares except what were known as "bridle-paths."

Among these early judges was the illustrious James Kent, afterward Chancellor of the State, and author of those incomparable law lectures and commentaries, "distinguished alike for classic elegance and deep erudition," which unite his name with those of Montesquieu, Blackstone, Coke, and other great legal commentators. He was appointed a Judge of the Supreme Court in February, 1798, Chief Justice in 1804, and Chancellor in October, 1814. Before his elevation to the bench, he attained a peerless position at the bar, while he was equally distinguished in literature.

Few, if any, of the early judges made more frequent journeys, in the discharge of their duties, to that far-off region, as western New York was regarded in those days, than Chancellor Kent.

He decided to spend his first vacation, or part of it, with John C. Spencer, afterward so illustrious in the history of the State and nation.

Accordingly, early in July, 1815, accompanied by his wife, he left his home, in the city of New York, in a private carriage, on a tour to the country of the Genesee, as western New York was then called. Though the distance which he was to travel was less than three hundred miles, yet the journey was regarded as far more dangerous and protracted than a journey now to the Rocky Mountains.

On the fifth day of their journey the travelers arrived at that wonder of the age, Cayuga Bridge, erected by the Manhattan Company in 1800. From this bridge the scenery was surpassingly beautiful, excelling, wild as it was, the landscape of the soft Campanian realms. Surrounded by unbroken forests, green with the prodigal richness of June, the Cayuga,

"In all her length far winding lay,
With promontory, creek, and bay;
While, mild and soft, the summer breeze
Just kissed the lake, just stirred the trees."

Crossing the bridge, the travelers continued their journey, hoping to reach Canandaigua before night. But, unfortunately, the chancellor mistook the road—lost his way, and night overtook him while yet many miles from the place of his destination. He was naturally adventurous, and the dark woods around gave him no fears.

Not so with Mrs. Kent. Her life had been spent in the city of New York, and until her present journey she had never beheld an extensive forest. Thus far, the woodlands through which she had passed had inspired her with admiration; but she had seen the grand old trees only in the cheerful sunlight, with their branches "moving by the breeze of summer, and vocal with the song of birds." But now night was settling down with indescribable gloom. Wild beasts were in motion; strange chattering and unearthly hoots and screams made a hideous accompaniment to the howl of the wolf.

The chancellor urged his weary horse onward with the hope of gaining some place of safety for the night, while his wife clung in terror to his arm. But the darkness soon became so deep that it was impossible to proceed, and the travelers believed themselves doomed to spend the night in the forest, exposed to all its horrors and dangers. But just as Kent brought his horse to a halt a light suddenly gleamed out of the interstices between the trees, apparently but a short distance beyond them. Pushing onward once more, they soon found themselves in front of a comfortable log house, standing near the roadside.

A woman, apparently thirty years of age, attracted by the rattle of the carriage, came to the door with a lighted candle in her hand.

"My good woman, myself and my wife, the lady with me in the carriage, are on our way to Canandaigua, but we have lost our way; night is upon us; we can go no further. Can you give us shelter for the night, some supper, and something for our horse to eat?" said Kent.

"We are poor folks, and I'm alone. My man is chopping over in the Billings settlement," said the woman, approaching close to the carriage and narrowly scanning its occupants. "But you look like respectable, good people," she continued, "and I guess you can stay here. I can give you something to eat, if it ain't quite so good, and I'll fodder your horse, too. You and your woman had better get out and go into the house, while I lead the horse to the stable."

Mrs. Kent found a seat in the cottage, and the chancellor assisted the woman in unharnessing the horse. The hostess prepared a frugal but acceptable supper for her guests. When the meal was finished, she said:

"I s'pose you are tired and want to go right to bed, and you can. That's our bed in the corner there, but you can sleep in it to-night. I and my man can sleep up stairs. He may not come in some time. I'll just set his supper on the table; when he comes in he'll eat it. But he won't disturb you one bit; and then he'll come right up to bed. So, I'll bid you good-night. I'll try and keep watch when my man comes, so he'll understand things."

So saying, she placed her man's evening repast on the table, then ascended a ladder leading to a sort of scuttle-hole, through which she crawled to the attic.

The chancellor and his wife retired to rest. "Tired nature" was hurrying them on to the land of dreams, when, of a sudden, Kent started up, saying:

"Bessie, that outside door is not fastened. Presently the man of the house will return, and, seeing me here in bed with you, he will of course think that you are his wife, and he may not fancy that I have any legal right to be here—that my business is not just the thing; and, being a wood-chopper, he will have his axe with him, and his wife will be asleep; and, before I can explain matters, the chancellor of this State will be pretty thoroughly chopped up. Not a pleasant thing to think of, is it, Bessie?"

"It is a bad matter. After he has finished chopping you, I fear he will turn his attention to me. What can be done? Perhaps his wife will watch for him. You know she said she would."

"I'll tell you what I'll do, Bessie: I'll push that heavy table against the door. When the man comes, it will take him some time to remove it, and while he is doing so I can explain matters to him," said the chancellor.

Accordingly, he got out of bed, took hold of the table, and had just pushed it against the door, when he heard heavy footsteps approaching. The next instant the door was pushed open, the table nearly overturned, and a man of gigantic size, in his shirt-sleeves, wearing a broad-brimmed straw hat, entered the room. The first object that met his sight was Kent en déshabillé. Glancing at the bed he saw, as he supposed, his wife there, and the situation became painfully apparent to him.

"Who the devil are you, and what are you doing in my house this time of night in your shirt-tail? Damn you, I've caught you, whoever you are; and I'll—"

"It is all right, my good sir—all right. Let me ex—"

"All right, is it, hey? You be damn. All right? Yes, I see—don't expect me home. Thought you'd fasten me out, so I couldn't get in when I did come—was going to have things all your way, hey? But I happened around in the nick of time, and I'll let you know a thing or two," thundered the fellow, in a voice that resembled a fog-horn.

"Pray be cool a moment—let me explain. Myself and my wife there—"

"Your wife! Your wife! Your—good God! what a hold cuss you are! Just ready to go to bed with my wife—but I know who you are, now," said the man, giving the chancellor a sharp look. "You are Sam Flickner, that used to court my wife, and I've heard about your hanging around here since we got married. Now, Flickner, I'll end all that kind of business, you cuss, you!" and he gave the axe in his hand an ominous shake.

"Hold on, for heaven's sake, and hear what I have got to say. My name is not Flickner. It is James Kent. I am the Chancellor of the State of New York. That is my wife in bed there. Your wife is up-stairs in bed all right. There is your supper on the table; eat it, for gracious sake!" said Kent, in a hurried, excited manner.

"Chancellor of the State of New York, hey? Sam Flickner, Chancellor of the State of New York! Well, there, chancellor! You used to chancel round my wife when she was a girl, and you mean to keep it up, do you? Started in well to-night; hut, hy G—d, I'll end it, or else you will end me," said the man, dropping his axe and advancing toward Kent, with a fist that looked like a sledge-hammer.

At this critical moment the man's wife put her head down the hatchway, exclaiming:

"Hold on, Jim! Don't make a fool of yourself! I'm up here all straight and right. What are you cackling about Sam Flickner for, you dunce? The man is all right, and that's his wife in bed there—I guess. They have lost their way, at any rate, and I've given 'em our bed. Eat your supper and come up to bed here, and let 'em go to sleep. If I hadn't been asleep myself all this fuss wouldn't happened."

This address brought the fellow to his senses. "Well, all right; sorry I've been so fast. Ought to know wife ain't that kind of woman. But, good gracious, heavens and earth! what could a fellow think to see a man in his house after ten o'clock at night, in his shirt, and nothing else; and his wife, as he thought, in bed, and knowing all the time that Sam Flickner was a cuss?" And there he burst into a horse-laugh that resembled the roar of a hison.

The chancellor went to bed. The man ate his supper, and retired quietly to his bed up-stairs, and soon all the inmates of the house were wrapped in slumber. The next morning the hostess prepared a comfortable breakfast for her guests which was eaten with a relish. The appearance of the chancellor, though unassuming, was impressive under all circumstances. The man, in a deferential manner, apologized to him for his rudeness the night before. "Only think," he said, "I took you for Sam Flickner. Well, things did look a little rusty at first, but it's all right now." After receiving careful directions as to their route, they took leave of their host and hostess—not, however, before Mrs. Kent gave the latter substantial evidence of her gratitude for the kind treatment she had received at her hands.

L. B. PROCTOR.

He who does not rise when it is time to rise—who, though young and strong, is full of sloth, whose will and thought are weak—that lazy and idle man will never find the way to knowledge.—Buddha.

What is an island? A body surrounded by water. Give an example. A hoy in swimming.

"Here's rheumatism, that's for remembrance."

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

The first time that your wife tells you not to go out, but to stay at home and spend the evening with her, you are vexed. The second time, it is all you can do to restrain yourself from killing her.

The third time, you stay at home!

An expiring railroad superintendent asks the doctor, who is alone with him, how much longer he has to live.

"Two hours," replies the man of science.

A few minutes later the family of the sufferer are introduced into the apartment.

"Courage!" says the dying man, firmly; "courage! Do not weep for me. The doctor says I am due at the gates of gold at 5:35, sharp!"

A husband takes his wife to a gallery to be photographed. As the sacramental formula against laughing is about to be pronounced, the husband comes to his aid.

"Now, Mary," he says, "be grave. Don't laugh, or else you'll spoil the picture. Think of something serious. Think of how you was sent to the penitentiary for hog-larceny—think of what would have become of you if I hadn't taken pity on you and married you! Now, then!"

Model puff from a Belgian newspaper:

"Nana, the filthy story, worthy of this age, which indicates the decadence of good taste and the excesses of literary uncleanness in which some authors wallow, after having nauseated the readers of Le Voltaire for months, has been published in book form. As booksellers are compelled to cater to all tastes, M. D. has ordered a large package of Nana, and people whose fancy is for such inartistic indecencies can obtain copies at his store, 17 Rue S—."

They were rehearsing a play in which the leading rôle was confided to an actor who was inordinately fat. There was in it one sensational scene in which the actor, tempted to the commission of a crime, implored heaven that he might not yield to the temptation. Alas! at the rehearsing it became evident that the actor was too fat either to kneel or to clasp his hands.

"We'll have to cut it," said the disappointed manager.

"Oh, no," says the actor, cheerfully; "I'll attempt to kneel, and then cry, with a despairing gesture, 'Lost! lost! My sin-seared knees refuse their office; I can no longer pray!'"

In daily carrying milk from her mother's to the chateau, the feet of la petite Jeanne had worn a threadlike path. One morning the lady of the chateau noticed the path in the grass for the first time.

"It is straight and narrow, like the way to paradise," she said, piously.

"Ah, non, mon petit chou," said her husband, "the Milky Way!"

It was in the time of Louis Philippe that the minister of war sent an order to the general commanding at Constantine, placing him under arrest and confining him to his quarters for fifteen days. By way of compensation, however, the same post brought the officer a dispatch from the Citizen-King, announcing that the war department was at his disposal, a change of ministry having been decided on.

The officer, without paying any attention to the order, as may naturally be imagined, took the road for Paris, and found on his arrival that the irony of fate had brought about the ex-minister's appointment to the command at Constantine. He promptly called for a telegraph blank, and when, a few hours later, his predecessor and successor arrived at Constantine he found the following dispatch awaiting him: "You will have found on your desk, on arriving, an order for the commander at Constantine to consider himself under arrest for fifteen days. Have you obeyed it?"

Two American ladies, just arrived in Paris, had been visiting millinery establishments all the forenoon. They could speak but one phrase of French, learned that same day, and indelibly fixed in their minds by frequent repetitions: Un chapeau noir avec une plume longue.

When finally the last hat was bought, one of the ladies said:

"Now, I must buy an undershirt."

They entered the Magasin du Louvre, and one of them repeated automatically to the dapper salesman:

"If you please, I want un chemise noir avec une plume longue."

During the Franco-Prussian war an enthusiastic native of Bordeaux, keeping up his courage in the midst of disaster and defeat, declared perpetually:

"If the South rises in her might and majesty, the German army will melt away like summer snow."

"Yes," said a more cold-blooded Northerner, "hut will the South rise in her might and majesty?"

"To be frank with you, I do not think she will."

At the table d'hôte a commercial traveler takes the dish of radishes and empties its contents into his plate.

"I beg your pardon, monsieur," says one of his neighbors, "hut I am fond of radishes, too."

"Oh, not half so fond of them as I am," replies the other, with conviction and his mouth full.

An honest farmer's idea of communism:

"After all," says the friend who is explaining the subject to him, "if all the money owned in France were to be put together and equally divided, you share would be only five hundred and five francs thirty-five centimes."

"Well," says the honest farmer, "that with what I already have wouldn't be so had!"

It is a wise dead man who could tell his own will were he to return to earth.

Society is the hardest haked on its upper-crust.

"DOMESTIC" THE LIGHT RUNNING SEWING MACHINE.

It is PERFECT in every feature, and COMPLETE in all its details. It embodies all of the MODERN improvements that are of PROVED VALUE.

J. W. EVANS,

No. 29 POST STREET (MECHANICS' INSTITUTE BUILDING).

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

CHICKERING PIANOS AT COST.

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
COAL DEALERS.

Office and Yard, 14 Post Street.
Store Yard, 718 Sansome Street.

BRANCH OFFICE.
J. Middleton & Son, 419 Pine Street,
Opposite California Market.

All kinds of coal at lowest rates. Orders may be sent by telephone through any of the company's offices free.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, CITY
and County of San Francisco, State of California, Department No. 10. In the matter of the petition of JAMES M. SHORES, an insolvent debtor. Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Charles Halsey, Judge of said Superior Court, notice is hereby given to all creditors of the said insolvent JAMES M. SHORES to be and appear before the Hon. Charles Halsey, Judge as aforesaid, in open court, at the court-room of said court, in the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on TUESDAY, the 27th day of April, A. D. 1880, at 11 o'clock A. M. of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the prayer of said insolvent should not be granted, and an assignment of his estate be made, and he be discharged from his debts and liabilities, whether perfectly or imperfectly described, or not described at all in the schedule filed herein, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided; and in the meantime all proceedings against said insolvent be stayed.

Witness my hand and the seal of said court this 22d day of March, A. D. 1880.

[SEAL] WILLIAM A. STUART, Clerk.

By JOHN H. HART, Deputy Clerk.

WM. H. H. HART, Att'y for Petitioner, 230 Montgomery Street.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED, DO
hereby certify and declare that we have formed a partnership, under the firm name and style of the OAKLAND BAG MANUFACTURING COMPANY; that said partnership has for its object the manufacture and sale of all kinds and descriptions of jute fabrics; that its principal place of business is the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, having its works and factory in the City of Oakland, County of Alameda, State of California; that the names in full of all the members of such partnership and their places of residence are as follows, that is to say: WILLIAM SCHOLLE, residing at Number Twelve Hundred and Twenty-four Post Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California; ISRAEL CAHN, residing at Number Eleven Hundred and Twenty Post Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California; and JOSEPH BRANDENSTEIN, residing in the Town of Alameda, County of Alameda, State of California. Dated March 16, 1880.

WILLIAM SCHOLLE,
ISRAEL CAHN,
J. BRANDENSTEIN.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, ss.
On this Eighteenth (18th) day of March, A. D. One Thousand Eight Hundred and Eighty, before me, James Mason, a Notary Public in and for said city and county, personally appeared William Scholle, Israel Cahn, and Joseph Brandenstein, known to me to be the persons respectively named and described in, and whose names are subscribed to, the within and foregoing certificate of partnership, and they severally duly acknowledged to me that they executed the same respectively.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal the day and year in this certificate first above written.

[NOTARIAL SEAL] JAMES MASON, Notary Public.

Endorsed—Filed March 18, 1880.

WILLIAM A. STUART, Clerk.

By J. WHALEN, Deputy Clerk.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—ESTATE
of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator, at No. 327 Pine Street, in the city of San Francisco, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California.

HENRY A. NEWTON,
Adm'r of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, Deceased.
Died at San Francisco, March 10, 1880.

SAFFOLD & MEUX, Attorneys.

OFFER EXTRAORDINARY!

THE Automatic

THE ONLY LIGHT RUNNING AND NOISELESS SEWING MACHINE made. It has no Bobbins, no Shuttle, no Tension. It is sold wholly upon its merits.

We hereby offer to parties who have owned an Automatic for Six Months and are dissatisfied, a New Machine of any other make, on even exchange. No other Company dare make such an offer.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.

124 Post Street, San Francisco, and 361 Twelfth Street, Oakland.

The ARGONAUT is Printed with Ink Manufactured by

SHATTUCK & FLETCHER,

520 Commercial Street, San Francisco.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

— THE —

NEW WESTERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

APRIL NUMBER NOW ON SALE.

The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.

CONTENTS:

SAND. Chapter IV.....J. W. GALLY.
THE STORY OF AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND.....R. E. DESMOND.
THE HERMIT OF TREASURE PEAKS.....SAM DAVIS.
PALLAS.....CHAS. H. PHELPS.
SHEPHERDS AND SHEEP-HERDING II.....ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.
AT AGUA TIBIA.....AGNES M. MANNING.
AMERICANISM IN LITERATURE.....EDGAR FAWCETT.
CAPTAIN MOLLY.....E. M. LUDLUM.
THE ETHICS OF SUICIDE.....ALBERT WILLIAMS.
OUR OPHIDIAN FRIEND.....JOHN VANCE CHENEY.
NOTABLE AUTOGRAPHS.....POURQUOI.
RUBY.....J. H. S. BUGEIA.
ARIZONA.....JAMES WYATT OATES.
A GLIMPSE OF THE UNUSUAL.....W. C. MORROW.
OUTCROPPINGS.....
About Pets.—Waiting for the Galleon.—Pencil Shavings.—Ike Gives his Opinion on Total Depravity.—A Stroll Through Chinatown.—A Vaquero's Love Song.—Under the Smilax.—Winter Rain.—The Voice of the Sea.—Elsie.

One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.

SEE THE APRIL NUMBER OF THE CALIFORNIAN!

FOR SALE BY NEWSDEALERS AND THE TRADE GENERALLY.

THE ONE PRICE DRY GOODS HOUSE.

42, 44, AND 46 THIRD STREET.

KID GLOVES A SPECIALTY.

6-Button, first quality.....$1 75 | 3-Button, first quality.....$1 40
4-Button, first quality.....1 50 | 6-Button, second quality.....1 50
4-Button, second quality.....$1 25.

Lace-top Lisle and Silk Gloves, from 50 cents and upwards. Our Kid Gloves are the best fitting and most durable.

PEIXOTTO & SILVERMAN, Importers.

LADIES

All know how unsatisfactory Foreign Black Silks are in both cutting and wearing shiny. We give you a reliable test below that will give you a perfect guide in selecting silk material for actual wear.

JOHN D. CUTTER & CO.'S

RAVEN BLACK AMERICAN SILKS are now being retailed by the following established firms:

Doane & Henshelwood, San Francisco.

M. W. Henderson, Portland, Oregon.

O. A. Hale & Co., San Jose.

H. C. Taft & Co., Oakland.

THE TEST.

Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulteration, and will either cut or wear shiny.

Cutter's Samples for the trade.
ALLEN C. REID & CO.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS, REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,
No. 325 Montgomery Street,
Odd Fellows' Hall.

J. A. HUNTER, M. D.,
No. 321 Sutter Street, devotes Special Attention to
Catarrh, Deafness,
Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, and all ailments of the Throat, Lungs, and Heart.

SCHOOL AT DRESDEN.

MRS. AURELIA BURRAGE, LATE
Principal of the School at 850 Van Ness Avenue, has opened a School for American Girls in Dresden. Terms $25 per month for board and tuition. For particulars apply to Miss West, room 61, Nevada Block, or address Mrs. Burrage, care of Dresden Bank, Dresden, Saxony.

DANIEL GIOVANNINI,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
dealer in Wood, Coal, Charcoal, and Coke, 816 Pacific Street, between Stockton and Powell.
Charcoal Depot.—Charcoal for sale in lots to suit, from 1 to 10,000 sacks.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room No. 37, San Francisco, March 15, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 23) of Thirty Cents per share was declared, payable on SATURDAY, March 20, 1880. Transfer books closed until the 2nd inst.

P. JACOBUS, Ass't Secretary.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth (8th) day of March, 1880, an assessment (No. 62) of Two ($2) Dollars per share was levied upon the capital stock of the Corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the tenth (10th) day of April, 1880, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the twenty-eighth (28th) day of April, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

E. L. PARKER, Secretary.

Office, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free.

Address H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine.

The Argonaut.

VOL. VI. NO. 14.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 3, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

A SYMPOSIUM OF TRAMPS.

By One of Them.

The Los Angeles River, flowing by the town of Los Angeles, is a shallow stream, except during freshets, and is some thirty or forty yards in width. On the western, or town side, for some distance up and down, it is skirted by willow copses, dense or sparse, as they have been left to grow, or have been thinned out for purposes of fuel. On the immediate margin of the stream the soil is sandy; a little further inland it is dark and spongy, owing to imperfect drainage over acres where King Ague holds undisputed sway; while the residue lying between the river and the town is covered with vineyards and orchards.

The willows afford a noble vantage ground for the vagrant. They constitute a sort of neutral space between civilization and utter vagrancy; a sort of "Tom Tiddler's ground," sacred from the fell swoop of the municipal authorities; a veritable "Fiddler's Green," exempt from the knowledge or approach of the virtuous and pious, who go to church here and to heaven hereafter, and yet not so glaringly vicious as necessarily to condemn its occupants to the hell of the prison or penitentiary. Very frequently those emigrants who still come across the continent, "all the way from Pike," in a wagon drawn by two horses, with a led horse tethered to the back-board, camp here for a day or two to recuperate, prospect, lay out their scanty silver on household stores, and think over things in general before starting south on their never-ending tour; for the chances are that in a couple of months the self-same wagon, with its semi-circular canvas cover, with a woman in calico dress and sun-bonnet sitting bolt upright beside the driver—he of the unkempt, bushy, brown beard—and a handful of little male and female shock-heads, mixed up indiscriminately with the flour and bacon, the coffee-pot and the frying-pan, will camp on the self-same spot, on the "home stretch," and never "let up" moving till they reach Oregon or Washington Territory, or at least until their funds give out. There, too, you may see little gypsy tents—a few yards of canvas stretched over a pole, its ends lying horizontally in the complementary angles of other pairs of poles stuck in the ground so as to form the sides of an isosceles triangle four or five feet high. Indeed, at every little clearing in the willows you may see signs and evidences of the place having been once used as a camp—white ashes of dead fires, scraps of brown paper, bits of meat, of bread, of crackles, old oyster-cans, bits of half-burnt sticks, etc., etc.

But it is to that dense copse to our right that I wish the reader to bend his steps; and as I will lend him the cloak of Fortunatus, so that he may do so safely, and without compunction, seeing all, himself invisible, we shall together inspect the situation. It looks as if we shall have a hard time getting through these closely-planted, serried ranks of saplings, but as I have been here before, just follow, and I will show you how easy it is; for, as the old song says,

"It's easy, if you only know the way."

Push yourself through this little gap, now three steps to the right, and, presto! you see you are now on a nice, well-worn foot-path, by which you pass easily through the copse, and after ten or twelve yards of somewhat irregular travel, we come on a little clearing. This clearing, as you observe, is an irregular circle of some ten or twelve feet in diameter, surrounded by the dense copse, as by a wall twelve or fourteen feet high.

In the centre of this clearing, set upon the sandy soil, are two rows of large stones, set parallel at the distance of about a foot apart, and about six inches high, a receptacle for the fire, composed of dried willows and sticks picked off the river bank—for we are within a few yards of the river—and the stones came from there, too. You also see those three old iron bars stretching transversely, like a gridiron, over the stones, two of which support an old, soot-begrimed coffee-pot, which is being persuaded to the boiling point by the fire below. Two old cups, without handles, and innumerable old oyster-cans represent the dishes of this peculiar camp; for it is easy to see that it is a camp—not only by that short, squat, bare-armed, tan-breasted, open-shirted individual, with the black "dhudeen" stuck in the corner of his mouth, who is ever and anon poking a fresh stick into the fire, and keeping the blaze economically beneath the bottom of the pot, but by those three or four old and very dirty looking blankets, which repose in three several heaps at different points in the periphery of the enclosure. At length the water boils; the individual referred to puts a very dirty hand into a brown paper bag lying promiscuously among other bags upon the ground, and extracts an oyster-canful of some dark-looking powder, supposed to be coffee, which he then puts into one of the handleless cups, so as to half-fill it. Boiling water is poured from the coffee-pot into the cup, the contents of which are then returned to the pot, which process is repeated several times with the practiced motion of a ginslinger, until the critical eye of the cook surveys the mixture with satisfaction, and the expression of his countenance betokens that he considers the decoction perfect. This done, he leisurely stretches himself on the ground by the fire, knocks the ashes from his pipe, refills it, looks westward at the sun, whose position he can just catch as it glimmers through the close-set willows, lights the "dhudeen," which, like the general race of "dhudeens," is short, stumpy, black with absorbed nicotine where it is not coated with dirt, and seems to await events. Presently, the coffee-pot, which had been replaced upon the bars, begins to bubble over at the lid and mouth. He reaches over to an old five-gallon oil-can, with its top cut off, and an old piece of rope slung across the mouth, and taking from this improvised water-bucket a cupful of water, pours it into the boiling coffee, to settle it. These arduous duties performed, he lies back and smokes.

It is about sun-down in September—approaching the equinox. The evening is serene and still; the temperature just warm enough to render a coat unnecessary; not a sound is heard, save the distant swearing of a teamster on the down-grade across the river, the occasional rumble of a wagon or buggy on the bridge which spans the stream a couple of hundred yards above, or the mellow, high-keyed, far-off shouts of boys at play up toward the city. Presently a noise is heard as of crackling and parting of willow saplings, and two other individuals appear upon the scene by the inlet afore-mentioned.

"Halloo! ye ould skite," shouts the foremost, who packs a demijohn in his hand, "have ye been afther makin' the coffee? Get up an' take some wine;" and suiting the action to the word, he stoops down and reaches for an oyster-can, uncorks his demijohn, fills it up with a yellow liquid, and presents it to the chunky fellow in the open-breasted shirt, who takes it and drains it at a draught, wiping the drops from his rough, gray beard with the back of his hand—for our friend is sixty, if he is a day.

"It's very little pressing that old Vino Blanco needs. Take another to warm ye up, old chap. Astonish your stomach with two: the first's lonesome," and the second speaker pours him out another "calker," which is accepted, and disappears as readily as the first.

"Sure an' Boston Bum's the boy that always makes a raise of the wine," responds the hoary-headed old ruffian addressed as Vino Blanco; "an' what have ye bin afther, b'ys?"

The person addressed as Boston Bum does not reply categorically; but produces from the pocket of his pantaloons—he wears nothing but trowsers of a dubious grayish color, and woollen shirt likewise of dubious gray—a couple of plugs of tobacco, one of which he throws on the ground—pro bono publico—and from the other of which he bites off a good-sized chew. Boston Bum is a short, heavy, fat-faced, stolid, animal-looking specimen of the genus homo, with hairless countenance, an old gray cap on top of his round head, and looking every inch the "bum." His companion is taller, thinner, has a sharper face, wears clothes more in accordance with style, has a coat on—which neither of the other two possesses—and his two-weeks' growth of tawny beard and whiskers, if they add to the general villainy of his appearance, also indicate that he has sometimes the "style" to shave it, so haply he possesses the wherewithal. He walks with a jaunty air, and apparently has some dim, shadowy pretensions to being considered a gentleman.

"Smartie couldn't make a trick, with all his chinnin'," puts in Boston Bum, contemptuously; "thim high-falutin' ways o' his'n don't pan out worth a cent."

"Now, you needn't talk, you ould bum. All you can do is raise the baccy and the wine. I never saw you with a dollar to your name yet," retorts the individual addressed as Smartie. "What grub's left in camp, old man?"

"I've got the rest o' the steak ye left thish mornin', an' three ould shiale loaves of bread I bummed off o' the baker's thish noon when I was out," responded Vino Blanco.

"All right, old man; slap 'em on, an' let's have some. I haven't eaten a d—d bite since morning, and I'm devilish hungry," saith Smartie.

The old man, thus adjured, fumbles among the packages which are lying spread out topsy-turvy upon an old gunny-sack, apparently answering the purpose of a table-cloth, and takes therefrom a brown-paper parcel containing three or four tolerably good-looking beefsteaks, from which he picks the pieces of brown paper which stick to their surfaces, while a dozen buzzing blue-flies endeavor to extricate themselves from their lurking places where they have lain all day gorging themselves between the folds of the meat. Some escape, and others are remorselessly crushed by the grimy paws of the chief cook.

"What are ye doin', ye ould baste, killin' thim flysh ag'inst the mate?" chimes in Boston Bum; "have ye no manners in ye, to cook mate that-a-way fur gintlemen?"

"Thim flysh is the divil," reasons Vino Blanco, apologetically; "ould Crice himsilf couldn't do nothin' wid thim."

Smartie strikes a theatrical attitude, puts his right hand into the breast of his buttoned-up, seedy coat, stretches his left arm, and delivers himself:

"The fly that blows and flies away
May live to blow another day;
But he by Vino Blanco slain
Will never live to blow again."

"Dry up, ye thievlin' ramrod!" shouts Boston Bum, indignant at this meaningless and unintelligible display of poetry, "d'ye think this is a circus?"

"Faith, ye're right there, Boston," chips in Vino Blanco; "he thinks because he wunst shoveled sand in the circus that he's a play-actor."

"You shut up, old man, and get these steaks ready," retorts Smartie, who has an eye to business as well as aesthetics.

Vino Blanco having cleaned the surface of the steaks to his own satisfaction, puts them on the iron bars, shoves more wood into the fire, while the meat sizzles and sputters, sending up that appetizing odor which always characterizes meat broiled in the open air. Parenthetically I would ask, is there anything more appetizing than an old-fashioned Mexican barbecue? Your Mexican daintily cuts off tid-bits of beef, two or three inches in diameter and about half an inch in thickness, and hanging them tenderly; one by one, in a string upon a green wand previously sharpened to a point, holds them over a fire until cooked to suit his taste, which is merely the matter of a minute or two, while the contiguity of the pieces themselves and the greenness of the stick prevents the latter from being affected by the flame till the former are broiled. The improvised gridiron of our tramps, however, answered the purpose just as well, and presently they were engaged in silently munching their steaks, using the mediæval forks provided by nature to convey them to their mouths, dipping the meat in a common salt-cellar, composed of a paper of salt set upon a gunny-sack, this table being garnished with the three loaves of stale bread aforesaid, "bummed" by Vino Blanco during the day from various bakers in the town on the plea of starvation, in which business old Vino Blanco was an experienced hand. A ready wit, combined with a certain degree of tact, low cunning, and knowledge of human nature, rendered his applications signally successful in acquiring those stale loaves on which bakers lose but little, and gain the sense of having done a meritorious action in bestowing them. The repast is being washed down by draughts of coffee sweetened with sugar obtained by pinches from an oyster-can, much as "ye bonest miner" might have taken his pinch of dust from his wallet in '49 to pay for his drink, or by draughts of wine from the demijohn. And now another actor appears upon the scene.

A pair of blue overalls, tucked into boots, surmounted by a striped woollen shirt, this latter by a face tolerably frank and good-natured, the usual old felt hat, which, though now his (save the mark!) looks as if it might have previously been "slave to thousands," comes forward through the opening in the willows and confronts the crowd.

"Hello! Cayuse," sings out Smartie, "what luck? Sit down and have some supper."

"Ye'll find some shtek in that paper," say Vino Blanco; "put it on for yerself."

The party addressed as Cayuse looks round, spies the demijohn, and makes for it, pours himself out a can of wine, empties it, and proceeds to appropriate another.

"Go shlow on that wine," cries out Boston Bum authoritatively and warningly; "there's only a gallon in that jug. I shpent my lasht four bits on it down to Palincony's, an' when that's done there'sh no more."

"All right, Boston," responds Cayuse, "I guess I can get some to-morrow."

"To-morrow be d—d!" imperatively answers Boston Bum; "put it back when I tell yez."

Cayuse puts down the jug, not forgetting, however, to drain the second can he had poured out for himself.

"I've had supper," says he, "down to the Italian's."

"How did you manage that, Cayuse?" chimes in Smartie.

"He's been stood off so often that you can't give him taffy any more. You can't play that off onto me."

"Bob's in town; just come in from the ranch. I met him on Main Street, and he asked me to take supper with him," responds Cayuse.

"The h—I you say!" returns Smartie. "Is he heeled?"

"I saw him change a twenty," answers Cayuse. "I guess he's got more than that; but he always socks it behind the bar."

"Why didn't you strike him for a piece?" returns Smartie.

"I would, but just then another fellow came in, and before I could say a word they went off together," answers Cayuse; "but he's coming down here this evening. I told him the boys were here, and you bet if he comes he'll set 'em up."

"Bully for you, Cayuse; take some more wine," chips in Boston Bum, who, as purveyor of the fluid, considers himself in the light of arbiter bibendi. "Hustle around, old man, and you, too, Smartie, get out and get some wood; we ain't got near enough."

The mandate was obeyed; for Boston Bum, despite his obtuseness of intellect and general abasement in the scale of humanity, was yet possessed of sufficient physical strength and plain sense to make his dictum law when it came to matters of business. In addition to this, he was respected as being no mean purveyor: no matter how he came by it, he usually kept the camp "fixed" in the matter of baccy and wine—no mean items in the struggle for existence.

Ten minutes later Vino Blanco and Smartie return, each with big armfuls of the best and driest sticks they could pick out from the drift-wood on the river banks; a matter of no small difficulty, considering that the stores of this material had been repeatedly ransacked to supply hundreds of camp-fires since they were replenished from the Tejuanga and other canons of the Sierra Madre by the spring freshets. While all hands are smoking, and either thinking, or doing what in camp life takes the place of thinking, the rustling of the willows indicates the advent of a new arrival. Dusk has already deepened into darkness—it is now about eight o'clock—and the ruddy blaze of the camp-fire is reflected by a figure who offers a certain contrast to the lumberers by the fire. He wears, it is true, overalls tucked flannel shirt, no waistcoat, a common coat, and a felt hat, but his appearance is neater, his coat person cleaner, and his bearing sprightlier than the crowd already assembled.

"Hello! Bob," shout the whole gang in chorus, rising to their feet and shaking hands with the new-comer in ultra-demonstrative fashion, as if he was the dearest and most admirable friend on earth, "where ye been all summer? Come round to the fire and warm yourself; sit down here." Each vying with the other in attention to give Bob the snugest and cosiest place, for has not the report gone forth from Cayuse that Bob is just off the ranch, and has got the scads? And is not the man of means as welcome, or more so, to the impecunious tramp as to his wealthier brother? Verily he is; for do not visions arise of square meals, and striking for half dollars, and setting up of drinks, and buying of innumerable jugs of wine? Even so. Praise to Allah! Selab! Ready hands invert the demijohn; oyster-cans of the beverage contained therein are deferentially tendered to this man of means; and under the genial influence of the wine, and hopes of future benefits, tongues are unloosed.

"I haven't seen ye, Bob, sint ye was up on the San Joaquin. How's times, anyway?" inquires Smartie.

"Can't ye let the man drink his wine, an' not keep gassin' an' hotherin' the life out o' him?" cbiips in Boston Bum.

"Take some more wine, Bob; there's plenty more where that come from. Old Palincony's not did yit."

"All right, boys," says Bob; "you can't scare me with wine; but there's very little left in the jug. Suppose we empty what's there into the cans, and send old Vino Blanco for another gallon; and while he's gone we'll talk over things in general. Here, old man," says Bob, chucking him a couple of half-dollars, "get us a gallon of the best, mind you, the seventy-five cent stuff, and keep the balance for luck."

"Sure an' the ould man'll niver come back if ye give him that," remonstrates Boston Bum.

"Mind yer own business, ye low-lived loafer," indignantly responds Vino Blanco, "it's Bob that knows me hettern' that." And the old gray-beard disappears, jug in hand, through the thicket.

"Ab! Bob," says Boston Bum, after a pause, and as if the fact struck him for the first time, "it's a fine thing to bave money."

"What would you do, Boston, if you bad it?" asks Bob.

"Do?" chimes in Smartie; "why, he'd be drunk till he died. He wouldn't last out the year."

"Just what you'd do, Smartie," retorted Boston; "but you'd spend as much on gambling an' dance-houses as ye would on drink, an' ye'd beat me there. D'ye think them big-bugs in Frisco, Bob—thim as makes piles o' money off railroads and shtocks and sich like—d'ye think they has a good time?"

"Time?" puts in Smartie contemptuously; "why, don't you know that these are the hardest kind o' workers? They toil an' slave from mornin' to night in an office, afraid that somebody'll cheat them, and can't get asleep of night's thinkin' about it. Psbaw! I wouldn't have their money at the price they pay for it."

"Very true," says Bob; "there's a good deal in what you say, Smartie. You and Boston may not be the best of men, but you bave one advantage over these fellows—your faults are in the line of nature; theirs, if all they look to is the acquisition of money, for purposes of ambition or power, and not for the legitimate objects of the pleasure they can get or give by it, are against the line of nature. 'This avarice hath a deeper root than summer-seeming lust: it hath been the grave of our slain kings,' said the man who wasted no words in expressing truths."

"There's one thing sure, b'ys," put in old Vino Blanco, who came in with the demijohn, and who had gathered the gist of the argument, "thim min can't ate more'n three square meals a day, they can't get good an' dhrunk more'n wunst a day, they can't shlap on more'n one bed at a time, an' whin they die they can't okkepy more'n one coff'n; an' be Jases I can do all o' thim things mysilf widout no money at all. Now, b'ys, here's yer wine; dbrink harty, an' be glad ye's have got it."

"Work," enunciated Smartie, reflectively, "work I consider the meanest and most degrading thing in nature," and he emphasized his remark by a smack of the lips as he drained his wine. "Work was the curse of our first parents; work was invented by the rich to grind down the poor; work came in with the empire. Adam an' Eve could 'a' lived on fruit and sich truck forever without doin' a lick o' work, jist like them Injuns in the Panama States that live on bananas an' lie on their backs an' look at the bananas gettin' ripe."

"Don't you believe it, Smartie," says Bob. "That yarn's in the allegory line. It means that the primitive men lived, as you say, on bananas, and did no work; but after a while they got hankering to see something—their minds began to get restless, jist as your's'll do when the grape season's over here—and they emigrated from the hot climates where fruit was plenty and they badn't got to work for their grub, to the temperate zone where they had to work if they wanted to live, for there was d—d little fruit there but apples; and how would you like to have to eat apples for breakfast, dinner, and supper every day—apples, apples, apples, nothing but apples or go hungry? Grapes may do, but apples—faugh! And look what a bard, sour drink they make out of them! What do ye think, Vino Blanco, would you rather take in—Oregon or California?"

"Californy every pop, in mine," answered Vino Blanco, positively.

"An' what d'ye think about Cain an' Abel, Bob?" inquired Boston Bum, feelingly; "d'ye think Cain really got away wid the b'y?"

"Devil a bit, Boston; it's worse than that. Cain's killing Abel right here in California every day. Cain's the farmer, and Abel's the stock-raiser. Isn't the farmer getting away with the stock man more an' more every day? You mustn't believe all you read in books as it's put down. But fitting truths to persons is the only way they could make you old vags understand anything anyway. Hand that jug here, Boston."

"What a larnin' Bob's got," whispered Boston to Vino Blanco, reverentially. "I niver could make out why he shtops in the country when he might be clerk in a shtore or a bar-keep. Bob, was you iver a bar-keep?"—this in a whisper.

"Once, in a sort of a way," said Bob, "for about a month."

Tell's about it, Bob," respectfully urged Boston, for in

Boston's eyes the divinity that hedges a bar-keep was something tangible and most worthy of respect.

"All right," says Bob; "but, as the wine's getting low, we'd better get another jug. I'll stand the coin if Vino Blanco'll get it."

"Devil a fear o' me goin' all the time," responded Vino Blanco, whom his potations now caused to stand upon his dignity, and whose old legs preferred a recumbent posture to a walking one. "We'll cut an' see who goes for the wine, an' who goes for the grapes;" and so saying, he reached for the packages lying upon the gunny-sack and produced from among them a very greasy and dirty pack of cards, which he proceeded to shuffle in his grimy hands. "Now, b'ys; ace high. Cut."

The cuts were made, and Cayuse and Smartie, drawing a deuce and five, respectively, one took the demijohn and the other a gunny-sack wherein to gather grapes from a neighboring vineyard.

"Don't git thim Mission grapes, Cayuse," shouted Vino Blanco after the retreating figure. "Go to that farder vineyard an' git the Maligays an' the Swatewater; an' mind an' bring enough for mornin'! Thim Frinchmin are devils to be up in the mornin'."

Vino Blanco, Boston Bum, and Bob continued the conversation.

"How did ye git out o' that woman scrape, Bob, down to Soledad? That must be goin' on to three year ago, now," asked Boston.

"Just about as usual in these things, Boston. Made the march and skinned out," said Bob.

"Ah, you can jist bit that Bob ain't goin' to be caught in no fly-trap, now," said Vino Blanco, with emphasis.

"Vbat d'ye think o' wimmin anyway, Bob?" asked Boston.

"First rate in their place," said Bob.

"Thim Turks is the b'ys, though; ain't they, Bob? I wisht I was a Turk."

"An' a foine Turk you'd make," put in Vino Blanco, contemptuously.

"Ould Brigham could bate them, though. He sbtood 'em off an' raked in the chips, eb, Bob?"

"It's all fashion," remarked Bob. "If you told the Shah of Persia that he was immoral for having a bundred wives, be would probably merely pity your theories, and might even express regret at your inability to have the same. These things depend simply on statecraft, fashion, and custom. Power means the ability to control. Wealth is a form of power. The men in power say, in effect: 'We're the men that make the laws, and you're the fools that keep the laws.' Can you blame them? There is no such thing as equality in any department of nature, or in man's work. Give you a thousand dollars to-day, Boston, and in a year you'd be as big a vag as you are now."

"There's a big difference in thim farmers' wives," resumed Boston; "some on 'em'll slap the dure in yer face an' lock it, an' some on 'em'll give ye a 'hand-out' sort o' timid like, an' some'll ax ye in an' give ye a reglar square 'sit-down.' But wimmin's wimmin, an' that's all ye can say about it," concluded he, with the air of a philosopher.

"Wuz ye at Santy Anny, Bob, whin Dinis Karney wuz there?" asked Vino Blanco, presently. "Sure, an' the b'ys gave Dinis a rough dale."

"Dinis is-a good talker," said Bob. "It pleases his constituents to hear him, because half a loaf is better than no bread. If you can't do a thing, the next best thing is to think you can. Those who haven't the means or are too old to enjoy the pleasures of life, console themselves with religion, and call the rich clusters that hang out of their reach 'sour grapes.'"

"An' here comes Cayuse wid the grapes," exclaimed Vino Blanco, as a figure with a well-stuffed gunny-sack slung over his shoulder made his appearance in the ring. The sack was put on the ground, and bunches selected by the party to suit themselves. Cayuse had foraged well, and picked the biggest, juiciest, and most blooming clusters. Silence reigned while the banquet was being discussed, the matter and the manner being both perfectly Homeric. Anon Smartie entered with the wine; oyster-cans are filled and emptied; hilarity ensues; pipes are filled and lit, figures are stretched beside the blaze, and at last Bob is called upon for his story.

"Fair play," says Bob. "I've stood the wine. Now, suppose we all tell stories. I've got two-and-a-half to spare—the man who tells the best story to have it. What d'ye say? Agreed? Then, Vino Blanco, shuffle up that deck of yours, and we'll cut for position."

The cuts are made to the following order: Boston Bum first, then Cayuse, Vino Blanco, Smartie, and Bob last. Boston Bum takes a drink, clears his throat, spreads himself, and begins:

"It's little I have to tell ye, b'ys, in the way of a shtory. I don't mind now that I iver done much good, or much that's worth speakin' of. I've been through mosht of the Shtates of the Union, an' I've bate me way here to Californy on the kayrns, an' I could tell ye's somethin' about batin', but I guess ye's know near as much as I do mesilf. There was wunst, though, I took it into me head to go up through Minnysoty, and the devil took me there in the winter-time. I bate to St. Pauls, an' thim I bate to Doolootb, an' thim I took to me legs an' tramped. Talk about yer could, ugh! An' devil a blanket had I got but an ould sojer coat that I got when I jumped the hounty lasbt in sixty-five, an' it was purty well wore out. Well, one evenin' I got to a farm-house an' sez I, 'Can ye give me any wurk?' says I; 'I'm shtarvin', an' I'm wake, an' I can't go no farder.' An' the young 'ooman as come to the dure, sez she, smilin' like, 'Come in an' set down an' have some supper,' sez she; 'me husband's gone to sell some spring chickens in the waggin, an' I guess ye can shtop all night,' sez she, 'anyways. Ye'll find some hay in the barn, an' here,' sez she, 's a blanket, for I see ye hain't got none, an' mehbe ye wuddent mind choppin' me up some wood,' sez she, 'for I don't know as I've got sufficient to cook the breakfast wid in the mornin', sez she. Well, seein' she wuz a nice young 'ocman, an' no man aroun', an' the night was cold, I chopped for about an hour, an' knocked out a purty decent pile o' fire-wood, an' arter that she had the supper ready when I went in, an' she was rale soshable, a genooin lady; an' we got talkin' about old times—for she wuz from Boston, like meself—an' the time slipped on, an' naither of us thought anythin' about it till the clock shtruck twelve, an' then she jumps up an' cries 'Oh, my! what in goodness is keepin' John! I'm afeard he's got lost. Oh, my! I thin

I axed ber, 'Where's he gone?' an' she said 'He's gone to town,' an' I sez, 'How fur?' an' she sez, 'Twelve mile.' 'Then, sez I, 'mebbe he's shtoppin' all night,' an' she sez, 'Oh, no!' Then I chucks another log on the fire, an' sez, 'Wait a little.' So we waited till the clock shtruck one, an' thim I looks out at the dure, an' belave me, b'ys—wuz ye iver in Minnysoty?—it wuz shnowin' like mad; about two foot thick all round, an' niver no more but an inch or two whin I come in.

"So I comes back to the warm fire an' sez I, 'Thur's about two foot o' shnow on the ground.' 'Tbank God!' sez she, an' sez I, 'D'ye like shnow?' sez I. 'No,' sez she; 'but it might be wuss. Oh, my!' 'Then,' sez I, 'why d'ye say "Ob, my"?' 'Well,' sez she, 'I haint heen in this country more'n seven months, an' I don't know but what John might git lost in the snow—I've beerd tell o' sich things—an' I'm afeard.' So I sez, 'Wait a little,' sez I, an' I chucks another big log on the fire—for I tell ye, b'ys, it was mighty cold. After a while I sez, 'How long ha' ye bin married?' 'Eight months,' sez she; 'we wuz married in Boston, an' come out here in the summer.' Then I tumbled, an' sez I, 'Did John niver shtay cut all night afore?' an' she sez, 'No, never.' Then sez I, 'Which way did he go?' an' she brought me to the dure, an' pintoed into the dark the way the shnow wuz drivin', an' sez she, 'That-a-way.' Then sez I, 'Have ye got airy horse in the shtable?' an' she sez, 'Yes.' 'Have ye got anny whisky?' sez I. 'No,' sez she; 'but I've got some peppermint, an' some ginger, an' some brandy.' 'All right,' sez I, 'gimme the brandy.' An' I went to the shtable, an' I found the horse, an' I saddled him an' brought him roun' to the dure; an' sez I, 'Gimme that brandy,' an' she bairds it to me, an' I took a shwig; an' then sez I, 'Gimme a blanket,' an' she banded out the blanket, an' I puts the bottle in the blanket an' ties it bebtin the saddle an' sez 'Good night!' 'Good night!' sez she, an' I rode off to find John.

"Well, b'ys, it's no use a-talkin', a sbnow-storm in Minnysoty is the devil—sudden an' sure. There wuz no kind of a track, ye couldn't see nothin' on the ground, but the night wuz clear, an' when she pintoed me the way I seen one sbtar an' I made for that shtar. We got flounderin' along through the shnow, me an' the horse, for about an hour, till I felt so mighty cold I reached back into the blanket for the brandy bottle, an' tuk another shwig. In about half a hour more, I heerd somebody cussin' an' shwearin' like mad someways to the left, an' I worked up to him, an' finds a man with a waggin an' two horses, one stannin' up an' the other layin' down in the shnow, an' the man tryin' to get him up, an' sez I, as I come up, 'Is that you, John?' an' he sez, 'Yes, it's me—who's you?' 'Ise come to help you,' sez I. 'How did you know I wuz here?' sez he, as bras as if he owned the hull o' Minnysoty. 'Your wife told me,' sez I, 'an' I've come here to help you get that horse up,' an' I jumps down, an' after both of us luggin' an' tearin' at the baste we got him on his legs. Then John gets on the seat, cracks his whip, an' sez, 'gee.' I see'd from the fust what kind o' man he wuz, but sez I, wantin' to have a little fun, 'Ain't ye could, John? Take a shwig o' brandy?' 'None o' your dam business,' sez he, 'dam your brandy?' 'All right,' sez I. 'I see what kind of a man you are. You lave your wife to bome unprotected, you get sbtagged in the sbnow, you shwear at the man that comes to help you, and after be has belped you, you don't even thank him—that's you. I go to your house while you're away, ate supper wid your wife, borrow your horse and your brandy to come an' help you, an' here they are both,' sez I, perducin the brandy bottle an' slappin' the horse's shoulder, 'that's me.' At this he shtarts, jumps on his seat, and eyes me a moment; I jumps off the horse an' sez I, 'All right,' sez I, 'if you mane fight, come down an' we'll have it out in the shnow; but he thinks better of it, cracks his whip an' sez 'gee.' So I jumps on the horse agin, an' sez I, 'Let this be a lesson to ye, niver lave yer home unguarded, an' niver shwear at a man that helps ye in a tight fix. I've got yer horse, I've got yer brandy, an' I've got yer blanket. Nobody gave 'em to me, I tuk 'em; the brandy an' the blanket I mane to kape for me services; the horse I shall lave for you somewheres when I gets done wid him, in case ye might bate yer wife if ye lost him. Good-hye, John,' an' I left him shwearin' worse than ever, and I made the town that night."

"Well, how did you come out, Boston?" inquired Bob.

"The shnow got worse," said Boston, "an' I put the horse in the shtable of the botel, an' him an' me ate his vally up in boord afore two weeks was out, an' then I shkipped out."

At this point Vino Blanco, Smartie, and Cayuse, oyster-can in hand, could be descried beneath the ruddy light of the blaze hob-nobbing and indulging in sundry gesticulations to the inspiring strains of "The Bounty Jumper's Song," as rendered by the first-named of the three, who was generally understood to have the best faculty of minstrelsy when tolerably drunk:

"We jumped the bounty-y all the way from Illinois to Maine, From Portland in to Boston, an' thim tuk back again, New York an' Philadelph-ee an' many a city moRE, But the last time that we jumped it was the city o' Baltimore."

Thus far got Vino Blanco, but here, for some reason or other, he incurred the resentment of Boston Bum, who reached over with his foot from where he was lying and knocked the oyster-can out of his hand, accompanying the polite gesture with the forcible though not particularly courteous remark:

"Dry up, ye ould fraud. What d'ye know 'bout bounties? Ye niver jumped notbin' but a canteen o' wine. Come on wid yer shtory Cayuse; the b'ys is waitin'."

Thus adjured, Cayuse spread himself, and without more ado, began:

"There was three of us left 'Frisco this last hard winter—ye mind the time when the ladies set free lunches in all the churches, an' there was a big wooden shanty near the corner of Montgomery Avenue an' Jackson, where I guess about a thousand of the hoys got their grub every day—some on 'em three or four times, too. If one meal wasn't enough for ye, ye could go back to the rear end of the file as soon as ye came out from yer hash, an' if the man at the door didn't spot ye it was all hunky-dory, and ye could play that racket till ye got filled up. Well, as I was tellin' ye, me and Jim Foster an' Roxy Smith played the grub racket on all the churches an' on this Jackson Street lay-out till they closed down on us 'bout the beginnin' o' March. We'd take lunch at the Methodist Church South, an' as quick as the door opened at eleven o'clock you bet we was there every time, an' got the best seats, an' all o' them bully old ladies a-comin' an' askin' us if we was comfable an' had all we wanted; but when it come to scrubb'n down the benches on the outside arter we had hed our hash, we had pertickler engagements a-huntin' up work elsewhere; for we hed to ketch the crowd at the Jackson Street shebang afore four o'clock, or elst we'd git left out in the cold. There was Dockins's Hall, to be sure, an' one or two o' them other churches; but barrin' one where we could get bed-tickets they wasn't much account, an' we didn't patronize 'em more'n wunst or twicet, when we couldn't make the riffle elsewhere.

"Well, as I was sayin', when the grub racket shet down on us we was one mornin' in Bottle Jake's, settin' at one o' them round tables, an' waitin' to see if we couldn't tackle some greeny an' ring in on him an' rope him for the beer, when Roxy up an' says: 'Boys, I guess this thing's about played out; the country's openin' up now, s'pose we take it in for a month or two.' An' Jim Foster says: 'Which road d'ye think's the best for a fellow to go?' An' Roxy says: 'South every time.' An' I says: 'All right, let's go.' Then Jim Foster says: 'Boys, I've got two short bits that two fellers gave up this mornin', corner o' Market an' Montgomery; they ain't no use for nothin' else, I guess we'll better have the beers on 'em,' an' he raps with his fist an' calls for two bottles. Then we started, an' by evenin' next day we made Sau José, beatin' the kyers durin' the fust night for about thirty mile, till the conductor tumbled to the racket an' showed us off. Then we made Gilroy, workin' the ranches an' farm-houses with pretty good luck, one of us goin' in to prospect while the other two would set outside waitin' to see what the show was to get in on it. Jim an' Roxy said I was the boss on the bum-racket, an' got 'sit-downs' for all hands when neither o' them couldn't sometimes scarcely make the 'hand-out' for one. I used to tell 'em to set down out of sight, back o' the fence, but near the gate, so's they could see what was goin' on through the cracks; an' I would go for'ard to the door, an' knock kinder gentle an' timid like, so's to 'tract attention, but not so's to seem like business, in case the old 'ooman might leave her bake-pan in a burry an' come to the door 'xpectin' to see some fren' or hear some news, an' then git mad seein' 'twas only a tramp, an' either slam the door in yer face, or at least tell ye they 'hedn't nothin' cooked,' w'ich was the common way o' gettin' out of it if they didn't want to hurt yer feelin's.

"Not much! I had played the game too often not to know how to stock the keerds an' hold both bowers an' the ace. I'd knock, as I say, in a sort o' frightened way; first two little raps, then a pause, an' then one a leettle louder, jest so's they could hear it in the kitchen, for I allus went to the kitchen door. If no one come, I'd wait about half a minute an' do the same agin. Then, if no one come, I'd try the handle o' the door to see if it was locked. If 'twas locked, I'd go back an' tell the boys, an' mebbe, if 'twas much of a house, we'd make up our minds to stay round till meal-time, an', meantime, prospect for anythin' that might be of service to us under the suckumstances. If 'twas open, I'd go in mighty quiet, an' prospect the cupboards in a hurry, thinkin' it was more gentleman-like to do what was necessary in the way o' gettin' grub without bein' so onpolite as to trouble the people o' the house, seein' they might be ockeped an' engaged on important matters, an' nat'rally wouldn't like to be disturbed on sech a errand. In course I listened to'able keerful fur footsteps, fur there was no tellin' but what some people might be so onthoughtful as to resent the liberty I was takin'; but I gen'ally made no mistakes on this p'int.

"Ef I heerd the old 'ooman, or the girl, or the old man, or some one else comin', ef I see'd I hedn't time to get away with the grub without raisin' onseemly objections to the transaction, I would put it right back an' stand till they came in; an' afore they could say 'scat,' I would off with my hat an' say 'madam,' or 'sir,' as the case called for, 'I dropped in in a hurry to tell you that the gate at the corner o' the field down the lane's open, an' the cow, or the horse, or the colt's got out, or the hogs are gettin' in,' or 'there's a wagon stalled down the road an' the man want's help,' or some sich yarn as would answer, for we kep' our eyes open on the way 'long so's to fix up the proper story. Also, I'd take pretty good care not to give no taffy where I wouldn't do no good. Some men an' a good many wimmin, too, wouldn't hev' it; an' with sich I'd give 'em the business short an' without wastin' wind, an' then say I was in a pertickler hurry, but hed they a little snack o' sumthin' cold so's to keep the stummick from cravin', havin' left somewhere in a pertickler hurry that mornin' afore breakfas', an' not carin' to rouse the missis on my account. Sometimes, in course, they'd say 'No,' an' wouldn't bave it, but oftener they'd give a 'hand-out,' seemin' glad to git the bisness over.

"But, ef the door was answered the best pop by a fat, smilin' 'ooman, with rosy cheeks an' a calico wrapper, an' bare arms with flour on her hands, then I'd tumble to the hull business to wunst, an' takin' off my hat I'd make a 'bow like Chesterfield,' as Smartie'd say, an' say, 'Madam, you behold a gentleman in distress—one as has held the highest government appintments, though now reduced by stress of suckamstances to walk when he would much prefer to ride. Madam, I have jest received news of the demise of a aunt—probably you may know her, Mrs. Thomson, of the next town, a lady of wealth—an' I go to bury her, as her nearest and dearest relashun in the world.' (Here it is necessary to drop a tear, an' ef ye haint got no han'kercher, rub it off with the sleeve o' yer coat, then resoom): 'Madam, I crave your pardon fur introodin' on your domestic privacy, but hunger, absolute hunger, compels me to do so, else how shall I hope to reach my destinashun, an' preside at the obsequies of my departed relative, rebuffed as I so often am by the rood an' unlettered barbarians who reside along this road, an' refuse to listen to the tale of woe of a stranger! You, madam, I have reason to believe from your ladylike appearance, are of a different calibre to the ignerent wimmin whom I have passed upon my journey, an' I am sure will not refuse to grant my small request.' Ten to one the old 'ooman 'll be tickled all through, an' the last fly 'll fetch her. Ushally she spreads the cloth an' lays out cold bacon, an' pies, an' bread, an' butter, an' molasses, an' cold biskits, an' a jug o' milk, and mebbe fries some eggs ef eggs is in season. As soon as this is done I chips in for the boys as is left layin' off behind the fence, an' says, 'Madam, your trooly good heart will, I'm sure, warm to a tale of sufferin'. There are at this moment waiting outside, too timid to enter your hospitable abode unasked, two young men, footsore and weary, whom I overlook upon the road, and for whom I desire to bespeak your good offices and kind hospitality in their need.'

"Here she will probably compliment you on your sympathy an' forethought, and tell you to call 'em in. This is actually what happened in the case of Roxy an' Jim Foster, way down near Vyzaleye, at a slap-bang, way-up farm-house where I spun the racket just as was stated. In they come, an' we all three sat down to a roarin' good spread o' eggs an' the other fixin's o' a square meal. The old lady was no end sympathetic, an' asked me where Mrs. Thomson lived, an' what was her maiden name, an' what bizness she did, or whether she lived on her money, an' I told her the hull history o' the old lady—when she died, an' what she was wuth, an' in fact give her the troob bizness in every p'int.

"Jest as we was gettin' well into the eatin', we hears a horse an' buggy drive brisk up to the door, an' a second arter in comes a man, in a long linen duster, about six foot an' a half high, an' sez, 'Hello, Mary! what've ye got here?' an' she says, 'A poor gentleman that's jest lost a rich aunt down to Vyzaleye, an' I'm glad you've come, John, for you're jest the man as he would like to see, seein' as you're the Public Administrator this year, an' was the Assessor last, and so'll know all about poor, dear Mrs. Thomson.' Then I seed that I'd giv the thing ded away, an' felt so flummoxed like 'at I couldn't eat a other bite; an' Roxy an' Jim Foster lays down their knives an' forks an' fust looks at me an' then at the door. Then the man in the duster he bust inter a loud laugh, an' 'Mrs. Thomson be d—d!' sez he, 'there's no sech a pusson. Mary, this d—d loafin' tramp has been imposin' on ye, him an' his two pals. I passed the hull gang up the road yesterday, an' know all about them. Now, sez he, turnin' to us, 'finish yer dinners, good an' hearty, an' then wait till I get my waggin hitched up an' I'll give ye all a free ride inter Vyzaleye, an' free quarters when ye git there; the city's in want o' some hands, an' I guess ye'll jest fill the bill. Eat hearty,' sez he, 'I won't be more'n five minnits gettin' ready,' an' he goes out. Well, would you believe it? his kindness quite took my appyite away, and so suckum-frustrated me that I rose up from the table as soon's he went out, an' went through the door without biddin' the lady good-bye, or thankin' her for her kindness, an' Roxy an' Jim Foster followed suit; an' before we were a hundred yards down the road I heerd that man a-larfin' like a bull, and sayin', 'I thought I'd skeer the appyite out o' them tramps, Mary. Did ye see them git?' an' the hull bizness so sickened me o' goin to Vyzaleye that we turned up the country an' took in the foothills instead."

[CONCLUDED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

Edwin Arnold, whose poem, "The Light of Asia," has passed through two editions in England and eight in America, has received the following letter from the King of Siam, together with his majesty's Order of the White Elephant:

"GRAND PALACE, BANGKOK, December 5, 1890.

"SIR:—My father devoted much time to the study and defense of his religion, and although I, being called to the throne while young, had no time to become a scholar like him, I, too, have interested myself in the study of the Sacred Books, and take a great interest in defending our religion and having it properly understood. It seems to me that if Europeans believe the missionary preaching that ours is foolish and bad religion, they must also believe that we are a foolish and bad people. I therefore feel much gratitude to those who, like yourself, teach Europeans to hold our religion in respect. I thank you for the copy of your poem, "The Light of Asia," presented to me through my minister in London. I am not a sufficiently good scholar to judge English poetry, but as your work is based upon the similar source of our own information, I can read it through with very much pleasure, and I can say that your poem, "The Light of Asia," is the most eloquent defense of Buddhism that has yet appeared, and is full of beautiful poetry; but I like Book Second very much, and am very much interested in the final sermon. I have no doubt that our learned men would argue with you for hours or for years, as even I can see that some of your ideas are not quite the same as ours. But I think that in showing 'love' to have been the eminent characteristic of the Lord Buddha, and Karma, in Siamese 'Kam,' the result of the inevitable law of Diarma, the principle of existence, you have taught Buddhism; and I may thank you for having made a European Buddhist speak beautifully in the most widespread language of the world. To mark my opinion of your good feeling toward Eastern peoples, and my appreciation of your high ability and the service you have done to all Buddhists by this defense of their religion, I have much satisfaction in appointing you an officer of our most exalted Order of the White Elephant, of which you will soon hear further from Mr. D. K. Mason, my Consul-General in London.

I am yours faithfully, CHULALONKORN, King.
"TO EDWIN ARNOLD, ESQ., C. S. I., etc."

A slight girl, dressed in black, with a sad face, explained to a Rochester news-gatherer the other morning how it happened that she engaged in draw-poker on a railway train. "You see," she began, "after we left Buffalo I found that in some way I had lost my money, and what to do I didn't know. I had my ticket in another pocket, and that helped matters. Two gentlemen, in the section just ahead of me, were playing cards. It was poker. I became quite interested in the game, for you see I often play it with my brothers for corn, and they say I play it pretty well. Pretty soon I made some remark about the game, and then they asked me if I wouldn't like to 'set in.' Just for the fun of the thing, I said yes, and I never had such luck. I guess they let me win the first two or three times because I was a lady, but after that they played for what they were worth, and so did I. And you never saw the equal of the cards I held. They called me once, and all I had was three aces and two nines." "Is that a good hand?" "Well, I should say so. It was good for eight dollars that time." "How much did you win in all?" "Oh, somewhere between forty and fifty dollars; haven't counted it yet."

A present Newport craze is chicken-raising. Some of the aristocratic young lady residents, happening to attend a poultry-fair at Providence, bought a number of fancy hens and roosters, and, going home, started the fashion and the chicken-yards. Now everybody of any account is following suit. Pleasant prospects these for the season. A crowing rooster next door is a delightful acquisition to a neighbor-

A little fellow lately asked his parents to take him to church with them. They said he must wait until he was older. "Well," was the shrewd suggestion in response, 'you'd better take me now, for when I get bigger I may not want to go."

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

Réné sternly reproaches Nana for having jilted him. With no less gentleness Nana answers:

"What would you, mon ami? You know I am already engaged to Paul, Jean, Charles, Alphonse, and Henri!"

"We could crowd a little," insisted the aspirant, humbly.

The mayor of a village refuses his authorization to an itinerant quack who wishes to sell his wonderful elixir of life, warranted to cure corns, toothache, consumption, liver complaint, rheumatism, and boils, and equally available as a cement for broken crockery, an insect exterminator, and a leather preservative. His worship is afraid that the vaunted panacea may contain noxious drugs.

"Oh, there is no danger of that, your excellency," says the quack, assuringly; "nothing in it but cold water."

"I beg your pardon, then," says the mayor, signing the authorization; "I was afraid there was some fraud about it, you know."

At a restaurant:

"Take away the sauerkraut; there is a hair in it!"

"Monsieur, you astonish me. I thought I had picked them all out!"

A not uncommon trick of the enterprising sailor in foreign parts is to induce the captain to go overboard to take deep-sea soundings, and then to run the vessel into an out-of-the-way port and dispose of her and her cargo to honorable brokers making a specialty of this business.

The other day a bottle was picked up on the sea-coast in which was found the following letter:

"Schooner Virginie—Longitude west 45 degrees, latitude north 20 degrees. Fearful tempest; we have all been washed overboard, but by a fortunate chance the vessel has hidden out the storm and been driven into the port of Bahia, where she has been taken charge of by Messrs. Receladores Brothers."

Sing, hey the pirate sailors to the bar!

A lady has been compelled to leave the city for a few days, leaving her mother very sick at home.

Returning, she asks her husband anxiously: "How is my dearest ma? Is she still alive?"

"She is, darling—she has just called me a Nihilist and thrown a bowl of gruel at my head."

"Thank heaven for that! She will be spared to us!"

Pedestrian—"Ah! pardon, coachy, I stopped you without noticing that you already have a passenger."

"That doesn't matter—he is asleep, and has taken me by the hour. Get in beside him, and before he wakes up I will carry you wherever you wish."

X. is noted for a peculiarity—that of always becoming very gallant directly after dinner.

Mlle. Z. said of him:

"C'est drôle! just as soon as he is tight he begins to be loose!"

French local item:

All the world knows with what violence come at times certain souvenirs of the time passed. What of times we search uselessly to remove the images which seem to impose themselves at us in the reason of the efforts which we make to chase them!

It was in this situation of spirit that was finding himself last night, 85 Street of Flanders, Mr. L—.

Mr. L— was owing to marry himself to-day, and, in attending the day, elbowed to the window, in spite of the cold, he was thinking.

Entered in a current of ideas melancholics, Mr. L— abysed himself few to few in the reflections the most sad. He resaw himself more young, and remembered himself that in 1874 he was inhabiting 5 Street Lacépède with a little seweress, whom he had conducted to the Père-Lachaise by a morning of winter.

Few to few his souvenirs became more cleans, so well that, all of a blow, they took the astonishing precision of a reality.

In a hallucination sudden he thought he resaw at the trembling rays of the stars his jolly mistress of the Street Lacépède.

He bended himself, extended the arms, and fell by the window.

By a happiness providential, L— has been quit for a leg broken.

Madame Z. lacks confidence in her lord's veracity.

"At the skating rink all the afternoon? I don't believe it!"

"Shall I show you my bruises, ma chère?"

The mistress of a cigar shop to a young Bohemian journalist:

"This is the sixth time you have been here without saying a word about the money you owe me!"

"Ah, madame," said the clever rascal, "when one sees you they forget everything!"

Monsieur Alphonse, a venerable beau, can not make up his mind to grow old. A friend met him beaming with delight.

"What delights you so?" the friend exclaimed.

"Ah, mon cher!" responded Monsieur Alphonse, bridling, "I have just had such a delicious adventure. I have just come from Mlle. R.'s. During my visit her lover arrived. She hid me in a clothes press. I remained there more than three hours!"

The son of a politician of eminence, not possessing his father's common sense, among other vagaries goes in for spiritualism.

"Oh, I say," he says to a friend, "I have succeeded, you know, in calling up my poor, dear, dead father's spirit. Last night, after the gas had been turned down and the light had played 'Dans le doux Tantôt,' his spirit recognized me—recognized his peculiar hand."

"Ah, it boxed your ears, eh?"

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

TOMBSTONE, Arizona, March 24, 1880.

All the space that can be allowed me in the Argonaut would be altogether insufficient to describe so much of this curious land as I have seen within the last three days, or since my last letter from Tombstone. This new mining camp lies seventy-five miles from Tucson—pronounced "Took sohn"—and the road to it is up-grade, over a dry mesa land. The rivers—little streamlets they are—the Santa Cruz and the San Pedro run northward. At the place where the railroad crosses the San Pedro a town is to be built; it is to be named "Benson," after our townsman John Benson, who was of our royal party in the railroad excursion—special train. From Benson to Tombstone is twenty-four miles, easy grade for a railroad. All the way from Tucson to Benson we cross only one small rivulet. The San Pedro is at the bottom of a little crack in the parched soil, but never runs dry. The mesa is covered with a dozen varieties of cactus, and the mesquite shrub, that raises mesquite beans—good for Mexicans, Indians, and horses. It makes good firewood. Amid the mesquite, greasewood, and cactus there is good gramma grass, and this country would be a good grazing land if it had water and was not too warm. If Arizona was cool and well watered it would be a delightful land—but so would hell. It is a land of romance, a fantastic land, weird and curious—a land of perished history and lost traditions, of ruins as inexplicable if not as marvelous as those of India or Egypt. Who built the Pyramids? Who built the houses of Casa Grande, and laid the foundations of those marvelous cities of the desert? Where were the cities of which Homer wrote? where Agamemnon lived? where the Seven Cities of Cihola? What more curious, strange, or adventurous in the fabled expedition of the Argonauts in search of the Golden Fleece, than in the story of the Jesuit, Dominican, or Franciscan fathers who took their cross and hook of prayer to the wilds of this desert land, and built churches and altars, adorned with colored frescoes and gilded figures to catch the imagination of Indian tribes? What more curious than to see in this desert land the beautiful Church of San Xavier del Bac, standing alone among the grass huts of a Papago village—dome and tower and well-preserved engraved ornaments, that would not shame old Seville if set down there to-day? These were my reflections after having run all night with the boys at the new mining camp of Tombstone, after drinking more mescal than was good for me or was at all proper. But what can a fellow do eleven hundred miles from home, in a wild mining camp, where every other man is found to be an old Californian, and who claps you on the back with a resounding whack, and says: "How are you, old fellow? Come and take a drink!"—where every man is rich—in expectation—and has a valuable hole in the ground from which he is dead sure to take his pile, or sell the hole to some avaricious greeny from Boston or Philadelphia?

Tombstone is built and building upon a broad, level mesa, is approached by low foot-hills rising each a plain above the other, and is surrounded with higher hills, all bare, save of cactus, greasewood, and gramma grass; all dry, and where the water to wet the mescal, or make steam for hoisting-works, is bought by the gallon from carts. I am not a mining sharp, and was never below ground in a mine till in the "Contention," but I know the signs of a good mining camp, and they abound in the part of Arizona that I visited. I saw stalwart, hopeful men, prospectors from Huachuca, Whetstone, Santa Catarinas, Dragoon Mountains, Mule Mountain, San José, Patagonia, Santa Rita, and a host of other mining camps, all staked out within the grand quadrilateral formed by the monuments of Picache, Old Baldi, Ring Cone, and Barbera-Quivere. These prospecting miners give but one, and that a glowing, account of the mineral richness of all this country. These are men of experience, old miners from California, Nevada, Idaho, Montana, and Colorado. There are other indications to be found at Tombstone of the good time coming, in the presence of bad girls, gamblers, and saloons where drinks are furnished at two bits a glass. Mining experts from San Francisco, scientific people from Boston, all agree in the proof of large wealth in the mines of Southern Arizona. Capitalists from the East have sent their confidential and trusted agents to purchase mines. They have bought, and are buying. Mining machinery is pouring into the country, merchants are laying in large stocks of goods, Tucson is crowded with a new, eager, restless population, like that of Virginia City in the year 1860. The best, and highest, and most conclusive evidence that this is to be a reliable mining district is in the fact that the "Contention" mine exists; that the "Tough Nut" is in operation; that they are worked down some three hundred feet; that their veins are well-defined fissures with well-marked walls, varying from five to thirty-five feet in width; that the ores are taken from these mines, and are crushed and manipulated into silver bars that one may handle. Mr. White, of the "Contention" mine, was polite enough to take me down into the lower levels. Good hoisting-works, with engine, etc., etc.—mining men will understand. I went down upon the "cage" one hundred feet, and then off into the gallery upon either side; then fifty feet deeper, and again off to the galleries; and then another fifty feet, to other drifts, and stopes, and cross-cuts, and inclines, and air-shafts; and I saw what he called ores, varying, as he said, from forty to four thousand dollars per ton. Of one thing I was convinced: he was sending the unpicked average ore to his "dump," and I said to Mr. White: "This may or may not be silver ore, but I will follow it down to your mill"—ten miles away, on the San Pedro—"and if it comes out silver I shall know it." And I did. I saw it hauled away in great wagons, I saw the rock tossed to the devouring jaws of the steam monster, and saw it stamped, and pulverized, and put into pans, and churned, and concentrated, and the quick-silver washed from the amalgam, and the amalgam melted into great bricks of silver as heavy as one could lift; and I came away convinced that the "Contention" was a silver mine. I was the guest, also, of Mr. Corby, manager and part-owner of the "Tough Nut" group of mines. He has two mills—a dry and wet crusher—also on the San Pablo, and I saw his process, handled his silver bricks, saw his great bars in a Diebold fire-proof safe, and I admit that the "Tough Nut" is a silver mine, and it seems to me an inexhaustible one. The "Empire," the "Sulphuret," and other mines are putting up steam hoisting-works. The "Head Centre" is an extension in the east direction of the "Contention." The "Sunset" I heard everybody say was a mine. In a word, I am convinced that southern Arizona is a rich silver-mining country, and that the Tombstone and Patagonia districts have demonstrated the existence of great wealth. Not all the mining camps are destitute of wood and water. Many abound in forest trees, in springs and streams. Some of the higher mountains were covered with snow when we were there.

There is one peculiarity of Arizona. Everybody agrees that it is an agricultural and grazing Territory. The good lands, the flowing streams, the rich meadows, and grand old primeval forests lie just beyond you. All the places that I did not visit I was assured flowed with milk and honey. All that I did see of Arizona, from Yuma to seventy-five miles below Tucson, was a desert, uninviting, uninteresting, weird, and strange land. It is a great plain, with no continuous mountain ranges, but spattered over with hills and mountains. The railroad makes but one cut—and that a small one—from Yuma to Tucson, and you may drive in a carriage over the whole section upon a level plain; you may drive around any mountain upon level land—which my domestic half, with a simile borrowed from the kitchen, likened to a great hot griddle, upon which the chef had ladled out larger and smaller dabs of melted earth and rock, and these had dried and fried for untold ages into burned and wrinkled hills, old and bare and brown, but seamed with rich ores of gold and silver. That this is a mining land may be known by the existing evidences of a former working by early Spaniards, scattered all over the land. In the "Dragoon" range is found the evidence of Spanish workings for turquoise. Along the sides of low hills are found breasts—from twelve to fifteen feet in height, two hundred feet in length, with a depth of from sixty to eighty feet—of reddish porphyry, impregnated with iron. Specimens of turquoise are found in the debris. It was evidently worked by "gads"—wedges—and more than an hundred years ago.

The ore deposit upon the surface of the Tombstone district is a very large one, and almost everywhere that labor has been done, ore is found underlying the lime rock. How general or how deep these mineral deposits may be can only be demonstrated by labor, and by the expenditure of capital. The evidence of existing mines is greater to-day in the Tombstone district than in Virginia City at an equal period subsequent to the discovery of silver upon the Comstock. I was in Virginia in the early part of 1861. At that time the State of Nevada had no mines equaling the "Contention" or "Tough Nut," and no prospects equaling those I saw on my recent visit to the Tombstone district. I speak of none other than from personal observation, and I have no theories. But all the persons I met agreed in their estimate of the value of this new mining field—both practical and scientific men. The practical miner has great contempt for the scientific. The man from Bodie or the Black Hills, who has worked in Virginia and mined at Deadwood, knows a thing or two himself that the mining expert from Freiburg can not disturb. He has his theory upon the formation of everything from the creation down; a theory also about creation. He is learned about fissures, and how they were filled, and how the filling was vitalized with metallic wealth. He is eloquent of geological and scientific terms, sometimes doubtless misapplied. He is always confident, positive, and didactic. The person who differs from him is an ass. I was a good listener; I never differed. My modesty was taken for wisdom; my ignorance for modesty. I have no theory of my own about the mines of Tombstone, and the Argonaut is not large enough to contain all I have heard. Let the reader be duly thankful. I will venture the prophecy, however, that the country traversed by the Southern Pacific Railroad, from Casa Grande till it reaches beyond the borders of Arizona, is one of the rich spots of our continent, and is destined now and at once to attract to it a great wealth and a great population.

Below our borders and into Sonora, rich mines are found. The States of Chihuahua, Sinaloa, and Durango are rich in mines and agricultural wealth—a great and splendid empire in the possession of a people and a government that show but little enterprise in the way of development, and little knowledge in the art of ruling. And, whilst in the prophecy business, I will indulge myself in the luxury of predicting that our borders will soon be revised; that our star of empire, arrested by the Pacific, will tend southward. Already our prospector crosses the southern border, and gossip says that when he finds a mine south of the line, he lifts the monument that bounds the Gadsden purchase and sets it to suit himself. The Mexicans of the States named would rather be in the United States of America than in the United States of Mexico. The Mexican population will quarrel with the central government, the Yankee miners will take a hand, an independent State will be created—a second Texas; negotiations will follow, our Government will assume Mexican debts, pay some money, and revise the boundary by a direct line from the Gulf of Mexico at the Rio Bravo del Norte, along the twenty-sixth parallel to the Gulf of California, around the southern point of Lower California to the Pacific Ocean. This reminds me of the fact that Tucson is, or rather has been, a city of smugglers. Its principal industry has been to furnish facilities for transporting merchandise across the boundary of the two republics without paying duties. These facilities are small jackasses, or burros, led by Mexicans. They usually entered the corral of the Tucsonese merchant by moonlight, and departed at the like witching hour of night. A long experience had so demonstrated the savage hatred of the bloody Apache toward the diligent customs officer that he had ceased to be diligent, and the traffic has been practically abandoned for years. The mescal I drank came in duty-free, and I am conscious of having smoked unstamped cigars. The climate is still unfriendly to internal revenue officers, and those we have are so utterly demoralized that they only collect enough revenue to pay their own salaries. And speaking of Apaches, I learned an important fact, if true. A most excellent gentleman, who has lived long in the country, told me in the presence of several other excellent gentlemen that the renowned Indian warrior, General Crook, never killed an Apache in his life, never fought one, and never saw a hostile while he was in Arizona.

"But this can not be," I replied, "for we gave him a banquet in San Francisco for his prowess as an Indian warrior of great renown."

"Yes," was the answer, "and all Arizona laughed a loud laugh, and the Indian ring laughed loudest."

"And are there such things as Apaches?" I asked. "Did Cochise live? Are the stories of Colonel Cremony all the coinage of his fanciful imagination?"

"Well, there is and was a ragged tribe of horse-stealing bandits, sneaking, cowardly, red cut-throats, who would lie in ambush to murder defenseless women and unarmed men, whom the yellow-covered literature of the Indian ring styled the 'bloody Apaches,' and out of whom this ring of politicians made money by contracts. There never was an Indian war in the Territory. There never was a time when one hundred brave and earnest men could not have driven Cochise and his band out of existence. It is the old story of the Seminole war and Billy Bowlegs over again. It has been a long continuous history of plundering contractors keeping the war alive for the purpose of fat jobs; a history most disgraceful to the Indian ring, and not at all creditable to those gentlemen of the army who have had the expenditure of more millions of money than they have taken lives of fighting Indians in battle."

Another Apache chief, one Victorio, with about thirty bloody thieves—using bloody in the English sense—are on the predatory path. There are seven hundred soldiers in the Territory, and if the "army" can not beat this brigand then the army had better disband. We shall, however, hear of the enlistment of scouts, a few bloodless marches, and innumerable army contracts. This being the case, I suggest that Victorio and his band be invited to spend the summer at the Palace Hotel in San Francisco, as the most economical mode of terminating this Indian war. The railroad is in length, from San Francisco to Tucson, nine hundred and seventy-eight miles. The graders are at work thirty miles beyond. Iron and ties are being pushed to the front most energetically. Fifty additional miles will be completed by the first of June. P.

A Waif from the Society World.

MY DEAR —:—The penitential season has at last come to a close, and everybody is on the qui vive in expectation of the fulfillment of several engagements of marriage that are believed to exist. I am sure a wedding just now would give me double pleasure—first, to see the happiness of others; and then to know that the time-honored institution of marriage has not been entirely abandoned by those in our midst; for in spite of the Sand-lot, and some other abominations that might be mentioned, San Francisco for the past winter has certainly in one respect been emulating a state of affairs that we are told will exist in heaven, where "there will be neither marrying nor giving in marriage." Upon Wednesday evening last, I was one of the favored few present at the wedding of Miss McDougal and Mr. Le Breton. At nine o'clock the bridal party appeared, Miss Gordon and Mr. Edward Le Breton acting as bridesmaid and best man. I must be pardoned if, as a spinster, I felt a secret satisfaction in witnessing the retirement of the most fascinating of San Francisco belles. There is one time in a woman's life when she is the cynosure of all eyes, and those who were present on Wednesday evening were fortunate in seeing a bride whose lovely face was in accord with her chaste and exquisite costume. I know you will be pleased to read a description of the bridal dress. It was of the richest gros grain, cut en princesse, and castellated round the bottom, with plisses of satin beneath. The front was of satin, richly embroidered in chenille and pearls. Of course, there was the traditional wreath of orange blossoms, from which floated a cloud of tulle. The other important personage looked becomingly proud and happy. The air was heavy with the perfume of orange blossoms, and the bride was posée under a porte-bonheur, instead of the old-time marriage bell. The flowers were many and beautiful, indeed, and made one forget for the time being our backward spring. The call to the wedding feast, even in the midst of romance and flowers, was joyfully hailed, and I had the solid comfort of enjoying a plate of terrapin—sent all the way from Washington by a thoughtful friend—which, however, was only the beginning of a delicious menu. I know you will be curious to know who were the wedding guests—who I assure you were not gathered from the "highways and hedges," but were the chosen friends of the bride and groom. The entire families of the happy pair were present, for, spite of my absorption in the bride, I managed to notice a few of the guests for your sake: First, the charming Count and Countess de Tocqueville were equally interesting in their native tongue, to which she added the double pleasure of speaking English with a melodious accent. Though the sweetest of languages may be that in which she "murmured je l'aime!" for a good, comfortable gossip give me my own vernacular. I also saw Mrs. Gordon, Judge and Mrs. McKinstry, Mrs. Stewart, Mr. and Mrs. Hooker, Mrs. and Miss Fall, Mrs. and Miss Hamilton, Commodore and Mrs. Phelps and daughters, and many other representatives of the navy, Mr. and Mrs. Colgate Baker, and Mr. and Mrs. Reis. The heaux were Mr. La Fôret, Dr. Shorb, Mr. Maye, Mr. Dewey, Mr. Kenny, Mr. Gordon, and Major Hammond. Mrs. Jewett had a musical Tuesday evening—about sixty present; it was the last of a pleasant series which she has given through the winter. She shortly breaks up housekeeping to return to the hotel. On Wednesday, General and Mrs. McDowell gave a brilliant luncheon, followed by a large reception to the recently arrived officers of the army. I hear there are to be several "germans;" when they come off I will not fail to write to you of them. Until then, adieu! Yours affectionately, ADA VEN.

CXXIII.—Sunday, April 4.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Asparagus Soup.
Boiled Salmon—Anchovy Sauce.
Pigeon Pie.
Green Peas. Baked Tomatoes.
Roast Beef. New Potatoes.
Oyster Salad. Charlotte Russe.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Oranges, and Bananas.

TO MAKE OYSTER SALAD.—Take fifty oysters; scald them in their liquor; let them remain until cold; drain and chop slightly; add some finely chopped celery. Dress with a rich mayonnaise dressing. Surround your dish with lettuce leaves; put the oysters, celery, and dressing in the centre, and serve. Can oysters may be used instead of fresh ones.

A recent discovery is a telephone talked to death by a barber.

THE PLEA OF A COUNTERFEITER.

Before an Elective U. S. Judge of the Future.

May it please your Honor, I deem it most fortunate that, having the bad luck to be indicted for the crime—legally so called—of making and uttering counterfeit money, I am arraigned before this honorable court instead of another. Elected to the Bench by the votes of a Greenback constituency, and wisely favoring a fiat currency, your Honor is in a position to apprehend the weight and bearing of the arguments which I am about to adduce in my own defense without other counsel. Let me rather say that you, better than any of your judicial brethren, will understand the cogency of the considerations that it is my great privilege to submit in mitigation of the sentence which my plea of guilty compels you to pronounce. Some punishment I know I must suffer, but I should have been but little worthy of the financial principles which you and I have equally at heart if I had not preferred a few years in the penitentiary to the loss of your Honor's esteem, which I would justly have forfeited in proving, or attempting to prove, that as a citizen of this great country I had neglected to perform that clearest and most important of a citizen's duties, the making and uttering of counterfeit money.

Let me, then, in the first place, remind your Honor that the business and industries of this country are suffering severely from contraction of the currency, as appears from the resolutions of the convention by whose votes you were nominated for the office which you dignify by your virtues and ennoble by your wisdom. Contraction, may it please you, is a great evil: it hampers commerce, places fetters upon labor, and compels "enterprises of great pith and moment" to await a more favorable season for developing the resources of the country, and bringing plenty into the homes of the poor. Observe, now, that while the Secretary of the Treasury, in slavish subservency to the iniquitous demands of bankers and money-changers, has been steadily reducing the volume of the country's currency by every device known to the so-called science of finance, I, without expense to the people, by making and throwing into the channels of trade the closest possible imitations of the Government notes to take the place of those wickedly called in and destroyed, have done what in me lay to avert and mitigate the mischief of contraction. Indeed, had my efforts not been hampered by the necessity of a secrecy imposed by the prejudices of the "gold bugs," and finally stopped by the police, I should probably have more than counteracted Mr. Sherman's designs, securing to the country and people the blessings of steady and unrestricted expansion.

As to the intrinsic value of the money issued by me, I submit it is not appreciably less than that which it was designed to replace. The paper is as nearly of the same quality as I could procure from my accom—my noble and unselfish collaborators in the East; the engraving is not notably inferior to that done for the Government at great expense by the American Bank Note Company, or whoever has secured the lucrative contract on the usual swindling terms—for there is much dishonesty in this world, may it please the court. The signatures on my money are absolute fac similes—signatures that are good for millions, not only at the Treasury of the United States, but at any private bank in the land. Considering the difficulties under which a false though diminishing public sentiment has compelled me to work, I am justly proud of my workmanship, which, as your Honor is well aware from admissions of the prosecuting attorney, possessed such merits as rendered it indistinguishable by nearly all from the so-called "genuine" issue. And here I may be permitted to explain, that of the many thousands who have used my money no one had lost a cent by it until my arrest had drawn attention to differences minute and unimportant in themselves and vital only by force and virtue of these proceedings. Even then it was only the last holders of my work who suffered loss. Faith, as it often happens—as it happened in the instance of the Government currency itself—was salvation, but doubt was damnation. Surely, money which in this respect stands on the same footing as greenbacks and the holy word of God can not be altogether false.

None better than your Honor knows the mischiefs resulting from the Government policy of redemption. Your own eloquent and convincing remarks on the subject, in accepting your nomination, are doubtless fresh in your mind, and I allude to them now only to remark that it was their learning, wisdom, and logic that first suggested to me the duty of engaging in the business which the verdict of the Republicans and Democrats of the jury have compelled you temporarily—and I venture to think reluctantly—to suspend. Contraction of the currency is in itself bad enough, but it is worse when the method adopted is redemption. If the greenbacks could be replaced by irredeemable and non-interest-bearing bonds, suitable for large transactions and heavy investments, the mischief, though great—as affecting the poor and honest—would not be intolerable; but when in retiring the paper the Secretary of the Treasury issues coin instead, no one can compute the magnitude of the evil. I need not rehearse the disadvantages, the iniquities, the crimes of gold coin; these have been sufficiently pointed out, and their dismal effect sufficiently described, by Senator Jones and the advocates generally of the recent remonetization of silver. Nor is it necessary for me to enlarge upon the social, political, and moral disasters that lurk in the substance and essence of silver; the mono-metallist enemies of the dollar of our fathers have apprised us of the peril, though unable to save us.

Now, my money was not only not subject to contraction, so long as I was free to control its issue, but it is absolutely irredeemable. After what I have already said with reference to my skill in imitation, I will not claim the credit of having thoughtfully and wittingly given the product of my presses this substantial merit. It is irredeemable, not because of my skill, but in spite of it. The minute differences heretofore spoken of, which, though unnoticed by the public, would cause its rejection at the United States Treasury (where, however, but for the policy of the Secretary, none of it would ever be presented), my utmost efforts were unable to reconcile. What I could not perfectly do another could not, and in this respect the actual superiority of counterfeit currency over "genuine" is manifest. The latter, even though declared by law irredeemable, may by a subsequent law be declared redeemable; against the holders of the former the business interests of the country are absolutely safe. It can never be retired, but must remain forever in circulation, blessing both him that gives and him that receives, a permanent addition to the wealth of the world, an eternal factor of expansion in the happiness of mankind. In the manufacture and disposal of counterfeit paper money I seem to behold the greatest and noblest industry of the near future—an industry in which beneficence is the condition of success—in which no one, not even the most selfish and disloyal of men, can enrich himself without at the same time enriching equally and permanently his country.

May it please your Honor, by virtue of every argument favoring the unlimited issue of redeemable, or the limited issue of irredeemable, currency by Government, I confidently claim at your Honor's hands the lightest sentence that a wicked and barbarous law permits you to impose.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 31, 1880.

B.

Capital Notes.

SACRAMENTO, March 30, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—Nothing on a very "swell" scale has happened these two weeks—only nice little quiet affairs, you know, very appropriate and becoming to the Lenten season—nothing where they dance, or get very hilarious, or assemble in very great numbers; just "our set," who can't live even during Lent without meeting a few of our "dear five hundred." Children are not supposed to observe Lent so strictly as their religious mammas, so Mrs. Gallatin invited a number of these miniature fashion-plates—these charming, self-possessed little creatures, called "children" to be sure—to her elegant home, on Sixteenth and H Streets, last Friday night. She is quite noted for her success in giving these children's parties, and has three lovely little ones of her own.

Tuesday of last week, Mrs. Horatio Hurd had a few friends at her home, in honor of Miss Carrie Crocker, of San Francisco, who is visiting her. The same evening a musical concert was given in the Congregational Church. The leading singer was Miss Annis Montague.

On Monday evening some of Captain Sheehan's friends surprised him at his house, and made their surprise more real in the shape of a very elegant silver tea-set. Last Thursday, one of the school ma'ams—Nellie Shepherd—took for better or for worse a Post-man, a deputy clerk in the State capitol. Her "flock" will now be less numerous than before, but, we presume, perhaps just as apt to "stray" as when she was Shepherd of fifty sheep instead of one. At Mrs. John Carroll's, on Thursday night, thirty or forty candy-loving people assembled, and varied the usual routine of dancing and small talk by candy-making. The Sacramento papers tell us that Charles Houghton, one of the firm of W. A. & C. S. Houghton, booksellers, was married in Waltham, Massachusetts, on the 18th ultimo, to Miss Florence Fiske. He went East some weeks ago for his bonny bride; and now people are wondering why none of the Sacramento girls were witty and wealthy enough for this connoisseur Charles, that he should go clear across the continent to find a bride.

Last night some of the young men gave a party in Turner's Hall, in honor of some of the University boys. Lawd Dundweawy and his "dwawl" are here, also, this week; and that miserable, disgraceful little theatre is crowded. There was such a talk about having a new theatre, and people began to prick up their ears and look happy all over; and now, by appearances, the scheme has fallen through. Legislators will have to stay in Sacramento a few weeks longer than the usual allotted time. Bills are so many and long they can't begin to finish by April-fool's day. Weather is lovely, and "spring's ethereal mildness" has come; and that's all we know about Sacramento's "culchaw."

BETSY AND I.

Mr. Skerrett, the only Republican on the Sand-lot ticket, was beaten, by Mr. Kohler, 8,594 votes. Skerrett got the lowest vote on the ticket, and it served him right for being caught in bad company. If Judge Hastings was sober when he accepted his nomination, he ought to be ashamed of himself. The most respectable person on the Sand-lot programme was, in our opinion, Mr. Broderick. He would have been a valuable person in forming a charter, for he is both intelligent and honest. A bad case of poor Tray. We are glad he was defeated.

"McClellan's Last Service to the Republic" is the leading and most important article in the North American Review for April. This paper is meant as a vindication of McClellan against the charges of over-caution and laggard generalship in the campaign preceding Antietam. George Ticknor Curtis is the author of the paper, and will continue his effort at reputation-mending in the number for May. Mr. Parnell contributes a paper on the "Irish Land Question." Ex-Secretary Boutwell writes about "Grant and a Third Term"; and the other papers are fully up to the magazine's average of excellence.

Mr. George Augustus Sala will undoubtedly write a book upon America. He was in the country some six weeks or more, one of which he spent in California. His letters are exceedingly breezy, flippant, and ridiculous, and yet this man has a European reputation as a writer. A journalist is without honor except in his own country. Mr. George Augustus Sala appears to us to be very light timber and season-cracked.

A Tennessee man accidentally shot a dog, and in trying to explain to the owner how it occurred, accidentally shot him. A coroner thought he ought to explain how he shot the man, but couldn't get a jury that was willing to listen to the explanation; they were kind of shy of him, as it were.

Owing to the pressure of other business engagements, Mr. F. M. Somers has disposed of his interest in The Californian, and with the April number retires from the editorial control and management. The magazine will still be issued by the A. Roman Publishing Company.

WHAT THE WOMEN ARE DOING.

While playing "Juliet" recently, Miss Mary Anderson was seen chewing something. Some think it was gum; others are of the opinion that it was a piece of the scenery; while still others believe it was a part of "Romeo's" left ear.

Mary A. Northrup, in Rochester, to avenge herself on her neighbor, John Morton, built a tight board fence ten feet high, but entirely on her own land. She was awakened by a great racket one morning, and found the fence being demolished by Morton. Her son went for her lawyer, and testifies that when he returned he found the fence down and his mother under it.

The game of "sixteen" is played at the front gate with one foot on the bottom and both arms across the top, while she stands on the other side and winds a bit of blue ribbon around her fore-finger and heaps up a little pile of gravel with her foot.

The fall of a ballet dancer on the stage of a theatre is described as follows in the Boston Herald: "She came capering down, pointing one foot to six o'clock and the other to high noon, when of a sudden both feet flew up at once, and she sat down with what the reporter of a banging would call a 'dull thud.' There was the customary idiotic smile on her face when the mishap occurred, and it remained there for a few seconds through force of habit; but gradually it was displaced by an expression of deep, deep disgust, and her lips moved, while the people wondered what she was saying."

A girl who went down three stories with a falling elevator says that the sensation was like that of being hugged. Fathers, watch your elevators.

A woman disappeared from Reading, Pa., leaving the following note behind her: "My Dear Husband:—I left in peace and joy. My body will be found by some one. Show this to mother, and give my love and a kiss to all. The lost shall be found and the dead rise. I will meet you all again. I had to do this; but, dear Lew, I had no ill-feeling against you." Dear Lew was greatly grieved until he found out that his wife was alive and well with another man in Philadelphia.

"Two sisters of Glasgow got mad at a plumber, and threw him out of a fifth-story window." But he got even with the sisters. He charged them double time from the minute he left the window until he struck the sidewalk.

Miss Jennie Horn was just going to "run across the way," and so stepped out bareheaded and with an apron on. But instead of going across the way, Miss Horn slipped round to the Moravian church, which she entered by the back door. Her lover, William Collier, and Rev. Mr. Clewell were there before her. The knot was soon tied. Mrs. Jennie flew back home, with a blush chasing its shadow among her dimples, and baked the bread for dinner. This was in the town of Uhrichsville, O., where on the afternoon of the same day Henry Horn, the bride's brother, chased both bridegroom and preacher down the main street with a shotgun. Mr. and Mrs. Collier left that afternoon on a bridal trip, Mrs. C. still being bareheaded.

A Cleveland lawyer, defending a handsome young lady charged with larceny, closed his appeal to the jury thus: "Gentlemen! you may hang the ocean on a grapevine to dry, lasso an avalanche, pin a napkin to the mouth of a volcano, skim the clouds of the sky with a teaspoon, throw salt on the tail of our noble American eagle, whose sleepless eye watches over the welfare of the nation, paste 'For Rent' on the moon and stars; but never for a moment delude yourself with the idea that this charming girl is guilty of the charge preferred against her." The jury acquitted her without leaving their seats.

A young New Yorker was introduced to a Boston girl, and before they were acquainted thirty minutes she got so spoony that she had called him an asterolepis, a Silurian placoid, and a cartilaginous vertebrate. He returned to New York by the midnight train.

A Maryland schoolmaster told a refractory girl that unless she wrote a composition he would punish her. She appeared with two big brothers. The pedagogue laid a revolver on the desk and called for the screed. It took her about ten minutes to indite the sentiment: "There are various kinds of big brothers. Sum would stand up for a sister under any circumstances; but there are sum lily-livered, slat-sided mungrels, who air a cross between a Gibrawlter jackass and a Maltese Jew, who would sit around like a rat-hole while a red-headed, cock-eyed slab of unrespectful poverty wanders around with a borrowed pop, and makes their poor sister paw around fur the materials fur a composition."

Miss Roseberry wanted to marry Mr. Deputy, at Seymour, Ind., but her father commanded her to marry Mr. Bowers, and appointed a day for the wedding. On the evening before, she secretly became Mrs. Deputy. She was on hand for the other ceremony, however, and it proceeded smoothly as far as the question whether anybody objected, when Mr. Deputy remarked that he had an objection—a trifling one, which he felt some reluctance about mentioning—the lady was his wife.

The Boston girls are rushing into violinity in a way that is terribly suggestive of the horrors which unborn generations are to sup upon. At one of the evening fiddling schools, the "professor" asked one of the misses rather abruptly: "Where is your bow, Miss Rosinwell?" "Oh," she said, abstractedly, "he's waiting for me outside, I guess." And then every drop of blood rushed into her face, and when she began to practice, her violin gave vent to cries as of one undergoing a violent colic.

An Ohio woman dreamed that she saw her husband kissing a certain neighbor's wife, and she awoke and kissed him across the face and broke his nose.

AT THE OPERA.

Every seat in the house was filled—
Sonnambula, and a gala night,
 Without, the frost-laden breezes chilled—
 Within, all warm and bright.

And I sat close to the stage alone;
 My place was good—I had had my choice;
 So I sat and drank in every tone
 Of the rich soprano voice.

There was loud applause and frequent applause,
 And I applauded—my heart was light;
 And I little thought that a musical pause
 Should alter my fate that night.

But I looked across as the music ceased,
 Across the crowds and the beauty rife,
 And, thrown in her box like a queen at a feast,
 I met the eyes of my wife.

And I felt at that moment I loved her still.
 She was pensive, but very fair to see,
 And I could not credit the whispers of ill
 That had sundered her and me.

Was it too late to undo the past,
 To lay forever the ghost Renorse?
 Had not the judges pronounced too fast
 The ominous word Divorce?

She was fair and petted and very young,
 And wrong must ever come from the heart;
 Her heart was mine; it was I was wrong
 When I said: "It is best we part."

I turned again as the music swelled;
 The stage was dim with mysterious light,
 And the feeble candle "Amina" held
 Was the brightest spot in sight.

And the light in my heart was burning low,
 And life seemed utterly void and blank—
 The house scarce breathed a moment or so
 As she stepped on the trembling plank.

'Twas a gruesome chasm to cross, I ween,
 In her robe de nuit and disheveled locks;
 But nothing to that which stretched between
 Me and that distant box.

But I turned and looked as I framed the thought—
 Who says an impulse is never wise?
 For, looking out of that box, I caught
 My wife's soft, violet eyes.

I can not tell what her glances said,
 I can not tell what my own replied,
 But that moment spun a gossamer thread
 Whereon I crossed to her side.

The fair "Sonnambula" on her plank
 Has doubtless crossed, but I can not see;
 For the wild applause spread from rank to rank,
 And it all seems meant for me.

For have I not crossed on a frail plank—
 The gossamer bridge of a mutual glance—
 And now my life is no longer blank,
 And the future seems all romance.

I have crossed and reached her, my own, my wife,
 And the air still peals with the wild "Brava!"
 But the favorite opera of my life
 Will be La Sonnambula.

G. H. JESSOP.

THE FRAGMENT OF A LETTER.

Found in the Rue de Rivoli.

FROM THE FRENCH OF ALPHONSE DAUDET.

—what it has cost me to have married an artist! Ah, my dear, if I had only known! But young girls have such strange ideas about matters in general. Now at the Exposition, when I used to see the artists' addresses upon the picture cards—far off in quiet streets at the extreme corners of Paris—I would conjure up visions of peaceful, happy lives, and of husbands always at home. I knew that I was of a jealous disposition, and I said to myself: "Now, that's the kind of a husband I would like. He would be home all day—at work on his statue or his painting—and I at his side, reading or sewing, drinking in his words. And then the tranquil atmosphere of the studio!" Poor innocent that I was! Little did I know what a studio was, or of its singular visitors. Never had I dreamed, in gazing upon those marble goddesses so lightly clad, that there were women hold enough to — And that even I — Well, well, you must know that bad I not so thought, I should never have married a sculptor. No, indeed!

And then all the family were opposed to it. He was wealthy, young, famous. Yet all were against it, except myself. But then he was such a charming fellow. It is true, he used to concern himself almost too much about my dress, my hair: "Wear it a little higher—so," and he would toy with my curls, and place a flower in their midst with the coolness of a hair-dresser. So much experience—and unmarried, too—it was alarming, was it not? I should have been warned. But you shall see.

Well, we returned from our wedding journey, and installed ourselves in the delightful house he had prepared for me—"the cage for his bird," as he said. My husband's studio was immediately adjoining our house, and upon our return he plunged into his interrupted work. Every evening he spoke to me with enthusiasm of the approaching completion of his statue. It represented "A Roman Lady Emerging from the Bath." He was striving, he said, to give to the skin that delicate little shiver which it has upon encountering the cold air, the close clinging of the wet drapery upon the rounded shoulders—and—oh, all sorts of fine things that I don't remember. Between you and me, my dear, when he talks to me of his art, I do not understand quite so well as I might. But no matter—I always said, "Oh, it will be splendid!" and in imagination I saw myself standing before the completed work in the gallery, while the throng behind me murmured, "Look! It's the sculptor's wife."

At last, one day, being curious to see how our Roman lady was getting along, I determined to surprise him in his studio, which I had not yet entered. I found the door unlatched, and walked in without knocking. Judge of my amazement, my horror, at the scene before me. There was my husband, with a dirty blouse like a stone-mason's, his hair every which way, his hands covered with clay, and standing before him — Yes, my dear, a creature with almost nothing —

And on a chair lay the creature's clothes—an ugly dress, a hat with a bedraggled feather, shabby boots, and—so forth. All this flashed upon me in a second, for you may imagine how I darted out. Etienne tried to detain me, but, with a look of horror, I fled from him; and I never stopped, I promise you, until I reached my mother's house.

"Ah, my poor child! There, there—don't cry! Tell mother what is the matter."

And so I told mamma all about how I had gone to the studio, and about the awful woman, and how she had nothing on. And oh, how I cried!

Mamma was much moved, and did all she could to console me. She said it was probably a model.

"A model? But oh, mamma, it is perfectly awful! He never said anything about models before we were married."

At this moment Etienne arrived, breathless. He also tried to make me understand that a model is not like other women, and that they are indispensable to sculptors. But I was inflexible. I informed him that I would have nothing to do with a husband who passed entire days with creatures in such a costume—or rather, in such a lack of it.

"Well, well, my dear children," said poor mamma, striving to bring peace to our convulsed household, "let us see if we can not make some arrangement. Could you not contrive to work with a pasteboard woman—a mannikin, or something of the kind, that would satisfy your wife?"

My husband gnawed his moustache—"Impossible, my dear mother, impossible!"

"But, my dear Etienne, it seems to me that—milliners, you know, have imitation heads for bonnets. Now, if that will do for the head, why not for the—"

Apparently, however, it would not do. At least, so Etienne assured us, at great length, with an infinitude of technical terms. He certainly seemed most unhappy. I glanced at him slyly, now and then, in wiping my eyes, and I saw plainly that he was almost as miserable as I.

Finally, after an interminable discussion, it was agreed that, the model being indispensable, I should be there whenever she was. There was a little apartment adjoining the studio, whence I could see without being seen. (I know what you are saying now, my dear—that I should be ashamed of myself for being jealous of such creatures, and more ashamed to show it. But wait until you are married, my dear, and above all, until you are married to an artist.)

The following day the model was to come. I plucked up courage, and installed myself in my little apartment. Before doing so, however, I stipulated that when I rapped, were it ever so gently, my husband should hasten to me. Scarcely had the door closed upon me when the model arrived. How poor, how dreadfully poor she looked! I could not help wondering at my foolish jealousy of a woman who wore an old, green-fringed shawl, and showed no trace of white at wrist or throat. But, my dear, when I saw the creature cast aside shawl and dress in the centre of the studio, and continue to disrobe with such an utter lack of modesty, I could not restrain myself. I was stifling with anger. I rapped on the door. Etienne found me pale and trembling. He made sport of my fears, gently chided me, and returned to his work. The woman was now upright and posing, almost nude, her long hair coiled upon her back and shoulders with a certain massive grace. She was no longer commonplace—she was almost a statue. My heart sank, but I said nothing. Suddenly my husband cried:

"The right leg—advance the right leg!"

And, as the model did not seem to understand him, he approached her, and—oh, I could hear it no longer! I rapped. He did not hear. I rapped again, almost furiously. This time he did hear, and hastened to my side, hut with a frown upon his brow.

"Come, come, Armande," he said, somewhat brusquely, "don't be so unreasonable!"

"Oh, Etienne," I replied, through my tears, "it is too much for me—I can not bear it!"

He left me without replying, and passing into the studio, bade the awful woman dress herself and leave.

For several days Etienne did not go to his studio. He remained with me and did not go out, refusing even to see his friends; all the while kind, though seemingly sad. One day I said to him, very timidly:

"You do not work any more."

He replied, somewhat coolly:

"It is impossible to work without a model."

However, by many little attentions and a good deal of coaxing, I made him promise to return to his studio, and set himself to work to finish the statue by—(what shall I call it?)—well, either from imagination, or by mamma's method. As for myself, I thought the plan quite easy enough, but he, poor fellow, took an entirely different view of it. Every evening he came home irritable, discouraged, almost sick. In order to cheer him up I frequently went to see him, and would invariably say to him: "Why, it's charming!" or something to that effect. But I could see at a glance that the statue made little progress. In fact, I doubt whether he worked at all, as I usually found him stretched upon the sofa, smoking, or rolling bits of clay into balls, and spitefully hurling them against the wall.

One afternoon I was there, looking at the poor Roman lady, only half completed, so long in emerging from her bath, when a foolish whim suddenly seized me. The statue was of about my size; perhaps I could—

"Etienne, what do you sculptors call a—a—well, a hand-some—er—limb?"

He went on to tell me at some length, showing me what his statue still lacked, and that he could not supply the deficiency without the aid of a model.

Poor fellow! He said this with such a disconsolate air! What do you think I did? Well, I'll tell you. I quickly gathered up the drapery, which was lying in one corner, and went softly into my little apartment, without saying a word, while he was still looking at the statue. I got upon the platform in front of him, in the same costume and pose as that dreadful model. Oh, my dear, imagine Etienne's emotion when he lifted his head and saw me! I felt like laughing and crying at the same time. Why, I was just as red! And then that horrid old drapery would keep falling in every direction! Well, never mind. Etienne was delighted; his eyes sparkled with enthusiasm, and I was quickly at my ease. Just fancy, my dear; to listen to his ravings one would think—

N. P. FOSTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1880.

SCIENTIFIC TRUTHS.

As Told by Alden in the New York "Times."

Professor Macgregor tells us that his attention was attracted to the use of girls for scientific purposes by overhearing a young lady remark that her "bang would not keep crimped in damp weather." Upon this hint he immediately began a series of experiments, stretching over a period of eleven months and involving the use of three hundred and seven girls. He began by taking a red-haired girl with a luxuriant bang, which he caused to be crimped with great care, on an evening when the atmosphere was particularly dry. The next morning the bang presented a beautifully "trizzed" appearance; but as toward afternoon the air grew perceptibly foggy, the professor expected that the bang would lose its crimpidity—to use a scientific term. It did nothing of the kind, and, so far as he could see, the state of the atmosphere had no effect upon it. Instead of being discouraged by this failure, Professor Macgregor persevered. It occurred to him that the color of the hair might be an important factor, and that red hair might maintain its crimpidity in circumstances where other hair would lose that quality. He therefore ordered from a charity school three dozen orphaned girls, of from twelve to sixteen years of age, and of assorted colors in point of hair. Twelve of these were black-haired, twelve were brown-haired, and twelve were red-haired. All of these girls wore bangs, and were in every way well adapted for scientific investigations. By a long series of careful experiments he proved that on the approach of wet weather the bangs of the brown-haired girls, without exception, became limp and straight; that a like effect was produced upon the bangs of ten of the twelve black-haired girls, while the red-haired girls were not a particle influenced either by the humidity or the dryness of the atmosphere. Further experiments upon ladies of every age, from sixteen to forty-five, gave like results, and the conclusion that the bang of a brown-haired girl is an infallible indicator of the approach of wet or dry weather may be unhesitatingly accepted. The professor also discovered that red-haired girls show a peculiar susceptibility to electricity. When a thunder-storm is brewing, their bangs become stiff and bristling, and in three instances, when the professor tried to smooth down a bristling bang, he received a violent shock in the region of the ear. He is not as yet prepared to say that the presence of an unusual amount of electricity in the air can always be detected by the use of red-haired girls, but he is strongly inclined to think that further investigation will prove that such is the fact. In view of this important discovery, Professor Macgregor recommends that brown-haired girls shall be substituted on board all vessels, whether naval or mercantile, for the present untrustworthy barometer. He points out that in the merchant service, where a stewardess is at present carried, she should be required to be a brown-haired woman, with a bang, and that any neglect on her part to crimp her bang every night while at sea should be punished as a misdemeanor. In the navy, peculiarly sensitive brown-haired girls should be employed, and the professor suggests that they should be kept in glass cases, open, of course, at the top, so that they would run no risk of being injured. The first cost of a girl is, of course, more than that of a barometer, and it is expensive to keep her in order, but this is of no consequence compared with her value as a weather indicator.

Everybody knows, by reputation, Mr. Kellner, of St. Louis, the eminent dyer. Long ago he conceived a most violent prejudice against Mr. Walker, a really unobjectionable young man, and forbade him ever to cross his threshold. This prohibition was a painful thing to Mr. Walker. He had been for some months a warm admirer of Miss Kellner, and had been accustomed to spend three evenings a week in her society. Knowing the inexorable character of the indignant dyer, he foresaw that he must either abandon the young lady or resort to strategy and deception. He greatly disliked to deceive even an unreasonable father, but he yielded to necessity and the imperious nature of his passion. In accordance with a system of clandestine interviews, under cover of darkness, in the back-yard, Mr. Walker met the dyer's daughter three weeks ago, at about nine o'clock in the evening. The latter had secretly issued from the back-door, and her lover was awaiting her under the shadow of the projecting eaves of the wash-house. A large tub and a long plank happened to be conveniently at hand, and placing the plank across the tub, the youthful pair sat down to sweet converse. The plank was a half-inch one, and seemed sufficiently strong to bear the weight of two persons, with a large margin of safety. When, however, the weight of Mr. Walker and Miss Kellner was concentrated on the center of the plank it bent and broke, and Mr. Walker was plunged, head and shoulders, in the tub. With great presence of mind he kept the young lady's head out of danger, but he could not prevent her from assuming a sitting position, with her lap partially submerged. The lady fled into the house and Mr. Walker climbed the fence, the charge from old Mr. Kellner's shot-gun happily failing to hit him. He went home, and as soon as he had lit the gas he was horrified to find that his face, hair, neck, and hands were dyed a deep and brilliant blue. When he realized the fact that he had fallen in a tub full of Mr. Kellner's "Indestructible Ultramarine Blue," he fell back upon a chair, feeling that he was a ruined man. Of course he tried every means to wash away the stains, but soap and water were in vain. He remembered Mr. Kellner's boast that his dyes could not be washed out, and he gave up the attempt. He sought out a faithful friend who was familiar with water-colors, and implored his aid. The friend could give him no hope. He did, indeed, offer to cover Mr. Walker's face with a film of transparent yellow, which would have the effect of changing his tint from blue to a deep and beautiful green, but this handsome offer was declined. So, too, Mr. Walker refused to call on Mr. Kellner, and ask him for some chemical which would remove the blue. To do this would have been to implicate Miss Kellner in an indiscreet though innocent act. Mr. Walker preferred to go to a blue and lonely grave rather than to incur the slightest risk of injuring the reputation of his adored one. Physicians are divided in opinion as to whether Mr. Walker will fade in course of years. So far, his color is preëminently fast, and neither water, sunlight, nor sulphurous acid has the slightest effect upon it.

HOW UNCLE TOM RAN AWAY.

"When your Uncle Tom and I were children," began I, slowly, "we were ever such good friends; and although I am eight years older than he, we were always together. My pleasure was never real unless Tom shared it, too."

"But Tom's temper sometimes got the better of him, and when provoked—but wait a little, and you shall see what happened to your big Uncle Tom."

"One afternoon—a cold, cheerless, rainy one, like this, dear—I sat looking out of the window at a poor little meadow-lark that stood shivering and wet on the edge of the porch. I soon called Tom to look, too, but when I turned to see if he was coming, not knowing he was so near me, I accidentally struck him in the face with my elbow."

"Horrid, awkward thing," growled Tom; and I received a blow from his strong little fist which, I am sorry to say, was not accidental. Mother had just come in, and she saw the whole scene. She made Tom sit alone on a sofa, away from the window and the bird, till he should grow good-natured again. But Tom was not to be soothed."

"Horrid, awkward old thing!" he muttered again, between his teeth. "I just won't stay in the house with such a girl! I'll run away, so I will. I'll run away to-night," he added in a louder voice, intending to attract my attention."

"What's that?" said mother. "Run away from home?" "Yes, and I'm going now, if Jen don't say she's sorry." "Very well," said mother, looking at me, and seeing no signs of repentance in my face; "you know I allow no one in my house to tell a lie, so I suppose I must say good-bye to you, Tom."

"Up-stairs to his room directly overhead went the angry boy. We heard him shake his long-saved pennies out of his tin bank, heard him pull out bureau drawers, and then all was still, till Master Tom, flushed, angry, yet calm, tramped down the stairs. He said 'good-bye' to all the family except me, and started out in the rain and wind."

"I shall never forget how forlorn the little fellow looked as he walked down the path from the house to the barn. An immense umbrella, old and torn, he tried to hold over him with one hand, while in the other he held a bundle, containing his best suit of clothes, clean shirt, and his pennies. No overcoat had he, no rubbers, and only an old straw hat which he had pulled down over his eyes."

"Bang! went the front door after him. Oo-oo! roared the wind as it followed him! Splash! came down the rain through his torn, worn umbrella; and even the grim, tall cypress trees swayed their dripping tops over the path as he passed, as though they would send down an extra shower."

"Soon it grew dark. But no Tom returned. Of course, none of us thought he would really go away. We supposed the hottest of tempers would soon have cooled in that storm."

"An hour passed; the darkness grew blacker. "Poor Tom!" I thought. "It's all my fault, every bit of it; and although I was fourteen years old, and considered myself quite a woman, I began to cry."

"But suddenly, much to my joy, I heard Tom's step on the porch. I was about to rush out to meet him when my mother stopped me."

"No, child," said she, firmly.

"That minute the front-door bell rang—then it was not Tom at all, I thought."

"Mother went to the door, and there indeed was Tom. Lifting his hat to her in the most polite manner, he said:

"Good evening, madam. Will you have the goodness to tell me the shortest way to B—?"

"We were then living at Alderwood, in the country, and B— was the nearest railroad station."

"Oh, certainly," mother said; "take the first road to the right. B— is three miles from the turnpike."

"Thank you, madam," came the answer from Tom's proud lips, but his moist eyes said plainly: "I'm so sorry, mamma." "He lifted his hat once more and walked calmly down the porch, off the steps into the dark garden and among the moaning cypress trees."

"Oh, mother, mother, how could you?" I sobbed, no longer ashamed of my tears. "Tom will perish, I know he will, and I—I—and I—"

"Jennie, my child," said mother, "do I not know best?" And that answer was all I could get her to make."

"Supper was forgotten; we all sat gloomily around the fire. I was most miserable. I could do nothing but think how I loved Tom, and how lonely it was without him, and how lonely he must be feeling."

"But another hour had ticked its slow way around the clock before we heard those steps on the porch again. Then the bell rang again as before. This time I went with mother to the door. Tom stood there. His hat was gone, his umbrella, too; his frowzy hair was wet, and his hands purple with cold; but, in a plucky voice, he addressed mother:

"Please tell me the price of a night's lodging in B—."

"I gave a man fifty cents yesterday; that bought him both bed and supper."

"Will you take me in here to-night?" asked Tom. "I can pay you." And he showed mother his handful of pennies. "No," mother replied; "we don't take in tramps here. Perhaps they would at Nichols's, across the road."

"But," said Tom, his little lips trembling, "I—I—love you!" "Mother's lips trembled, too."

"That's a very strange thing for a strange man to say to me. What do you mean sir?" and then, somehow, she shut the door in poor Tom's face."

"Oh, oh!" broke in Frank; "how could she do it! how could you let her, auntie! it was just meaner than—oh, auntie, how mean it was!"

"But by the time mother had got back into the sitting-room, and into her chair, looking so pale, I began to understand that she was giving her boy a lesson—but she nearly broke my heart, as well as Tom's and her own, in doing it."

"Eight o'clock came, and with it, falteringly, slowly, came Tom's step on the porch. He rang the bell, but it only tinkled feebly. This time we all sprang to meet him, mother leading us and opening the door."

"Would you?" sobbed poor, tired Tom, "would you—would you let me come in and warm my poor little hands? I am—Jennie—I am so sorry."

"In a minute, in a second, Tom was folded in mother's arms, sobbing, repentant, wet, drabbed—and Tom never ran away again."

INTAGLIOS.

A Woman's Love.

A sentinel angel, sitting high in glory,
Heard this shrill wail ring out from purgatory:
"Have mercy mighty angel! Hear my story:

"I loved, and blind with passionate love, I fell—
Love brought me down to death, and death to hell;
For God is just, and death for sin is well."

"I do not rage against His high decree,
Nor for myself do ask that grace shall be,
But for my love on earth, who mourns for me."

"Great Spirit, let me see my love again,
And comfort him one hour! and I were fain
To pay a thousand years of fire and pain."

Then spake the sentinel angel: "Nay, repent!
For see—the dial-finger's bent
Down to the last hour of your punishment."

But still she wailed: "I pray you let me go,
I can not rise to peace and leave him so;
Oh, let me soothe him in his bitter woe!"

The brazen gates swung suddenly ajar,
And upward, joyous, like a rising star,
She rose and vanished in the ether far.

But soon adown the dying sunset sailing,
And like a wounded bird her pinions trailing,
She fluttered back with broken-hearted wailing.

She sobbed: "I found him by a summer sea,
Reclined his head upon a maiden's knee;
She curled his hair, and kissed him—woe is me!"

She wailed: "Now let my punishment begin,
I have been fond and foolish: let me in
To expiate my sorrow and my sin."

The angel answered: "Nay, sad soul, go higher!
To be deceived in thy true heart's desire
Were bitterer than a thousand years of fire."—F. M. R.

The Marked Grave.

Bowie's rangers, out on the trail,
Had galloped from early dawn;
But the prairie road was cool and sweet
And green as a garden lawn,
And the strong air stirred the blood like wine—
The strong air, scented with flowers and pine.

Silent and stern and ready to fight,
They followed the Indian foe,
Till Bowie cried: "Let the bridles fall,
For the sun is sinking low.
We must feed and rest, or we shall fail,
Though fifty miles on the Lipan trail."

They had reached the grove of mighty oaks;
Into the shade they went;
The saddles were loosened, and beasts and men
Were glad of their leafy tent.
Said Bowie: "Just take your rifle, Hays,
And see how the land around us lays."

The youth went forward with head-up step—
Came back with a quicker tread.
"Captain, I found beneath your oak
A man that is—" "Dead?" "Quite dead.
His saddle and whip beside him lay;
I reckon his horse has strayed away."

Yes, dead he lay in the blowing grass,
Lay sleeping like any child;
One arm was under his curly head,
His lips still faintly smiled.
Booted and spurred he had gone to rest,
But looked like a man that death had blessed.

There was not a wound, or mark, or stain;
There was not a line to tell
From whence he came, or what was his name,
Nor where he was wont to dwell.
"Well, no matter," said Bowie; "because Where we know nothing at all, God knows!"

They dug him a grave beneath the oak;
And Bowie, with hunting-knife,
Cut deep in its living bark the date of
When the stranger stepped from life.
Then, glancing down, with a solemn pause,
Cut under the date the two words: "God knows!"
—Lillie E. Barr.

Persia.

A world of radiant roses far and wide,
Clasps in its red embrace fair Ispahan;
Which, like a veiled and flower-wood virgin bride,
Blushes behind her santal-smelling fan.

Looped on the Zandrood's stream the city lies,
A marvel of marble, whose white minarets,
One maze of arabesque, assault the skies,
Until the admiring sun, reluctant, sets.

There, through yon open palace window, hear
The satrap's favorites chatting with their birds;
Tuned to the low Kinoores, young voices clear,
Warble sweet Saadi in soft Persian words.

One dainty houri tips each lash with khol,
While eunuchs comb her tresses' liberal jet,
And with henné-stained fingers almonds roll
Her fragrant, gold Latakiah cigarette.

Pale Schiraz buds adorn each silk divan,
Odors of benzoin scent the morning air;
And tales from Hafiz or the Gulistan
Are softly syllabled by the poets there.

And as I watch these fair Badouras play
In drowsy grace, with amulets and curls,
I see, in fancy, pass this sunny way
Some young Aladdin, scattering gold and pearls!
—F. S. Saltus.

June.

"Give me a month," said the Summer,
Demanding of Nature a boon.
"Thou shalt make surly Winter forgotten,
And be with all sweet things in tune!
The skies must be blue, the sun golden,
Love must light the white lamp of the moon."
The great mother smiled, and she kissed her,
And the smile and the kiss were June!
—Henry Richards.

FRANCE AND THE FAIR SEX.

Stendhal: "In France, women are flattered at twenty and deserted at forty."

Lesmesle: "Women love brave men very much, but they love still more the audacious."

Dumas Sr.: "God in His divine foresight gave no beard to women, for He knew they would not be able to keep their mouths shut while they were getting shaved."

Love pleases more than marriage, for the reason that novels are more amusing than history.

Madame de Girardin: "That which is rarest in France, after a stupid woman, is a generous woman."

Louis Desnoyers: "A woman who throws herself at the heads of men very soon finds herself at their feet."

Immorality with women is almost always a hard necessity. With men it is almost always a vicious longing.

Charles Lemesle: "Women owe to us the most of their faults; we owe to them the most of our virtues."

La Bruyère: "I would wish to be a girl, a beautiful girl, from thirteen to twenty-two, and after that to become a man."

Frenchmen do not often speak of their wives, lest they talk about them before gentlemen who know them better than they do.

Bougeart: "If I speak badly of women in general, all of them attack me; if I make an application, all the others applaud me."

The waves of a woman's handkerchief have wrecked many a man.

It being claimed by one of the sterner sex that man was made first and lord of creation, the question was asked by an indignant beauty how long he remained lord of creation. "Till he got a wife," was the reply.

Dubay: "Man acquires cunning; woman is born with it."

When a woman no longer blushes she has lost the most powerful charm of beauty.

J. Petit Senn: "The first love which enters into the heart is the last to go out of the memory."

Madame de Sartory: "Jealousy is nothing, properly speaking, but a strong desire to keep what we love and what we possess, and to take care that another does not enjoy what we wish to have all to ourselves, from which I conclude that we should be jealous of all that we love, and that it is impossible to love without jealousy."

Ph. de Varenne: "Many women judge favorably of a man by the elegance of his dress. The skin, in the eyes of the fool, recommends the fruit."

Adolph Ricard: "The extravagance of a woman's dress gives rise to the suspicion of extravagance of conduct."

Ph. de Varenne: "A beautiful woman who sees another woman still more beautiful than herself is the most unhappy creature in the world."

"I love them too much to paint them," says Meissonier of women; which makes one wish that some of our ladies had more self-respect, and did not paint themselves.

Madame Geoffrin: "There are three things which the average woman throws out of the window: her time, her money, and her health."

The proper dress material for some women is gros grain.

Long ago some wise woman started the proverb that "the proof of a pudding is in the eating," and now some men are putting the assertion to a practical test.

Circe is the most bewitching of women; Ulysses the wisest of men. Weary of submission to her despotic will, he resolved to see her for the last time and break with her forever. "Behave yourself like a man," said his sympathizing friend to him as they parted at the door of her boudoir. They met an hour later. "How is it?" said the friend. "Did you behave like a man?" "Very like a man," said the unhappy slave; "I made an ass of myself."

There are four good mothers who have four bad daughters: Truth hath hatred; prosperity hath pride; security hath peril; and familiarity hath contempt.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company. Subscription, $1 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served at 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents. No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer. News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed. The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe. Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1880.

The result of Tuesday's election is highly satisfactory. It disposes of the political agitation that a few most vicious demagogues have for now these two years disturbed us with. It demonstrates that the knaves and idiots are not in a majority, and that law, order, and good government is not yet to be sacrificed to the proletarian mob. This decisive victory at the polls should be followed by an earnest determination on the part of the general public to no longer yield any concessions to the alien agitators and native-born criminals that supplemented their political threats with threats of violence and menace. To threaten with bemp and fire is a crime; to await the act would be to imperil society. Kalloch, by his demagogism, his slanders, his insinuating tongue, places himself in antagonism to society. He may artfully and adroitly avoid conviction, imprisonment, fine, or impeachment; but he is nevertheless a criminal, at war with society, and ought to be punished. If the law faithfully tried, and legal remedies fully exhausted, are found inadequate to restrain him and the lesser and more ignorant villains of whom he is the leader, then society, in self-defense, must resort to remedies more heroic. The Rev. Mr. Kalloch and his associate criminals must be taught the lesson. The work of the Council now begins. The election has demonstrated the strength of this element of agitation. We do not mean to be understood that there are in San Francisco ten thousand or more persons who would deliberately endeavor to destroy and tear down our government. There may be of this number one thousand desperate men who have determined to live by violence and agitation. Of this number we rank our accidental Mayor as one, and we commend him and his kind to the surveillance of the armed and determined men whom the conduct of his associates has called into existence. Let him, and them, be taught the lesson of obedience—not to the letter of the law, but to the spirit—that makes prosperity in organized society possible. That the Rev. Mr. Kalloch need not be at a loss in understanding our position, and that we may relieve him from the necessity of placing any forced interpretation upon doubtful passages of our writing, we say to him, and authorize him to read this to his dirty and blustering mob of the Sand-lot, or to his more contemptible claqueurs at the Temple, that we consider him an arrant, vicious, and most unprincipled demagogue, a slanderer, libeler, and a blackguard, and that we should be most glad if we had the power to so stir against him a just public indignation that it would tie him to a cart's tail and whip him through the streets of a city he has disgraced by his magistracy and dishonored by his contemptible conduct.

And now, since the suppression of this political rebellion of the Sand-lot, Kearney has been taken with fits. He faints in the street, and, according to the Chronicle, he howls of nights with the gravel. As between the gravel and Kearney, our sympathy is with the gravel. The fact is, we regard this opportune sickness of the drayman as a cowardly feint to escape conviction, with cropped hair and striped clothes in the House of Correction. We had hoped to have enjoyed the pleasure of a visit to that institution, and to have seen the reformers, Kearney, Gannon, Steinman, and the female street tramper, breaking stones for the public roads. We have no sympathy nor affectation of sympathy for any one of these criminals. We have no sympathy for any press or individual that does in any degree excuse or palliate their conduct. We admit the fact that we regret that between the leaders of this ignorant and vicious mob and good citizens, there could not have been a more decisive conflict than is presented at the hallot-hox. For honest laborers no man lives who has a higher regard than we. But for the idle, profligate, whisky-drinking tramp who can not make a living in this country except by politics, and for the alien loafer who comes from Ireland or Germany, and thinks through political agitation to intimidate good citizens into his support, we have an unmitigated contempt. On our late trip to Arizona we saw black Berkshire pigs rooting for a living on the desert of the Mohave, and we asked ourselves why Denis Kearney and his associates of two-legged swine could not make a living in this country of freedom, opportunity, and sovereignty. And we said to ourselves, The pig is the better citizen, and the more useful. He can root out for himself an honest living. He carries no banner for "labor or bread." His motto is "Root, hog, or die." He drinks no whisky. He does not beat the sow that mothers his pigs. He leads a useful life, and at his death fills an honored pork-barrel. It is one of our privileges as an American citizen to think the Berkshire pig a better citizen than the ungrateful foreign agitator who comes to our country, and by his life and conduct makes the experiment of Republican liberty a failure.

For the honest and deserving laboring poor we have the kindest feelings. We would not allow one of them to remain unrelieved. We would spare no reasonable exertion to find them remunerative labor; but in this country there are no poor that have not met with misfortune or are in ill health. The misfortunes of accident, fire, disease, may occur to working men or working women, and they may find themselves in the straits of a temporary poverty; old age or orphanage may demand our charities; but that there is any such thing as general distress among the young, the middle-aged, the temperate, the industrious, the prudent, and the economical, we deny. The man who drinks whisky, plays cinch at the corner grocery, spends his time in politics, and is too idle to work, may bring poverty upon himself and distress to his family. The man who will follow and applaud and uphold the political agitation of the Sand-lot, and drive capital from the State, and make enterprise impossible, is a criminal, and deserves to suffer. For all this mob of political and idle and drunken we have neither compliments nor sympathy. They are a bad and dangerous element in our city. They render the experiment of republican liberty a doubtful one. We see but one remedy for this condition of things, and that is a repeal of our naturalization laws, and such a modification of our European treaties as will discourage the immigration of their criminal, pauper, and ignorant element. Our political liberties are endangered from the immigration of this class of people. They are more dangerous than the immigration from Asia. The Chinese may interfere with labor, may demoralize our social organization, and disturb our industrial arrangements; but they do not and can not imperil our liberties or destroy our government. Except for this alien element there would be less native-born demagogues. Except for Kearney the Baptist blackguard would be an impossibility. Except for the foreign-born there would be no Democratic party to-day; and except for the scum of this vile importation such Democratic gentlemen as have played the cowardly and contemptible part of subserviency to the Sand-lot would have acted a more manly and honorable part. We hope we shall not be misunderstood in these remarks as reflecting upon the intelligent, order-loving class of our foreign citizens. We can not always stop to draw the line between the intelligent and the ignorant, the moral and the vicious, the industrious and the idle, of foreign birth; but the line is always there, broadly marked and boldly defined.

These agitators are only scotched, and not killed; this rebellion of the Sand-lot is only checked, and repressed—it is not destroyed. It has taught us a healthful lesson. It has forewarned us of a terrible danger. It has disclosed to us the existence of an element of destructive force within our political organization—of the most menacing character. It has injured our city almost beyond repair. It has reduced values of real property one hundred millions of dollars. It has driven fifty millions into hiding or exile. It has arrested the development and progress of our city. It has given us a bad name abroad. We have a right to demand of the Council, and its registered thousands who stand ready to do its bidding—with bayonets, if necessary—that it do not palter with this business; that it do not sleep upon its arms; that it do not relax its secret military organization; that it keep the regiments to their full quota; that it keep the police armed, and that its enrolled veterans may be kept in readiness at the tap of the hell to step to the front and take any fight that Hans Steinmann and his gallows-birds may offer. Let every agitator be marked, known, and spotted. If it is right for them to make a black-list of every man who keeps a Chinese servant, or smokes a Chinese cigar, or wears a shirt from a Chinese laundry, then it is right to note and watch every criminal and blackguard who for these two years have kept our city in fear of their violence. Let the Council do what in its proclamation it promised to do; then the recurrence of such a condition of things as we have passed through will be impossible.

We commend to the leaders of the Democracy that they review their conduct for the past two years, and ask themselves how far they have been responsible for the existing condition of things. This party has been trodden in the very dirt of the Sand-lot. With here and there the honorable exception of a few young, spirited, Democratic gentlemen, the leaders have played a base and cowardly part. They have been in vile dalliance with this strumpet of the slums, and now we fear they propose to marry it for the Presidential election, and of the strumpet make a wife—by brevet. Now we shall hear of compromises and adjustments, of arrangements and concessions—concessions of political principles to party blackguards in order to catch votes. This recent charter election demonstrates that this fight for life was made mostly by Republicans. Thousands of Democrats abstained from voting, while other thousands cast their ballots to send a corset-vendor to the Senate of this State. It is such things as this that makes the Democratic party contemptible, and drives every proud, honest gentleman into opposition to it. It lacks the courage to resist the criminal and ignorant of its own rank and file because it fears to lose their votes. There should be but two parties in San Francisco—the Citizens and the Sand-lot. Such a division is at present impossible because of an impending Presidential election. Party issues will be made on national politics in disregard of our local issues, and for the next struggle we shall divide upon broader questions than are involved in this struggle between good society and the handits of the Sand-lots. Let us hope that in the election to adopt our charter, and in those elections that will follow the Presidential, we may divide upon rational local issues.

And may we not also commend the daily press to review its career in connection with this Sand-lot insurrection? We mean the Chronicle, Call, and Bulletin. The Alta has been resolute and loyal, bold and fearless. The Post has been ridiculous. We remember when this caricature of journalism covered the city walls and suburban fence-boards with the legend, "The Post is the Workingman's organ." The Examiner (let us be excused for calling had names) has been consistently Democratic, and that, being interpreted into plain English, means "consistently contemptible." We do not read the German dailies. The common schools of our youthful days were deficient in their range of instruction. But the Chronicle, the Call, and the Bulletin! How they have crawled and wriggled and sweat; how they have debased, disgraced, and dishonored the very name of independent journalism! The Chronicle was the first to prospect and the most enterprising to work this Sand-lot scuff. It had Kearney as a fixture in its office, sitting daily among its news editors, and daily closeted with its proprietor. Its best Bohemians coached the drayman how to talk, and its best reporters cooked his uncouth billingsgate, his ribald wit, and blasphemous blackguardism into grammatical and forcible English. Reporters followed him through the country, wrote him up, gave him importance, and all for the poor, paltry, mean hope of extending the Chronicle's circulation to a class that could not read, and carry the new Constitution. The Call—the meek and cowardly Call—came prowling forward like a cat in the dark, its eyes green with the jealousy of lost advertisements and circulation. Then the rivalry of these two journals to gain and keep the favor of the cattle of the Sand-lot. Rival reporters traveling through the country with Kearney. We need not recall the conflict between these two journals; their alternate victories and defeats; the fight over the election of convention delegates; the fight over the adoption of the Constitution; the brutal and bloody collision between the editor and the candidate; the more brutal and beastly effort of the Call to make profit out of a personal quarrel; the alternating popular indignation against both Call and Chronicle; the Bulletin, with the cunning of the fox and the wise reticence of the owl, poisoning itself in deliberative non-committalism between these contending factions, intent to keep the patronage of the commercial community, while its associate pushed the rake of its croupier out to this mob. This has been the history of our leading dailies. They are largely responsible for all this agitation, and all its consequences. If these journals could have been burned, and their editors burned with them, San Francisco would have been to-day richer by millions. If political parties, newspapers, capital, and labor have not been taught a lesson from which they may all draw a profitable moral then we may despair of the future. We have passed through a dark and nasty night; we think we see the glimmer of a brighter and a better day.

We have not read the McClure charter, but we have read the Bulletin's criticism upon it, and we are inclined to think the Bulletin's argument is a sound one. No law is always better than a had one. If we should have a charterless interregnum there will be no authority for anybody to steal from the city treasury. Better no king than King Stork. As a tax-payer we would risk the experiment of one year without authority for the Supervisors to do anything except to sauce Kalloch.

A Chinese laundryman in Utica has written to the New York Herald, offering to do washing and ironing for all the Irish sufferers without cost. Coals of fire.

AFTERMATH.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Vale, of the Bulletin, may not fail to secure the blessing that was promised to peacemakers on the Mount of Olives a good many years ago, but it will pretty certainly not come from his fellow-citizens, except upon divine compulsion. Representing Deacon Fitch and Mr. Pickering, this meddlesome mischief-maker attempted to patch up a peace between God and the Sand-lot by a conference, the former power being represented by Messrs. Coleman, Crocker, Flood, and Goodall; the latter by Mayor Kalloch single-handed. Nothing came of it; but with indecent haste Messrs. Fitch and Pickering announced, editorially, in their newspapers, that a modus vivendi had been found, honor was satisfied, and the business boom inaugurated. With deep disgust and high elation, respectively, the law-abiding interpreted this as a cowardly surrender to the Sand-lot; the Sand-lot, as a concession of the right to drive ahead their hangman's cart. The rascals who, alarmed by the thunder of the Council of Two Hundred, had scuttled away for shelter, came out and defied the lightning. Finding itself ridiculous in the field, the Citizens' Protective Union took to its tongue, issued an evasive denial that it was then engaged in compromise, and, with a multitude of double-fisted adjectives, stoutly scolded the rogues whom it had failed to mollify and dared not repress.

Out of all this disaster the meddling, muddling incapable who conceived the fascinating notion of an understanding with the Sand-lot has already secured a portion of his promised blessing—vide the Beatitudes. Utterly unknown before, he has now a wide and lasting renown as a first-chop fool. To mitigate the bitterness of his self-respect he has earned the hatred of his employers, who have been detected singing "Peace on earth and good-will to men" in the guiding beam of a doctor's tin lantern steering to a flatulent tramp in the familiar sentry-box of a suburban back-yard. But the crowning glory of this self-appointed go-between's pacific achievement is a first-class "character" from the master of the situation which his blundering created: Kalloch has publicly buttered him from the apex of his reasonless head to the uttermost extension of his immeasurable beel.

On Wednesday, February 25, Auditor Dunn said: "If Kearney or Kalloch is assassinated, the people will be recreant to their trust if they allow it to pass without retaliating." On the same day Sheriff Desmond said: "I wish Kearney God speed in his good work, and the man who lays hands on him, officer of the law that I am I will lay hands on him." That was when Kearney and Kalloch appeared to need the strong arms of individual citizens and officers of the law to protect them. Now that the Council of Two Hundred, rising in its might, has pledged itself and its twenty thousand followers to non-resistance, Messrs. Dunn and Desmond, relieved of the terrible responsibility of guarding their benefactor, have leisure to mismanage the offices he gave them. With General Miller and Mr. Coleman on guard, Kearney feels himself secure against everybody but his attorneys, and Kalloch fears nothing but the rivalry of that rising statesman and popular ladies' man, Mr. Satan.

My Dear Dennis:—The praise service at the Temple on Fifth Street next Sunday evening will probably start off as follows:

There's a place that is warmer than this,
And it's south, on the line of the cars;
There they've saved you a snug little cell,
Its windows all checkered with bars.
"Oh, the Chinese must go," etc.

"A prophet has no honor in his own country." In other words, the people among whom he has been "raised" know too much about him. They understand and appreciate at their full value his weaknesses, foibles, and failings. No man is a hero to his valet. So a "prophet" must needs go abroad to secure respect and consideration. Thus Parnell, the Irish agitator, came to this country to beg, and when he returns to his own neighborhood his begging is repudiated by his countrymen; nay, more—he is rotten-egged, kicked, beat, hustled, pulled by the legs, hattered as to the hat, torn as to the breeches, and apparently only saved from utter destruction by the intervention of some priests who seem to have been "on their muscle." Truly, this is discouraging to prophets! To think that a presumably respectable person, a member of the English legislature, after having been wined, dined, and dragged about in carriages in America, after having made speeches and collected alms, should return to the country of his birth—aye, to his own neighborhood—and be thus abused by his own neighbors as a dictator, and an arrogant, overbearing aristocrat! O tempora! O mores! But then the idea suggests itself that, after all, these people knew the party they were dealing with better than we did, that perhaps they only treated him as he deserved, and that probably they were not to be caught by specious pretense and clap-trap political philanthropy.

There has been a hit of discussion in one of the newspapers as to why the parsons leave California. The discussor whose screed was the last that we had the happiness to read puts it somewhat like this 'ere: California is an irreligious community; pew-rents are low, salaries ditto; and the parsons are treated with derision by the press. To these several indictments we reply: An irreligious community is where the gospel is most needed; the New Testament ranks poverty among the capital virtues of the pious; and when the good Jesus was derided he didn't much mind. We confess it's a long leap from a San Francisco parson to Jesus Christ, but if our clergymen find the comparison odious, they will have the satisfaction of feeling that they have done very little to provoke it.

Unless the New York Herald "lies for the very lust of lying," three of the converts of the Salvation Army, now tramping the overskirts of that city, have had a relapse. John Richards, who professed one evening to have been blessed by the Holy Spirit, got drunk the next, and went down to the Pickwick House, where the army has had headquarters, and wanted to fight. He did not want to fight the devil, he said. "I'm a man, and men are good enough for me to fight with. Oh, I'm a hitter, and I want Railton to come out here till I club him. I've had 'ligion—lots of it. I git drunk just as I git 'ligion—I git full of it. I'm a backslider from Kalamazoo, whoop!" The counsels of a policeman calmed the vicious intrepidity of Mr. Richards, and he said he would watch and pray silently until Mr. Railton came, and then he would "fix him." Pretty soon he broke out again: "As for them dough-faced gals, why they can tarry at Jericho until their beards grow—that's from Samuel. Oh, I'm a Scripture sharp, and don't you forget it! Them girls ain't doing nothing good; they're unctuous and greasy enough to be good preachers, but they ain't winning. 'Tisn't the beauty, it's the winning ways that fetches the sin-sick sheep that's astray from the fold. Yes, I did say I had 'ligion. I've had it as many times as I've been drunk, and that's a useless number; and I'm giving it to you straight. What gives it to me? Religion? Dogonmyskin 'fi know." "But, Mr. Richards," interposed the policeman, "you didn't use such language as that when you were relating your experience the other night." "Course I didn't. Was-z-use? Got two vernaculars for two purposes. When I'm drunk I'm drunker'n anybody. When I'm converted I'm more converted'n anybody." Mr. Richards was evidently in the superlative degree of his boasted inebriety, and his utterance became clogged with the effort of speech, so that, important as it was for him to remonstrate with the policeman who took him firmly by the collar, he was only able to smile in maudlin confidence and endorse the situation by an indistinct and oft-repeated "'s all ri'." And still the emigration of our clergymen is eastward, where there is not the "irreligious community" that obtains here.

To the clatter and crash of innumerable tongues afflicting this unhappy city is now added the still, small thunder of Mr. Edward Carswell, talking teetotaler. Ed'ard has signalized his advent and made us feel his presence near, by a heak-and-talon assault upon "the moderate drinker," filling the air with that malefactor's fine feathers, and making him squawk it lusty. We congratulate Ed'ard on the success of his first effort on this coast; unless they are altogether impregnable to reason, the moderate drinkers will never again drink in moderation. The mistake that previous crusaders have made is attacking the evil in the wrong place; they had not the sagacity and discretion to lay bold of the snake by the middle. Ned knows how to manage the creature; he has worn them in his boots.

In a speech at Union Hall on Monday evening last, State Senator John S. Enos is reported as having used this language: "Frank Pixley says: 'Every Frenchman, Scandnavian, and Irishman is a ———.'" Supposing Mr. Enos to have been correctly reported, and supplying the place of the dashes with words of reasonably profane and vulgar disparagement, one of two things is manifest: either Mr. Pixley or Mr. Enos is a liar of the first magnitude. Yet we know that Mr. Pixley is not a liar, and that Mr. Enos is not of the first magnitude. Will some one who has solved the gem puzzle have the goodness to tackle this hoss paradox?

Fraulein Bertha von Hillern, the girl who used to leg it round the ring for gate-money, has been adopted by a wealthy couple enamored of her staying powers, who "take her into the best society" and have set her to studying art. The manners acquired in the best society will be useful to the lady when making her laps, and her art-instruction will enable her to paint her legs barber-polewise, saving the expense of tights. Altogether, it's a good idea—one that ought to gratify every lover of the picturesque. Will some other wealthy and respectable couple have the benevolence to adopt the O'Leaary and prance him through a school of design?

It is announced that the United States will shortly be honored with a visit from that royal hutch, the King of Siam, and that the authorities at Washington will send a man-of-war to convey him hither. As his majesty is principally known as an obese gentleman who, during his "sprees," playfully cuts off the heads of his relations by way of an appetizer before his breakfast, it is questionable what feeling he will produce in this country. Our friends ———— may not have much to entertain him with in his sanguinary line, but if he ever gets out to this coast in the humor and condition, and will attend strictly to his accomplished business, in the matter of political and miscellaneous heads we think we can furnish him with steady and exciting recreation.

Mrs. Winifred Pelletreau, having been arrested on a warrant charging her with arson, in that she did malevolently ignite the combustible castle of her son-in-law, a chivalrous contemporary is at the pains to invent a "motive" for the act. "Prisoner," said a Kentucky judge, "before passing sentence upon you for this outrageous assault which you have confessed, I should like to know what prompted the act. What did the complaining witness do to you?" "I'm a rip-snortin' bull buffaler of the windy wild—a hell-bilin' sky-walloper from the head-quarters of the Big Sandy! I'm a bowel-raveler and a bone-breakin' yearner for the ideal! I'm a lily-handed trifter with men's in'ards, and alligators stewn in sheet lightnin' is my principal diet! That's what he done to me." The lady arrested last Monday is a mother-in-law—that was her motive.

A propos of the promised speed-track in the Golden Gate Park, and fast driving generally, a good story is told of ex-Governor Stanford. He and Mr. Crocker, some time back, transgressed the ten-mile-an-hour rule until the park policemen could stand it no longer. Accordingly, Mr. Stanford was accosted as follows: "I tell you what it is, Governor, you've got to come down to the law, like any one else. We'll have to arrest you or Mr. Crocker for fast driving. There's no other way out of it." Stanford looked at his interlocutor for an instant, and then, with a quiet twinkle, said: "I'll tell you what to do, officer—you arrest Crocker."

The Kentucky Legislature has passed a whipping-post bill for the admonition of petty thieves, and the advocates of repudiation over the Tennessee line feel uncomfortably creepy under their jackets every time they cross the border for their morning bourbon.

So long as the Sand-lot remained in the ascendancy the good God soured upon us. He frowned upon us with chill northern winds, and wept over us his tears of cold and unrefreshing rain. The verdure hid itself in the ground, the blossoms refused to put forth their beauty and their fragrance, and the earth refused to give promise of its harvests. As soon as we gained courage to repress the blasphemy of the Sand-lot, and drove out these infidel railers against his goodness and his generous hounty, he smiled upon us. He sent us a warm and genial and copious rain. The earth laughed in its fatness. Jeweled dew-drops sparkled in the sun. The fields put on their mantle of green, and the trees put forth in beauty of blossom and huds of fruit, and Nature promised full harvests. Gold and grain, and wine and wool; a great fleet of richly-laden ships to come and go; plenty, prosperity, and peace await us. We commend to our clergy and pious laity that in their to-morrow's prayers they thank the good God that he has not abandoned or forgotten us, his people.

"O sad-eyed savant, on the window leaning,
Tell me what golden secrets you've been gleaming
From the blue pages of unearthly meaning?"

"O blear-eyed roisterer, I'm not drunk, as you are,
And so my mental needs are somewhat fewer;
For your complaint the pump's a certain cure."

A flying brick the flippant savant tilted.
He swayed a moment, then, like celery, wilted.

It is cheery news, this thing about the intention of a number of Swinomish, Samish, and Stragumish farmers to engage in wheat-growing. If anybody can coax the reluctant wheat-vine out of Washington Territory's worn and weary soil it is just that kind of a farmer.

Bishop Hillery, of the colored Methodists, lectured on Wednesday evening at the Zion Church, on "Ireland, and the peculiarities of the Irish at home." We commend to our apostolic colored brother that he note the peculiarities of the Irish upon the Sand-lot, and give us his opinion; and inform us whether in his judgment Divine Providence has organized a proper hell for their punishment; and if not, what we had better do about it.

On the first day of April, Kearney pleaded illness of the gravel in order to procure an adjournment of his case for one week. This looks like an April-fool's joke. Kearney has no sand in his craw, but he may have gravel in his bladder. Six months' quiet in the House of Correction will, in our judgment, be good for his complaint. He evidently needs rest, and we are sure he needs correction. A gentle exercise in breaking stone is good for men with such an inflation as our reformer has been troubled with for the last two years.

Freud is a fraud, if what a very worthy lady tells is true. She says that all his corsets, chemises, and female under-gear are the manufacture of heathen Chinees.

THE HERMIT OF TREASURE PEAKS.

From the "Californian" for April.

In 1858, a couple of ragged and vermin-inhabited prospectors, wandering about one of the spurs of the Sierra, discovered gold, an article for which they had been assiduously searching for some months. Immediately on fixing their hungry optics to the fragment of auriferous rock, they gave a shout of delight, drove down a stake, fixed a notice of location, and announced the birth of a new town, calling the same Treasure Peaks.

When the place was dubbed Treasure Peaks, even the visionary minds of the two unkempt gold-hunters did not for a moment imagine that the mountain-side would ever be graced by any more than one, or perhaps two, miners' cabins. They were not selfish men, and the next time they visited the town of Forks Flat, they proclaimed their golden discovery at the first public bar of the place.

The idle population of Forks Flat was not slow in availing itself of the traveling facilities which led to Treasure Peaks. The trail up the mountain-side was a rugged and tedious one, and took the better part of two days to traverse; yet, inside of six months, a passable wagon-road was worn to the camp, and the place witnessed all the scenes of life and activity incidental to the birth of a new city.

When Treasure Peaks contained about a thousand inhabitants, the little town began to swell with importance. The mining prospects were, indeed, flattering, and the quartz ledges in the hills were rapidly being developed. Besides, they were productive, and the deeper the workers went, the richer and wider grew the veins. New cabins went up every day, the prospect-holes became shafts, the bucket and windlass gave way to the donkey-engine, people poured in from all directions, and the village child began to assume the airs of the municipal man.

In the midst of the bustle of business and money-making, the inhabitants of the Peaks did not forget that they had a rival—a small one, it was true—in the shape of the town of Forks Flat, and to wipe out the Flat from all commercial and geographical recognition was their sole aim. Joe Beggs, a man whose opinions had the advantage of considerable weight—as he ran a first-class blue-chip taro game—insisted on a newspaper:

"What we want for this growing camp is a first-class newspaper, that can properly set forth the interests of this mountain metropolis."

One of the crowd suggested that a man named Lightner, in San Francisco, was the party wanted.

"Has he got the classical education necessary to run a newspaper in a town like Treasure Peaks? Is he a man of elevated thought and vigorous expression? Is he a man that's well read?—one that we can refer gambling disputes to with a guarantee of a proper rendering of the points?"

The party who had suggested the name of Lightner vouched for the thorough capacity of the man, and by the next day three thousand dollars were raised, as a bonus, to induce him to come. Lightner was sent for, and in about a month the citizens of the Peaks began to look for the advent of the printing-office.

One sultry afternoon, a horseman came up the grade at a brisk pace, to announce that the printing establishment was on the way, and would arrive in a few hours. This intelligence caused an extraordinary commotion in the camp, and as soon as the first flush of excitement was over, preparations commenced for giving the new editor a fitting reception—something which would glorify the Peaks forever, and correspondingly humiliate the commercial pride of Forks Flat.

It was just at nightfall when John Lightner, with two loaded freight wagons, came in view at a bend of the grade, half a mile below town. The sighting of the teams from the top of the hill was signalized by the explosion of an anvil—a mode of firing salutes much in vogue at that period. In an instant more, an American flag was hoisted to the top of a pole, while on a neighboring eminence the welcoming bonfires were lighted, and there was a general rush to the foot of the main street.

When the teams halted, steaming and panting, at the town level, the journalist was considerably astonished to find a delegation of citizens drawn up to receive him. It had been agreed that Joe Beggs, the leading faro-dealer in the town, should deliver the address of welcome; and, for the first time since attaining his majority, the man of notable nerve and coolness was in a state of excitement which required a stiff horn of brandy, taken every fifteen minutes, to allay. When Lightner got down over the wheel, however, Beggs advanced, and, with half-lifted hat, grasped him warmly by the hand, cleared his throat for the first oratorical effort of his life, and, after a slight pause, began:

"MR. LIGHTNER: In behalf of the citizens of this growing commercial metropolis and mining centre, I bid you thrice welcome to Treasure Peaks. [Here he threw his weight over on the other leg.] I assure you that the fact of my being the first man to be afforded the opportunity of welcoming a writer of your brains and ability to our midst, causes my breast to swell with a pride which would be impossible for me to conceal, even if I so desired. It is the happiest moment of my checkered and eventful existence, and I will not efface it from the tablets of my memory till my dying day."

At this point, the speaker, whose remarks had fully realized the most sanguine expectations of his friends, looked about him in a dazed way, and it was quite evident, to those who knew him best, that his stock of English had given out. Nothing daunted, however, he plunged boldly into the more congenial and familiar parlance of his profession, and struck out as follows:

"You will find the journalistic lay-out in this section a bang-up game to buck at, and, with a man of your heft in the look-out chair, we can call the turn on the whole coast. We boys propose to play you open-up from the start, and chip up our subscriptions to the last cove in the camp, and to the full limit of the game. As long as you don't ring in a brace deal, and keep clean cases, you can bet heavy on the square-up support of this camp, and don't you forget it."

Three rousing cheers greeted Beggs's closing words, and one of his admirers critically remarked:

"He made some awful wild play at the start, but called the turn beautiful at the close."

Lightner thanked them cordially in a few quiet, well-turned remarks, and introduced his wife, who had remained on the elevated seat of the freight wagon, curiously contemplating the bonanza of her husband. She heard the three cheers given in her honor, saw the waving hats and bristling bands of welcome, and wished, more than at any other time in her life, that she had a thick veil to cover her beauty and blushes. Then came a fusillade of small arms, as a sort of gunpowder supplement to the cheering, and the boom of another anvil shook the air. A moment later her hand was grasped by the supple fingers of Beggs, who hastened to extend his apologies for the incompleteness of the preparations for the reception, and the utter poverty of their execution.

After having made the speech and chatted with the first respectable woman ever seen at the Peaks, Beggs seriously considered the propriety of securing a municipal charter for the town, and getting elected mayor. When the reception was over, and the ruddy light of the bonfires had ceased to gild the rough crags lying behind the Peaks, the crowd dispersed, and for the rest of the night the public sentiment could be summed up in a remark of Beggs:

"Now we'll make them Forks Flat fellows sick."

It took some weeks to set the little printing-office on its legs, and the constant presence of squads of inquisitive visitors did not materially facilitate matters. Over a hundred men came in to suggest a name, and such names! The Tidal Wave, The Mountain Thunderbolt, The Mining Blast, The Sierra Snow Slide, The Voice of Truth, The Forks Flat Crusher, and The Treasure Peaks Howitzer were a few proposed. The excitement incidental to the baptism of the new journal ran so high that one man was shot dead in his tracks, in a street debate over it.

The editor finally announced The Treasure Peaks Standard, and the first issue was hailed with a general outlay of enthusiasm, liquor, and gunpowder. The proprietor of the leading saloon purchased the first copy, damp from the press, for twenty dollars, and put it proudly on exhibition in his cabinet of curiosities. The leading article, dilating upon the prospects of the town, its growing industries and inexhaustible resources, was voted "just the business" by everybody. Subscriptions and advertising poured in, and Lightner came to the conclusion that he had reached a spot where a small fortune awaited him.

Time showed that the editor had, indeed, wielded a prophetic pen. Treasure Peaks progressed with a steady development, and the founders of the city began to regret that they had not built on some spot where there was more room, instead of being buddled up in the confines of a mountain, with a precipice below and a wall of rock behind them. Claims increased in value, corner lots advanced, the saloons were crowded, the gambling-bells resounded with strains of music and revelry; while the abodes of vice and the resorts of commercial industry literally made money "band over fist."

The Standard was a weekly, and Lightner and his wife did the work, both setting type, and each assisting the other in the odd jobs which are found in a printing-office. As business increased, Lightner concluded that his wife was overtasking herself, and finally the following was inserted in the paper:

WANTED—A GOOD, STEADY COMPOSITOR, TO WHOM THE highest wages will be paid. Apply at this office immediately.

Next day a young man called, and said he had come to answer the advertisement.

"I've been keeping cases at Beggs's," he said, frankly. "I could get nothing else to do, except mining, and my health won't stand it."

He said his name was Houghson, and he was from Maine. He was set to work at once, and proved to be a rapid, careful compositor, and just the man for the place.

There was no longer any necessity for Mrs. Lightner working as a type-setter, yet, after a few days, she came down and took a case by the side of Houghson. Presently, Houghson changed his slouched attire for new clothes, and manifested a decided interest in clean shirts.

One day Mrs. Lightner left a composing-stick half full, and when she returned from dinner, noticed that the balance of the type had been set. Next day Houghson found some wild flowers on his case. The new compositor assisted Mrs. Lightner whenever she "pied" a line, or fell into any vexatious troubles with the type. She needed assistance quite often, and Lightner was delighted with the thrifty ways and accommodating spirit of his new employee. On one occasion, in correcting Mrs. Lightner's type, their hands touched, but she made no effort to withdraw hers, and they lingered in contact. The woman's eyes met Houghson's, and in her confusion she "pied" a line, and the type, rattling upon the floor, caused her husband to look up. He saw, however, nothing but two people absorbed in their work.

Soon after, the new compositor resolved upon a desperate venture. He was setting some reprint, and a fresh piece of copy began with the words, "I love you." He set them in his stick, and beld it where she could see it. She gazed at it steadily for a few seconds, and hit her lip with an angered expression, as if she considered such a liberty unwarranted. Lightner went out a moment after, and Houghson took advantage of the opportunity afforded to make an explanation and apology, saying that the words he had set were in his copy.

"Then you did not mean it seriously?" she said.

"No."

The anger which Mrs. Lightner had assumed a few moments before now changed to genuine discomfiture. Houghson saw that the point so daringly won had been lost by sheer cowardice. She noticed his troubled face, and a few minutes later they exchanged smiles which spoke louder than type.

It was a day or so before they began to renew their conversation, and then they did so by touching, successively, the boxes containing the letters, thus spelling words and sentences quite rapidly. Houghson grew bolder every day, and finally, using their system of dumb signals within a few feet of the unsuspecting husband, they talked without reserve; their expressions of affection, born of a finger-touch upon piles of inanimate type, leaving no trace.

One night, the woman contrived to have Houghson invited to the house. After accepting, Houghson gave her to understand that she must search the right-pocket of his overcoat for a letter, when he came. That evening he called, and, taking off his coat, handed it to his employer, who was assisting him. He passed it to his wife, instructing her to hang it up, and the instant his back was turned the letter was extracted, and another put in its place. Houghson smiled in the husband's honest face at the idea of making a letter-carrier of him, and Lightner smiled cordially in return.

After that, Houghson spent his evenings at Lightner's quite frequently—the husband pressing him to come, and the wife professing that she considered him a bore. They exchanged letters daily—each seeming to be endeavoring to outdo the other in expressions of affection; and all this time the woman treated her lover so coldly in the presence of her husband that on one occasion he took her to task for it.

"If you don't like the man, you should at least remember that he is a gentleman, and treat him with politeness."

"I can't endure his ways," was the reply, and the subject dropped.

The crisis in events was bound to come, sooner or later, and it came in due time.

One night, Lightner was standing on a knoll, in the rear of the printing office. It was an evening sweet with the delicious atmosphere which characterizes the mountains, and the strong scents of the pines loaded the breeze with a fragrance so suggestive of woods and glens that one could almost see the splendid scenery with closed eyes. He watched the rush of busy life beneath him. The roar of machinery, the clamor of stamp-mills, and the cheery songs of the men blended grandly together. As the doors of the furnaces were opened, at intervals, the glow of the fires penetrated the dark recesses of the foliage beyond, and lit up the bleak rocks with mellow reflections. Lightner's mind reverted to the business of the past year, while he considered the prospects of the future; and when he thought of his cheerful though humble home, and devoted wife, he was indeed a happy man.

As he sat gazing upon the works below, he fancied that the glare upon the pines and rocks suddenly grew more pronounced. A moment later, the shout of fire rang out; it was the first time that cry had ever been raised in the Peaks, and the camp was a scene of confusion at once.

The main mine of the place was burning; and there being nothing to check the rush of the flames, and no water facilities to speak of, the whole line of works went, one after another. All night the pillars of fire shot upward from the shafts—as the underground workings communicated with each other—and these pillars rose above the tallest crags, while the thick, dun smoke shut out the sky. Below, the mines were filled with men perishing in the flames that swept from drift to drift, or suffocated long before in the sulphurous gases that on such occasions find their way to the remotest corners.

In the morning, the flames were flaring from the shafts. The town had escaped, but every vestige of the mining industry had been swept away. It would not pay to rebuild. There was no longer any reason to conceal a fact, well known to the insiders, that the vein had "pinched out." Treasure Peaks was already a thing of the past, and the exodus began. The grade was filled with men and horses, leaving the stricken town as fast as possible. They did not even remain to take out the dead from the lower levels.

"Why should we dig 'em from the ground to bury 'em again?"

No one could answer such a question, and the subject was not agitated. Business men did not sell out, they simply vacated the premises—finding, in many instances, that it was cheaper to leave provisions and merchandise than to remove them—something not at all uncommon in those days. Stores were gutted, and barrels of liquor rolled out for the mob. The streets were filled with howling drunks, most of them singing snatches of the wild refrains which were horn of the rush and riot of '49. Thus the town passed out of existence, with the inhabitants singing, fighting, drinking, and drowning their troubles in a delirium of revelry.

The night after the fire, Lightner's wife advised him to go down to the office and look after affairs. As he left, she remarked that she was indisposed, and would go to bed early, but he need not hurry back.

Half an hour later, as Lightner was sitting in his murky office, he thought he heard the clatter of hoofs, and went to the door; as he did so he saw two figures disappear over the grade, but thought no more of it.

By midnight he had put things to rights about the place, determining to move away with the rest in a day or two. As he went home he thought of the brave little woman who had faced the trials and privations of the past two years, and all for him. He entered the room where she was sleeping, but did not light the candle, for fear of waking her. He sat for half an hour beside the bed, filled with gloomy reflections and miserable forebodings. Then he bent over the pillow where he knew her head lay, and tried to kiss her cheek. He found nothing, and his hands wandered nervously over the bedclothes for a moment. Rushing to the window he tore aside the curtain, and let the moonlight stream in. The bed was empty.

Three days later a man wandered aimlessly about the streets of the deserted city. It was Lightner, gone mad from the events of the past week, and the sole surviving inhabitant of the dead camp. He roamed about the streets all the forenoon, and then drifted back to his little office. Sitting down to his desk, as he had before a thousand times done, he wrote:

"CHEERING PROSPECTS.—Treasure Peaks was never on a more substantial basis than at present. Its population is constantly increasing; buildings are going up at a rate which bespeaks a population, by next fall, of double that which we can boast of at present. The strike in the Lone Pine, yesterday, is one of immense importance, and more will be said of it in our next issue."

He hung this on the hook, and went out to "rustle" for more items; going from one empty store to another, and returning in an hour or so to scribble his impressions on paper. He moved about all day, and returned home at night, wholly oblivious of the fact that he was the only inhabitant of the dead and desolate city.

Occasionally the Indians would pay the Peaks a visit, but seldom, as the dreariness of the place was to them more lonely than the unexplored forest. These savages, who never harm a demented man, brought Lightner provisions, and treated him with great respect. He usually alluded to their visits as the arrival of New York capitalists seeking investments in mining property.

There was an old hall at the Peaks, which had been occasionally used for theatrical performances by local talent. Not unfrequently, Lightner would repair to this building, and, taking a front seat in the dress-circle, sit for a couple of hours under the supposition that a play was in progress. Here, indeed, was the "beggarly array of empty benches." The moon, shining through the gaps of dismantled windows, threw but an indifferent light upon the stage and over the interior of the building, and occasionally Lightner would allude, in his paper, to the fact that it was a pity that the leading place of amusement in the city was not better lighted. He was always very guarded in his comments, however, as he seemed to fear that, unless he remained on good terms with the manager, he might lose his advertising patronage. Sometimes, he would hang about the empty box-office for days, with a bill which he was anxious to collect.

On one occasion he delivered a lecture in the theatre, on the "Life of Charlemagne," and roared and gesticulated for an hour and a half, by the light of a tallow candle, to absolute emptiness, weaving his mad oratory to the irresponsible air, and trying vainly to call down the applause of the silent gallery.

On the Fourth of July he decorated his office with evergreens; pulled out an old American flag, which he hoisted early in the morning; read the Declaration of Independence to a band of Washoe Indians; marched them up and down the main street, and wanted to get gloriously drunk, but lacked the spirituous auxiliaries.

During the next few months the town shrank away like a withered vegetable. The buildings twisted and warped with the summer's heat, and the dry rot set in. Here and there patches of grass could be seen in the streets, a sort of verdigris collecting upon the town. Day after day the signs and awnings were shaken by the mountain winds, and fell to the ground alongside the sinking buildings. Vines and weeds began to mantle and choke the charred and blackened ruins of the hoisting works, and cover the grim wrecks of machinery.

In the midst of all this, the demented editor prolonged his solitary existence, subsisting on the scanty allowance which the Indians furnished him, and occasionally issuing the Standard, printing it on odd pieces of paper, and distributing it by throwing it into the yawning doorways. Its circulation was generally about a dozen copies, and it came out as the humor seized him.

When not at work on his journal, he was digging among the ruins for the body of his wife, whom he firmly believed had been burned in the fire. One day he found some bones, probably belonging to a miner, and, believing them to be the remains of his lost helpmate, he buried them in a little knoll back of his office, and began to plant flowers there, watering the spot daily. The flowers soon completely engaged his attention, and, one day, seeing them through the open window, he wrote:

"The flowers are coming up close by our door again. All hail! As, in our wild and uncertain struggle for wealth, we toil in the lower levels, let us not forget the priceless treasures of the upper earth. The gold of the mine is not half so bright as the yellow buttercups that flick the sod above it. The cold crystals, the gleaming pyrites, and the many-colored traceries of wealth and beauty that blend in the soulless rocks, make poor compare with the vines and grasses which, a hundred feet above, tell us of God's divine sympathy and Nature's exhaustless bounty. The gold and silver lasts forever because neither have ever lived. The flowers spring up and die because they are immortal. Does not the spirit of the rose, upon the hill yonder, live and breathe as a man lives and breathes? Does it not feel every movement and change of the air which surrounds it, and die as the blast smites it? Does not the spiritual essence of its fragrance haunt the earth, while its seed is quickened for another spring? Let every man have his share, for the treasures of nature are illimitable."

In the fall he imagined that he was nominated for Congress, and for about six weeks he conducted a vigorous political campaign. He went on a canvassing tour through the mountains, and whenever he struck an Indian camp he made a speech—a rousing and ringing Republican oration—which was generally listened to with marked attention by groups of stolid savages.

On election day he distributed his tickets through the saloons, laying a pile on each dusty counter, and covering them with small stones to hold them in place.

In a day or so he imagined himself elected, and thanked the solitudes about him as follows:

"It is with a feeling of no inconsiderable pride that the editor of the Standard is able to announce that he has been chosen by the people of Nevada as their Congressional representative. We did not seek the office, and, in accepting it, we but bend to the royal will of the popular majority, who were determined to do us honor, in return for our labors in behalf of the growing country during the past four years. Our record as a pioneer, a journalist, and a citizen we feel proud of, and shall make it our endeavor to retain the confidence of our constituents in the future as we have in the past."

That night he packed a small black valise, and determined to set out for Washington on the early stage. He went behind the office, and stood for half an hour by the grave which he supposed to be that of his wife, and then turned sadly back to the dingy old printing-shop. Sitting down to his desk, he seized a scrap of paper, and began to write. He wrote slowly for about half an hour, and then, throwing away the manuscript, wrote again. Then he carefully read his copy, and hung it on the hook.

"Julia," said he, "set that up in leaded minion, and then we'll go home."

He looked over toward the case where his wife had so often worked, and his dimming eyes tried to pierce the gloom. Folding his arms upon the table, he laid his head down upon them with a sigh of weariness, and was soon asleep.

Three years later, a man and a woman came up the grade on horseback, and entered the deserted town. They walked where the ruins of the hoisting-works crumbled beneath masses of waving grass, and inert machinery lay in the close embrace of creeping vines. The pair rode through the flowers and weeds in the main street, and neared the office of the Standard. The woman's quick eye caught sight of the grave at the top of the knoll, and she walked up to it. On the head-board she saw the inscription cut deeply into the wood:

JULIA LIGHTNER,
MY BELOVED WIFE,
Died April 16th.

The two looked in each other's faces, when the man remarked:

"The day of the fire."

They walked through the office, passed the cases, thick with spiders' webs, the rusty press, and the pied masses of type. They saw something bowed over the editorial table. It was a human figure, half skeleton, half mummy, over which clung some ragged remnants of clothes.

"My husband!" said the woman.

A horrible shiver came over the man, and the woman, ashy pale, clung to him for protection, as if she expected the figure would rise up and confront them.

Presently, Houghson walked up closer, and seeing a sheet of paper upon the hook, took it off, shook the dust free, and with some difficulty, read as follows:

"HOME.—Love is a sleep, in which a man dreams of joys which rise before him in the air, in endless architecture which the imagination never tires of rearing upon the clouds. He awakes, is at home, and the unsubstantial castles of his dreams become as solid masonry, when he views the cheerful hearth, hears the prattle of his children, and presses the responsive lips of his faithful wife. This is the glad consummation of all his hopes, and all other joys which wealth and power and satiated ambition tempt us with, pale before the splendor of such a sun as this whose fire the grave itself quenches not, and whose light pierces the shadows of eternity."

As he read, Houghson had moved toward the light which came through the broken window, and his back was turned away from the woman whose affections he had won. Suddenly the crash of a pistol's report caused him to leap back as if the ball had pierced him.

As he turned, the woman fell to the floor at the skeleton's feet, the blood which streamed from her mouth mingling with a bubbling froth which swelled from her nostrils. She made no motion after the fall, except to inflate her chest once or twice.

Houghson gazed, transfixed, upon the corpse for a few minutes, incapable of motion. The sun had set, and the scene was shrouded in the gathering shadows. He made a step to approach the body, met the fixed gaze of the eyes, and, recoiling, reeled through the open door. The two horses were close at hand; one he liberated, and the other he mounted. He turned one more look at the office, and paused, as if he would go back; and then, wheeling his horse about, dashed through the crumbling and rotting city at a pace which made the frail houses tremble as he passed, and in the misty twilight disappeared down the lonely grade.

SAM. DAVIS.

The type of our fair countrywomen presented in the Daisy Miller of Mr. Henry James Jr., is still sometimes to be found wandering among European cities with her family. A short time ago, at a certain continental public ball, an exceedingly pretty American girl sat looking on, and with that fearless innocence, so incomprehensible to the old world critics, had struck up an acquaintance with a young man sitting near her. She had apparently not long left her own unsophisticated corner of this hemisphere, for the young man was not exactly of her world, and looked like a German commercial traveler, fully endowed with the easy volubility characteristic of his class. From her naive conversation all her neighbors learned that she adored pumpkin pies, that she preferred apple pies with the bottom crusts to them, that she thought the continental breakfast without hash and buckwheat cakes was a poor affair, and a hundred other interesting facts and views which are very amusing when poured from the fresh lips of a pretty girl.

The chain-mail vest which is said to have saved General Melikoff from Vladetski's bullet has for many generations past been a common article of wear with the leading personages of Europe, the most notable example being Oliver Cromwell, Gustavus of Sweden, the present Czar, and Louis XVI. In the middle ages these mail-coats were known as "Milan shirts," and greatly esteemed for the fineness of their workmanship. A famous Italian guerrilla, who went into the battle of Ravenna thus equipped, was found dead with the links of his mail still unbroken, though the bones beneath it were completely shattered by the force of the death-blow. A "bullet-proof" vest of this kind was offered by a speculator to the Duke of Wellington, who got rid of him in a very characteristic fashion. Bidding the man put it on, he called to the sentry outside to load with ball-cartridge and come up at once. But the visitor's confidence in his invention did not apparently extend to the testing of it in his own person, for he took to his heels at once.

The representative of one of the oldest and most esteemed Irish families in Galway, being unable to get in any rents, told the tenants that, as he must live, he should be compelled to sell his property. Thereupon the tenantry met and consulted, and sent a deputation to the squire to say that they still honored and revered the "ould" name better than any other name in Ireland, and that rather than have a stranger among them they would lend him as much money as he wanted, but devil a ha'penny rent would they pay.

A lady living near Baltimore, who is very deaf, stopped a milkman as he was passing the house the other day, asked him how much he charged for a quart of milk, and then put up her ear-trumpet to catch the reply. The man drew a quart of milk and emptied it into the trumpet, and the result has been that he has to go three miles out of his way to keep out of sight of the lady's son, who sits on the front porch waiting for him to pass.

It is well known that Victor Hugo and Emile Augier are warm friends, although holding each widely differing opinions. One day, in a conversation on potatoes, Victor Hugo said, laughingly, to his friend: "Confess, now, that you are a frightful réactionnaire, and that if ever you came into power you would be capable of demanding my head." "It is true," said Augier, "only I would take it for myself."

A minister once told Wendell Phillips that if his business in life was to save the negroes, he ought to go to the South, where they were, and do it. "That is worth thinking of," replied Phillips; "and what is your business in life?" "To save men from going to hell," replied the minister. "Then go there and attend to your business," said Phillips.

That was a triumphal appeal of the lover of antiquity, who, in arguing the superiority of old architecture over the new, said: "Where will you find any modern building that has lasted so long as the ancient?"

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Scherzo.

Scenes that are brightest
Are soonest to fade,
A girl who eats onions
Will be an old maid—
At least she ought to be.

Adagio.

Come into the garden, Maud,
With a brick-bat or a stone,
Here's the biggest cat I ever saw,
Gnawing a chicken-bone.

Adagio con Sentimento.

Three hogs lay under a shed,
Three hogs lay under a shed;
'Twas a lovely day,
The rafters gave way,
And the hogs were killed stone dead.

Piano.

Little Denis Kearney
Sitting in his cell,
Sighing and cursing,
Swearing like—well,
Never mind his crying,
He's used too much his chin;
Come away and leave him—
Be sure to lock him in.

Smorzando.

A delicate maid of Delhi
Declared she could never eat pie.
So she tackled the ham,
Roast turkey and lamb—
She is now in the sweet by and by.

Capriccioso.

There was a native Brazilian,
Whose pa was a regular villain,
He became without hope,
And took to selling soap,
And thus he became a Castilian.

Passigo Chromatico.

Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these: "Ift hadn't been
For that one block that came between
I could have got the whole fifteen!"

Fuga del Diavolo.

He kissed the tips of his fingers
At a girl across the street,
And the boot of her big brother
Raised him off of his feet.

Forte Vivace.

An unsophisticated young person of Kent
Brought forty old jokes on Lent.
He was pounded with chairs
And kicked down the stairs
And sent home with his nose badly bent.

Fortissimo Vivacissimo.

When the young and tender school-girl isn't thinking,
Isn't thinking,
Of the time when she will be allowed to vote,
'Loved to vote,
The chances are that she is coyly blinking,
Coyly blinking,
At some young man in a zebra overcoat,
Overcoat.

Finale.

"Away!" she cried, with accents bold,
And looks that were quite sinister;
"Come near me not, for I've been told
That you, sir, are a minister."

Encoro.

Things are seldom what they seem,
Skim-milk sells for re-form cream;
Scratchers pass for honest voters,
Independents stand for bolters.

Very true, so they do.

Black sheep dwell in every fold,
Young Repubs are often old,
Bald-heads are not always level,
Splits in parties raise the devil.

Yes, I know, that is so.

Booms may boom—erangs become,
Sticks alone can't play a drum;
Facts, like mules, are stubborn things,
Stalwart arms ain't worn in slings.

Veri-lee, No, Sir-ee.

Encorissimo.

Old "Speckle" rose from off her nest
And cackled with much vigor,
As if to say: "That egg's my best;
No hen can lay a bigger."
While Johnnie, standing near the gate,
In mute contempt was gazing,
As if he could not tolerate
The fuss the hen was raising.
His protest took her down a peg—
He raised his voice to say it—
"You fink you're smart. Dod made zat egg—
You toodn't help but lay it!"

Encorossissimo.

I sit by my window side,
And gaze into the quiet night,
Made mellow by the moonbeam's light;
I feel the zephyrs from the lea
Caress me through the window wide;
And as they flit

So soft and free,
Dear George, I sit
And think of thee,

—Female Poet.

Confiding friend,
And while you sit and let them flit,
Although to you

It may seem queer,
We'll bet ten cents to a brick block
That "dear George" sits—
A-drinking beer,

Are we regaining a lost sense?—the sense of the artificial comedy?—the pure comedy? There is ground for indulging a hope that it may be resuscitated—may even now be reviving, after a century's syncope. The thing is infinitely to be wished. One fact may be noted which is capable of standing in the relation of cause to such an effect—viz: the birth and vigor of opera bouffe. Aside from its gauds of unhallowed dialogue, the theme of opera bouffe is inversion of the moral sphere; and this is one stage toward that higher sphere void of the moralities—the sphere of pure comedy. In a real world, the action and motives of opera bouffe would set the foundations of social order a-wagging; but in its own hewitched world, lawlessness is the local form of law, and social enormity the propriety of the place. To enjoy this certain power of mental detachment is called into play—we sink this work-a-day world with its merely human people, and float into another where no duties, pains, nor passions intrude to jar the harmonious levities of the place.

From France, came to us this world of comedy—the artificial comedy, as Lamb calls it, in distinction from the sentimental comedy then driving it out—the pure comedy, as we prefer to call it now, in distinction from both the sentimental comedy and the comedy of manners. It was debauched during the English reaction from Puritanism; it flashed up once more, brilliant but not quite monochromatic, in Sheridan; then flickered and went out amid the murk of Knowlesian tragedy and the "domestic" drama.

In this dreariness, Mr. Robertson, not long since, set up his altars to the comedy of manners; and, albeit their mild flames wrought but imperfect illumination, they diffused some warmth and no had smells. Next, Gilbert has done work of delicate fancy, of some true wit, and more good fun. This, like his "Bab Ballads," has been of a kind to quicken in us that same faculty of getting ourselves out of the world of sense and the gravities; it is the faculty that survived in Elia, moving him to tender grief over its loss by his contemporaries, and to render those pious tributes to its memory that are becoming intelligible to our experience.

All this is a profos of French Flats, now running furiously at the Baldwin. "But it is not natural," was the comment we overheard. Praised he mercy, it is not!—it is something much better. This matter is one of taste, and hence admits no disputation. The comment is valid enough. French Flats is anything but "natural," and there are people who therefore will not like it. The play shows rare invention; its complexities are ingenious, its characters are congruously unreal—i. e., are the real people of pure comedy. And it is being played in this spirit at the Baldwin. "Blondeau" (Bishop) and "Bonay" (Jennings) are admirable, and "Barrameda" (Morrison) triumphant. The Portuguese is played at the true heroic pitch. "Riffardini," the old tenor (Barrows), appears to have been differently acted elsewhere. Mr. Barrows plays it in the spirit of a "Tattle" or "Tom-noddy," making him a mere fop.

The part admits of a different rendering. Some touches—casual hints—of a heart beating beneath that foolish exterior might be given. The solitude lest his voice fail him—the desolation of soul when it does in fact break down—might he acted in a way to stir some human sympathy. In short, the tenor might be played in part as a man and not altogether as a tenor. We prefer the character in Mr. Barrows's vein. Any pathos would be out of place. It was precisely such realities as those that proved the hane and death of the old artificial comedy. In the sentimental sort they have their place, but not in this—acted as we would have it. "Vallay" (Bradley) is doubtless made up after the original, and follows his prescribed "husioess," but that original is familiar only to the few among us who have traveled. He is indeed a Frenchman, and a Parisian among Frenchmen, but a Parisian who stays at home and is strange to the foreign eye. "Vallay" would be more effective if played as the old beau—the type we are acquainted with—my Lord Ogleby's vein.

On Wednesday evening, at the Bush Street Theatre, will be presented the musical comedy entitled The Royal Midday, with Emelie Melville as "Fanchette"—afterward a royal midday—and a strong cast, including Turner, Max Freeman, Peakes, and Miss Montague. The music is said to be very catchy, the comical scenes side-splitting, and the spectacular features immensely attractive. The royal chess tournament, thirty-two girls constituting the pieces, will be a novelty here, and an excitement to those conversant with the game. Great care has been taken in the rehearsals, and in scenery, costumes, and accessories there is nothing that could be improved. The Royal Midday is now in its twelfth season at Daly's new theatre, New York.

THE THEATRE ROYAL, DUBLIN.

When I lately read in the San Francisco papers of the destruction, by fire, of the Theatre Royal, Dublin, it seemed to me as if I had lost a dear old friend. One of my earliest recollections is that of being a little child seated in this same theatre, witnessing the play of the Babes in the Wood. Twice a year, at Christmas and Easter, I was brought to the Theatre Royal—an event which I looked forward to for months. As I grew older, and able to take care of myself, I went oftener; and one of the epochs of my youth was when first I went to the top gallery to hear the Italian opera, and was for the first time one of the "gods."

It was rare fun to go to the theatre in those days; the incidents of the play would furnish talk for weeks afterward. I remember, on more than one occasion, assisting to draw some popular actress to her hotel, and then hallooing in the street until she came on the balcony and made a little speech, or sung a stanza or two of a song. A brief address from Piccolomini lingers in my memory; it was: "I love you all! God bless you all! Good night!"

Piccolomini was a favorite with the Dublin theatre-goers. On one occasion the "gods" sang the following song to the air of "The Red, White, and Blue."

We thank you, sweet daughter of beauty,
For the light of your presence and song;
We thank you—it is but a duty,
We feel, as we cheer you along
The bright, winning grace, and the pleasure
That beams from your eyes when you sing,
Have brought us a joy beyond measure,
For which we your praises now ring.

We have twined you, with friendship and feeling,
A garland of flowers for your brow,
In the hope that, though years may come stealing,
They may find you as happy as now.
For your fame, no fitter a token
Than the wreath that we twine you to-night,
May your fame, like that wreath, be unbroken,
And bring to you always delight.

Speaking of the top gallery reminds me of the Ganymede of that region. He was an old man who sold apples and programmes; his cry was: "Want the hill! Want the oranges! Food for the mind and food for the body, the aurea melia and the poma dulca. Since you won't buy, gentlemen, I must only hurl Virgil at you." Such a smattering of learning in unexpected places is always attractive to students, and so the aurea melia man was liberally patronized.

Boxing night, the night after Christmas, when the annual pantomime is first presented, was always a gala night, the theatre being packed from pit to dome. A farce, or some short play, preceded the pantomime. In the first piece the actors went through their parts, but not a word could be heard from beginning to end; the audience keeping up an incessant cheering, laughing, crowing, and singing all the time; pushing and swaying in great masses in a most uncomfortable manner. As soon as the pantomime commenced order was restored, and the audience listened attentively to the performance. A Dublin audience is always patriotic, and some significant demonstrations have been made from time to time in the Theatre Royal. Dion Boucault was on more than one occasion accountable for such outbursts of enthusiasm; once when, in Arrah na Pogue, he introduced the song of the "Wearing of the Green," and a second time when, in the Relief of Lucknow, he puts in the mouth of "Nena Sahib" a bitter invective against the British government in India. The "rebellious though beautiful" song, above alluded to, in which one peasant tells another that "The shamrock is forbid by law

To grow on Irish ground," was popular at the time in Dublin, and Boucault relates that about the time he refused to sing it in the Theatre Royal, Dr. V., a celebrated diner-out, sang it with great applause at the table of the viceroys.

It was in the Theatre Royal that Mrs. Siddons, in announcing Macbeth's approach, which is as follows:

"A drum! a drum! Macbeth doth come!"

found it necessary to change the words on account of a mistake in the orchestra—a trumpet being sounded instead of a drum—so the lady said:

"A trumpet! a trumpet!"

hesitating to finish the line. A voice in the gallery added:

"Macbeth doth stump it!"

A writer in the Argonaut complains that the Theatre Royal was too large. The dimensions of the building were as follows: The theatre proper was one hundred by one hundred and eight feet, the walls being seventy-eight feet high, and the total span of the roof seventy-eight feet; from curtain to the front of the centre box, fifty-two feet six inches; across the pit, forty-five feet; and the stage, from the footlights to the extreme back, sixty feet; the breadth of the stage, from wall to wall, sixty-one feet. The theatre was in the shape of a Grecian lyre, and I do not think there was a seat in the house from which the stage could not be plainly seen and in which the voices of the actors could not be distinctly heard. It is many years since I have been in the Theatre Royal, but in my time it always drew good houses—and a full house never looks too large.

In this city the California Theatre flourished for many years; there was scarcely a night in that time that there was not a fair audience; there were no complaints heard then that the house was too large. But times got dull, other theatres arose, poor actors took the place of good ones; then business fell off, and then they discovered that the house was too large; so they closed it up, and called it the "old dreary." For the modern society play a theatre such as the Bush Street one may be suitable; but when plays are enacted not necessarily spectacular, but requiring for their ordinary business such scenes as, say, an open country, where troops meet in conflict, sieges of towns or fortresses, conquerors brought home in triumph, senates or councils debating, gladiators in the arena, gondolas on canals, street scenes in cities, and such like, a much larger theatre is required.

The first stone of the Theatre Royal was laid on the 14th October, 1820, and the building was completed in sixty-five days, and opened on the 18th of January, 1821. The last performance took place on the 8th of February, 1880, and on the afternoon of the following day it was destroyed by a fire, which is supposed to have originated by the ignition of the curtains of the viceregal box while the theatre was being lighted up for an afternoon performance, in aid of the Irish Relief Fund.

RICHARD EDWARD WHITE.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 2, 1880.

A Lesson in Stage Interviewing.

Possibly the reporter did not know how to interview an actress. He stated his business, and she said languidly: "I'm sorry you've come. I don't fancy you newspaper men; and I hate being interviewed."

"Oh, well, then I'll not trouble you. Sorry I intruded. Good-day."

But she reached the door first, and said: "Oh, now you're here, I'll oblige you."

And he answered: "Oh, no; wouldn't trouble you for the world."

"But it won't be very much trouble."

"Well, never mind; I don't care particularly about it."

"But—but—in fact, it will be a pleasure. I only object because reporters always ask the same questions, and then don't print just what you say."

"Well, I'll try to do better than that," said he, and they seated themselves. Then he asked: "How did you celebrate your thirty-fourth birthday?"

"Eh?"—jumping up—"What d'ye mean, sir? You're a mean wretch to ask such a question!" (Steps on her lap-dog—addresses dog:) "Drat your pet, get out!"

Then she observed him writing, and asked what he was doing. He replied: "I promised to print exactly what you said, and I have taken down your very words."

"About the dog?"

"Yes."

"Goodness gracious! You won't print that?"

"Yes, I will."

"But that wasn't meant to print."

"Can't help it."

"Oh, but it won't do. You mustn't. Let's begin the interview now."

"Very well. Which do you prefer as an advertisement: being robbed of diamonds, run away with a hack, or having a divorce suit?"

"Sir, I—I don't do such things! I never heard such questions!"

"I promised to try to vary the list you said had become so monotonous. How many bushands have you living?"

"See here, if you don't stop this, I'll send for one of 'em. That is—please state that I'm not married."

"Just so. Do you shave your head?"

"Sir!—of course not. Are you crazy?"

"No, ma'am. Which is your favorite liquor?"

"Do you wish to order some sent up? Of course you won't say in the paper that I ever take anything?"

"Look here, ma'am, I was to print just what you said."

"But I don't want you to."

"It must be done."

"Well, then, if you don't ask me if the audiences everywhere are as enthusiastic as they are here, and what I do with all my bouquets, and if I don't almost feel that I ought to be in boarding-school instead of on the stage, I'm so young, and if I don't find it very embarrassing to have all the men so madly in love with me and several bank directors committing suicide because I won't marry them—if you don't ask me these questions, I won't say another blessed word. So, there! And if you print what I've said, I'll sue you for libel."

Many pleasant anecdotes of Miss Neilson are told by those who know her behind the scenes, and she is said to be thoroughly pleasant and unaffected, and fond of a jolly time. One morning recently, when she went to rehearsal at the Globe, she found that she had left thirty thousand dollars under her pillow at the hotel. She was not at all troubled or nervous about it, but quietly asked the property-man to go and get it, which he did, restoring it to her at rehearsal. The tribute to her acting which, perhaps, she is most proud of, is the fact that when she is "on," the scene-shifters, gas-men, mechanics, and supers generally, instead of skylarking or chattering behind the scenes, as usual, crowd into the wings and crane over each other's shoulders, watching her every motion with absorbed interest. These men are the most case-hardened critics to be found, and it is said that Fechter was the only actor who shared with Miss Neilson the honor of numbing them among his audience.

Adelina Patti takes only one real meal on a day when she expects to sing in the evening. At eleven o'clock she is served with meat and eggs, but very rarely vegetables; Bordeaux and seltzer-water accompany these substantial. Then she takes a nap two hours long, after which she goes out driving. When she returns she sits down at the piano and practices, "in preparation for the combat," as she herself says. Just before leaving for the opera house she takes a little bouillon, but no dinner. After the performance she eats a substantial supper. Patti herself seemingly believes that she owes the preservation of her marvelous voice to this course of hygiene, for she adheres to the latter in the most minute particulars, and nothing would probably induce her to abandon it. She never, without exception, utters a word on any morning until she has drunk her cup of chocolate. That done, she then tries her voice by summoning the maid with the full force of her lungs.

Her success at the Paris Gaiteé showed that her voice is as sweet, flexible, and incomparable as ever. It has gained in volume, and its medium register has increased to the richness of quality generally found only in the mezzo-soprano voice. She is now in the full meridian of her success, and Paris pays the round sum of fifty thousand francs every time it enjoys the pleasure of beholding her on the stage. Her bold upon that city is now complete; but in years gone by she was not so appreciated by the fickle Parisians, because she seemed to belong to them. In the same way the French peasant is never in love with his wife until she elopes with somebody.

In London, recently, a "Soirée des Coiffures" was given in the presence of a much delighted and amused concourse of people. There were twenty ladies sitting on a platform before twenty looking-glasses, having their hair dressed by twenty of the most skillful operators in London. The skill, celerity, and artistic knowledge displayed in perfecting some of these elaborate coiffures is said to have been marvelous. There were all kinds of fancy and historical bead-dresses, of the times of Marie Antoinette, Louis XIV., Louis XV., and the Directoire. Possibly the greatest triumph was a marvelous edifice of hair, designed to represent the billows of the ocean, on which a tiny model of a ship tossed as the wearer moved her head. This was called the "Frégate Fantaisie Louis XVI."

The Boston Courier says that probably no young couple ever got married without finding that in sending their invitations they had forgotten the people whom, of all others, they wished not to neglect. A happy way of repairing such a misfortune has been struck out by an audacious young man of this city, who, after his cards were all sent, announced the wedding in the newspapers in the usual formula, and added: "No cards." The people who didn't get any cards will think no one else did.

A young lady of twenty-eight summers, who attended a coffee party last week, said that before she entered the hall where the company was assembled she felt like an old maid, but when she saw the large number of maiden ladies present who were training their "wintry curls in such a spring-like way," she felt like a giddy girl again. This shows that age is only a comparative matter.

He held four jacks
(I had four queens),
He bet on them
Just forty beans.
(The betting was ret-hot.)

And when he called
Just forty more,
He held them still,
And even swore—
(Whilst I raked in the pot.)

A New York heiress who moves extensively in society, and who is noted for her good sense and generosity, has made it a rule to never permit an escort to any place of amusement to order a carriage, as she invariably uses her own. She gives as a reason for this custom that worthy young men, struggling for professional and social position, can not easily afford the expense from which they are released by her usage.

The epizöotic has again appeared in the East. Evidently this dread distemper has begun its westward march. Its coming might relieve labor distress if there were no "ifs." But when the epizöotic comes, and our drays stand idle, and our carriages roll theatrically no longer, and the sand-lot still hungers—what then? "Sand-lotter—will you work?" "No, I'll starve first."

Lo, the lean Indian, whose bewildered mind Sees naught of God in either cloud or wind; His soul proud science never taught to stray, It strayed itself, and now has lost its way. Simple nature to his hope has given, Beyond some cloud-capped hill, a sensual heaven. Some place where science can not grope its way, Nor learning cast within one feeble ray; No whites disturb, no Christians' stablish laws, But he can rest while work is done by squaws. To loaf contents his natural desire, He asks no angel's wings to get up higher; And if he did, no angel from the sky Would think of taking Lo up very high. But grant the burden of his Indian song— Go where he likes and take his dorg along.

To secure healthful growth, a city must have not only expansion but certain places, either within or very near its own limits, where its citizens may have the sort of "outings" which all demand. The Golden Gate Park is gradually filling part of this vital necessity to our municipal convenience. The projected park, within the Presidio reservation, will help things in the same direction. Sausalito, Oakland, San Rafael, San Mateo, a dozen other places not far away, are all attractive, and offer choice spots on which to while away an afternoon or a day. But trips to all these places are expensive. We need just what Golden Gate Park is already giving us, and what Presidio Park promises us. The California Street Railroad is doing a work almost missionary in its nature—while it is also, we are glad to know, "coining money"—in making these spots within such an easy-to-be-undertaken distance of the business heart of the city. The head of the family, who has toiled all week to provide for his wife and little ones, may leave his office early Saturday afternoon, and, taking a seat on the "dummy," at the corner of Kearny and California Streets, may be "bowled away in no time" to join his family at the end of the road, and enjoy with them "a country picnic" only a little distance beyond the fire limits of the busy city. The completion of the California Street road to Sixth Avenue, and to the Villa entrance of Golden Gate Park, will bring our "Central" within half an hour's delightful ride of Pine Street or Front Street. When it is taken into consideration that the California Street cable road has brought up the price of property along its line from "bed rock" to the present satisfactory rates, and that now it is extending its lines so as to ultimately connect Kearny Street with the ocean, we may be pardoned for thinking that the property-owners along its line, and, indeed, all San Francisco, owe it a debt of gratitude which mere patronage can scarcely repay.

That fat, rollicking boy, a year ago, was given up as incurable and lost. In our desperation, we put him on Hop Bitters, and there he is, tough and hardy as a knot.—Papa.

"Persons suffering from impure blood, or whose health is giving way, either as ministers or those who study closely, will find in Fellows' Syrup of Hypophosphites the material to build them up and the tonic to keep them there. DR. C. CLAY."

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery St.

Hackett & Dean, Dentists, No. 126 Kearny Street, Thurlow Block.

MORSE'S PALACE OF ART, 417 Montgomery St.

GRAND CONCERT BY THE LIEDERKRANZ
At Platt's Hall, April 10.

A. C. EIMER'S "SYMPHONIC"
Mass, "under the direction of the composer. Select Soloists, Grand Chorus and Orchestra. Tickets, $1.00, admitting gentleman and lady. Additional ladies' tickets, 50 cents each. Concert to commence at 8 P. M. sharp.

THE BALDWIN THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
R. M. EBERLE.....STAGE MANAGER.

FRENCH FLATS,

The most pronounced success ever known in San Francisco. Houses crowded nightly.

STANDING ROOM ONLY AT 7:30.

Hundreds turned away at every performance. Roars of laughter and tremendous applause on witnessing the funniest comedy ever acted.

FRENCH FLATS!

Every evening.

FIRST FRENCH FLATS MATINEE

To-day, Saturday, at 2 P. M.

This (Saturday) evening, April 3, first annual benefit of California Lodge, No. 12, B. P. O. Elks.

FRENCH FLATS!
AND OTHER ATTRACTIONS.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR AND MANAGER.

Mr. Locke begs to announce for production,

WEDNESDAY EVENING.....APRIL 7,

THE THE

ROYAL ROYAL

MIDDY! MIDDY!

From "Der Seekadet" of Richard Gruee, Esq.

A MUSICAL COMEDY IN THREE ACTS,
Now in its twelfth week at Daly's Theatre, New York.

THEATRE CLOSED MONDAY AND TUESDAY.

Seats at the Box Office.

J. A. HUNTER, M. D.,

No. 321 Sutter Street, devotes Special Attention to

Catarrh, Deafness,

Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, and all ailments of the Throat, Lungs, and Heart.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine.

HARLEQUIN PLAYING CARDS

"GEM" PUZZLE!

TWO PUZZLES IN ONE. SOMETHING NEW!

C. BEACH

107 MONTGOMERY STREET.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS---APRIL STYLES.

Send Stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRENCH, GERMAN & ENGLISH INSTITUTE

FOR YOUNG LADIES AND CHILDREN. 922 POST ST., between Hyde and Larkin. This well known Day and Boarding School, with Kindergarten, will reopen for the term on MONDAY, March 22, 1880. MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

HULLED, CRUSHED, STEAM-COOKED AND DESICCATED AMERICAN

BREAKFAST CEREALS.

A. B. C. WHITE WHEAT. A. B. C. WHITE OATS.

A. B. C. BARLEY FOOD. A. B. C. MAIZE.

The most Nutritious, Palatable, and Easily Digested of all Cereal Food.

A Necessity for the Rich, a Luxury for the Poor.

CAN BE PREPARED FOR THE TABLE IN TEN MINUTES.

FOR SALE BY

C. J. HAWLEY & CO., BENJ. SCHLOSS & CO., LEBENBAUM & CO., BOWEN BROS.,

And all first-class groceries. The trade supplied by JOHN T. CUTTING & CO., Sole Agents, 407 Front Street.

SPRING STYLE HATS

NOW INTRODUCED BY

HERRMANN

THE HATTER,

336 KEARNY STREET,

Between Bush and Pine Streets.

BRANCH, 910 MARKET ST., ABOVE STOCKTON.

As regards beauty and number of styles, Herrmann still leads.

Spring Catalogues now ready. Send for copy.

$5 to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

$72 a week. $12 a day at home easily made. Costly outfit free. Address TRUE & CO., Augusta, Maine.

STORAGE.

Furniture, Pianos, Pictures, Trunks, Carpets, etc., carefully stored in large, airy lofts.

Families leaving the City,

Or declining Housekeeping, are requested to call. Facilities the best possible. Terms moderate. Advances made. J. H. MOTT & CO., 647 Market Street (Nucleus Block).

NOOK FARM.

THIS PLEASANT COUNTRY

home is now open for the accommodation of guests. The many improvements made the present season add greatly to the beauty of the grounds and the health and comfort of the guests. Everything is cheerful, healthful, and homelike.

Only three-fourths of a mile from railroad station. Two trains to and from San Francisco and Oakland daily. For particulars address E. B. SMITH, Ruthford, Napa County, Cal.

HOME MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

406 California St., San Francisco.

Capital... (Paid up in Gold)... $300,000 00.
Assets, Jan. 1, 1880..... 591,106 34.

PRESIDENT.....J. F. HOUGHTON.
VICE-PRESIDENT.....L. L. BAKER.
SECRETARY.....CHARLES R. STORY.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS, REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,
No. 325 Montgomery Street,
Odd Fellows' Hall.

SCHOOL AT DRESDEN.

MRS. AURELIA BURRAGE, LATE

Principal of the School at 850 Van Ness Avenue, has opened a School for American Girls in Dresden, Germany. Terms $50 per month for board and tuition. For particulars apply to Miss West, 1001 Sutter Street, or address Mrs. Burrage, care of Dresden Bank, Dresden, Saxony.

J. DOHERTY,

PRACTICAL

Plumber, Gas and Steam Fitter,

345 KEARNY STREET, COR. PINE,

San Francisco, Cal

Etchings and Rare Engravings.

W. K. VICKERY INVITES ATTENTION

to his large collection of the above, which includes fine original Engravings from the great Paintings of Europe. Rare Portraits, either in collection or procured. A large number of fine Etchings in stock. Hours 1 to 5 o'clock.
126 KEARNY ST. (Thurlow Block), San Francisco.

WANTED!

Nos. 1 (March 25), 4 (April 15), of Vol. I of the ARGONAUT for 1877. Twenty-five cents will be paid for each of the above numbers at the ARGONAUT office, 522 California Street.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth (8th) day of March, 1880, an assessment (No. 62) of Two ($2) Dollars per share was levied upon the capital stock of the Corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the tenth (10th) day of April, 1880, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the twenty-eighth (28th) day of April, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.
E. L. PARKER, Secretary.

Office, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

INSTANTANEOUS RELIEF FOR CORNS, Bunions, Ingrowing Nails, Club Nails, etc.

CORNS, BUNIONS, ETC., WILL BE attended to without the use of knife, file, or acid, and without pain. Charges moderate. A. L. Y. LOEWENHORST, Chiropodist, 331 Kearny Street, between Bush and Pine Streets, Room 8. Office hours, 9 A. M. to 9 P. M. Sunday, 9 A. M. to 12 M.

EDWARD T. MARTIN

Has just received a choice stock of new designs in MENU AND DINNER CARDS?

Also a fine variety of

WRITING PAPERS AND PAPETERIE

In New Tints.

N. B.—Tiffany's New Harlequin Playing Cards, $2.50 per pack.

No. 5 Montgomery Street.

OH! BOYS!

A CHANCE FOR THE BOYS.

Boys wanted to sell the ARGONAUT on Saturday of each week.

Business for the boys;

Money for the boys.

From 50 cents to $5 profit made in a single day.

One thousand boys wanted to work up ARGONAUT routes for themselves, and get from $1 to $5 per week for a few hours' labor.

A steady thing when once started.

25 subscribers will guarantee to each boy $1 income per week.

50 subscribers $2 income per week.

75 subscribers $3 income per week.

100 subscribers $4 income per week.

And all for an hour's work of a Saturday.

Boys in this city have started with only three or four subscribers, and now have from one to two hundred each, and gaining every week.

One boy has a bank account of $135; another has saved up over $50, as the result of trying this experiment.

Let every boy desirous of earning a little spending money make his friends help him start a list.

Boys always have plenty of friends in their first business venture.

A single half-dollar is sufficient to make a beginning.

This is all the capital needed.

The very first week a profit, though ever so small, comes in.

The second week the profit increases.

Then the increase becomes a steady thing, and the boy is independent.

TRY IT, TRY IT.

Count up the relations, friends, and acquaintance, whom you think would take the paper.

Then start in next Saturday and deliver to as many subscribers as you can get.

You will be pleased with the result.

You will have independent spending money.

You will have a little business of your own.

You will have lots of fun.

If you conclude to try the experiment, try it at once.

This is a good time to begin.

Start on Saturday next.

Don't be discouraged at a small beginning, for tall oaks from little acorns grow.

The profit is well worth the time spent.

Success is a sure thing.

Nothing ventured nothing gained.

Show this to some gentleman friend and ask him to capitalize you for a start.

You can pay back the capital advanced the first week.

Then you are under no obligations.

Then you are a full fledged man of business.

For price of papers and further particulars inquire at this office.

REMEMBER, this is a chance for every boy.

One thousand boys wanted to try this experiment in every city, town, and village on the Pacific Coast.

There is money in it, and no possibility of failure or loss.

Call or send for particulars to the

ARGONAUT

PUBLISHER

CO.

522 C

LITERARY PERSONALS.

The Norwegian poet, Bjornstjerne Bjornson, offers his estate in Gandsdal, Norway, for sale, and proposes to make Munich, Bavaria, his permanent home. It will be remembered he had to fly from his country a short time ago to escape being tried for high treason. King Oscar, who during his leisure hours dabbles in literature, bitterly attacked a new work of the poet. Bjornson lost his temper, and not alone called the king a contemptible and malicious criticaster, but also, it is said, challenged him to fight a duel. This is how Norway came to lose her poet.

Bancroft, the historian, is now in the most excellent health, and works every day from five o'clock in the morning until lunch time. His great library-room is one of the most cheerful imaginable workshops. The floor is painted and polished, in dark color, and over it are spread neat, dark-red rugs. Easy-chairs are scattered about the room in great profusion. There is only one window in the room, but it is a large one and faces the south, so that the room is bathed in a perfect flood of wholesome sunshine nearly all day long. The walls of the room are lined and double-lined with books, reaching from the high ceiling to the floor. Books and manuscripts are scattered over the large desk in the centre, and upon almost every place where vacant space can be found.

Victor Hugo's sprightliness was exhibited at the supper lately given in honor of his birthday. He wept with true French emotion over the enthusiasm of his friends. He heartily embraced Sarah Bernhardt, who recited some verses at him. He made a pleasant speech; then he went home to Passy in a cab by himself, and, it was observed, put on no greatcoat, old as he is. In his speech he made some mention of the French press, which must have hugely pleased those members attending the supper. "The French press," he said, "is one of the masters of the human mind. Its task is daily; its work colossal. It acts at one and the same time and every minute on all parts of the civilized world."

Mr. Whittier's own statement of the origin of his poem of "Maud Muller" is quoted by a correspondent. He was driving with his sister through York, Me., and stopped at a harvest-field to inquire the way. A young girl raking hay near the stone wall stopped to answer their inquiries. Whittier noticed as she talked that she bashfully raked the hay around her bare feet, and she was fresh and fair. The little incident left its impression, and he wrote out the poem that very evening. "But if I had had any idea," he said, "that the plaguey little thing would have been so liked, I should have taken more pains with it." To the inquiry as to the title, "Maud Muller," it was suggested to him, and was not a selection. It came as the poem came. But he gives it the short German pronunciation, as Meuler, not the broad Yankee Muller.

The Spectator says of Beaconsfield as a novelist: Minds of the metallic order are hardly capable of either pathos or poetry, and all Mr. Disraeli's attempts at either have been flashy failures. In their piquant criticisms on society and politics, his novels, excepting Lothair, have always contained good reading. Their satire is pungent; their parodies of the ways of the world admirable. But as mirrors of human character and human nature in the larger sense, they are naught. They never get beyond persiflage. They photograph the trashy parts of life and passion, and miss all that is deep and real. Their mysticism is pure bombast, and their idealism pure glitter. They touch their highest point in delineating the talk of the club-room, but when they profess to plumb either a man's ambition or a woman's love, they become false, pretentious and hollow.

A correspondent writes: "It has been said of late that Mr. Emerson was growing old very fast, and was losing, in some respects, the use of his faculties. I found, in the two hours I remained with him, the only indication of this to be that matters of contemporaneous worldly importance are apt to be forgotten, and that very often he finds it difficult to recall the word that he wishes to use; but his intellect, when turned to the illumination of the themes in the contemplation of which his life has been spent is as clear, as grasping, as unapproached and unapproachable as ever. When asked if he had undergone a change of religious belief, he replied that he had seen no reason whatever for modifying the views he had held for so many years. He accompanied me to the door as I took my departure, putting me under additional obligations for his kindness by saying that he was 'an old man and saw very few visitors,' and I left him whose genius as a philosopher is unrivaled save by his virtues as a man."

Zola is a short, round, and fat man; black hair, black eyes—rather small, and always sheltered behind a double eye-glass—a black and closely-cropped beard, pale complexion, fine and small features, a round head, a high forehead—such are the distinguishing features of Zola, a man who rarely smiles, talks little. At the theatre you see Zola, during the entr'actes, leaning mournfully and sulkily against the wall of the couloir, and deigning now and then to accord a word of qualified praise to the piece which everybody else finds charming. He is full of sorrow and gloom, like his writings, in which he always dwells upon the mournful and repulsive aspect of things. In public, Zola always seems to be on the defensive. In his private coterie his own Olympian elevation, perhaps, embarrasses him a little, and leads him to exaggeration. His conversation is brusque and jerky, and his use of coarse and vulgar expressions is more frequent than agreeable. In fact, he makes a point of using a coarse word in preference to an ordinary and adequate one, provided that he has the choice of the two. He works four hours a day, from nine o'clock in the morning until one, during which time he writes, in a large, school-boy hand, the amount of some five printed pages; the next day he adds five more, and so on, with the steadiness and regularity of a machine, until the volume is finished. He then makes a few corrections, very few, and carries his annual tribute to the printer. In the evening, he corrects his proofs, does his correspondence, and writes his dramatic criticism.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

The Two Villages.

Over the river, on the hill,
Lies a village white and still;
All around it the forest trees
Shiver and whisper in the breeze;
Over it sailing shadows go
Of soaring hawk and screaming crow,
And mountain grasses, low and sweet,
Grow in the middle of every street.

Over the river, under the hill,
Another village lies still;
There I see in the cloudy night
Twinkling stars of household light,
Fires that gleam from the smithy's door,
Mists that curl on the river shore;
And in the roads no grasses grow,
For the wheels that hasten to and fro.

In that village on the hill
Never is sound of smithy or mill;
The houses are thatched with grass and flowers;
Never a clock to toll the hours;
The marble doors are always shut;
You can not enter in hall or hut;
All the villagers lie asleep;
Never a grain to sow or reap;
Never in dreams to moan or sigh,
Silent, and idle, and low they lie.

In that village under the hill,
When the night is starry and still,
Many a weary soul in prayer,
Looks to the other village there,
And, weeping and sighing, longs to go
Up to that home, from this below;
Longs to sleep in the forest wild,
Whether have vanished wife and child,
And hearth, praying, this answer fall—
"Patience! that village shall hold ye all."—Rose Terry.

Mephistopheles, General Dealer.

Who'll buy tresses, bonnie brown tresses?
Maidens and matrons, come and buy!
Here is one that was cut from a beggar
Crouching low down in a ditch to die.
Look at it, countess! envy it, duchess!
'Tis long and fine, and will suit you well;
Hers by nature, yours by purchase—
Beauty was only made to sell.

Who'll buy hair of lustrous yellow?
Maidens and matrons, 'tis bright as gold;
'Twas shorn from the head of a wretched pauper—
Starving with hunger, and bitter cold.
It bought her a supper, a bed, and a breakfast;
Buy it, fair ladies, whose locks are thin,
'Twill help to cheat the silly lovers
Who care not for heads that have brains within.

Who'll buy tresses, jet-black tresses?
Maidens and matrons, lose no time!
These raven locks, so sleek and glossy,
Belonged to a murderess red with crime.
The hangman's perquisite—worth a guinea!
Wear them, and flaunt them, good madame!
They'll make you look a little younger—
She was reality, you are a sham!

Who'll buy tresses, snow-white tresses?
Widows and matrons whose blood is cold,
Buy them and wear them, and show the scorners
You're not ashamed of growing old.
The face and the wig should pull together,
We all decay, but we need not dye;
But age as well as youth needs helping—
Snow-white tresses, come and buy!

Who'll buy hair of all shades and colors,
For masquerade and false pretense?
Padding, and make-believe, and swindle
That never deceive a man of sense!
Chignons! chignons! lovely chignons!
'Tis art, not nature, wins the day—
False hair, false forms, false hearts, false faces!
Marry them, boobies, for you may!

—Anonymous.

Beside the Bars.

Grandmother's knitting has lost its charm;
Unheeded it lies in her ample lap,
While the sunset's crimson, soft and warm,
Touches the frills of her snowy cap.

She is gazing on two beside the bars,
Under the maple—who little care
For the growing dusk, or the rising stars,
Or the hint of frost in the autumn air.

One is a slender slip of a girl,
And one a man in the pride of youth;
The maiden as pure as the purest pearl,
The lover strong in his steadfast truth.

"Sweet, my own, as a rose of June,"
He says, full low, o'er the golden head.
It would sound to her like a dear old tune,
Could grandmother hear the soft words said.

For it seems but a little while ago
Since under the maple, beside the bars,
She stood a girl, while the sunset's glow
Melted away 'mid the evening stars.

And one, her lover, so bright and brave,
Spoke words as tender, in tones as low;
They come to her now from beyond the grave,
The words of her darling so long ago.

"My own one, sweet as a rose in June!"
Her eyes are dim and her hair is white,
But her heart keeps time to the old love-tune,
As she watches her daughter's child to-night.

A world between them, perhaps you say;
Yes. One has read the story through;
One has her heartfelt yesterday,
And one to-morrow fair to view.

But little you dream how fond a prayer
Goes up to God through his silver stars,
From the aged woman gazing there,
For the two who linger beside the bars.

—Margaret E. Sangster.

THE RULING PASSION.

"Dress drains our cellar dry and keeps our larder lean."—COWPER.

The girls who wore cream and blue and cardinal crape shawls last summer, and looked very pretty in them, will find new shades this year.

Flame-colored tulips contrast well with all the shades of coachman's drab—which is a very ugly name for a very pretty color, when made up properly.

The sizes are marked on French-made shoes in centimetres, so that what in America would be about number five, in Paris is number forty. This fact will prevent American ladies from wearing French-made shoes. They don't like the sound of the thing.

Short skirts are shorter than ever this spring, when worn by the most fashionable women, and we are exceeding grateful.

Most absurd of the ornaments yet invented is an arrow with an olive in the barb. If we must go to the pickle jar for fashions, what pretty bonnets we shall have one of these days.

Sunflowers are ubiquitous. As if it were not enough to see them on walls and curtains and chair-backs, they now stare one in the face from the embroidered illusion which is used for bonnet crowns.

Pagodas, Cupids, birds in cages, flowers, and bells are all found in indefinite forms among the involved patterns of the brocades lately imported from France.

Women who abandon fresh white petticoats for those of black and colored foulards at the bidding of fashion deserve to lose their reputation for personal neatness. The difficulty of locomotion in a "balmoral" has been thoroughly proved during the reign of narrow skirts, and, except in bad weather, that clinging economy ought to be hung out of sight in the closet.

One of the prettiest summer fans, by no means likely to grow common, is composed of three ostrich feathers fastened by ribbon bows. Every ostrich feather that one has in the house will not do, for only the longest and fullest can be employed, and the colors must contrast nicely.

The profuse display of "old gold" in the costumes of the ladies of the present day serves to recall the jest of the famous George Selwyn. The beautiful Lady Coventry exhibited to him her gorgeous new robe, sparkling with spangles, and demanded his opinion of it. The wit replied: "Why, your ladyship will be change for a guinea."

The white gowns lately worn in Paris under winter mantles were anything but cheap, although they were called "peasant gowns." White velvet bordered with ostrich feathers and buttoned with pearls made the jacket, white silk pekin the skirt, and white felt trimmed with ostrich plumage the bonnet. The only color about the gown was the profanity of the husband or father who paid the bill.

"Josephine shawl" sounds very nice to ladies who are carefully informed by obliging salesmen that the shawls are made in imitation of those formerly ordered by the Empress Josephine and woven expressly for her. The truth is that the cape-like garments with pelerine ends and with borders of a design unlike that of the centre are sewed in America, being made out of the pieces of cashmere shawls that have been cut up to repair a more costly web.

The latest addition to the toilet is a large cross, worn suspended from the neck or waist. It is hollow, and contains one fair drink of brandy, gin, or whatever "vanity" the wearer affects. The fashion is English, and the article is a part of a lady's traveling outfit. This is to "bear the cross before the world" in a novel manner.

The wide-brimmed bonnets tied down over the ears which are now being introduced, come upon us like the fleeting memory of a dream. Never seen before in reality, they now recall the quaint woodcuts that adorned the juvenile literature of thirty years ago.

Worth has always had a fancy for combining pink and the bluish grays that are almost purples, and therefore no one is surprised that he should mingle rose-color and the new heliotrope tint, as he does in a dress recently imported for a Boston lady. The train of this gown is of heliotrope brocade, finished at the edge in leaf points that fall over a plaiting of rose-colored satin. The front of the skirt is of satin, crossed by two fringed scarfs, and the satin basque is finished by plaitings, from beneath which fall draperies of point lace.

Ladies who wear the new full skirts must submit to being unappreciated. The other night a young girl appeared at a Boston party, wearing a skirt with the regulation "four full breadths and one gored breadth," and looked with great contempt at the scant draperies of her friends, but, after she had been on the floor about an hour, she was astonished by hearing one youth say to another: "My gracious, Charlie, how did you have the courage to dance with that poor girl in the old-fashioned gown? The fellows are all laughing at her. It was good of you, but—" The young woman moved out of hearing at this point.

It is always pleasant to know exactly what things are called, and as the poet says, Dulce est decorum est, that is, it is a sweet and proper thing to snub a saleswoman by asking for an article by a name which is not known to her. There are a great many roses on the spring bonnets, and ordinarily persons ask for them by mentioning their color, but she who is skilled in millinery demands the "Bouquet d'Or" when she wants a golden-yellow rose; the "Madame Kuppenheim" when she desires a scarlet and salmon-colored blossom; an "Anna Diesbach" when she wishes bright pink petals; a "Paul Neyron" when she seems to have one of those vast flowers like peonies; a "Sombreuil" when she intends to adorn herself with a pale straw-colored rose with a pink heart; an "Eugene Fürst" when her bonnet seems to need a garnet rose, slightly tinted with reddish copper; a "Prince de Rohan" if she think that her complexion will endure wearing garnet, shot with flame-color.

"DOMESTIC" THE LIGHT RUNNING SEWING MACHINE.

It is PERFECT in every feature, and COMPLETE in all its details. It embodies all of the MODERN improvements that are of PROVED VALUE.

J. W. EVANS,
No. 29 POST STREET (MECHANICS' INSTITUTE BUILDING).

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

CHICKERING
PIANOS AT COST.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.
These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, no imitation.

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
COAL DEALERS.

Office and Yard, 14 Post Street.
Store Yard, 718 Sansome Street.

J. Middleton & Son, 419 Pine Street,
Opposite California Market.

All kinds of coal at lowest rates. Orders may be sent by telephone through any of the company's offices free.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED, DO hereby certify and declare that we have formed a partnership, under the firm name and style of the OAKLAND BAG MANUFACTURING COMPANY; that said partnership has for its object the manufacture and sale of all kinds and descriptions of jute fabrics; that its principal place of business is the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, having its works and factory in the City of Oakland, County of Alameda, State of California; that the names of all the members of such partnership and their places of residence are as follows, that is to say: WILLIAM SCHOLLE, residing at Number Twelve Hundred and Thirty-four Post Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California; ISRAEL CAHN, residing at Number Eleven Hundred and Twenty Post Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California; and JOSEPH BRANDENSTEIN, residing in the Town of Alameda, County of Alameda, State of California. Dated March 16, 1880.

WILLIAM SCHOLLE,
ISRAEL CAHN,
J. BRANDENSTEIN.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, ss.
On this Eighteenth (18th) day of March, A. D. One Thousand Eight Hundred and Eighty, before me, James Mason, a Notary Public in and for said city and county, personally appeared William Scholle, Israel Cahn, and Joseph Brandenstein, known to me to be the persons respectively named and described in, and whose names are subscribed to, the within and foregoing certificate of partnership, and they severally duly acknowledged to me that they executed the same respectively.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal the day and year in this certificate first above written.

[NOTARIAL SEAL] JAMES MASON, Notary Public.
Endorsed—Filed March 18, 1880.
WILLIAM A. STUART, Clerk.
By J. WHALEN, Deputy Clerk.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—ESTATE of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator, at No. 327 Pine Street, in the city of San Francisco, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California. HENRY A. NEWTON, Administrator of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased. San Francisco, March 10, 1880.
SAFFOLD & MEUX, Attorneys.

OFFER EXTRAORDINARY!

THE Automatic

THE ONLY LIGHT RUNNING AND NOISELESS SEWING MACHINE made. It has no Bobbins, no Shuttle, no Tension. It is sold wholly upon its merits.

We hereby offer to parties who have owned an Automatic for Six Months and are dissatisfied, a New Machine of any other make, on even exchange. No other Company dare make such an offer.

WILCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.

124 Post Street, San Francisco, and 361 Twelfth Street, Oakland.

The ARGONAUT is Printed with Ink Manufactured by

SHATTUCK & FLETCHER,

520 Commercial Street, San Francisco.

STORES AND PRIVATE RESIDENCES.

PROTECT YOUR FRONT DOORS AND CARPETS FROM THE SUN by getting

AWNINGS

—AT—

E. DETRICK & CO.'S, NO. 123 CLAY ST.

Call and examine our NEW STYLES for 1880. TENTS and CAMPERS' OUTFITS. Tents let for the Season.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

—THE—

NEW WESTERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

APRIL NUMBER NOW ON SALE.

The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.
The Californian. April Number.

CONTENTS:

SAND. Chapter IV.....J. W. GALLY.
THE STORY OF AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND.....R. E. DESMOND.
THE HERMIT OF TREASURE PEAKS.....SAM DAVIS.
PALLAS.....CHAS. H. PHELPS.
SHEPHERDS AND SHEEP-HERDING II.....ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.
AT AGUA TIBIA.....AGNES M. MANNING.
AMERICANISM IN LITERATURE.....EDGAR FAWCETT.
CAPTAIN MOLLY.....E. M. LUDLUM.
THE ETHICS OF SUICIDE.....ALBERT WILLIAMS.
OUR OPHIDIAN FRIEND.....JOHN VANCE CHENEY.
NOTABLE AUTOGRAPHS.....POURQUOI.
RUBY.....J. H. S. BUGEIA.
ARIZONA.....JAMES WYATT OATES.
A GLIMPSE OF THE UNUSUAL.....W. C. MORROW.
OUTCROPPINGS.....

About Pets.—Waiting for the Galleon.—Pencil Shavings.—Ike Gives his Opinion on Total Depravity.—A Stroll Through Chinatown.—A Vaquero's Love Song.—Under the Smilax.—Winter Rain.—The Voice of the Sea.—Elsie.

One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.
One Hundred Pages. Twenty-five Cents.

SEE THE APRIL NUMBER OF THE CALIFORNIAN!

FOR SALE BY NEWSDEALERS AND THE TRADE GENERALLY.

THE ONE PRICE
DRY GOODS HOUSE.

42, 44, AND 46 THIRD STREET.

KID GLOVES A SPECIALTY.

6-Button, first quality.....$1 75 | 3-Button, first quality.....$1 40
4-Button, first quality.....1 50 | 6-Button, second quality.....1 50
4-Button, second quality.....$1 25.

Lace-top Lisle and Silk Gloves, from 50 cents and upwards. Our Kid Gloves are the best fitting and most durable. PEIXOTTO & SILVERMAN, Importers.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.,

SHIPPING AND

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.
Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt.

C. F. SHEPFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

PACIFIC

SAW MANUFACTURING CO.

17 AND 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

SAWS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION
on hand and made to order. Agents for C. B. Paul's Files.

Repairing of all kinds done at short notice.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

H. L. DODGE.....L. H. SWEENEY.....J. E. RUGGLES

DODGE, SWEENEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS,

Wholesale Provision Dealers,

.....AND.....

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Nos. 114 and 116 Market, and 11 and 13 California Sts.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.,

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR Street.

Liberal advances made on consignments.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

English and American BICYCLES.

KEPT IN STOCK

And imported to order.

Prices only $5 over those in Boston.

LORING CUNNINGHAM

No. 206 Sansome Street, office of Macondray & Co., S. F.

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE.—THE TRADE AND THE

Public are informed that we receive the Genuine LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAMPAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular Invoice. Each case is marked upon the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRAY & CO.,

Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, CITY

and County of San Francisco, State of California, Department No. 10. In the matter of the petition of JAMES M. SHORES, an insolvent debtor. Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Charles Halsey, Judge of said Superior Court, notice is hereby given to all creditors of the said insolvent JAMES M. SHORES to be and appear before the Hon. Charles Halsey, Judge as aforesaid, in open court, at the court-room of said court, in the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on TUESDAY, the 27th day of April, A. D. 1880, at 11 o'clock A. M. of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the prayer of said insolvent should not be granted, and an assignment of his estate be made, and he be discharged from his debts and liabilities, whether perfectly or imperfectly described, or not described at all in the schedule filed herein, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided; and in the meantime all proceedings against said insolvent be stayed.

Witness my hand and the seal of said court this 22d day of March, A. D. 1880.

[SEAL] WILLIAM A. STUART, Clerk.

By JOHN H. HARNEY, Deputy Clerk.

WM. H. H. HART, Atty for Petitioner, 230 Montgomery Street.

DANIEL GIOVANNINI,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

dealer in Wood, Coal, Charcoal, and Coke, 816 Pacific Street, between Stockton and Powell. Charcoal Depot.—Charcoal for sale in lots to suit, from 1 to 10,000 sacks.

The Argonaut.

VOL. VI. NO. 15.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 10, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LOS ANGELES, March 27, 1880.

It was a pleasant change to leave San Francisco, its politics and hard times, its dissensions and controversies, its Kearneys and Kallochs, its newspapers, and other unpleasant things, for a trip to Arizona. Sandy deserts, broad plains, cactus, greasewood, and mesquite shrubs are not altogether interesting in themselves, but they are most refreshing and consolatory in contrast with the angry passions of demagogues, the blasphemous scandals of the Sand-lot, and the pharisaical blackguardism of our Hard-shell Baptist Mayor. It was again a pleasant change, after spending a week in Arizona, to be whirled back from the land of the Apache to the land of civilization—from the land of sandy deserts and widely-extended cactus plains to the beautiful and fertile valleys of California. Our party left Tucson at three o'clock on the morning of March 24th, and in less than thirty hours we stepped from our comfortable silver palace-car to a clean and comfortable hotel at Colton. All that night it had been raining. The bright morning sun was reflected from millions of diamond drops, sparkling on leaf and shrub. The atmosphere was laden with perfumes, the breath of the honey-bee was in the air.

Let me for a moment pause and apostrophize the railroad cars as they depart, leaving us to visit the valley of San Bernardino and Riverside. Tom Fitch, in his speech at the Tucson dinner, styled the railroad the "black cavalry of commerce," and, in some fanciful imagery of his poetic imagination, likened the double steel track to a swiftly-flowing river, bearing upon its surface to the inland continent all the treasures garnered from other continents. It was a bold and audacious undertaking for Messrs. Stanford and Crocker, and their associates, to undertake to lay the rails from the Bay of San Francisco to the Gulf of Mexico, across these treeless and arid plains. It was a bold confidence that gave them heart to pour out their millions for this realization of the old Spanish navigators' dream of the new-found route to India. It was an enterprise that no personal effort had ever before equaled, and one which the combinations of governments have not often excelled—a transcontinental railroad from the Pacific to the Atlantic, without aid of Government or the subsidy of lands. I believe I do not write prematurely of this enterprise, as I have the personal assurance of both Governor Stanford and Mr. Charles Crocker that it will reach to San Antonio, in Texas, in less than two years. I have seen the road as it is being pushed by its energetic builder, Mr. Stronbridge. I have seen, away out on the mesa beyond Tucson, a thousand miles from San Francisco, acres of ties and miles and miles of rails. I saw the graders ahead of the track-layers, and the engineers ahead of the graders—hundreds of men at work, heading eastward with energy, enthusiasm, and money.

San Antonio is connected with the Gulf of Mexico by rail now. Construction of the road westward will shortly be begun at San Antonio, and as the distance between this place and the present Southern Pacific terminus is only about seven hundred miles, I think I need not doubt the completion of the work within the time promised, viz., two years. The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Road also promises to make San Francisco or San Diego one of its terminal points on the Pacific. This road is pushed with energy, and an apparent abundance of means, but I do not believe it intends to come within the boundary of our State. It may be going to Guaymas. It works as though it were in earnest in this; but a few loads of iron and a few hundreds of Chinese shipped to this obscure little port upon the Gulf of California does not justify any display of enthusiasm over the fact that the company intends to build the road to Guaymas. That the company will come to San Francisco along a line for twelve hundred miles parallel with one already constructed, I doubt. Money does not, as a rule, do foolish things. The company will make money by building so long as it can put bonds upon the road more than it costs to construct. So long as those conditions last it will build; and if the people of Boston or England think their money safely invested in a railroad through Mexico to the mud huts upon the banks of the Gulf of California, and can delude themselves that this pueblo is to become a great commercial emporium, we shall all rejoice at their confidence. I am not afraid that our city will be disastrously affected by others upon the Pacific Coast, and every line of road upon this western shore will develop the country and contribute to the prosperity of San Francisco. We shall be glad to have an English Halifax upon our northern coast, a Portland at Puget Sound, a Boston at the mouth of the Columbia, a Philadelphia at Monterey, a Baltimore at Los Angeles, and as many Charllestons, Mobiles, and New Orleans as can be crowded between the harbor at Wilmington and San Diego. We shall be content to remain the New York of the Pacific. We need not be disturbed by the idea that shorter routes on sea and land will much affect the great currents of trade. Steamships with abundance of coal, and ships with bellying sails, annihilate both time and space.

But the gong of the Transcontinental Hotel at Colton sounds, and I go to breakfast. While my hot cakes and mutton chops were cooking, I had just time to reflect that this southern railroad, in opening up the treasure-box of Arizona, and in giving us a vast interior trade, and in connecting us with the Atlantic in direct route to Liverpool, is a great boon to California and is a great advantage to San Francisco. After breakfast I took a carriage and drove some miles to old San Bernardino—one of the very prettiest villages in the whole State of California; one of the best watered—running brooks crossing it in every direction, artesian wells pouring out their pure waters five feet above the surface; rich lands; orange orchards, fairly loaded down with their great golden fruit; shabby farming, shabby old houses, shabby fences, dilapidation, shiftlessness, Mormonism, Democracy, on all sides. A splendid valley, but represented in the Senate by Mr. Scattergood, a Democratic Sand-lotter. I saw his sign upon a little old dilapidated village shanty—"Attorney at Law," etc.—held my nose and drove hurriedly by. There is some excuse for the poor, ignorant alien, whose idea of political privilege is the right to steal his more fortunate neighbor's accumulation; but for an American, unless he be a Kalloch Baptist, or a forty-wived Mormon, I find no apology.

Returning to Colton, my wife and I drove to Riverside, crossing the San Bernardino six miles away. If my readers will remember all I said in reference to the Central Colony at Fresno, my enthusiasm over the fact that industrious families could obtain an independent and comfortable maintenance off twenty acres of land there in the centre of that great, uninteresting plain of the San Joaquin, they may appreciate my greater delight and pleasure at visiting the colony at Riverside. I do not intend to unsay or qualify anything I said of the Fresno colony, and I do not admit that I have seen any raisins in any part of the State equaling those sent me by Miss Austin from her Fresno plantation of twenty acres. But this was a beautiful day in spring; it had rained all the night before, and the air was laden with fragrance; the phaeton was comfortable, the horse was spirited, the breakfast was good, my wife was amiable. The mountain-range that bordered the drive was clothed with wild flowers; the fields were green with crops of promising grain; a great broad canal was carrying its waters along the drive to Riverside, and in the distance we saw the groves, and above the groves the curling, lazy, blue smoke of cottage and farm-house breakfast-fires. Along at our right lay the rich bottom-lands of the San Bernardino. We drove into and all over Riverside; criss-crossed through all its by-ways, away, down its seven miles of straight, splendid avenues, and looked down five miles more, newly laid out; passed cottages, and some almost shanties, but all clean, all comfortable, all pretty; passed great, beautiful, luxurious, and costly houses—one that of Mrs. LeGrand Lockwood, one belonging to a Mr. Benedict, others the names of whose owners we did not learn; and all the way, everywhere—in lanes and avenues and by-ways—we saw orange-groves; orange orchards in fruit, in blossom; orchards just planted; orange nurseries; vineyards—some in bearing, some just planted. Orange groves and vines on every side, and we inquired of every man we met; talked over fences with men at the plow, men pruning, planting, watering. They talked of nothing but oranges and raisins—nothing else to talk about. And we brought away from Riverside the impression that a highly-cultured, intelligent, and well-to-do people had, by system, order, and industry, converted this upper bench-land of San Bernardino Valley into a paradise—literally, a land of plenty, flowing with milk and honey. The holdings are from ten to twenty acres in extent; there is cheap and abundant water; the climate is agreeable; the soil is adapted to its purpose. We found only one place billed "For Sale." I asked a score of people if they would sell, and found, without exception, content. There could not be such a thing as a tramp in such a community. The Riverside House, where we lunched, was a large, comfortable, broad-roomed, clean house, with every indication about it of comfort—good wines and good milk.

I obtained a hasty memorandum concerning the raisin and orange culture from a gentleman whose name I do not know, and for the correctness of whose figures I crave pardon for cautioning my readers, as he informed me he was a reformed colporteur, or tract-distributor, or something of that kind: Land costs from $50 to $100 per acre. The first year's labor in preparing it for grape-planting is $25 per acre; roots, $6.50 per acre; planting, $22.50 per acre; irrigation, $2.50 per acre annually. Raisin-grapes will produce the first year, nothing; the second year, nothing; the third year, $25 an acre net profit over all cost of working and irrigation; fourth year, $100; fifth year, $300; sixth year, and for all future time, $500 per acre. The market for raisins is the whole world; the product, in point of quality, is equal to that of Malaga; the work can be done by women and children. For orange culture, the price of land and the cost of its preparation for planting are the same, excepting that the orange tree at the nursery varies in price, according to its age or character—three and four-year-old trees, one dollar each; younger, down to ten cents. A standard orange bears at nine, ten, eleven, and twelve years from the seed, and is considered in full bearing at twelve years. The grafted fruit begins to bear at four years. Strange to say, seedlings and grafted produce the same fruit, grafted a little the larger. One hundred and eight trees are planted to the acre. A full-bearing standard seedling will produce from one to four thousand oranges annually. The rule is to bear a fuller crop on alternate years; the off-year has the best fruit, and commands a somewhat higher price. Persons in a hurry to get fruit may bud trees on roots from three to four years old. Trees are planted when two years from the bud, and will bear second year from planting. Such trees are for sale in nurseries; the prices I did not learn. As we drove out from this most delightful settlement, I reflected on what might be done in California if people only had the sense and contentment of these colonists. Think of the millions and millions of acres of our fertile and lovely valleys now held by the avaricious land-shark. Think of the millions and millions of dry, useless, and unoccupied lands, with the water running waste to the sea, only awaiting brains and muscle to make this the richest, happiest land in the world. Think of the future greatness, wealth, and power of a State where twenty or sixty acres of its soil will maintain in ease and abundance an industrious family, and think of the miserable blasphemers in the city who mock the bounty of their God by inciting an ignorant and alien mob to complain that their destinies are cast within the reach of all these blessings, so that they may live at ease in a municipal office.

The next day we visited Pasadena, a colony from Indiana, located in the valley of Los Angeles, and within ten miles of the town. The same general features, the same evidence of industry, order, and plenty, the same evidence that water, with limited and well-tilled acres, will richly remunerate the toiler. From the Sierra Madre Villa, a few miles beyond Pasadena, we overlook the valley of the Los Angeles, lying between the Sierra Madre and the ocean—1,750,000 acres of rich valley land, all capable of irrigation, all capable of producing semi-tropical fruits. This valley is sheltered on the west, north, and south by mountain ranges, and is open on one side to the sea. It is interlaced by five railroads. It has a good seaport. It has an hundred thousand acres of fat corn-land, that needs no irrigation. Los Angeles is a land of corn and wheat, of hogs and packing-houses for pork and bacon, and of mills, as well as of orchards and vineyards; and what is best of all, it lies right at the door of the great consuming, non-producing treasure house of Arizona. When its greasers and land-monopolists all die out, it will be a good place for men and women to live who are willing to work. The Los Angeles folk soured on the Argonaut once because it said—what is manifestly true—that the northern is the better part of the State of California, and that there was a heap of bosh and nonsense being continually written about the land of the orange and the vine, the pomegranate and the olive; and that to read the prospectuses of immigration societies and land speculators, Eastern people were led to believe that full-grown orange groves and vine-covered cottages, with a Jersey cow, were provided for every immigrant who came to Los Angeles or Santa Barbara. The fact is, you can not sit under the vine, nor get figs at the corner grocery, unless you plant a vine, wait for it to grow, and have money to purchase figs until you grow the trees.

In conversation with Judge Sepulveda, of Los Angeles, he suggested that the Americans make the best colonists. They have more tact, adaptability, and genius; are more prolific in expedients. I use his language. The settlement at Anaheim, which is a very flourishing one, is composed mostly of Germans. The colonies of Riverside, Pasadena, Orange, and Westminster are largely, in fact almost entirely, American. There is in Oregon, in the valley of the Willamette, a colony of Hollanders, who are prospering. The Central Colony, of Fresno, is American, and is also a prosperous one. The colony of Lompoc, in Santa Barbara County, I am informed—for I have never visited it—is not altogether a success. What the causes are that have withheld from it the prosperity of other communities I am not advised.

If any one chooses to be tickled with the feather of a pen, and desires to grow rich in his imagination by seeing me make figures that will most audaciously lie, just go through the following calculation of the products of an orange orchard at Riverside, taking the maximum of oranges upon a tree, and the maximum price paid by Lusk & Co, fruit-dealers of San Francisco, for prize oranges—say $6 a hundred: 160 acres of land, with 108 trees to an acre, gives 17,280 trees; 4,000 oranges to a tree, we have 69,120,000 oranges. These, at $6 a hundred, give the eloquent total of $4,147,200. Even if the orchard was only eighty acres, the income would be satisfactory. If Los Angeles County contains 1,750,000 acres of orange land, the same calculation would enable it to produce 756,000,000 oranges, which, sold by Lusk & Co., or sucked by the Papago children of Arizona, at six cents each, would give us the magnificent result of $47,360,000,000! It is so easy to make figures, like Colonel Sellers: "Four hundred millions of people in China; each one with two eyes; every eye sore; all demanding eye-water at six bits a bottle, that costs a dollar a barrel. There's millions in it!" The truth is sober, and soberly clad; and the fact is that in the county of Los Angeles, as elsewhere, the blue-eyed goddess of plenty is in no wise allied to the divinity who presides over games of chance. Industry, economy, sobriety and toil tell in orange-groves and vineyards and under sunny skies as well as in less inviting places; and the south is the very devil of a country to grow lazy in.

It seems almost too bad that two broad-backed and stalwart Irishmen and the colossal Hans Steinmann should be compelled to break stones for six months in the House of Correction, and pay one thousand dollars each for the privilege, when they might earn four dollars and a half per day mining in Arizona. If the House of Correction could require a laundress and chaplain, we take recommending Mrs. Smith and the Reverend

DADDY LONG-LEGS.

Or the Man with the Awfully Awful Name.

Tobias Bilesbach was afflicted not only in name, but his face and his long lank figure verged upon ugliness. He had a peculiar bend of the back and an uplifting of the shoulders that gave an impression of reality to his name.

Alas! there is much in a name. Tobias had found it so, for his had been a heavy burden from the days when the thronging imps of the old school-house shouted after him in tones of that condensed, concentrated, double-distilled meanness, of which the school-boy still remains champion:

"Biles-on-his-back! Two-pious! Bi-iles-on-his-back!"

to the time when the girls at singing-school were wont to giggle—or, worse yet, try not to—when some smart beau exclaimed, with jocular familiarity: "Hello, Biles, how's your back?" In the days of manhood he was often greeted, seriously, as Mr. Boilsback, and Boilhisback, and so on through an endless category of ridiculous torturings of a ridiculous name.

Had he possessed half the stupidity of his tormentors, had his mental cuticle been as elephantine, he would have laughed them down; but Tobias was sensitive, "thin skinned," and the shafts of their spurious wit, clumsy as they were, pierced and wounded and rankled in his heart. He grew misanthropic; he shunned people, but he cleaved to books. What other youths of his acquaintance spent upon dress and the sometimes costly pleasures of society, Tobias lavished upon his library. Thus, while he grew silent, shy, and awkward in manner, and acquired that peculiar stoop of the shoulders, his mind became a flower of culture, blossoming into rare fancies that ripened into the fullness of profound thought. What became of it all I can not tell; Tobias had not the gift of expression—perhaps it had perished in the overpowering shyness born of his ugly name. It may be that his beautiful thoughts were not lost, but borne out into the universe and woven into its music, to become the inspiration of others—who can tell? The orator, standing in pride of conscious power before an audience who laugh and weep and thrill with heroism as he sweeps them along on the stream of his "silver utterances"—the author, climbing to fame by the outpouring of his beautiful thoughts—may he give life to the very ideas of poor Tobias Bilesbach; indeed, I know that often, in his reading or listening, he has exclaimed:

"Wby, I've thought of that, only I could never put it into words."

In his own community Tobias was respected, if not admired. He was known to be gentle of heart, pure of life, and sound of judgment; his elders, at least, gave him credit for all this, though the young swells would say, in supreme disdain: "Deuced unsocial fellow, that chap with the eruptive name. Might as well talk to a lamp-post as to try to draw him into conversation."

If ever a sensible, far-seeing father or mother ventured to suggest to a daughter that Tobias was worth all the rest of the young men put together, oceans of scorn surged around them.

"That old stupid! and uglier than Time. Though, if he were as handsome as Apollo, I wouldn't marry him with such a name. Mrs. Bilesbach—ugh!"

Tobias was far enough from putting them to the test; he had no idea of imposing his name upon any woman or child.

It is true, there was a girl, a glorified being, the embodiment of all beautiful ideas, who, metaphorically speaking, took Tobias right off his feet. When the sunshine blended with the rich tints of her brown hair, when she raised her dark blue eyes—those fathomless seas of light—and the delicate color flushed her soft, oval cheeks, and her lips just parted in that sweet smiling, or, above all, when she talked with Tobias, in speech so filled with gracious sweetness, he was thrilled from head to foot, and that was a long way.

This girl smiled—she never simpered; and her laugh was a clear out-ringing of purest melody. She used none of the vapid forms of society speech; but, in her simple English, she uttered such bright thoughts—such good, womanly thoughts. She lent a grace even to common words; and when she said "Bilesbach," with that little touch of German accent, and a kind of tender lingering on the vowels, it was for Tobias as a new revelation; he thought it heavenly—the very soul of the name purified from all hard, unharmonious sound, and all possibility of ridicule. He looked at her in mute, adoring gratitude; his soul was in his eyes, and she saw it—the beautiful soul of "homely" Tobias Bilesbach.

"Theodora Howard. Theodora—gift of God. It's a beautiful name," sighed Tobias, when, alone in his retreat, he thought of her and mused upon her loveliness.

He saw her but seldom in reality, yet in imagination she was ever with him, though he was half unconscious of it. Tobias never for a moment entertained the idea of falling in love—that is, as an intention—for he must have had his tender dreams of what life might have been to him under other circumstances; still, he meant never to marry, and, therefore, never to fall in love. Now, we all know that when a man makes that resolve it is all over with his heart—the drawbridge is up, and the very punctilious little god of Love—who never, upon any pretext, goes where he is not cordially invited—has no choice left him but to run weeping to his mother, and sharpen up his shafts for somebody else. We have all noticed this. By "we" I mean "us," but not including Tobias, "and people of that ilk."

An only child was Tobias—he was glad of it; it was a comfort to think that his abominable name would end with himself. His father was dead; his mother—gentle, yet strong as adamant in her love for her boy—was fading slowly away.

"There is only one thing that troubles me, my dearest—that is, to leave you, to have you miss my visible, tangible presence. But I want you to remember this: I don't know where heaven is; I have no idea of its similitude; yet of this I feel assured, be it near or far, mother's love will reach you, will answer to your every call. If you have faith to believe this, it will be easy for me to die, to go a little while before you to your father. Can you believe it, dear?"

He did believe that his mother's love would endure through eternity, would expand as her soul developed its capacity for spiritual life; that God, upon whose attribute of Fatherhood we lean our timorous hearts, would never count a human parent's love as dross. He could say this to his mother—he could always talk with her, almost as freely as he thought.

Her soul was comforted, and turning upon him a lingering look of ineffable love, as if she wished so to fill his heart with it that it should never fail him, she closed her eyes and fell asleep, still smiling.

Tobias was alone in the world. There was no touch of tender hand, or sweet caress of human speech, or loving, smiling eyes for him—none. At least Tobias thought so, and nearly every one else looked at it in the same way. Yet there was one who knew that a different state of things was possible, one very angelic yet very human being—Theodora.

Theodora admired Tobias, and understood him; or, she understood him, and, therefore, admired him. State it as you please, it amounted to the same thing: she loved him—loved even his name, and would gladly, proudly have exchanged for it the ancient, honorable, and euphonious name of Howard. As for his plain features, she really never saw them, any more than one sees the frame of a glorious picture, or the casket in which a marvelous jewel gleams. To be sure, there are people who scrutinize the frame, and smell the casket to know if it is real Russia leather. But Theodora was not that kind of a girl. Oh, if she could have gone to poor, lonely, heart-broken Tobias, and put her little, soft, warm hand in his, and said: "Tobias, I love you, fondly, faithfully, and I know that you love me. Are you going to ruin both our lives for a whim?" How long do you suppose it would have taken her to argue down his foolish, morbid notion? Then what a world it would have been!

But she could not do it—that is one of the world's heart-breaking laws. So it happened that Tobias broke up the old home, sold it to strangers; sold his books, sold everything but a few mementoes of his father and mother, and disappeared from his native town. And Theodora? Ah, well, shall a woman mourn forever for a man who runs away from her like a coward?

Among the mountains of California, with their rugged, sun-kissed hills and hollows, where many a hunted creature seeks a sheltering nook, a woman had found refuge—a widow and her two young sons. Robbed and wounded, they had been left by the terrible Jericho Road; and, after priest and Levite had passed by on the other side, came the Samaritan. Thank heaven for the good Samaritans!

This one, the Widow Allison's Samaritan, was of the mountains—like them rough and rugged, with just such sunny places in his nature. It did one good to look at him: a great, strong, kindly man; it seemed as if trouble and ill-fortune would stand no chance at all with him.

When he found the widow and her boys—that is, when God had directed him toward them—all his great, warm heart was filled with compassion.

"It's pretty rough if there isn't a good place in all California for a woman and two fatherless boys; and there is one, I know; only wait and it'll be found. I'm a great believer in Providence, Mrs. Allison, and so is Matilda—that's my wife—and we try to build it into the children's hearts as they are growing up; there's a thundering lot of 'em, too; not quite such thoroughbreds as your boys here, but pretty fair—pretty fair, now, I tell you! But I was going to say—there's the Cameron's ranch, next to mine. Cameron lives in Frisco, and I work his ranch on shares. There's a house on it, rough but snug; there's a nice little orchard and vineyard, too, and a garden spot. Seems to me it would be a pretty comfortable place for you, for a while. There's another idea in my mind: if you could teach my youngsters for a few hours a day, it would be a grand thing. There's no school anywhere near us. There's the Stevens children, too; I guess they'd be glad to have you take them in hand. Pretty high-toned, the Stevens are, but good neighbors, nice folks. We'd pay you well for your trouble, and maybe you wouldn't be so lonesome with the children around you. Think you'd be willing to try it? Well, come up and talk it over with Matilda and Mrs. Stevens."

Mountain ranches, as a general thing, have very little beauty that is not of the Lord's creation. In the way of buildings, and other evidences of human skill and care, they are poor indeed. The Retreat was no exception. Mr. Cameron had obtained it in "a trade," had given it in charge of his friend Samson, and paid no further attention to it—that is, in the way of improvements. It was to him chiefly a camping-place, where he spent a few weeks in the summer and a few days in the hunting season. Mrs. Allison found the house as Mr. Samson had described it, "rough, but snug." There were two rooms, and a "shakey" lean-to that served as kitchen; the walls were of rough, weather-stained boards, the roof unceiled, and the rafters and shingles—black with rain and smoke—were festooned with dust-laden cobwebs, and dotted with spiders' nests and great cocoons; a nest of yellow-jackets added variety to the decorations. But the distinguishing glory of the place was a pair of bats that dwelt in some dim recess of that mysterious upper region. At night, when the widow lay broad awake, thinking, planning, or, it may be, grieving for her past, and the red light from the great, rough fire-place shone in upon the gloom, she could see the festive pair circling and swooping above her. She had always felt afraid of bats, they looked so foul and impish; in her childhood she had read an ancient copy of Pilgrim's Progress, and had been horribly fascinated by one of its rude cuts, representing Apollyon as a huge vampire; she could never see a bat without thinking of it. She also remembered a tradition that they tangle themselves in the hair; and she carefully hid her abundant tresses beneath a cap.

"You'd better change beds with us, mamma. It would take a pretty smart bat to get tangled in our hair, wouldn't it, Dick?" said Harry, passing his hand over his closely-cropped head.

Ants and spiders were abundant and intimate; but for real sociable friendship, there were the "daddy long-legs," or "daddies," as the boys called them; myriads of them gathered in colonies here and there, in corner and crevice; at night they came out and ramped and tramped over everything and everybody—hush them away, and back they would come in haste, persistent little pests. But, after all, they did not feel much troubled by them; there were never many of them abroad at once, and they were clean, innocent-looking little creatures, and droll, if you studied them. The boys made pets of them, fed them, teased them, tied bright silken threads around their legs and drove them about on the table, while their mother sat by and sewed for them, for the boys,

Two boys to be kept from tatters—it was no joke. All their soft, fine underclothing was worn out, and she was a little troubled about getting more.

Her courage nearly failed her sometimes. It was especially weak one night near Thanksgiving time, when she sat alone, writing to distant friends. Out of doors an owl was sounding his dismal serenade to the plaintive accompaniment of the creek that ran disconsolately down the lonely gulch. She could think just how the first stood, weird and spectral, against the sky, and how dark and fearful were the gorges. In doors, a fire burned bright and cheering; the bats were "at it again," and the "daddies" were abroad; and her troubles seemed to have gathered in full force, and paraded themselves before her, crying out and importuning her: "Here we are; look at us; think of us; pity us!"

Thanksgiving day was so near. Oh, how cruel are these feasts when the soul is in sackcloth, and the heart a burden of anguish hidden 'neath the holiday smile! One may get bravely over the busy working days; but when the world pauses in its rushing to ring the bells for gladness, and calls you to join its chorus, that is bard to bear. "Jubilante, jubilante!" sing the lips, and "De profundis!" wails the heart.

One by one, visions of the dead Thanksgiving days—true feasts of the joyous soul—passed before her, though between them and her was the great gulf of the Past; and the cruel, mocking Present cried: "Come, sing to me!"

Around and around swept the bats, in their "dim-lighted region of Weir," the cry of the owls pierced the awful stillness of the mountains, the creek ran on in endless complaining, and the night-wind sobbed and sighed through the firs.

Mr. Cameron was coming to occupy his ranch. "Going to fix it up," the Samaritan had told her, and added:

"It must be that he's going to get married. I don't believe he would ever think of 'batching' it here; he ain't the kind of man to take care of himself."

"I thought he was married."

"Bless you, no! He's a bachelor of long standing, awful long standing," said the Samaritan, enlarging upon his joke, and laughing heartily at it. "My boys call him Daddy Long-legs. I don't know as it's right to let 'em; but they don't mean to be saucy about it; boys must have their fun, and mine think the world of Cameron, after all. No, he ain't married; and Matilda, here, will be dreadfully disappointed if he's got a wife picked out, for she's—"

"Dan'al!" cried Mrs. Samson, in tones of warning, "Dan'al!"

"—The smartest woman on the hill!" completed Daniel, triumphantly.

"And so he's coming here to live, and I shall have to look for another retreat."

"Now, don't you worry," cried Matilda, the echo of her husband's goodness. "There are places enough for such as you and yours. Your first duty is to come and help us eat our Thanksgiving dinner, and by that time I guess you'll see your way clear. We should love to have you stay with us just as long as you can put up with our rough ways. We can make you comfortable till you can find a better place, anyway. So don't you worry." Blessed Samaritans!

The feast-day came. Mrs. Allison did not yet see her way clear, but she determined to keep up her courage and let the day be unclouded, for the children's sake. Ah, that holy battle-cry of the mother's heart: "For the children's sake!"

If you could have seen the brave little woman laughing and singing along the forest path with her two merry boys, you would have said that hers was the gladdest heart in the universe!

"Now, if I ain't glad to see you!" cried the smiling Matilda, at her door. "I was afraid something would happen at the last minute to keep you at home."

"It would have taken a good deal to keep the boys from coming, Mrs. Samson."

"Well, I'm glad they like to come, for our children are crazy to have them here—do just look at them, going pell-mell down the canon, girls and all! Now, sit right down here by this window that you like so much." Then, leaning forward, she whispered: "Guess who's here—there; pointing to 'the other room.' "Mr. Cameron," she added, impressively, as if she thought it no use for the widow to try to guess. "Came last night, and I never did see him look so nice. He's an awful homely man; that is, folks think so; but he looks good to me, because he is so good—so right down splendid! But now I'm going to bring him in here. I guess he'll be surprised enough to see anything like you up here in the mountains; and she fondly brushed a little way lock loose on the widow's forehead, and gave one proud, admiring look at her as she left the room.

She reappeared directly, followed by the much-talked-of Long-legs, who paused before the door, as Mrs. Samson said, with grave ceremony:

"Mrs. Allison, this is—"

"Tobias Bilesbach!" shrieked the widow, and

"Theodora!" cried Tobias, clutching at the door.

Mrs. Samson sank, in speechless amazement, upon the nearest chair.

"What in the old Nick is to pay?" said the jovial Samson, at the door, with the whole crowd of curious, peering children behind him.

"That's him, Harry; that's Daddy Long-legs!" came in an eager whisper of awful distinctness from one of the little Samsons—while a look of deep horror succeeded to his mother's wild astonishment.

But Tobias heard nothing—saw nothing but the beautiful, blushing face of Theodora.

Oh, the soft-falling beneficence of rain! It had clothed the hills with gladness. The oaks—those venerable patriarchs that reach forth their giant arms to bless the land—were marvelous with blossoming lichen, with lace-like draperies of long gray moss and clinging velvet robes of green. From the clefts of rocks the young ferns sprang; away up in the solitude of the hills the manzanitas held out their clustering, waxen, pink-tinted chalice, and thither the little brown bees sped on swiftest wing, with joyous murmuring, to gather the ambrosial drop. All God's beautiful green world rejoiced, and in full unison beat the hearts of Tobias and Theodora. It was all clear at last—the way of true love—never more to be overcast. JULIA H. S. BUGEIA.

CALISTOGA, April, 1880.

Mr. George Augustus Sala designates San Francisco as the "bay-windowed" city. Singularly appropriate.

ENID—A PORTRAIT.

Striving in many ways to paint my love,
I find no light nor color that doth please.
My brush and canvas all my thoughts disprove;
And so I'll paint my love in smiles.

She minds me ever of an old-time madrigal,
Which sets itself to music as I read;
Her childlike, quaint simplicity of speech
So surely fills my need.

Or is it a lily, standing fair and tall,
Whose slender, ever-swaying plume
Leans lazily against the garden wall,
With over weight of bloom?

Rather, we'll say, a wild rose satin-lined,
Shunning the statelier flowers and garden plots;
Yet, if I wrought her face to suit my mind,
I'd make it of forget-me-nots.

Nay—she is just a child with credulous eyes
Waiting for what the new to-morrow brings;
Putting the plaintiveness of thrush or dove
Into the song she sings.

Strolling among the sunny garden walks
With busy silence, as if, each to each
In language held aloof from mortal tongue,
The flowers and she held speech.

Oh foolish finger that can turn to paint her so!
She is a woman, with a woman's tender heart,
But all unconscious of her power for weal or woe,
Unskilled in woman art.

Of shutting out of sight the tediousness and fret,
Behind smooth speech and smiling face;
Of hiding foolish eyes whose lids are ever wet
With tears that leave no trace.

She is a bit of nature drifting through the careless world,
Just as a loosened leaf or happy bird would do,
Clinging to outstretched branch or blossom here and there,
Trusting because she's true.

She is herself. Not even a master's patient hands,
Can fill the picture with a surer thought;
For when my love before me smiling stands
My smiles all come to naught.

KATE M. BISHOP.

The Giants and the Dwarfs

[Translated for the "Argonaut" from the German of F. Rucker.]

A giant's buxom daughter, while on a frolic, strode
Down from the mountain stronghold, her bluff old sire's abode.
When in a vale an ox-team she found, hitched to a plow,
Behind which walked a rustic, and all seemed small enow.

The oxen, plow, and peasant a hurden slight she thought;
So wrapped them in her apron, and to the castle brought.
"Halloo!" the giant shouted, "my dear, what have you found?"
Said she: "Some tiny playthings I picked from off the ground."

Her toys the giant glanced at, then quoth: "My child, beware!
Take back the little creatures, and place them where they were;
For if this race of pigmies don't till the ground and sow,
We giants on the mountain will lean and hungry grow."

P. R. R.

Minister.—"Hello, Exchange."
Telephone Exchange.—"Well."
Minister.—"Put me on the residence of Mrs. Duzenberry."
Exchange.—"All right; fire away."
Minister.—"Hello, Mrs. Duzenberry."
Mrs. D.—"Well?"
Minister.—"Ask your daughter Malinda to step to the instrument."
Malinda.—"What's wanted?"
Minister.—"Your affianced, Mr. Algernon Smithkinson, is here, and wishes to speak to you."
Malinda.—"Tell him for goodness sake to hurry."
Algernon.—"Malinda, dear, I find it won't be convenient for me to come around this evening. Can't we have the ceremony performed now?"
Malinda.—"I suppose so."
Minister (taking off his hat).—"DoyouAlgernonSmithkinson take Malinda Duzenberry to be your wedded wife for better for worse till death do you part?"
Algernon.—"I do."
Minister.—"DoyouMalindaDuzenberry take Algernon Smithkinson to be your wedded husband for better for worse till death do you part?"
Malinda.—"I do."
Minister.—"Then I pronounce you man and wife, and whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder. Make them so fit. Ten dollars. Good-bye."

He purchased a postal card at the post-office, and took up a pen and wrote for about two minutes with a determined hand. Then, as he blotted the card, he asked the stamp-clerk: "Is it against postal rules to call a man a liar on a postal card?"

The clerk thought it was, and the man tore up the card, bought another, and, after writing a few lines, inquired: "It can't be against the rules to call him a villain, can it?"

The clerk again decided that it was, and a third card was purchased. This time the man pondered over his lines, signed his name, and said: "I have written here that he ought to be in jail for his conduct. Is that against the postal rules?"

The clerk said he wouldn't dare run the risk himself; and the indignant citizen tore the card into a dozen pieces, and exclaimed: "Go to — with your old post-office! I won't send any card at all, but I'll waylay the fellow and knock the top of his head off!"

One of two well-known Southern clergymen undertook to rebuke the other for using the word.

"Brother G.," he exclaimed, without stopping to ask any other questions, "is it possible that you chew tobacco?"

"I must confess I do."

"Then I would quit it, sir," said the old gentleman. "It is a very unclerical practice, and a very uncleanly one. Tobacco! Why, sir, even a hog won't chew it."

"Father C., do you chew tobacco?" responded the amused listener.

"I? No, sir!" with much indignation.

"Then, pray, which is the most like the hog, you or I?"

VENUS ANADYOMENE.

A Disappointing Glimpse at Parisian Private Theatricals.

[FROM THE FRENCH OF GUSTAVE DROZ.]

"I do not say," said my aunt, tracing designs upon the carpet with her little boot, "I do not say that it does not add to a woman's beauty, but then it makes one look so bold! A little powder—perhaps a suspicion of rouge—sets off a pretty face admirably; but then the use of belladonna for the eyes, and that horrid enamel stuff—(what do they call it—liquid white?) why it's perfectly dreadful. Ugh! I don't see how a woman can use it!"

"Oh, I don't know, my dear aunt. Between you and me, when men regard a pair of velvety eyes, they do not always examine them too closely."

"Do you think so?"

"I know so. And, profiting by masculine blindness, some women even imitate veins upon the enameled surface."

"Why, the awful creatures! Isn't it shocking?"

"Dreadful!"

"But, Ernest, it seems to me you're a very knowing young gentleman. What business have you, a captain of dragoons, to be so thoroughly versed in such matters?"

"Oh, I—hem!—I—well, you know, I've been interested in private theatricals so often—yes, in private theatricals—that's it. Why, I have an entire collection of rouge-pots, and brushes, and needles, and—oh, everything of the sort."

"Why, you bad boy! I'm shocked at you! Apropos—of course, you're coming to-morrow night?"

"Certainly, if you wish it. Anything special?"

"Oh, no, a few friends, a little fête. And by the way, Ernest, bring your collection—I'd like to see it. Au revoir."

My aunt, as you may imagine, has by no means bidden adieu to her youth. How old is she? Well, let me see. I believe she is past twenty-five, but really I am so poor at figures that I couldn't say with any degree of certainty. And what difference does it make? Does not a murmur of admiration always receive her when she enters a ball-room? Do not the passers-by turn to look at her in her carriage? Is she not, in short, beautiful, and a Baroness?

Evening had come, and I had sent my museum of curiosities to my aunt's house, and shortly after followed it myself. As Jean, the valet, was assisting me to remove my overcoat, he whispered, with a discreet smile:

"Madame la Baronne bade me tell you, Monsieur Ernest, that she would be pleased to see you in her boudoir, immediately upon your arrival."

I followed the corridor he indicated, and tapped modestly at the door. A hurricane of suppressed giggling swept through it.

"Oh heavens! Don't let him come in yet!" shouted one.

"I wouldn't have him see me this way for the world!"

"Get behind the screens, you silly things," said my aunt's voice, and a fresh chorus of tittering followed.

At last a voice said "Come in!" and I entered.

At first I was unable to distinguish a thing amid the chaos of feminine frippery with which the room was encumbered. As the objects gradually took form I beheld in the center of the room my aunt, in pink t— in pink—well—that is, to say, somewhat lightly clad, in—in pink. Fortunately, there were a number of festoons of sea-weed draped around her form—I say fortunately, for it was this fact only that prevented my precipitate flight. And then there was her hair, too—yes, certainly—her hair was unbound, and floating upon her shoulders. Marie, the maid, was kneeling upon the floor before her mistress, engaged in lacing a dainty satin boot—the most adorable little boot! I never dreamed that my aunt had such a pretty—but let us pass on.

The furniture, the mantel-piece, the carpet, were heaped with every conceivable object. Skirts, laces, dresses, a gilt pasteboard helmet, a pair of t—that is to say, a pair of long silk stockings which seemed to have yielded up their fragile lives; curling-irons, brushes, combs, jewel-caskets, rouge-pots—anything, everything. At the end of the room were two screens, over which poured a ceaseless cataract of giggles. In one corner was Silvani the magnificent—Silvani the illustrious—Silvani, King of Hairdressers, who was regarding his work with the pride of an artist.

I stood petrified. What in the name of all that was marvelous was going on? My aunt noticed my astonishment, and said:

"Didn't you know that we were going to have tableaux this evening, Ernest?" And she laughed merrily.

By jove, I'm no chicken, you know—a captain of dragoons seldom is, being naturally an inquisitive rascal—but I must acknowledge that I never was so—so interested as on that evening. And who wouldn't be? It's not such an every-day matter to see one's aunt dressed as Venus.

"But in what tableau are you going to exhibit that extraordinary costume, my dear aunt?" said I.

"How do you do, Captain!" cried screen No. 1.

"We've been waiting for you!" cried screen No. 2.

"And I'm very much at your service, ladies. But what is the tableau?"

"The tableaux in which I appear," said my aunt, "are 'Venus Emerging from the Sea,' and 'The Judgment of Paris'—you remember your mythology, don't you?—and Mount Ida, and Paris, and the apple, and Minerva, and so forth? I have the rôle of Venus. I didn't want to take it, but they all teased me to death. Marie, give me a pin. There they are, on the mantel-piece—no, next to the bonbons—there, on that prayer-book. Yes, they threatened me with all sorts of dreadful things if I refused. 'Now, Baroness,' said they, 'with your heavenly shoulders, and your arms, and your—and your hands,' and this and that and the other. So they worried me until I yielded. Marie, give me another pin; these odious sea-weeds keep falling off!"

"It is somewhat desirable that they should not," I remarked, a trifle dryly.

"Now, I knew that's just what you'd say. But then I don't think I'm so very décolletée, do you? And the rôle requires it, you know. Mignonne [to screen No. 1], pass me the rouge, please. Silvani, go to the billiard-room; the gentlemen are dressing there, and may need you. And afterward go to the Baron's. And Silvani! See if De V— has found his apple yet. It is he who plays Paris," said she, turning to me. [To the corner.] "Well, Marquise, and the rouge—give it to the Captain over the screen."

Over screen No. 1, it appeared, followed by a hand.

"Here it is—hurry, Captain—my cuirass is cracking!"

"Her cuirass?" said I.

"Yes; she plays Minerva. Just listen to those gentlemen in the billiard-room—like a lot of school-boys, are they not? Oh, Ernest, I know very well I shall faint when I appear before everybody in this dress. I'm of such a nervous, impressionable nature, you know. Marie, you careless thing, do shut that door—I'm in a draft. Yes, I can not conceive how those actress women can bear to exhibit themselves so publicly—why, there's nine o'clock striking. Ernest, you bad boy, you say you know how to apply liquid white?"

"Well, yes, I know a little something about it."

"Oh, oh! shocking!" [From the screens.]

"Is it true, do you think—what they say about its being injurious to the skin?"

"Why, no—at least one application can do no harm. Marie, give us a rousing fire in the grate—that's a good girl." And I rolled up my sleeves and prepared for my task.

"Oh, how nervous I am! It is the first time that I ever used a cosmetic, you know."

"Oh, it's nothing—nothing at all. Extend your arm."

She lifted her rounded, white arm, and I dipped the sponge into the little onyx vase.

"Oh! Oh! O-o-o-o-o-o! Oh, how cold it is! Like ice! Et tu vas me promener cela sur le corps?"

"Pas absolument partout, ma chère tante."

"Je trouve votre partout singulièrement insolent, Ernest. Because you see you are necessary, you take advantage of it. You're just as saucy as you can be! Will it take long?"

"Oh, no, not very."

"O-o-o-o-o! Hurry up, Ernest; that's a good boy. Marie! Put some more coal on. O-o-o-o-o!"

When a man is frank, he should not be so by halves. So I'll tell you something. Of course you think that, seeing my poor aunt suffering so from the cold, I made haste with my work? Not at all! By no manner of means!! Very much to the contrary!!! I threw the most extraordinary deliberation into every movement. I worked with studied slowness. I promenaded my sponge over the hills and valleys with the utmost care. I said to myself: "Captain, profit by the opportunity. Once for all, become acquainted with the most charming fraction of your family." And the confounded sea-weeds would sway—again let us pass on.

[From Screen No. 1]—"Oh, my cuirass is broken again! Marie! Rosine! Pins! Needles! Mucilage! Oh, my, my!"

[From Screen No. 2]—"Marie, come and help me fasten my— A knock is heard.

Omnès—"You can't come in!!!"

It was the flute-like voice of the Comte de V—:

"I am in despair, Baroness, to give you so much trouble."

Omnès—"YOU CAN'T COME IN!!!" [Fortissimo.]

"But, ladies, I am not doing so. What I was going to say was, Raoul wants that black stuff for his eyebrows—"

"Very well, it shall be sent to him. O-o-o-o!"

"But that is not all, my dear Baroness."

"Dear, dear, what else?"

"My apple—I can not find it. Have you seen it?"

"No! Oh, Monsieur le Comte, I pray you go!"

"But that is not all. Saint P— has broken his trident and torn his tights. Could you send one of your maids—"

"One of my maids, indeed! What are you thinking of, monsieur?"

"But, Baroness, you are mistaken—the rent is in the arm—it was the trident that—"

"Very well, I'll send Rosine. Please go and get ready."

[De V— goes.] He and his trident! Why, he doesn't appear until the third tableau! So you've done, have you? Well, how do I look? What do you think of my coiffure?

Silvani is a true artist, is he not? He wanted me to wear a blonde wig, but I would never, never do anything so horrid!

"Certainly not—your scruples do you honor."

"Why, it's nearly ten o'clock. Oh, Ernest, if you only knew how I tremble! To appear this way before so many people! But then the sea-weed is there, that's one comfort."

"To my uncle—yes."

Another knock is heard. "Who's there?" said my aunt.

"The torches have arrived, Madame la Baronne."

"Oh, yes, they're for the Trois-étoiles girls. Go and tell them—they're dressing in the music-room. But don't light them yet; they're not wanted till the second tableau."

"So the young ladies of the Trois-étoiles family appear?"

"Yes; and their mother, too. They represent 'The Lights of Faith Pursuing Disbelief.' They have torches for the lights, you know—tin tubes, with spirits of wine inside. It'll be just too awfully sweet, won't it? It's intended as a compliment to that pious young Italian gentleman. You know him, don't you?—il Conto di Geloni. He's a nephew of the Papal Nuncio to Spain, and has the most angelic eyes! It's an excellent idea—don't you think so? It's Monsieur de Saint P—'s conception. He's not such a bad fellow for tableaux, Saint P—, if he doesn't tear his things."

"But who is going to take the part of 'Disbelief'?"

"Oh, it's a dreadful long story, Ernest. You must know that the very day the rôles were being distributed, the Encyclical of his Holiness the Pope appeared—that directed against the infidels, you know. Would you believe it? not a single gentleman would accept the part! I was at my wits' end, when finally I thought of John, the coachman. He's English, and a Protestant, so he could have no religious scruples. And he's a handsome fellow, too, is John."

"But won't the Trois-étoiles feel a little put out at appearing with a servant?"

"Oh, no; John is to lie at full length upon the floor, and the ladies will place a foot each upon his neck; so the proprieties are saved, you see."

Eleven o'clock. "Come, aunt, the stage will be waiting."

"Oh, Ernest, how dreadfully weak I feel! I know I shall faint upon the stage! Are the flowers on my coiffure fastened firmly? I'm afraid they'll fall. Oh, how my heart beats!"

"Be careful, aunt—it will be seen!"

* * * * *

Paris's apple was found, Neptune's trident was mended, Minerva's cuirass was repaired. From a corner of the brilliant salon I watched—with a pride which doubtless I shared—My Aunt Arising From the Sea.

But won't the Trois-étoiles feel a little put out at appearing with a servant?"

"Oh, no; John is to lie at full length upon the floor, and the ladies will place a foot each upon his neck; so the proprieties are saved, you see."

Eleven o'clock. "Come, aunt, the stage will be waiting."

"Oh, Ernest, how dreadfully weak I feel! I know I shall faint upon the stage! Are the flowers on my coiffure fastened firmly? I'm afraid they'll fall. Oh, how my heart beats!"

"Be careful, aunt—it will be seen!"

* * * * *

Paris's apple was found, Neptune's trident was mended, Minerva's cuirass was repaired. From a corner of the brilliant salon I watched—with a pride which doubtless I shared—My Aunt Arising From the Sea.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880.

JEROME A.

SOCIAL SALAD.

Since Lent closed its doors there have been ripples only on the surface of the society pool. This is as it should be. The indecent haste to put off the half-mourning which Society decrees for herself during a brief penitential season once a year is in worst possible form—"out of good social drawing," says Saunders.

The latest social wrinkle is the "soap-bubble party." You make them yourselves—the bubbles. To give a "soap-bubble party," provide the guests with tables, soap and warm water, and clay pipes, and turn them loose on the best parlor carpet. It's beastly jolly, they say. The idea is said to have originated with an American lady in Paris. At her first entertainment the utmost jollity prevailed. "The pipes were gaily bedecked with ribbons, and the guests vied with each other in the agreeable pastime." At the first entertainment given in this city the only difficulty experienced was in keeping the guests' hands out of the "soap and warm water."

The "Jersey" has reached New York, but not San Francisco. And what is the "Jersey"? The "Jersey" is a garment introduced into London by Mrs. Langtry, and at once made fashionable. To speak plainly, it is little more than a flannel undershirt. It comes in every color, and is made to fit tight to the figure, and reaches below the hips. It is very much worn in Nincompoopiana.

"Heigho, daisies and butter-cups!"
And fluted sedge-grass, golden yellow,
And flame-hued poppy buds scattered about
'Neath one pink rose—an impudent fellow,
Looking aloft, in bold, bad glee,
From a coign beneath the hosen knee.

"I want a pair for my wife," said he.
"Do you?" the shop-girl said, with a smile.
Somehow it darkened his pale face, red;
And his blue eyes blackened and burned with guile.
"I'll carry them home myself!" he said;
And his look might have stricken the shop-girl dead.

The interest that our young ladies are taking in panel-painting promises to keep them out of no end of mischief while the fever lasts. A great many of them are doing very good work—of its kind; the examples of their work given in outline by the dailies to the contrary notwithstanding.

They say that the highest aim of a Parisian elegante is to look like an English governess in the street. Dowdiness when out walking is very chic, and all magnificence of toilet is religiously reserved for in-doors; and that, too, when Americans are setting their neighbors such a noble example—and no Americans more thoroughly than the ladies of San Francisco, who make our shopping streets a veritable kaleidoscope of well-dressed beauty, especially of a Saturday afternoon.

A lady writes as follows of "the real Kensington, you know."

How little Matilda of Flanders imagined, as she sat among her maidens, celebrating in many a patient stitch the exploits and glory of her liege lord and master, the heart-burnings and dissensions that self-same stitch and its modifications would produce in this the nineteenth century. Like that time-wasting abomination, the 15-puzzle, there are many ways of working it, but only one correct way—and bless their little feminine hearts, they all have that way—like the Six Blind Men of Hindostan, who went to see the elephant: "Each in his own opinion exceeding stiff and strong"—at least until they meet with some other fair disciple, who destroys the fullness of their content by remarking: "It is perfectly lovely. How nicely you do it! But, this isn't the real Kensington, you know. You ought to go to Madam—; she teaches the real stitch, and only charges two dollars." Away speeds the cowering devotee, and gravely pays her two dollars, feeling that at last the correct thing is hers, and she can creelize everything in the house, from a pair of slippers to the best lambrequins—till she meets another sister who is all for Fraulein Wagnblast, a "real German needlewoman," who alone teaches the Kensington; or mayhap she meets one of those New Yorkers, who have learned at the only place—in their estimation—where it can be learned, to wit, the Decorative Art Rooms. After all, one stitch is just about as pretty as another, the main points to be gained being a natural blending of shades and correctness of outline. Any stitch which will produce these effects is just as satisfactory as the "real Kensington, you know."

A London physician—Doctor Richardson, we believe—has made a new point against the corset. He insists that "stays not only injure bodily health, but deaden mental capability." The question now is, How bright might not those French women have been who set Paris on fire with their wit a hundred years ago, if they had not worn the corset of their period? And if Elizabeth of England had flung her stays after Raleigh's cloak (a rather undignified proceeding that), might she not have been a greater queen than she was? One wonders if Miss Anthony—Miss Susan B.—and Mrs. Belva Lockwood and our own Mrs. Foltz wear stays. One wonders—but that investigation would be interminable.

Here is a realistic skit at the matinée by one of the crushed:

To the miseries of matinées those can testify who can not afford evening entertainments, or the unfortunates who have neither obliging husband or brother to act as protector. Women, women everywhere! They troop in, clad in shabby black, with mended gloves and faded shawl, dressed in modest neatness and unassuming simplicity, and the gorgeous silks and satins, velvets and flowers fill in the lights in the picturesque crowd. How strange it is that they never can keep still. They have such a time finding their places. No usher being near, they stir up the already settled to settle themselves. The seats being found, they are either just lovely, and then they audibly congratulate each other on their good luck in obtaining them just here; or they are not satisfied, and they find fault in equally emphatic and audible tones. They are sure the usher made a mistake, or they think of a dozen other equally absurd reasons why these may not be the places they secured. Or they are too warm, and they fan themselves with such vigor that I, who sit in front, feel an Alpine breeze coursing down my back. Then the temperature changes with the opening of a door, and they must disturb every one in the immediate vicinity with their complaints; and finally my best bonnet gets a terrible whack during the adjustment of wraps, and the dent in my head-gear is a mark for sneering critics. At last the curtain rises. I give a quiet little sigh, in pleased anticipation of the respite I am to have, but my hopes are vain. The play begins, and with it a running commentary on actors, acting, stage-setting, dressing, and plot. I give up all hopes of seeing anything but the huge Cainsborough hat in front, and of hearing anything besides the remarks of my tormentors, and I resign myself to fate. Their highmightsnesses are pleased, and the remarks, if not scientifically critical, are at least not unkind. Finally a more than usually strong scene bushes my talkative neighbors. The silence is breathless; but an anti-climax comes in the mellow, musical laugh which starts up suddenly behind me. The situation is spoiled by this distraction; and the crying of a petulant child, which sounds on the other side, has no power to add more to the discomfort. I no longer even attempt to hear the actors, and give myself up to studying my tormentors. It is a pretty girl who laughs. She giggles between the scenes; she laughs during the pathetic passages; and long after other merriment has ceased her voice rings out clearly in curious contrast to the stillness. A little way from me, but near enough to be distinctly heard, is a talkative daughter, who explains the jokes and rehearses the plot to her mother, who likes to know beforehand what is coming. Oh, these women! They whisper and giggle, flirt with the callow youths who frequent matinées, they rustle their programmes, rattle their fans, arrange their dresses, until they make drama-loving people who patronize matinées mentally harbor wishes which are better not expressed.

BUTTERCUP.

In a previous number of this paper attention was called to the desirableness of pedestrianism as an adjunct to the cultivation of a love for the picturesque. We believe there are already several walking clubs among society people in this city and Oakland. There is room for a great many more, and we shall be glad to print any intelligence concerning them that our friends may furnish us.

Ouida, in her last insinuating book, Moths, makes this very significant and not altogether lying statement: "Those who are little children now will have little left to learn when they reach womanhood. They are miniature women already; they know the meaning of many a dubious phrase; they know the relative value of social positions; they know much of the science of flirtation, which society has substituted for passion; they understand very thoroughly the shades of intimacy, the suggestions of a smile, the degrees of hot and cold that may be marked by a bow or emphasized with a good-day. All the subtle science of society is learned by them intuitively and unconsciously, as they learn French and German from their maids. When they are women they will at least never have Eve's excuse for sin: they will know everything that any tempter could tell them."

The following is our Sacramento correspondent's last letter, written under date April 5th:

DEAR ARGONAUT:—At last Sacramento has had a kettle-drum! And now we suppose many of our ladies will follow in the wake of this English fashion, of visiting one's friends in the afternoon, and taking a little tea, and talking a little talk. Mrs. George Cadwalader, on N Street, set the fashion here, and it was such a success that we shall doubtless answer to the call of many a (kettle) drum in the near future. Mrs. Cadwalader has a young lady friend visiting her from Philadelphia, Miss Bessie Slade, and this is the why of all this private matinée affair. The house was trimmed in flowers and smilax, great baskets of pansies and other flowers in profusion. Among other delicious eatables, Russian tea was served, which of course every one declared "nice if new." In Mrs. E. B. Mott's large rooms, on J Street, the Bric-à-Brac Club met the same evening—and, by the way, don't you think it a little mean that some of you San Francisco folks should pilfer our cognomen, and call themselves Bric-à-Bracs, when it was purely original with us? This club, you know, have gay, good times. Ostensibly they meet for mutual improvement. Some of the art members bring pictures. At their head is Norton Bush; so 'tis to be expected that this branch of the circle would do well. And then we have some musicians, who hardly ever quarrel about who shall do their share; and they give us merry music, that enlivens things wonderfully! Sometimes Miss O'Brien—poetess and elocutionist—renders some touching little thing; and we all talk and laugh, and are as much at home with each other as if every one were the other's bosom friend; and then we have little lunches set for us in the dining-room. Truly 'tis a delightful club, and we think it is quite chic. Norton Bush is president, and (did you know?) has taken to painting marine scenes, and dead game, and oceans of little things you would never have thought his tropical brush would have touched. Mrs. G. W. Chesley is vice-president; B. L. Ball, recording secretary; and Mrs. Blakeney, who spends much of her time in San Francisco, is corresponding secretary. Mrs. A. L. Frost, treasurer, has charge of the young (indeed, quite infantile!) bank this club represents. And as there was no office left for Mr. Procter, the pillar of the institution, this grateful club created an office for him, and call him executive officer; and now that he has got the affair in good running order, he leans up against his executive pillar, and smiles benignly and characteristically on his crowned efforts. Sometimes they invite outsiders to make 'em feel bad. Sometimes they entertain renowned people who come here; sometimes they give a public entertainment, and show their art work, and entertain with a musical and literary programme; but they always have good times, whatever they do, and no sometimes about it. On Friday, Miss Georgie Wilburn, sister of Mrs. W. B. C. Brown, entertained about two hundred of her friends at the Golden Eagle Hotel. The parlors were canvased for dancing, and tête-à-têtes were arranged around the great halls. Supper was served in the hotel dining-room. The house was very prettily decorated, and Miss Georgie played the charming little hostess admirably. They began the fun at a seasonable hour, too, 8:15 P. M., and went home at one o'clock like sensible people; and we all left thinking what a prime good evening it had been, what a nice place the hotel was to give a party in, and how pretty our hostess was in her gossamer dress. Cynical people and blasé folks can say what they please about party-going and giving, and all the etceteras connected with it being frivolous and vapid. We think it does people good to get out and see faces, and get a little excited over the dance music, and say and hear nice, comforting, flattering things, that perhaps one does not always mean. Mrs. Jesse O. Goodwin sang during the evening several songs. They say, you know, she was an opera singer before she married; and we should think so, for she seems to have a whole orchestra in that little white throat of hers. Several of the legislators were there. We noticed Senators Brown, Baker, Davies, Neumann, and Adjutant-General Backus, and many of our own ladies and gentlemen—Mrs. Gallatin, Brown, Beckman, Haymond, and the Misses Russell, Milliken, Clark, McKune, Seeley, Bernard, and many, many others.

BETSY AND I.

CRITICAL OF BRET HARTE.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Story writing, particularly where it takes the form of recital, is the art of making the workings of the imagination simulate the reality. A good story-writer, like Daniel Defoe, and some others known to English readers, to say nothing of writers in other languages, leads the mind of the reader along the pathways of the imaginary in such a careful manner that little or no violence is done to the actual. In fact, a romance should be in print much like what a character painting—historical or otherwise—is to the subject or object from which it is taken. It should be a beautified or pleasantly idealized reflex of reality. If the scenes of the romance are laid in a land distant from the familiar haunts of former home-places of the writer, some allowance may be made for misplacement of minor objects in the drawing; but what shall we say of a recent writer who seriously and laboriously puts the ultra-improbable into a picture of his boyhood home?

The above reflections may pass as a hasty introduction to a brief criticism on a romance published in one of your "live" city daily contemporaries. The romance is entitled, "Jeff Briggs's Love Story," purported to be written "by Bret Harte." If this "by Bret Harte" is not begged, borrowed, or stolen from Mr. Harte, it is evidence of an awful falling off in his powers. For surely he would not knowingly sell or voluntarily give away such a mushy mess of improbable nonsense. Here is a passage or two from the highest point in the culminating chapter—supposed to be the best chapter out of seven. The passage is intended to be descriptive of an assault by masked robbers upon a California mountain stage-coach:

Six masked figures had appeared from the very ground, clinging to the bits of the horses. The coach stopped. Two wild, purposeless shots—the first and last fired by the guards—were answered by the muzzles of six rifles pointed into the windows, and the passengers foolishly and impotently fled out into the road.

"Now, Bill," said a voice, which Jeff instantly recognized as the blacksmith's, "we won't keep you long. So hand down the treasure." The man's foot was on the wheel. In another instant he would be beside Jeff, and discovery was certain. Jeff leaned over and unhooked the coach lamp, as if to assist him with its light. As if in turning he stumbled, broke the lamp, ignited the kerosene, and scattered the wick and blazing fluid over the haunches of the wheelers! The maddened animals, gave one wild plunge forward, the coach followed twice its length, throwing the blacksmith under its wheels, and driving the other horses toward the bank. But as the lamp broke in Jeff's right hand, his practiced left hand discharged the hidden deringer at the head of the robber who had held the bit of "Blue Grass," and, throwing the useless weapon away, he laid the whip smartly on her back. She leaped forward madly, dragging the other leaders with her, and in the next moment they were free and wildly careered down the grade.

Queries. What were the six horses, with the sound of pistol-shots ringing in their ears, doing when the six robbers let go of the six bits to point six rifle-muzzles into the coach windows? Even Frank Cluggage and John Allman own no such stage-horses as above described. Who ever saw six mountain stage-robbers assault one coach, anyway—particularly with rifles? Does not every boy, every mountain traveler, every newspaper reporter know that real "road-agents" always hunt in trio—a tall man, a short man, and a fat man; and that at least one of them carries a double-barreled shot-gun? I will leave it to Louis McLane, to Len. Wines, Bob McComb, "Shot-gun" Taylor, Billy Pridham, J. J. Valentine, "Old" Cluggage, "Baldy" Green, Hank Monk, or to any of the boys, if ever they knew of, a respectable stage-robbery on this coast in which there was not at least one double-barreled shot-gun. Of course that boy down at Soledad only used a string across the road with a copy of a "live" San Francisco daily, filled with Kearney's triumphal New Constitution speeches, attached to the string—but that was no stage-robbery; it was only a two-horse wagon. But what shall we say to a kerosene lamp on a mountain stage-coach? A glass lamp that a fellow could break by stumbling so as to break up and scatter the wick all over two horses. Is there anybody on this coast idiot enough not to know—if they ever saw a mountain-coach lamp—that it burns a coach-candle, set upon a spiral spring to hold it steady when the coach bounces and lurches, and that the lamp is made of brass or other metal, with heavy plate-glass door and two sides—the back side being metal? Kerosene lamps! on the "Pioneer," which ran out of Sacramento!

Here is another morceau from the same chapter:

To select the best horse of the remaining unscathed three, to break open the boot and place the treasure on his back, and to abandon and leave the senseless Bill lying there, was the unhesitating work of a moment. Great heroes and great lovers are invariably one-dead men, and Jeff was at that moment both.

Eighty thousand dollars in gold dust and Jeff's weight was a handicap. Nevertheless he flew forward like the wind. Presently he fell to listening. A certain hoof-beat in the rear was growing more distinct. A bitter thought flashed through his mind. He looked back. Over the hill appeared the foremost of his pursuers. It was the blacksmith mounted on the fleetest horse in the country—Jeff's own horse—Rabbit!

This man "Jeff" is represented in the story as a lusty, large fellow. Let us say he weighed one hundred and sixty pounds, then add his weight to the avoirdupois of eighty thousand dollars in good, average gold-dust—which at $16 to the ounce, troy, comes to 313 lbs.—and we have 473 lbs. as "a handicap" for a bare-backed stage-horse, which "nevertheless flew forward like the wind." Ob, Baron Munchausen, where are thy laurels!

Of such dead-give-away bosh is the story throughout. If Bret Harte ever wrote it, it must have been razed, and rifacinted and improved by the editorial sharp of the "live paper" through which it gushes out upon an indulgent public. "Copyright secured." G.

Ouida has written a story in French. It is entitled Pépistrello, and is appearing in La Nouvelle Revue. This magazine, it will be remembered, was begun as a professed rival to the Revue des Deux Mondes, and is conducted by a woman—Madame Juliette Lambert.

These days no one is safe from the charge of plagiarism. Brown went to church last Sunday—a thing unusual—and, upon being asked his opinion of the clergyman, said: "Oh, his sermon was very good. But that prayer, beginning with 'Our Father,' I think he stole entire. I know I have heard something somewhere that it was strangely like."

MR. BARCLE'S MILL.

"You know I owned a powder-mill once," said Mr. William Barcle, "and it bust up?"

"I know," said I, "that one of the first things I can remember is hearing people wonder if it was not nearly time for old Bill Barcle's powder magazine to explode again."

"Jest so," assented he, thoughtfully stirring his toddy; "but the particular one I allude to never bust up but once. I owned a good many mills before that one, though, all built on the same spot. They all bust up."

"This bustin' up became quite a regular feature—something to look forward to, like Christmas, or election day, and the neighbors took an interest in it, as was natural, seeing that most of the families within a radius of ten miles were represented on my pay-roll, and the tombstones in the cemetery were a precious lot of standing advertisements of my business. But after ten or fifteen years of bustin' up, I cut my wisdom teeth—you can lay your life, I cut my wisdom teeth!"

Mr. Barcle paused to execute the strangled cackle which he had persuaded himself was a laugh, but in the cavity whence it proceeded I could perceive no wisdom teeth, or teeth of any kind.

"You see, I always had a talent for figuring; so one day I took the length of time from the foundation of the first mill to the bustin' up of the last one, and reduced it to minutes. Dividing this number by the number of bustin' ups—the school-master helped a bit—I found the average duration of a powder-mill in that climate was three years, two hundred and twenty days, five hours, and seventeen minutes. By this means I found the mill I then had would bust up at exactly five minutes past four o'clock on the afternoon of the fifteenth of September, 1869. It was then August of the same year. So I hadn't much time for fooling."

"Ah! I see—you set about removing the powder at once," said I.

"Perhaps I did, and perhaps I didn't. Perhaps I am fool enough to believe I can repeal the decrees of Fate, and perhaps I am not. As I am about to tell you, I swore the school-master to silence, and got him to draw up a flaming big notice, that 'owing to the proprietor of the Cat Creek Powder Works being about to retire to his estates in New Jersey, this flourishing property (the works) would be sold at a sacrifice.' This notice was posted up at a cross-road—the local newspaper had tried to get my license revoked at the last bust-up, and I never did like the Press, anyhow. For nearly three weeks I got no offers, and as the fatal day drew near I got more nervous every minute; but presently, on the tenth of September, a little fellow from New York came along and made a bid for the mill. I did not haggle very long about the price, if I know myself; but he took three whole days to examine the property, and the books, and everything—he and his lazy lawyer. Finally they were satisfied, and we four—I took the school-master along—met at the mill to draw up the papers. It was now two o'clock of the afternoon on which she was to bust up. I had stopped work and sent away all hands, so that nothing might interrupt us. But that lawyer—I never saw such a slow rascal to write! And I and the school-master were dancing with excitement! But the more nervous we got, the oftener that serene lawyer laid down his pen to assure us there was no occasion to worry, and to express his surprise that a man so accustomed to business as I was should get so excited about a simple transaction like this."

"I pulled out my watch a thousand times, I think; and every time I did so the school-master came up behind me, poking his white face over my shoulder to see the time; but my hand shook so we could neither of us make out the figures on the dial. Presently I remembered the big clock in the front of the school-house, facing the mill, and about a quarter of a mile away—the clock by which I had always regulated the working hours. I thought if I could just set that back two hours or so we should get done. It was a brilliant notion, and the moment it struck me, without even waiting to say 'Excuse me,' I broke for the door, and cut across the fields. With a yell of terror the school-master bolted after me, overtook me, passed me, leaping and shrieking like a panther, and dashed out of sight behind a distant hill."

"Gaining the school-house I kicked in the door, scampered up the stairs into the clock-tower as a monkey goes up an apple-tree, and in a moment was out at a hole, and standing on a ledge immediately in front of the clock-dial. I turned and cast one glance at the mill; the two men were standing in the door—that is all I observed, but, of course, they must have been saying, 'Well, I never!' And I suppose they never did."

"I turned my face to the dial. I could see I had a full hour to spare; it was just upon the stroke of three. Now that I was out of the mill I was cool enough to perceive that an hour later would have been ample time to get through the business, even at the rate of speed at which that exasperating lawyer was pretending to work. And now—what a contorted idiot I had been! I should have to go back and explain; I should have to hunt up my school-master. I seized the long hand of the clock, determined to set her back a good six hours. I couldn't move it—not an inch! In a fit of desperation I laid hold of the short hand—it wouldn't budge! I tried to work it a little both ways, so as to loosen it, when it suddenly gave way while I was pulling downward, and went to IV with a click—the other hand remaining motionless at XII! Then I felt the building tremble."

"Turning to the powder-mill I saw that valuable concern rising with slow majesty into the air, pushed upward apparently by a column of thick black smoke which appeared to come out of the earth. The school-house shook like it had a fit of the ague, the glass fell jingling from its windows, the clock pounded four stunning strokes in my very ear, and a low heavy rumble filled the air. And during all this time that column of smoke kept growing taller and taller, and swaying from side to side; and my mill, with two men chatting in the door, was balancing itself unsteadily on the summit of it. When it had been lifted about half a mile it stopped; the smoke pulled itself clear from the ground, and, soaring upward, lapped the whole establishment in obscurity. My flourishing property had left this wicked world, and hung suspended in the bowels of a giant ball of black smoke fiercely convolving in the blue empyrean! Then she bust up."

D. G.

WIT, WISDOM, AND SENTIMENT.

Macchiavelli: "Every man's good or bad fortune consists in his correspondence and accommodation with the times."

Shelley: "All of us who are worth anything spend our manhood in unlearning the follies or expiating the mistakes of our youth."

Froude: "As the planet varies from the atmosphere which surrounds it, so each new generation varies from the last, because it inhales as its atmosphere the accumulated experience and knowledge of the whole past of the world."

Emerson: "He whose sympathy goes lowest is the man from whom kings have most to fear."

Jeremy Taylor: "Friendship is equal to all the world, and of itself hath no difference; but is differenced only by the capacity or incapacity of them that receive it."

Sir William Temple: "A restlessness in men's minds to be something they are not, and to have something they have not, is the root of all immorality."

Cowper: "While the world lasts, fashion will continue to lead it by the nose."

Bolingbroke: "The deadliest foe to love is not change, nor misfortune, nor jealousy, nor wrath, nor anything that flows from passion or emanates from fortune; the deadliest foe to it is custom."

Talleyrand: "A clever woman often compromises her husband; a stupid woman only compromises herself."

Montaigne: "Man does not fall from all heights; there are several from which we may descend without falling down."

Ouida: "The faith of men can only live by the purity of women."

Winwood Reade: "As a single atom, man is an enigma; as a whole, he is a mathematical problem. As an individual, he is a free agent; as a species, the offspring of necessity."

Boulainvillier: "Vanity makes a man show much that discretion would conceal."

Cardinal Fleuri: "There are some people who are as human echoes, and have no existence except in the noise occasioned by others."

Bulwer: "What cosmetics are to the face, wit is to the temper; and, after all, there is no wisdom like that which teaches us to forget."

M. P.

Longfellow:

"Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals and forts."

Chateaubriand: "Without woman, man would be rude, unpolished, and solitary."

Ouida: "The thread of self-love is a thread without an end, and tough as it is endless."

Byron: "Some men are worms in soul more than the living things in tombs."

Shakespeare: "All things that are, are with more spirit chased than enjoyed."

Rogers:

"The good is better made by ill,
As odors crushed are sweeter still."

Lilly: "Ambition bath but two steps: the lowest blood, the highest envy."

Wordsworth: "What is truth? A staff rejected."

Young: "Friendship is the wine of life."

Shakespeare: "When sorrows come, they come not single spies, but in battalions."

F. W. Trafford: "All truth contains an echo of sadness."

Bailey: "Much more is said of knowledge than it's worth."

Burns:

"Learn three-mile prayers, an' half-mile graces,
Wi' weel-spread leaves, an' lang, wry faces,
Grunt up a solemn, lengthened groan,
And damn a' parties by your own,
I'll warrant then ye're nae deceiver—
A steady, sturdy, staunch believer."

Bailey: "Joy never feasts so high as when the first course is of misery."

Bulwer: "There is no man so friendless but that he can find a friend sincere enough to tell him disagreeable truths."

Aleyn:

"Destruction surer comes, and rattles louder,
Out of a mine of gold than one of powder."

Pope:

"Blunt truths more mischief than nice falsehoods do."

Locke: "The only fence against the world is a thorough knowledge of it."

Geo. Eliot: "Our thoughts are often worse than we are, just as they are often better than we are."

Goldsmith: "The hours passed with happy prospects in view are more pleasing than those crowned with fruition."

Bovee: "There is no tyrant like custom."

Shakespeare:

"Youth must have his course,
For being restrained it makes him ten times worse."

Lavater: "Acts, looks, steps, words, form the alphabet by which you may spell character."

Dickens: "Reflect upon your present blessings—of which every man has many; not on your past misfortunes—of which every man has some."

Confucius: "Even a man's faults may reflect his virtues."

Ingersoll: "Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities."

N. B. S.

A LITERARY RIOT.

A true and terrible Account of the recent remarkable Occurrences at Woodward's Gardens—Our Bilious Critic testifies his marked Disapproval of a certain Bard and a specified Editor—He cruelly Overcomes them.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—I knew I should find him, mine ancient enemy, at Woodward's Gardens. They keep him there—sometimes in a cage, sometimes running at large, gamboling with the Australian hiphiphurrahcus, or making love to the knuckleback rhinostyfurious of the windy wild. Proceeding toward the animal cages I met the greater camel, arm in arm with the scented polar bear, and scanned them narrowly through my eye-glass. They were not He. I caught an evanescent glimpse of the vaulting kangaroo, describing his trajectory through the air. I have no quarrel with kangaroos. They don't write "poetry"; they don't sass back when criticized.

I felt a hot breath on the back of my neck, perceived an aroma of South Sea spices, was conscious of a fumbling and groping in the tail pockets of my coat. I turned—the malefactor whom I sought stood before me. He carried a formidable lyre, and was clad in an apparently impenetrable Byron collar. Springing quickly backward, I put up my hands in an attitude of aggression and defense—if you don't mind the risk you can learn how it is from Tommy Chandler or Dublin Pete. The enemy did the same. A storm which had been long gathering in the heavens over the Mission muttered portentous thunder.

"Tell me," said I, with a dextrous feint—"tell me what"—he stepped slightly aside, averting his head and exposing his ear, at which I let drive with great fury as follows: "What is the difference between a torpid group in a cavern and the noise of a midnight riot on the peak of a roof?"

He threw out his hands before him, wild, helpless, and confused.

"One," I shouted, "is a cluster of bats; the other is a bluster of cats!"

The stricken wretch dropped his hands and his head. He reflected deeply and with manifest dejection, and at last, looking appealingly into my triumphant eyes, murmured hesitatingly: "I give it up."

I had missed him!

Then gathering all his strength for one mighty effort, "Why," said he, "should you never turn off the gas before retiring?"

"Because," I replied, contemptuously without a moment's hesitation, "it ought to have a month's notice." He had considerable difficulty in recovering his guard.

"Fiend!" I shrieked, "what is the fate of a child that perishes from a surfeit of mother's milk?"

He turned and fled along the gravel-walk, not observing in his confusion that it was circular. Simply facing about, I soon met him eye to eye, and thundered: "Cream-ation!"

The vanquished villain now reeled and staggered like a failing peg-top, stammering out a multitude of imperfect "whys" and "whats" and "whens" and premature "because's"; but without giving him time to rally his dispersed faculties I planted between the wild eyes of him this terrific Shakespeareo-Biblical smasher: "When is a butt of sack most unlike a sackbut?"

There was no defense, and the answer, coming like lightning out of a clear sky, laid him out as limp as a dish-towel—crushed, nerveless, insensible! So tremendous a "facer" would have felled an ox. A policeman now came up and raised him, mopping the clammy perspiration from his pallid face.

"Who is the poor man?" said the policeman.

"That," said I, chillingly, as I turned on my heel, "is what is left of Prince Hector A. Stuart, the Bard of the South Seas. Run him in!"

At this moment a pitiful-looking Object that had been hanging about the bear cages obtaining apples and peanuts by personation, came shambling idly to the scene of action.

"Oh, it's you, is it?" said I, with a freezing sneer—"you? Nothing could be more opportune. You are not a 'poet,' but you're an abettor of 'poets.' On fifty-two several occasions in each year you permit such fellows as those remains—with a jerk of my thumb Stuartward—"to put their impenitent nonsense into the Sunday issue of your paper, to the unspeakable distension of their vanity and the irreparable hardening of their ignorance. But your time has come. Now, caitiff, tell me—who was the most confident lover that ever a woman had?"

The miserable Object feebly muttered something about supposing it to have been the handsome Deacon Fitch.

"No, sir," said I, severely, "it was Adam."

The Object was visibly distressed. By way of averting his doom he thought he would ask one himself. So, bracing himself: "Why—" he began.

"Because," I interrupted, with pitiless persistence—"because he knew Eve could not reject his suit, for he hadn't any!"

At that moment a gnat flew into my eye, causing me to wink. On raising my lids I could see no Object. But, extending in a straight line from where he had stood toward the Call office, was a rapidly lengthening streak of blue ruin, consisting, near at hand, of dust, gravel, a wig, and the smaller mammalia; beyond this, where it crossed the pleasure grounds, of turf, iron fences, uprooted evergreens, pieces of conservatory, perambulators, and fragmentary nursemaids; still further along, of paving stones, hurtling policemen, broken wagons, pulverized building materials, general merchandise, chimneys, and toppling church-spires! Mr. Pickering was avoiding a breach of the peace.

YOUR BILIOUS CRITIC.

TOP O' PARNASSUS, April 1, 1880.

A clergyman, who had been traveling in a remote part of the West, was asked by a pious old lady if he saw any encouraging signs of the spread of religion. "I heard something," said he, rather hesitatingly, "which you might possibly call encouraging. As I passed a cabin, a woman cried out to her daughter: 'Jerushy Ann! you—snarly-headed little whelp, come right in to prayers!'"

If a man's religion compels him to pay his debts, be sure it is genuine.

A SYMPOSIUM OF TRAMPS.

By One of Them.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

"You got into a pretty tight place there, Cayuse," said Bob, "but I suppose, after all, it was only experience against doing the like again. You're incorrigible, anyway." Old Vito Blanco was at his singing again, and, with oyster-can in hand as usual, was giving forth the following applicable stanza con amore, and with evident gusto and impressive emphasis:

"O Mad'm, wud you be kind enough to give me-sunth'n to eat?"

A little piece of bread, or a little piece of meat,

(this line piano, and with pathos)

A little piece of custard PIE to appease the appy TITE, (fortissimo)

For I'm so very hungry-I don't know where to sleep to-night," (pianissimo.)

"Didn't I tell yez afore," exclaimed Boston Bum wrathfully, "to shut up? If ye sing another word I'll baste ye in the mou't," and he raised a very dirty but fleshy paw to emphasize his remark.

"Sure an' it's Boston that doesn't know what music is," responded Vito Blanco, pityingly.

"Never mind the song now, old man," said Bob, "here's Smartie stretching himself; let's hear what he's got to say." Smartie hereupon took his pipe from his mouth and began:

"You often joke me on the circus business, boys. You pretend to think that I was never in it, or that, if I was, it was merely in the capacity of dirt-shoveler when they threw up the ring. But what would you say if the old 'vag' that you now call 'Smartie'—the 'beat,' the 'bum,' the 'loafer,' the 'incorrigible tramp'—was once ring-master of a well-to-do circus?—not a first-class circus, though, of course, we called it so in our bills, and put out flaming posters big enough to prove it, and endorsement enough of the country bumpkins who filled the tent, for we took in the moderate-sized towns and villages, as opposed to the big cities. We had, besides our ordinary traveling horses, about fifteen trained horses, and a company of a dozen equestrians all told, including manager, ring-master, clown, etc. Now, it so happened that in the troupe there was one very beautiful girl—Annette, we called her, and she appeared in the bills under the title of 'The Daring Annette.' She was about seventeen years old, well-shaped, graceful, black-haired, black-eyed, and full of fun. Her father had been a circusman, and she had been trained in his company, but at his death had shifted into ours. She could do any equestrian trick, bare-backed act, ride six horses abreast, jump through blazing hoops—in fact, the full programme, and the company set a high value on her performances. The manager wouldn't have lost her for anything, as he knew she was a first-rate card with the people. Well, she hadn't been with us more than two months before I was dead in love with her; and, mind you, this is twelve years ago, and as I was only twenty-seven at that time I was no slouch myself, I can tell you, when I had on the ring-master's rig—tight-fitting blue swallow-tail, white waistcoat, kid gloves, and bouquet in button-hole. You may laugh, boys, but what I tell you's fact. When she came into the ring, through the parted curtains, at a canter, I felt my heart jump up into my throat, and I'd watch her round that ring—well, like anything you like; and, sometimes, when she'd jump off her horse, pretending she was tired or something—for you know all these gags are part of the business—I'd catch her in my arms as gently as a baby, and let her to the ground light. Sometimes I used to think she jumped off on purpose. Of course, you may be sure I didn't let any opportunity slip on the outside to get into her good graces, but she was terribly shy and backward at being alone with anybody. Still, I flattered myself my chances were improving, and so just waited to get a good show to speak to her unequivocally about what was uppermost in my mind. Just about this time our clown took sick, and we hired another. He knew his business, was quick at a point, could make new 'gags' on the spur of the moment, had plenty of tact, and was half-fellow-well-met with the company in a couple of days. First thing I knew he was fooling around Annette. He would wink at her from the ring, and would invent jokes at my expense that he knew would cut, but he knew that as ring-master my cue was to take all his jokes, practical and otherwise, in good part, and that I durstn't wince at any of them. But it seemed to me that Annette smiled at this business as she waltzed round the ring, and this made me madder than ever; and so, when it was the cue of the ring-master to crack his whip at the clown for fooling, I let him have it solid on the tight of the skin, and another little one for luck; and the people roared at the natural scream with which he played his part, never thinking that both the crack and the scream were as natural as they could be. Still, it seemed to me that he was making far too much way with Annette, and that she, if she didn't encourage his advances, at least made no effort to repel them. I determined to get him out of the company in any possible way; I put up jobs on him to find out his weak points; I tried to quarrel with him, but it was no use; any one could see that it wouldn't stick, and, if it came to that, though I was efficient enough in my place so was he, and the manager was a pretty fair man when anything of that kind was in the wind, so I saw that all I could do was to bide my time. At last the opportunity arrived. One night—it was in the summer, and we had been playing to a country audience in Indiana—after the performance was over, I was going my usual rounds to see that everything was right with the men and horses, when whom should I see sitting concealed by a wagon but the clown and Annette. I stopped short where I stood, some twenty yards away, and heard him say:

"Fly with me, dearest, to-night. Say the word, and I'll have two of the swiftest horses saddled. I've made arrangements with one of the boys to make the night-watchman drunk, so there's no fear on that score. That fool of a ring-master 'll never suspect anything. Say you'll come." Before he said another word, or Annette could answer, I was on him like a shot.

"You d—d scoundrel," said I, "so you're going to steal the horses are you?" and I caught him by the collar, and drew him to a standing posture. We grappled and rolled, both being about the same size; Annette screamed, and in less than ten seconds the whole circus was roused, manager and all.

"Now, what does all this mean?" said the manager, as soon as we were separated, "what's all this fuss about?"

"It means," said I, "that this clown of ours has put up a job to steal two of our horses and clear out with Annette."

"Is this true, Annette?" asked the manager, turning to the girl, who stood still and said nothing. "What do you say about it?" turning to the clown.

"The clown folded his arms, struck a defiant attitude, and said nothing."

"All right," said the manager, "clear out, if you want to, but not with my horses. Pack up your traps and get. If you're round here in an hour from now, I'll turn you over to the authorities."

"He walked off, while we all returned to our tents. Next morning we had no clown, and the next place we stopped at had to improvise one from one of the supes. Things jogged along in good style for the next three months. I was satisfied at having got rid of my rival, and Annette had no sympathy with the new clown, who was old enough to be her grandfather."

"Well, as I say, things went along swimmingly. Annette was more chatty, smiled oftener, and one day I determined to get her alone after the performance, and put the question to her. It was September, and we were working Pennsylvania on the home route. We had made town about noon, and were sitting down to dinner a little afterward, when a letter was handed to Annette by a boy who didn't wait. This was the first letter I had ever known Annette to get, and it roused my curiosity, but I hadn't time to say anything before I had to get to work looking after the boys. The performance went off well that night, for we had a crowded house, and this puts spirit into every one. While managing the ring my eye rested on the reserved seats, and was attracted by a well-dressed gentleman in a plug-hat, whose face seemed familiar to me, though I couldn't recollect where I had seen him. It seemed to me, too, that Annette looked more than usual over to the reserved seats, and played more with her handkerchief than she was commonly in the habit of doing. Well, about twelve o'clock, as soon as I got things right, I asked Annette if she would take a stroll, as I had something to say to her. So she came out, and we sat down on the further side of a wagon, when some idea struck me."

"Annette," said I, "do you remember a night about three months ago, when we were working Indiana, sitting with a clown behind a wagon like this—that fellow that was going to take the horses, and wanted you to go with him?"

"Yes, I do," says she, sighing.

"I don't know what's put that fellow into my head to-night," says I, "but I was just going to propose—"

"I never got the words out, for I was suddenly seized from behind, and as quick as thought a gag was slipped into my mouth, and I was lying on my back, bound, below the wagon."

"Draw him out and chuck him into the wagon," said a voice that I recognized as the old clown's, "so's the watchman won't see him." Whereupon two rough-looking chaps—about as rough-looking as we are now—took me up by the feet and shoulders, and hoisted me in. Before I got in I saw the fellow in the plug-hat that had occupied the reserved seats that night, and now saw that it was the old clown."

"Annette had given a little scream at first, but nobody had noticed it, and now she was evidently standing quiet. Then I heard him say to the two boys that were with him:

"Here's that fifty-dollar bill that I promised ye. You did that work well. Now get. Mum's the word. Come on, Annette, no more fooling."

"I heard nothing more than this, and lay in that d—d wagon-bed all night, where I was found in the morning, stiff and sore, with the gag in my mouth; and you can bet I wasn't mad—no, not at all. I was just considering how to act, when a boy hands me a letter; and tearing it open, I found it was from Annette. She said she had always liked me, and wished to explain her conduct. The clown had once been ticket-agent in the first circus she was in, and had followed her into ours. She was afraid to go with him the first time, as both of them were poor; and when he had the row with the manager, and lost his place, that made things worse. She had made up her mind to have me, but that letter from the old lover, saying that a rich relative had died, played me out. They had just got married, she said, and left for New York. That settled me. A woman's a queer thing, anyhow," concluded Smartie, philosophically.

"An' did ye niver hear anny more of her, Smartie?" inquired Boston Bum, sympathetically. "Ye missed it there, sure."

"Well, she didn't make much by it," responded Smartie; "the man turned out a gambler."

"And you turned out a tramp," put in Cayuse. "She'd better 'a' shook the both o' ye."

The irrepressible Vito Blanco at this point again gratified the company with a stave, as it were, to suit the times, and at its conclusion Bob remarks:

"Now, old man, both Cayuse and Smartie have given themselves away, have confessed to being beaten; let's see what you can tell us. Give us some sheep-racket; you've been herding all your life, except when you were in town getting drunk. Tell us some camp yarn."

Hereupon Vito Blanco quaffed off a full oyster-can of wine, smacked his lips, drew the back of his hand across them, and said:

"Ye niver wuz in San Bownaventy County, b'ys? It wuz Santy Barbary when I wuz there, though; and I wuz herdin' sheep fur ould Doc Sharp, an' it was lambin' time, too, mind ye. Me camp wuz up near the fut-hills, an' I hedn't no corral, an' nuthin' but a tent to shlope in; an' I wuz mighty could, rainin' at nights, an' I never cud git me clothes dry. If ye iver wuz up through that country, anny of yez, ye'll mind that the ground is cut up wid deep ditches like, what thim greasers calls barrackys, a-runnin' down from the fut-hills onto the plains mebbe for a mile or two mile or more, wid the sides o' them straight up an' down, an' mebbe ten fut, mebbe fifteen fut deep; some o' them not more'n three or four fut wide, an' so overgrown wid brush ye cud scarcely see them. An' sure, b'ys, ye might walk a mile widout comin' to an aisy place, where the bank was shelvin', so's ye cud git down the wan side an' up the other. The sheep an' me both knew all the crossin' places—an' we had three big barrackys on the range. Well, b'ys, wan night I wuz jest cookin' meself a bite to ate, an' I wuz after drivin' the sheep, wid their big lambs, up a cañon wid purty sheep sides, so's to be out o' reach o' the kyoties, whin a man comes along wid his blankets, an' sets down by the fire, an' says: 'Mighty could night, boss; is yer rashuns enough fur two the night?' An' sez I: 'Ye're welcome, an' I'm glad to see ye, an' ye kin spread yer blankets in the tent, fur it luks like rain.' Then I says: 'How did ye find the camp, an' how did ye cross thim barrackys?' 'Oh,' sez he, laughin', 'I knows thim barrackys, fur I wanst herded on this range meself. I'm jist after comin' from the Simmy Ranch, an' I drewed some o' my kine that was comin' to me, an' I'm goin' into San Bownaventy to see the illphant, an' I'll be back this-a-way ag'in in about a week, whin the kine's all shpent,' showin' me a couple o' twenties. So we hed supper, an' next mornin' after brekfus he tramped on, an' I tuk out me sheep. This wuz on the Sunday mornin'; and on the Wedn'sday mornin' I takes out me sheep, and was bringin' them home in the avenin' whin thim divils o' lambs begins a playin' like mad along the edge o' the far side o' the big barracky, an' wan little batch o' 'bout twenty hed got separated from the others, an' ran down the barracky by thim-silves, an' got lost an' bewildered, an' keeps a-go'in' on fuder an' fuder down an' away from camp. So, after shwearin' awhile, I lights me pipe an' makes afther them. It wuz after sundown whin I shtarted, an' 'twas dark by the time I overtuk 'em, for they wuz a mile down the barracky; an' me an' my dog headed 'em back to camp, an' wint be-hint them. Well, b'ys, what d'ye think? we hedn't gone more'n half way afore somethin' tuk thim lambs, an' they all turned an' tried to run past us ag'in, atween us an' the edge o' the barracky. Well, I outs wid me fut to shtop thim, an' the edge o' the bank wuz sort o' crumbly from the rain, an' it guv way, an' afore I cud recover meself down I went to the bottom o' the barracky—me, an' two lambs wid me. I wuz shtunned for about a minnit—for the barracky was more'n twelve fut deep—an' when I come to meself I tried to move, an' cudden, an' me right leg wuz numbed, an' when I felt it I thought sure it wuz broken. I cudden see thim two lambs nowheres, but I hears them blattin' somewheres near. Well, b'ys, me heart failed in me, a-thinkin' that I was at the bottom o' a barracky, half a mile from camp, an' cudden move, an' no one widin cryin' distance, fur the nearest house wuz four miles away, an' the boss didn't come more'n wanst a week, an' he hed bin round on the Monday, an' this wuz the Wedn'sday night. So I sez to meself, 'Ould Vito Blanco, yer time's come—fur aven if I didn't die o' the cold, I hed nothin' to ate nor to dhrink, savin' about a quart o' wather left in me canteen when I fell. Still, I hollers, an' hollers, till I got hoarse, an' thin 'bout daybreak, whin the day began to warm up, I fell ashleep, an' shtiept till about noon—fur I cud tell by the hight o' the shadder on the side o' the barracky. When I wakes up I felt so dhy I cud 'a' dhrank a gallon at a shwig; but knowin' 'twas my last chance, I jist drank wan good mouthful. Thin I began to crawl, an' I dhraggd meself 'bout twenty yards, an' hed to shtop fur the pain. Thin I began to holler ag'in, an' only let a good holler every five minnits or so, fur it made me too wake an' thirsty to cry more. An' 'bout avenin' I sees the sheep a-go'in' home wid their lambs along the edge o' the barracky, an' the dog a-dhrivin' them, though, mind ye, he had been a-settin' on the edge over forminst me all of the day keepin' watch, as ye might say, o' me an' the sheep. Then it comes on dark ag'in, an' I hears the sheep blattin' up to the camp with their lambs. 'Bout ten minnits arter I hears sumthin' comin' down the barracky, an' presently up comes the dog an' licks me on the face, an' sets down aside me feet so's to keep them warm."

"Well, b'ys, I shpent another horrible night o' pain an' thirst, an' dhrinks up the lasht o' me wather, an' 'bout sun-up falls ashleep. Be noon, I woke ag'in, near crazed, an' cud see the dog a-settin' up on the edge o' the barracky an' a lookin' at the camp. I watched him for about a hour, an' belave me, b'ys, me throat wuz that dhy I cudden shpake, when, all of a sudden, up he jumps an' pricks his ears an' goes to barkin' an' makes fur the camp. I wundered what he wud be afther doin', but he hadn't been gone more'n half a hour when I hears some one callin' out at the edge of the barracky, 'Hallo! ould man, what's up?' Well, b'ys, I niver heerd a more welcomer vice nor that; but I cudden say nary a word, but moved one hand a little. Thin that man lets himself down aisy into the barracky, an' seein's I cudden say nuthin', he m'istens me lips from his canteen, an' thin takes me on his shuthers, an' packs me clane up the bottom o' the barracky into camp, an' sets me on the bed, an' gives me wather, little by little, an' makes me tay, an' thin 'xamines me leg, an' says: 'It's broke, sure; but I won't lave you the night, but in the mornin' I'll go for the boss.' Thin, afther a while, he sez: 'It's a mighty lucky thing for you that them one-horse gamblers up to San Bownaventy roped me into a fargo game, or elst me money wud hev lasted two or three days longer, an' there'd 'a' bin a dead sheep-herder at the bottom o' that barracky; an' if it hadn't 'a' bin fur that dog o' your'n a-comin' up to me an' waggin' his tail, an' goin' on a little hit an' thin turnin' an' comin' up to me ag'in an' waggin' his tail, an' goin' on ag'in, as much to say: 'Come on, won't ye? an' I'll show ye sumthin'; I'd 'a' gone right on along the fut-hills, an' made Big Charley's camp to-night. Well, b'ys, in the mornin' he wint fur the boss, an' the boss hed me tuk to San Bownaventy, an' in two months me leg wuz well, an' I herded the ould band at the same camp, but I niver fell down no more barrackys."

Vito Blanco concluded, and even the scrupulous Boston Bum made no objection to the narrative—probably because the old man, being tired out with talking, made no attempt to sing. Smartie threw more wood on the fire, so as to get up a blaze, Cayuse filled up all the oyster-cans, remarking as he did so that there wasn't more than two rounds left in the demijohn, while Boston Bum said:

"Ye said ye hed bin a bar-keep wunst, Bob, an' now, senst it's your turn to tell a shtory, tell us sumthin' 'bout that."

"All right, Boston," said Bob; "I'll tell you all about it; but if it sounds tame after your adventures, you mustn't get mad at me. Here goes," and Bob began:

"It was the Fourth of July, some years ago, and I had had no dinner—if it comes to that, no breakfast either—and about dusk, seven o'clock or so, I approached a saloon, situated at a certain small station on a certain small railroad in a southern county. Of course I hadn't a cent, but I nevertheless walked in, laid my blankets on the floor, and settled down in a chair by a card-table. 'Pedro' was in full blast, engaging the earnest attention and apparently taxing the utmost capacities of two 'workmen', in coarse flannel shirts and blue overalls, a sheep-herder, with pistol at his belt, and a tall man in gray clothes, linen duster, collar, and necktie. These latter appendages argued a certain social standing. The host at the bar limped away to the back portion of the building, and presently limped in again, eyed me critically for a few seconds, made some mental calculation, then uttered the talismanic formula:

"Will you take a drink?"

"Certainly I would, and did. Then followed the query: "Do you wish to earn four bits?"

"This being an undeniable fact, I followed my limping interlocutor to the kitchen, where I found that the way and means to become owner of the sum in question was by clearing off the evening repast, cleaning the utensils, and getting the kitchen into order for the night. This having been satisfactorily accomplished, a move back into the saloon was in order, and an invitation to take a hand at 'big Pete' accepted. It boots not to tell how many games were played, how many drinks drank, how many loud epithets employed to grace the auspicious occasion. The thing, of course, broke up in a row. The two men in shirts and overalls got after the sheep-herder with the pistol; the man with the collar and necktie interfered, and was knocked down; the limping host was placed a little more hors du combat than when he started in; the mélée became general, till vengeance was satisfied and honor appeased by the forcible expulsion of the sheep-herder, whose pistol was thrown after him, missing his head but hitting the surface, and subsequently the bottom, of a four-foot-deep slough, which was popularly supposed to receive the drainage of the neighborhood. This happy dispatch having been accomplished, the door was bolted to prevent the return of the objectionable scapegoat; more drinks were set up; Pedro changed to poker; my four bits changed to four dollars, then back again to nothing. Daylight broke upon a demoralized crowd, unfit for anything but sleep. I suppose the exigencies of my position kept my head clear, and by noon, when the boys woke, there was soup ready for them, coffee, ham and eggs, etc., etc., which suited them and the lame boss to a jot. This latter—a Slavonian, whose liver had got down to his feet and swollen them to mere adipose tissue—needed a bar-tender and a cook. I needed a place, and stayed with it six weeks. Lively times. The two 'workmen' above referred to were well-borers, i. e., of artesian wells, who were eating and drinking up their pay—or rather what would have been their pay if they had had it—their boss standing security with the Slavonian until he got paid himself for his well contracts. The debt was well matured and still growing when I left, and how it came out in the end this deponent can not say. But he can say, that for jollity, bonhomie, laissez-faire, and any other epithet, French or English, that expresses the same thing, the racket couldn't be beat. Baker and Steiger were two way-up fellows—the former a broker (out of funds), the latter a machinist (out of order); the man in the collar and necktie (Crowell) was the biggest landowner in the vicinity—oldish, but with the reputation of being one of the boys. Our Slavonian host was a chef of no mean pretensions, and many were the nice little stews and entrées, got up with wine and other palate-tickling ingredients. These well-borers, be it remembered, made four dollars per day when at work; and having been at work four months at that rate, an easy arithmetical calculation was sufficient to convince even a Slavonian landlord that they could afford to spend four dollars a day for the same period, or eight dollars a day for half the period. They ranged between the two. They were bound to have a good time anyhow, being slightly suspicious of the solvency of their employer, and preferring to take it in the good things of life to getting nothing at all. True wisdom after all, and how many of us find it out after the knowledge is worthless! None of us moralized much there, though, you can safely bet. Crowell, the rancher, could always raise a handful of twenties by selling a colt—he had some fine stock—or a town-lot, for he it known this little country bantling had, like all good American hamlets, pretensions to become a city. Sometimes we made incursions into the willows—very like these—and brought in a wagon-load of fire-wood, for the sake of exercise; but this was only for pastime, for the true business of life was Pedro—and whisky-drinking. Jolly old Jack Falstaff's 'gallon of sack to bread one pennyworth' met its match here. Board cost but a dollar a day, whisky five. The participants in the carnival might have said, with Tennyson:

'We drank the southern sun to sleep, and lit
Lamps that outburned Canopus—'

But what does Tennyson know about these things anyway? He never was in any of them, except 'in his mind'—at least let us charitably suppose so. There was an old Spanish village a couple of miles away—just near enough to be handy and not obtrusive—which threw in such other good things as were necessary to complete the programme of a 'high old time'—fandangos, black eyes, forbidden fruit (for orchard poaching is strictly viewed askance in such communities), etc., etc. I am immodest enough to say that it was a fandango scrape that broke me up, and occasioned my departure for 'parts unknown.' Yet, perhaps, when absence shall have ceased to make the heart grow fonder, and healed up fresh cicatrices, or at least so overgrown them with adipose tissue that nice discrimination will fail to detect aught but nature's scar, there will still be a welcome, a dinner, and a drink for the graceless, devil-may-care, unprincipled vagabond who is known to you by the name of Bob.

Bob looked round at his auditors, but they were all snoring, deep in the arms of Morpheus. The last story had done the business; the last straw had broken the backs of these well-seasoned camels. He took up the demijohn and shook it—it was empty. "Perhaps," muttered he, sotto voce, "Morpheus wouldn't have got into this sanctuary so easily if Bacchus hadn't gone out;" and, first throwing the loose blankets over the legs of the sleepers to keep off the morning dews, and thoughtfully leaving four half-dollars on the gunny-sack among the packages, one for each of the boys, to procure as many gallons of wine against the morrow, Bob took his departure as the clock from the Court-house in the distance chimed twelve. And so ended this Symposium of Tramps.

ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.

INTAGLIOS.

Epigram from Goethe.

I met my love in a lonely place,
And clasped her in a warm embrace.
She struggled in my arms, and said:
"Unhand me, or I'll call for aid."

I cried, with angry voice and rude:
"I'll kill the man that dares intrude!"
She lisped: "Don't speak so loud, my dear,
Lest some stray passer-by might hear."
—Cecil Harcourt.

Adagio.

When memory is a harp in sorrow's hand,
How plaintive the aerial music swells,
As though a breeze from some enchanted land
Went sighing across long slopes of asphodels!

What pale, wild spirits troop with ghostly tread,
When memory is a harp in sorrow's hand—
Funeral-vestured and rue-chapleted,
Gathering at her disconsolate command!

What wistful eyes, amid that phantom band,
Meet ours through portals of the unclosing years,
When memory is a harp in sorrow's hand,
To throb with melodies that are shaped from tears!

What summoning spell, while these deep murmurs roll,
Can slowly wake, with resurrection grand,
That shadowy Campo Santo called the soul,
When memory is a harp in sorrow's hand!
—Edgar Fawcett.

Peace.

When winds are raging on the upper ocean,
And billows wild contend with angry roar,
'Tis said, far down beneath the wild commotion,
That peaceful stillness reigns forever more.

Far, far beneath the noise of tempest dieth,
And silver waves chime ever peacefully;
And no rude storm, how fierce so'er it flieeth,
Disturbs the Sabbath of that deeper sea.

To the heart that knows Thy love, O Purest!
There is a temple sacred evermore,
And all the babble of loud, angry voices
Dies in hushed stillness at its peaceful door.

Far, far away the roar of passion dieth,
And loving thoughts rise calm and peacefully;
And no rude storm, how fierce so'er it flieeth,
Disturbs the soul, O Lord, that dwells in Thee.
—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

Everything.

You'd call his room a pleasant place:
Satin and rosewood, lights and lace,
And fruits and vines were there. (Ah, well!)
And yet the rich man rang his bell,
When, lo! he saw a fairy flit
From outside dusk to answer it.

Her flower-like eyes, so faint and blue,
Looked at him through her veil of dew.
Though every gracious thing he had,
His face was fretful, tired, and sad.
"Pray, sir," she whispered, "did you ring?"
He said, "Yes; I want—everything!"

The fairy laughed, and walked away.
Ragged and rosy, at his play,
A boy, who had the grass, the dew,
Birds, bees, the sun, the stars, like you,
She met. "What do you want?" sighed she.
"Oh! I have everything," said he.
—Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt.

Death in Life.

She sitteth there a mourner,
With her dead before her eyes;
Flushed with the hues of life is he,
And quick are his replies.
Often his warm hand touches hers,
Brightly his glances fall;
And yet in this wide world is she
The loneliest of all.

Some mourners feel their dead return
In dreams or thoughts at even;
Ah! well for them their best beloved
Are faithful still in heaven!
But woe to her whose best-beloved,
Though dead, still lingers near;
So far away when by her side
He can not see nor hear.

With heart intent, he comes, he goes
In busy ways of life.
His gains and chances counteth he,
His hours with joy are rife.
Careless he greets her day by day,
Nor thinks of words once said—
Oh, would that love could live again,
Or her heart give up its dead.
—Mary Mapes Dodge.

At Her Grave.

I have stayed too long from your grave, it seems;
Now I come back again.
Love, have you stirred down there in your dreams
Through the sunny days or the rain?
Ah, no, the same peace; you are happy so;
And your flowers, how do they grow?

Your rose has a bud; is it meant for me?
Ah, little red gift, put up
So silently, like a child's present you see
Lying beside your cup!
And geranium leaves—I will take, if I may,
Two or three to carry away.

I went not far. In yon world of ours
Grow ugly weeds, With my heart
Thinking of you and your garden of flowers
I went to do my part,
Plucking up where they poison the human wheat
The weeds of cant and deceit.

'Tis a hideous thing I have seen, and the toil
Begets few thanks, much hate;
And the new crop only will find the soil
Less foul, for the old 'tis too late.
I come back to the only spot I know
Where a weed will never grow.
—Arthur O'Shaughnessy.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

"Annette, I am going to have company," says a belle of the Rue Breda to her maid, "and I want you to go to the fish-market and get some fish, some of the best."

"Yes'm."

"Only don't buy them from ma—she'll swindle you."

"Well, old fel, how's your mother-in-law?"

"Dead! Ha, ha! (Excuse my emotion.) Had a stroke of apoplexy and died in less than a minute. At first I thought she had only fainted, and I never was so scared in my life."

In a low restaurant a diner asks for a daily paper. The garçon carries him one, saying, in a loud voice, "Here is La Justice."

Immediately every table is vacated, the diners and drinkers flying out by a rear door.

At a café a demon yells for a bottle of brandy.

"But Monsieur has already drank a whole bottle," exclaims the garçon.

"True! true! Ha! ha! But here is my address. Have me carried there when the table gets me down and is throttling me."

Street urchin to Bohemian whose boots have given way extensively:

"Sa-ay, what sort of jokes have the sidewalks been telling your boots? They're on the broad grin."

A young actress urges her friend, Count X., to give her a splendid bracelet she had long set her mind upon possessing. "I'll give it to you," says the count finally, "but on one condition—you must never wear it on the stage. My wife might see it if you did—"

"Oh, I see—and raise a row."

"No: make me buy her one like it."

At an examination of medical students who have gone up for their degrees:

First Examiner—"Guess we ought to pluck about half of these fellows. I never saw such an ignorant lot."

Second Examiner—"Ssh! Let's pass them. They'll have to call us in for consultations!"

J. is a garçon de Paris, who never spares compliments to your face or the most malicious back-biting in your absence. Scholl says of him:

"He is a cup of poisoned holy water."

In a certain theatre was played a long, long drama. Everybody gaped. The third act came near to an end without developing the least interest more than the two before it.

Just at that moment one of the characters was killed in a duel.

"Thank God!" cried one of the spectators. "There is one less to worry us."

A statesman, bewildered at an official ball, lost his wife in the crowd. He bunted unsuccessfully for her for two hours. Finally a gallant cavalry officer led her to him.

The husband jokingly said:

"Monsieur, when one returns a lost valuable one has a right to ask a liberal reward."

"A thousand thanks; it has been paid me."

Dressed in fur-trimmed paletots they meet each other in the Place de la Madeleine. They take each other's measure at a glance.

"What did all that coat cost you?" said one.

"Three hundred and fifty francs. And yours?"

"Six hundred francs."

"Dear enough!"

"Yes; but as I never pay, it brings it a little cheaper."

Remarks of Montesquieu, returned from travels: Germany is made to travel in.

Italy is made to remain in.

Spain is made to love in.

England is made to think in.

Switzerland is made to climb in.

France is made to live in.

Two truly modern brothers repeat continually in the most natural manner, when speaking of each other:

"My brother and I are not at all rich, but we always say if one of us should die we should have such a fine fortune."

An excellent lady, whose excellent daughter is the happy wife of a promising young advocate, remarks:

"I am and ought to be the happiest woman in the world, for I have a daughter that is never talked about, and a son-in-law that every one is speaking of."

A literal translation:

One genteel little actress who has enough long-time made part of the theatre of the Variétés, Mlle. Stella, come of to die at the age of twenty-four years, after one long and dolorous malady. Mlle. Stella had been engaged the year last at Bruxelles, where she had played "Babiole" at side of Mlle. Mary Albert. She from it is become malade, and since she has been almost constantly abedded. There is in the life of this poor Stella one history touching. She had for companion to the Variétés one all young girl, Mlle. Deforme, dead at seventeen or eighteen years in giving the day to one fellow. The father, miskonowing the duty which itself imposed to him, had refused himself to charge of the infant. The little thing was fatally destined to enter to the Enfants-Trouvés. Mlle. Stella it took, and herself charged of it to elevate. Unhappily the death came off to interrupt this good work. The poor child, who has not two years, loses one second time his mother. Hope we that he him self will find to the Variétés or other parts, some artists who him will abandon not.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served at 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1880.

We are not at all unmindful of the fact that the Argonaut is often charged with being a Native-American or "Know-Nothing" paper, and we are not sure that the charge is not somewhat deserved. Kalloch at the Temple, Senator Enos at Union Hall, and all the small demagogues of native birth, who make of politics a profession, delight to charge this journal with entertaining and expressing sentiments of hostility to the foreign-born. The German papers catch the echo, and repeat it without reading, or, if reading, without understanding the great, broad, and distinctive line we draw between the ignorant and vicious of their countrymen who engage in politics, and those intelligent, worthy, and industrious Germans who engage in business pursuits and mind their own business. The Jewish journals have been the meanest and most deliberate in their lying misrepresentations, and the lowest and meanest of the Jews seem to think it their duty to vindicate the character of a people we have never assailed. The Democratic papers and politicians have taken upon themselves the duty of assailing and misrepresenting the Argonaut in the interest of the low, political Irish, because the rank and file of the party is made up of this very meanest class of citizens. Now, nothing is further from our purpose than the intention of drawing class lines, or religious lines; and if these lines are drawn—if they now exist—if there is a political class, or a religious class, drawn closer together by the ties of nationality or church—we declare that it is not American, and it is not of our ideas or belongings. We have no controversy with any one concerning his religious belief. We have no apologies for any Protestant or Catholic when they make use of pulpit or church organization to advance their political interests, or the interests of any political party. The conduct of Isaac the Baptist we regard as utterly contemptible. He has turned his pulpit, and the meeting-house in which he makes sacrilegious pretense of worship, into a political hall. There is no class of citizens so generous, so free from national prejudices, so liberal to all of other nations and other creeds, as Americans. Our history, our whole legislative and political career, from the landing of Pilgrim, Quaker, Huguenot, and Catholic, has been one of unexampled liberality. If we have had once in our history a "Know-Nothing" organization, it grew out of the unendurable insolence of the Irish wing of the Democratic party. This "Know-Nothing" party had the sympathy of very many of the better class of foreigners, and if to-day in California there was organized upon some broad and generous platform an "American party" the first to give it countenance and recognition would be intelligent citizens of foreign birth.

It is not strange that men of distant lands, meeting together upon a foreign shore, speaking the same language, and drawn together by common tastes and associations, should be more or less inclined to join their political fortunes. It is not perhaps strange that the associations of a common worship should bring men together in various organizations, and incline them to mutual dependency and support. It is not, perhaps, altogether unnatural that the Germans should employ the Germans, the Irish the Irish, and Jews the Jews. But when we see this tendency extending to the prejudice of Americans, and introduced as a factor into our politics, and made to cut a figure in the administration of municipal, State, and government affairs, we can not afford to be altogether unmindful of it. That this is so let us look around us for proof. Go to the Hibernia Bank, the leading Irish merchants and business men, the gas company, the railroads, the manufactures controlled by them; to the German banks, mercantile establishments, wine-cellars, and vineyards; to the Jewish banks, stores, shops, or industries; to their control and ownership, and observe the percentage of their own nationalities and co-religionists employed by them; note the deputies under the Irishman, or German, or Jew in office, and how rare to find an American—how almost certain to find a countryman. Of sixty-one deputies in the Sheriff's office, under Mr. Nunan, only three were native-born; and the same rule prevails to a large extent throughout our city government. The statistics of men in the employ of street-railroads, of factories, banks, and stores, show that employer, foreman, and manager of foreign birth employ foreigners largely, to the exclusion of our own countrymen. That this is a legal privilege—that the banker, merchant, or manufacturer has the right to employ his own countryman as clerk, bookkeeper, or laborer—we of course understand. But that these people have the right to band together and form classes in order to control and direct the politics of the country we deny. We would deny them the privilege of military association, and we would discourage this ever active and objectionable appeal to class interests and class prejudices, as something in bad taste and hurtful. It must be remembered that the native-born Americans are as yet in the numerical ascendancy in this country, and that Protestants are as yet more numerous than Catholics and Israelites combined; and that the one class has the same right to combine as the other. Only once in the history of the republic has the cry of an American party gone up. There ought to be no cause for its reorganization. We of San Francisco know what cause we have to reorganize such a party. We have tasted the bitter cup of alien mixture, as it has been forced to our lips by the brutal and devilish mob that was temporarily allowed the ascendancy of the Sandlot. We have seen what its intemperate violence would have ended in if the healthy sentiment of the better class of foreigners and Americans had not interposed for its suppression. This same combination that has united to put down this organized insurrection is now ready to unite in the formation of an American party.

There is also a growing sentiment in this city and in this State to favor the employment of that class of laborers and working men who have not been the followers of Kearney. It is all very well to say that the employer should not control or attempt to control the political opinions of those to whom he provides labor. We unhesitatingly declare that it is the privilege and the duty of the man of brains and capital to see to it that he keeps no one in his employ who, by his vote, party association, or political influence, endeavors to destroy capital or to agitate against the material interests of those who find for him the opportunity of labor. The demagogue may prate about the sanctity of the ballot, and the inviolability of the secret ballot, and the glorious privilege which the elector enjoys of doing as he pleases. The voter may do as he pleases, and so may we. The voter may please to vote as Kearney dictates, and we may please to let him go to Kearney or the devil for his opportunity to earn wages. It is the privilege of the employer to choose his laborers, and it is his duty to choose those only who vote for the maintenance of order, preservation of property, and the upholding of good government. And if it is the privilege of the foreign-born to discriminate in favor of employing his countrymen, it is equally the privilege of American citizens, all things else being equal, to give the native-born, well-behaved, and decent American a chance to earn his living—that is, if the poor, over-run, and down-trodden unfortunate can be found. In large cities nowadays he is not apt to be. An English traveler, writing of San Francisco and declaring it to be the most cosmopolitan city in the United States, says: "I had my boots blackened by an African, my chin shaved by a European, my bed made by an Asiatic; a Frenchman cooked my dinner, an Englishman showed me my seat, an Irishman changed my plate, a Chinaman washed my table napkin, and a German handed me my bill." Where, in our forefathers' great and glorious name, was the American? Macaulay's historical New Zealander alone knows. This is about the sum, substance, and extent of the Argonaut's Americanism; and to such of its readers as do not approve these sentiments we have no particular apology to offer for their expression.

A friend, the editor of an interior Republican journal, opposed to the nomination of Grant, asks what we will do in event of the ex-President's nomination by the National Convention? What position will the Argonaut take? Frankly, we say we do not know. We should regard the nomination of General Grant as an unfortunate act. We should believe that it had been accomplished by a minority of machine politicians, in opposition to the will of a majority of Republicans, and a very large majority of the better and non-office-seeking class. We should regard the result as a triumph of Senators Conkling, Cameron, Logan, and other politicians, and other cliques, rings, and juntas of Washington, over the higher intelligence and better patriotism of the Republican party. We should see in it the power of money, the influence of syndicates, and the exertion of great corporations. It would be the first step taken in the dangerous direction of a strong central government; we would see our country emerging from a republican to a monarchical form of government, State sovereignty trampled upon, and a central, strong government, altogether lacking the elements of our early organization, established upon the ruin of a constitutional confederation of independent and sovereign governments. What will we do about the nomination of General Grant in the event of its happening? We are powerless to control or direct, or indeed to contribute toward such a result. In California, as elsewhere, a small, active, and not very respectable minority of office-seeking, contract-getting, political jobbers will send delegates to Chicago. The people will not be consulted; the Republican rank and file will have no voice in the matter. The merchant, or farmer, or mechanic who reads this article will not be consulted nor have his opinion asked. Mr. W. W. Morrow, David McClure, William Higgins, Marc Boruck, George Evans, Archy Harloe, Jim Green, country court-house cliques, a few post-route contractors, Shannon of the Custom-House, a score or two of ward politicians, here an ambitious person who would go to the Senate, and there another who aspires to Congress, will manage all this business for us. When they have managed it, and sent their delegates, and made their nominations, and fixed their bargains, and divided out the spoils, and assigned to each his office, they will turn upon us voters, and enthrone us, and whoop us up, and set us on, and shake the red rag of party at us and inflame our passions, and beg our money, and persuade us that the country is in peril, that the devil is to pay and no pitch hot and ever so far to water, unless we rally, and talk, and vote, and go to ward meetings, and shout, and hurrah, and get drunk in order to elect a Republican President.

If General Grant is nominated, it will be in defiance of the popular will, and against the wishes of the Republican party. It will be in fraud of honest politics. But what we shall do about it we do not know. Mr. Blaine is the choice of the Republicans of this State. Mr. E. B. Washburne is the Argonaut's private preference. If Grant is nominated a great deal will depend upon who is nominated against him. If the Democracy should nominate Governor Seymour he would get a great many votes. We believe him to be able, patriotic, and honest. If Mr. Field of California should be nominated, we should be tempted to vote for him; and if we thought he would cut off little Black-and-tan's tail just behind his ears, the task of his support would be an easy one. If Mr. Bayard should be nominated we should not think it a national calamity if he should beat General Grant, and we should not be frightened because some years ago he made a secession speech. If Governor Tilden should be the Democratic opponent of General Grant? Well! we think we would either go fishing, or get somebody to hire us to leave the country for our health. We reserve to ourselves the privilege of reviewing the position when Grant is nominated, of deciding then what is the best thing to do—what is the right thing to do. We think now that General Grant can not be nominated; that he ought not to be; and that in such an event that he could not be elected; that he could not carry California; and that it is not for the best interest of the Republican party that he should be nominated; and not for the best interests of the American Republic that he should be elected.

The signs of the times indicate the nomination of Governor Tilden by the Democratic Convention. New York is conceded to him by all parties, and notwithstanding the defection of Tammany, this will be a formidable candidacy in that State. It is not at all probable that Tammany would maintain a hostile attitude against any Democratic Presidential candidate. Enough votes have already been obtained in Pennsylvania to give Tilden the delegates at large with a pronounced majority to back them. Nebraska, Iowa, and Connecticut are for Tilden, and on Thursday Oregon pronounced for him with an enthusiasm that indicated a marked preference. On the fourteenth of this month the Democratic Central Committee of this State met, and, by special invitation, some five hundred prominent Democrats have been asked to meet the committee for general consultation. It seems very certain that Governor Tilden will carry California. His great strength here, and everywhere, is based upon the general belief that he was honestly elected President of the United States, and unfairly cheated in the returns. Governor Tilden's record is not a bad one—indicating capacity, great firmness of character, and economy in the administration of public affairs. The opposition of Tammany—which is regarded throughout the length and breadth of the nation as the synonym for fraud, political trickery, and Tweedism—will strengthen the candidacy of Governor Tilden in all places outside the State of New York. Judge Field has been, and is being, prominently mentioned at the East in connection with the Presidential office. He ought, by the ordinary rules that govern in politics, to have the delegates of California, Oregon, and Nevada for him. If he has any friends who desire to save him in this State, they have as yet made no sign, and it now looks as though Tilden would carry California.

Times are improving, and the outlook is more promising. It would be idle to deny that San Francisco has been passing through a very distressing period, and that all departments of business and all industries have been greatly depressed. There have been two leading causes of our present condition: Chinese immigration, that has frightened more than it ought, and stock gambling, that has involved people who ought never to have dealt in mining stocks. The result was a reaction from our former prosperity; it would have been temporary and brief if it had not been for the Kearney agitation. The Kearney agitation would have been short-lived and unimportant if it had not been for the rivalry of the Call and Chronicle. Out of this grew the agitation and adoption of a new Constitution at a time not at all propitious for an experiment. Out of journalistic passion sprang the Baptist horror, like Minerva from the head of Jupiter, a full-armed, full-panoplied, political nuisance. Out of the agitation came a partial delegation to Sacramento of ignorant Sand-lotters, and more honest, but quite as ignorant, country legislators. The session that demanded the highest integrity and the best talent to interpret for us a new organic law and put in movement the machinery of a new system, gave us the worst Legislature, as a whole, that California ever had. But, thank God, we have survived all this, and, one after another, the causes and results of all these crimes and accidents are passing away. The storm has broken, and we have survived the deluge. The ark has rested; the dove has gone forth, and we think we see the bow of promise in the horizon, giving us assurance of better times. Stock gambling, like all other gambling, has reformed itself; the business has played itself out. Some of the leading and worst of our stock manipulators, the men of broken fortunes and of doubtful reputations, have gone to New York. Our burned business children dread the gambling fire, and will in the future to a great extent avoid it. Chinese immigration has been arrested. More Chinese are now leaving the country than coming to it. A commission, in which California is ably represented, is organized to reform the Burlingame treaty; and this question has now become a national one, and is no longer a mere local disturbance. The Kearney agitation is suppressed by a strong and determined public opinion, that has resolved that it shall no longer disturb the community by violence or show of violence.

As a most glorious consequence Isaac, the Baptist, sinks back to his primal insignificance of a vulgar, sensational preacher. The plug-ugly legislators of the Sand-lot return in a few days to the oblivion of their original obscurity. The Legislature adjourns. No very serious laws have yet been enacted. We may not like some provisions of the revenue law; we regret the passage of an unconstitutional anti-Chinese employment law; it was a mistake to repeal the gag law; we do not approve of the passage of the school-marm law, nor the Normal School law, nor the Folsom branch-prison appropriation, nor the McClure charter. We think it would have been good policy to have let the stock operators alone, and we can not see any sense or justice in legislating in obedience to a popular clamor against one interest and in favor of another. But the McClure charter, under the pruning-knife of the Bulletin, and the scrutiny of the Committee of the Council, and the honest purpose of Senators Traylor, Neumann, Hittell, and Dickinson, will not be a bad bill if it passes, and will not be a calamity if it does not pass. Our recent election demonstrates that San Francisco is not unmindful of her best interests, and the selection of fifteen of her best freeholders to form a charter is a guarantee of the future. Governor Perkins is doing his duty pretty well. Real estate taxes in San Francisco will be largely reduced this year; taxation will be equalized throughout the State. The warm spring rains have been most abundant and widely distributed, giving promise of a larger grain yield than California has ever before produced. More lands have been irrigated, more tule lands reclaimed, more breadth of acres sown to grain, more vines planted, more trees set to orchards, more snow piled upon the mountains for summer mining than in any previous year. Our people have been taught the necessity of economy, and are practicing it. Our laborers have been taught the dangers of demagoguery and agitation, and they will heed the lesson in future. This community has passed through a hard discipline, not much needed.

In Stetson's ward six thousand dead
Are buried, now, per annum.
He wants them moved, for poison-fed
The breezes are that fan 'em.

Let pure electors once surmise
Their delegate is cheating,
In righteous anger they arise,
Demanding his unseating.

But here's a Solon sans offense
Who views with disapproval
Corruption in constituents,
And prays for their removal!

Speaking of the dead, by the way, this is a good enough place to explain that a certain Dr. Dubois has been incurring considerable needless expense in advertising in the Bulletin what he is pleased to call "the Argonaut's opinion of the Mount Tamalpais Cemetery," as "showing the spirit of the opposition" to Dr. Dubois; the proprietor, in his "public-spirited desire to establish a large rural cemetery for San Francisco." We did not know that the Argonaut had any "opinion" of the cemetery in question, nor do we gather that it has from the jocular paragraph attributed, correctly, we suppose, to our journal. The things of this world interest us far more than the things of Marin County, and in the interest of the living we will go back on the dead every time we get the chance.

We confess to finding something not altogether unfunny in the notion of a doctor running a graveyard: it lends itself easily and abundantly to the purposes of the humorist. It is a theme upon which one could embroider a countless multitude of pleasing variations; but with a rare and touching moderation (it seems) we merely described the doctor's waste-dump as "waterless," which, in a measure, it is; but compared with the roasters in which his ex-patients will have their nobler parts freed from the sulphurets of sin, its humidity is as that of Oregon to that of Arizona, or as the sloppy liquefaction of a wet nurse to the mealiness of dry champagne.

There is a very unpleasant difference of opinion between Miss Raymond and Senator Hill. The lady insists that the senator is—or was—her de facto husband, and the father of a very interesting child, of which she is the de facto mother. Senator Hill is very positive that she is mistaken in this little matter. He is sure that he is not the child's father, and thinks Miss Raymond is misinformed in thinking that she is its mother. It is really a very pretty misunderstanding. The Senate of the United States has very properly decided not to interfere in the matter, arguing, with deep and deliberate wisdom, that to keep track of senatorial scandals would require a standing committee and one million double-back-actioned short-lived reporters to take the fragrant testimony.

MEANS OF GRACE.

A brave "New England Dinner," t'other day,
Was served in Plymouth Chapel to defray
The cost of sending souls, all sweet and nice,
From Post and Webster Streets to Paradise.
Bacon and Beans, in due proportion spread,
And liberally flanked with brownest bread
("By which, alone, man does not live," 'tis writ,
And which, at least, none living now e'er hit)
Tempted the sinner's purse; and, without question,
Salvation paid the pains of indigestion.
Bacon and Beans—O ministering pair!
Your holy functions bow shall I declare?

Each Yankee stomach—let me here proclaim
That Paunch and Spirit are the very same—
Each Yankee stomach gets itself a straddle
The sainted Pig ere yet his hide's a saddle,
And while to bim with love and faith it clings
It spurs to heaven without the need of wings.
But should Digestion interfere—which rarely
Occurs—that Essence is dismounted squarely,
Falls into ease (which is accounted sin)
And hy the devil Doubt is taken in.

As hunger was appeased and thirst was slaked
By manna, so the Blessed Bean—if baked—
Fills the faint soul with spiritual strength,
Broadens its breadth and lengthens out its length;
With edifying aches inspires the well,
The sick with profitable thoughts of hell.
Jack-Anxious, by religious fervor driven,
Shins up his bean-stalk to a dream of heaven,
Nor fears a giant with his "fee-faw-fum"
Will mitigate the bliss of Kingdom Come.
One only apprehension mars his quack-pride—
A fit of flatulence may make him backslide.
Meanwhile, the deacons crack no pods, 'tis said,
But make the neophytes shell out instead.

Hail, feast of reason!—hail, "New England Dinner"!—
"Them pious" that "eat's awful," and the sinner
That "pays tremenjus," equally attest
Thy charm the direst and Thy pain the best.
Nor purse nor flesh can e'er withstand Thee: Thou
Dost wring at once the pocket and the brow.
Thy thrifty priesthood—may they never cease
Providing means of grace by means of grease.

Those who remember how faithfully the Chronicle has followed the fortunes of the Reverend John Hemphill will be pleased to see that the signs of the times point to the lying down of the lion and the lamb in the not distant future. One can not help wondering, however, who will be inside.

Tom Collins and William Riley were walking in the park last Sunday, quietly and without interfering in the affairs of any one else. Along came a heavy team of bays. "What is the difference between that team and the Pacific Ocean?" said Collins. The blue-eyed and brown-coated guardian of the peace looked at them from behind the ilex hedge until each had been reduced to the semblance of newspaper pulp, then thoughtfully he dragged them in. "It is not for fighting on Sunday and in a public place, merely, that I give you each ten days," said his honor, in passing sentence; "it is because the provocative pun was unpunished by the serenity of judicious silence." There is a keen subtlety of suggestion in this incident which ought to appeal, irresistibly, to every intelligent reader—meaning every reader of the Argonaut.

It is a curious but suggestive fact that no person likes to be thought an ass. Curious because one is popularly believed to like the sense of superiority to one's fellows which generally accompanies a difference of opinion between gentlemen. And surely no fellow can be so undeniably one's inferior as the fellow who thinks one an ass. "Suggestive"? Well, it is suggestive, because the ass proper is an exceedingly useful animal, and can live on thistles and the north wind. The ass animal is a sort of sub-human Chinaman—who can live on rice and fog; and that is the bright, particular reason why Senator Kane did not take the thousand dollars offered him by the Irish barkeep to support the Débris Bill. As Dundreary would say, "what a lovely ass that fellow was."

Saint Denis was sleeping very quietly in his little bed, and the doctor thought he might last till morning. Mrs. Saint Denis thought so too, for she sent to the corner and had a wash-pitcher of beer brought in. The saint sat up in bed, and winked at a picture of Judge Freelon which hung on the wall. "Bring up a bit of cheese and some cold meat, and you might send out for some boiled oysters, for the hell-roarin', hide-bound, blood-letting thieves are put off for another week," said the saint.

The Call's society reporter gives us the following taffy from "a writer": "The possibilities of tragedy which lie in some women's eyes are sufficient to make the face strongly interesting and suggestive. You know that with the slightest application of the proper touch, the mind of concealed emotion would fly up!"

Some writers don't want no fame,
And others don't want no fuss,
But this 'nonymous sharp can't blame
A feller for reasonin' thus:
When he was christ'ened a name
Was give to the little cuss
O' the Call. Howsomever, the same
Remains unbeknownst to us.

The conduct of Mr. Senator Kane is very curious, and it is not explainable upon a hypothesis consistent with the senator's intelligence and personal honor. The whole matter impresses us as the effort of an ignorant man to become the centre of a vulgar sensation. How this very stupid act of the coal-heaver justifies the Chronicle in its very broad charge of corruption against senators upon the débris question we do not at all understand. Of course the Débris Bill ought not to pass. Of course it is wrong to tax a whole community for the benefit of a class. Still, a senator may make a mistake, or commit an error of judgment, or act under misinformation, or be a fool, or think it good policy to serve a gravel-bank constituency rather than the great farming, commercial, and tax-paying community, and still not be a perjured and bribed knave.

In Tucson, Arizona, the houses are not closed at night. People sleep securely with open doors. In the summer, beds are made in open verandas, and sometimes, as at Damascus, upon the roof of the dwelling. We hope we are not suggesting to the thieves and burglars of San Francisco that this is a good place for them to ply their vocation, as the Tucsonese gentlemen not only bear arms but know how to use them. There are no fleas in Southern Arizona. A hot, sandy country without fleas! What is the matter with our Academy of Sciences?

"We do not believe there is the least doubt that General Grant will be nominated by the Republican National Convention."—Call. We had a doubt, but we have none now: before Mr. Pickering makes a prediction, he must believe the event predicted to have already occurred; and if Mr. Pickering believes that Grant is already nominated, we think the Ruler of Nations will do what he can to spare that good man the pain of being undeceived.

Winthrop Mackworth Praed committed the indiscretion of dying in the year 1839, else he might have lived to be poetry editor of the Call. During his brief life he wrote a rather pretty poem, entitled "Josephine." In the social supplement of last Tuesday's Call this poem appears, under "Written for the Morning Call," and signed "Amans." It is true that it is a man's, but it is a dead man's; and one who, though he sinned certainly, was mercifully spared the degradation of signing his name to anything "written for the Morning Call."

SINGSAMSONG.

Air, "Days of '49," or any other.

FIRST VERSE.

Here's Mister Pickering—heware!—
He is a man of sense;
On ev'ry question he's right there—
Astraddle of the fence.

1st Chorus (all sing!)—Astraddle of the fence, my boys,
Astraddle of the fence;
On ev'ry question he's right there—
Astraddle of the fence.

SECOND VERSE.

And I'm Sam Williams—that's my name!—
I'm neither stout nor tall;
But writing straddles is my game—
Oh, straddles for the Call.

2d Chorus (now again!)—Straddles for the Call, my boys,
Oh, straddles for the Call;
But writing straddles is my game—
Oh, straddles for the Call.

WHOOHOO.

James R. Keene is going to Europe, they say, to teach the English turfmen how to run horses. It would be a praiseworthy action upon the part of any American; coming from Mr. Keene it is especially creditable. Keene taught us San Franciscans enough about stocks to make half the city bankrupt. He did the same thing on a larger scale in New York, and now he purposes to do a kindred missionary work for the betting-book-makers of England.

A FEW SHORT SELECTED STORIES.

"The timid lie that paints the hateful hit."

A lady friend is very fond of parrots, and determined to get one at any cost. Living near by her was a Frenchman, who owned a very fine specimen of the bird, and the lady threw longing and covetous eyes at it. It could talk like a woman, and Mrs. Blank at last resolved to own that parrot. The other day, being acquainted with the Frenchman, she made up her mind to ask him to part with it. She called upon him for that purpose.

"Now, Mr. Napoleon," she pleaded, "you must let me have that parrot."

"Oh, madame," he said, "I could not part wiz the parrote for any price. He vos ze choy of my what you call him? Oui, household. I have been offair feefy dollair of he. I would not take ze tousand dollair for he."

She pleaded in vain. Napoleon could not be moved. A few days later she called again, but still the Frenchman was immovable.

"I tell you what I do. I gee you two nice parrote eggs for ten dollair. All you haf to do is to place zem in some cotton, and zey hatch zemselves out two magnifiqu parrote peards."

The bargain was made, and the lady withdrew in a delighted frame of mind. She did as directed, and in course of time the eggs were hatched; but, instead of "two parrote," a brace of the finest young ducks that ever made a hole in the water put in an appearance.

Mrs. Blank hurried to the man and berated him soundly for the deception.

Mr. Napoleon looked surprised.

"Madame," he protested, "I saw ze female parrote lay zose eggs wiz my own two eyes. She was ze finest peard in ze world, but I can not vouch for ze morality of ze parrote."

1st January—Just born. Here's a lark. Papa doesn't seem very much pleased, though.

1st February—Every night pa walks up and down the bedroom with me when I squeal. I always squeal. I must do something.

1st March—Nurse is a spiteful thing—she sticks pins into a fellow on purpose.

1st April—After all, one may even weary of the bottle.

1st May—I wish I could cut a tooth, I'd bite nurse.

1st June—What a nuisance it is to have relations who keep on saying "Ketchetty, ketchetty," and dig in your ribs with their forefingers. When I grow up I'll do it to them, and see how they'll like it.

1st July—There are three babies next door got the measles. I get nothing. It's awful dull.

1st August—One of the babies from next door came in to see us to-day; and I heard ma say: "He hasn't got the measles now?" "No," said the baby's ma. There is a greedy sneak for you. Left 'em at home.

1st September—Nurse drinks something out of a black bottle. I've caught her at it. It isn't the same that is in my bottle, either. If I were bigger I'd change 'em.

1st October—Blessed if this ain't a nice go, neither. Some one called to-day to see ma and pa, and they said it was uncle, and gave me to him to kiss. He didn't kiss me, though, with what you might call a good will. Then they asked him again, and then they gave me to him to nurse, and he pinched me.

1st November—This is worse than ever. Why, here's another baby now, and they say he belongs to our house; and they're not going to send him away. Don't even know how to feed himself out of the bottle. Well, of all—never mind.

1st December—Got to sleep in the same crib with him now! Wait till he gets to sleep; I'll give him such a one! Here's a beast of a baby! He won't go to sleep, and not a soul in the same crib can get a blessed wink.

Chicago has a wealthy citizen of very liberal disposition. Although belonging to no particular religious sect, he has always hitherto been found ready to contribute to the carrying out of spiritual schemes requiring money. Not long ago, however, he happened to have a business transaction with one of the deacons of a certain Presbyterian church, and the deacon got quite six to four the best of him. A few days afterward the pastor of the same church called on the merchant for a subscription toward his schools, but to his surprise the usually amiable capitalist pushed the subscription book aside, with the abrupt remark:

"Played out."

"Dear me," said the surprised parson, "I really counted on you, Mr. K. You have always been so liberal that I was in hopes you would head the subscription list!"

"I am done," said the merchant. "I have changed my mind—I don't think half the people go to bell that ought to!"

"Yes," the man on the wood-box said, "I have felt something of the same sort of a feeling. I like to get to church always after the contribution-box has passed around."

"Yes," said the fat passenger, "and don't you like to get to the station after the train's gone? So quiet and dreamy around the station. That is, everything is quiet except the man who got left. There's nothing oppressively quiet about him."

"And how pleasant it is," said the tall, thin passenger, "to get to the hotel after dinner is gone!"

"And to hurry down to the bank, Saturday afternoon," said the man with the sample cases, "after the cashier is gone!"

"Or get to the grocery Saturday night," said the passenger with the sandy goatee, "after the last pound of butter is gone!"

"Or to scream yourself horse," said the woman who talks bass, "and have the policeman come round just after the burglar is gone!"

But the sad passenger said that was just the vein of thought he was following out, and supper being announced, the senate went into executive session.

While Jackson's corps was cautiously moving to the flank and rear of the Union army at Chancellorsville, the Confederate cavalry in advance became engaged with the enemy.

Soon a wounded and bleeding trooper was seen emerging from the woods in front. After looking round, he moved in the direction from which the infantry were marching, as if seeking the rear, or, as the average gray-jacket would say, the r'ar. Soon afterward rapid firing explained that the blue-jackets had closed in behind Jackson, and it was not long before the poor cavalryman was seen coming back again.

When opposite the "Stonewall," another cavalryman from the front also arrived. Number one at once recognized him, and said: "Hallo, Bill—wounded?"

"Yes," said number two, "but not bad. Let's git to the r'ar."

At which number one exclaimed: "This is the darndest fight I've been in yet. It hain't got no r'ar."

A well-known New York editor made the acquaintance of a lady at a soirée. The process of introduction had not fully revealed her name, and the editor hazarded an observation the reverse of prudent:

"Let us change our seats," he said, "as the gentleman approaching us is my particular detestation."

"You are speaking of my husband," said the fair one, with a severe glance of disapproval.

"Am I not right, then, in detesting him?" was the reply. The fair one admitted with downcast eyes that he was.

"Stranger, I want to ask your candid opinion about a matter."

"All right—go ahead."

"Suppose that you were my wife?"

"Yes."

"And that I should come home looking just as I do now?"

"Yes."

"What would be your strongest impression? Give me your honest opinion."

The citizen thus appealed to turned the man around, looked into his eyes, and stood back and said:

"Stranger, is your wife a lunatic or a fool?"

"No, sir."

"Then you'd better wait at least ten hours before you go home, for you've been on a three days' drunk, and she'll spot you in a minute! I've gone home looking fifty per cent. better than you do, and had whole handfuls of hair pulled out of my head before I could get my overcoat off."

He was a quiet, bashful-looking young man who got on the train at Hawleyville in the East. To the gentleman who occupied the seat by the stove he said:

"Will you let me sit there? I am very cold."

Said the passenger:

"There are hot pipes under all the seats."

Said the young man, in a painful whisper, and blushing as he said it:

"But it's my feet that's cold."

The passenger got up, and went out and stood on the platform until Newton was reached.

Daniel Gray looked just like a man who never says black when he means white. He walked out with firm step, looked the court square in the face, and said:

"I disturbed the peace, and put in a plea of guilty."

"That's honest," remarked the court.

"Business is business," continued Daniel. "I am guilty, and I feel that I ought to be sent up for thirty days."

"Very well; I'll make it an even thirty."

"Say, how much did you give that chap who was just out here?"

"The same."

"Then book me for sixty! I don't want to be classed with no such clothes-pin as he is!"

"Well, sixty it is. I hope you'll have a pleasant time and come out a better man."

One of the most remarkable things noticeable in social life is the unanimity with which people shake their relatives. Recently, a gentleman arrived in Carson with a letter of introduction to one of its leading citizens from the citizen's uncle. After the Carsonite read the letter he remarked:

"Glad to see you, sir. Glad to see anybody who knows my uncle in Cleveland. How are all the folks?"

"Splendid. I spent six weeks there last fall, and I really don't think I ever met such a fine family of genial, hospitable and cultivated people."

"Yes?"

"Yes, indeed; I never spent a pleasanter time in my life. Your relatives are indeed the—"

"Well, young man, if my relatives are such fine people, they must have changed like thunder since I lived with them. I lived there a year, and I think they are about the worst pelicans in the deck. I wouldn't spend a month with the crowd for the whole town of Cleveland."

"Indeed?" said the other, "Well, since you've been so candid about it I might as well remark right here that your uncle and his whole blasted family are the toughest collection of old fossils I ever had the misfortune to be steered up against."

"Put it there, young man; you show good sense. Let's go out and take something."

In a few moments more the two men were pledging perdition to the Cleveland relatives over a foaming schooner of Carson beer.

"I've bin a-workin' like all possessed to-day," said Colonel Solon one evening, as he borrowed a pipe from the local editor.

"So! What have you been doing?"

"My wife, ye see, has the rheumatics, an' 'twas wash-day. So she sez to me, sez she: 'Solomon, the water in the cistern is out, an' I can't wash without cistern-water, an' my rheumatics is so bad that I can't fetch it.' Sufficiently profounded, sez I: 'Sally, I'll bring the water.' An' I brought twenty-five pailfuls of water from my nabor's well an' poured into that cistern, an' then I pumped every blamed drop out for the washin'. Mitey hard work."

"Why, in the name of common sense, didn't you put the water in the tubs instead of turning it into the cistern and then pumping it out again?" said the editor.

"Coz," said the colonel, bristling up, "coz, in the name of common sense, she had to have cistern-water to wash with, yer darned fool."

MR. DODGE'S CHICKEN-RANCH.

According to the New York Times, our Southern fellow-citizens are accustomed to assert that the colored man has two glaring faults—that he will not work, and that his presence casts such a blight upon chickens that no white man can profitably engage in raising poultry in the Southern States. Mr. James C. Dodge, who recently emigrated from the town of Natick, Mass., to Laurelville, Ala., has signally refuted the popular Southern estimate of the colored man, and has succeeded not only in keeping chickens, but in inducing thirty-four colored men to work for him without wages. Mr. Dodge arrived at Laurelville last spring, with the intention of cultivating a farm. The local white population received him courteously and wished him every success, but they warned him that he could not induce a single colored man to work for him except at preposterous wages. When he casually introduced the subject of chickens, they assured him that there was an African church within a mile of his newly-purchased farm, and that he might as well try to keep icicles in a hot-house as to raise chickens in such a neighborhood. Mr. Dodge was a stubborn man, and, withal, an ingenious one. He determined to prove to the Laurelville whites that he could do precisely what they said he could not do. Accordingly, he offered to bet with Judge Slemmons that he would cultivate his new farm with colored labor, and that he would raise chickens without losing a single one by colored larceny. The bet was taken, and Mr. Dodge went to his farm and began operations. With the aid of the Laurelville carpenter, Mr. Dodge built a magnificent chicken-house, with accommodations for five hundred feathered guests. The windows were made so small that not even a consumptive colored boy could pass through them, and the door was of unprecedented thickness and strength. In one side of the chicken-house Mr. Dodge required the carpenter to leave a round hole of about two feet in diameter, for a purpose which he declined to explain. Much pity was felt for him by his neighbors, on the ground that he was wasting his money in a vain attempt to struggle against the chicken-stealing genius of the colored people; but Mr. Dodge "guessed" he was all right, and "cal'lated" that his chickens wouldn't be stolen to any great extent. When the carpenters had finished their work and had gone home, Mr. Dodge unpacked a large bundle which he had received from the North, and after dark he filled his chicken-house with three hundred chickens, and, locking it securely, went to bed. About eleven o'clock that night a leading colored citizen of chicken proclivities made his way into the chicken-house through the hole which had been left open. He chuckled quietly at the folly of Mr. Dodge in locking the door, and at the same time forgetting to close the hole in the side of the chicken-house. When he had selected a dozen of the largest chickens, he attempted to creep stealthily out of the hole, but found his egress impeded by a series of sharp and projecting spikes. He then realized the fact that he had been caught in a trap of much the same general nature as that pleasing variety of mouse-trap into which the mouse readily enters through a wire-lined passage, the pointed ends of which prevent him from escaping. The leading colored citizen's estimate of white intellect underwent a sudden change, and he sat down gloomily in the corner of the chicken-house to invent some plausible tale which would account for his presence when the inevitable moment of discovery should come. Half an hour later, the minister of the colored church entered the chicken-house, and was warmly greeted by his predecessor, who was beginning to feel very lonesome. From midnight until dawn the arrivals were almost incessant. The fact that three hundred chickens were in Mr. Dodge's chicken-house was known in every colored cabin within a radius of two miles, and the oppressed race had risen as one man and resolved to have those chickens. At half-past three there was standing-room only in the chicken-house, and gentlemen arriving after that hour were compelled to return home disappointed. After a comfortable breakfast, Mr. Dodge took his shot-gun and the key of the chicken-house, and proceeded to ascertain what luck his trap had brought him during the night. To his great pleasure, he found thirty-four able-bodied colored men in the chicken-house, and, after the most careful investigation, he ascertained that not a chicken was missing. He put no unpleasant questions to the colored men whom he had caught, as to why they had crowded into his chicken-house, but he merely informed them that he supposed they had come to assist him in planting, and that he was greatly obliged to them for their kind assistance. At noon Judge Slemmons and a dozen white Laurelvilleans arrived at the farm, and gazed with amazement at the spectacle of thirty-four colored men working energetically in the field. When the judge was convinced that no chickens had been stolen during the night, he frankly admitted that he had lost his bet, and, borrowing the money from Mr. Dodge, paid it on the spot. Since that day Mr. Dodge has never lost a chicken. He has, however, only caught a few sporadic colored men, and has thus been obliged to hire most of his labor. Nevertheless he has successfully refuted the assertion that no white man can keep chickens in Alabama, and has on at least one occasion induced thirty-four colored men to work for him without pay. Whether this plan would be permanently successful if tried in other parts of the South is, of course, uncertain; but there is certainly good reason to suppose that it would greatly increase the security of chicken property.

"Mamma, where do the cows get the milk?" asked Willie, looking up from the foaming pan of milk which he had been intently regarding. "Where do you get your tears?" was the answer. After a thoughtful silence, he again broke out: "Mamma, do the cows have to be spanked?"

"The hen which lays the Easter egg is a great bird, but it takes the goose which lays the golden egg to bring forth Easter bonnets."

"Blessed are the peacemakers." An Albany man clubbed two boys till they couldn't stand, to make them stop pulling each other's hair.

A man will remember a sore finger much longer than a kind look, but that doesn't prove a sore finger is any better than a kind look.

THE O'MEARA CONSOLIDATED.

One of the Virginia City newspapers gives this specimen of female mine-management on the Comstock:

"They met by chance, the usual way," among the daughters of the wife of Adam. Said the one neighbor unto the other:

"Good mornin' till ye, Mrs. O'Meara."

Said the other unto the one:

"Thank ye kindly; good mornin', Mrs. McCracken; yer lookin' well this mornin'."

"Och, but it's the kind ways ye have, Mrs. O'Meara; ye'd be spakin' the cheerin' word if ye saw a poor body wid a fut in the grave. But I'm far from feelin' well; it's the ould dishtress in me chesht, dear. It's airly ye're abroad the day, Mrs. O'Meara; but ye're always so indushrious an' drivin'."

"Ye flatter me, Mrs. McCracken; but it's only in drivin' that there's ony thrivin' these times—wid God's blessin', av coourse."

"Thru for you, Mrs. O'Meara, an' thruly it's snug ye air at home now—mainin' but the honest words I sphake, an' no flattery."

"Wid the blessin' o' God, we're doin' fairly—fairly, Mrs. McCracken."

"I wish I could get the saycret, Mrs. O'Meara. My Michael works ivery blessed day in the mines, but nothin' stays wid us."

"Do you collect assissmints, Mrs. McCracken?"

"Assissmints, Mrs. O'Meara—what would I be doin' wid collectin' assissmints? Bad cess to it, woman, it's the other way wid us; for Michael he do be payin' assissmints on this an' on that ivery blessed month, almost."

"An' where does he pay thim, dear?"

"To the broker shops. Sure, where else would he be payin' thim, Mrs. O'Meara?"

"Why, to yoursilf, darlin'?"

"To me, Mrs. O'Meara?"

"To yoursilf, woman! Where else should he be payin' thim?"

"What for would he be payin' assissmints to me?"

"What for does my Patrick pay assissmints to me but because I level 'em on him, dear?"

"On him! An' what is it for, darlin'?"

"It's for the stock he holds in the corporation, dear—the interests he has in the O'Meara Consolidated. Do you undershtand that now—the O'Meara Con-shol-ida-ted?"

"What would that be, dear?"

"Originally it was the Patrick O'Meara and the Norah McCue, but was incorporated as the 'O'Meara Consolidated' in 1865; first issue of stock in 1866, wid a new issue ivery two years since. It is what they call a close corporation, I belave; and I am both President and Board of Directhors, hould the contrholling intrust, and live! the assissmints."

"I don't understand it at all, Mrs. O'Meara. An' what is it that ye level the assissmints on, dear?"

"On the stock, to be sure, woman—on the live stock, do ye see? Six shares now."

"Do ye mane the childer?"

"What else would I mane? I'll tell ye, dear, for I see yer wits are wool-gatherin'. You see for a long time Patrick was buyin' this wild-cat an' that wild-cat, an' all the cats wur levelin' assissmints, an' he payin' 'em, an' kapin' us all at the point of shtarvation. I saw how things was goin', so I just brought out on him the papers of the home incorporation, an' I says to him: 'Here, now, sir, is the O'Meara Consolidated, a square location secured by a patent, with but six shares in it, an' showin' well as far as developed; now I level on it for my first assissmint of twenty dollars a share.' Says he: 'Norah, ye're wus nor the wild-cats; ye take me whole mornin's wages!' 'Thru,' says I, 'an' I'll honestly spid ivery cint in improvements for the benefit of the company.'"

"An' did he shtand the assissmint, Mrs. O'Meara?"

"He did; for he thought it a good joke at first, an' for two or three months he paid up like a man."

"Then he quit payin'?"

"He did."

"An' what then, Mrs. O'Meara?"

"I ould him out."

"Sould him out! How could you sell him out?"

"Well, dear, he had due and legal notice. I first of all tould him that such a day it would be delinquent in the Board, thin that it was advertised delinquent, an' that such a time would come the day o' sale. He thought it a good joke, but whin be kem home that evenin' he had no supper. I didn't cook him a warm male in a month, I sint a lot o' furniture to the auction, an' I cut him off in ivery way in his bome comforts."

"An' what then, dear?"

"He's niver since refused to pay his regular assissmints."

"Och! It's the wise woman ye air, Mrs. O'Meara. Good mornin' till ye, an' wid the help o' God I'll incorporate the McCracken Consolidated this blissid day, an' level my first assissmint before I resht me haid on the pilly the night!"

The ladies of Cologne, according to the Kolnische Zeitung, are addicted to the use of bracelets and other ornaments made of an inflammable substance, of which gun-cotton is an ingredient. The Cologne Journal thinks it necessary to warn the fair sex of that city of the danger of exposing themselves with their ornaments to a high temperature, as the consequence would be disagreeable to their masculine surroundings. This substance is called "celluloid," and consists of sulphuric ether and camphor, as well as gun-cotton. It is reported that one unfortunate couple have already been blown into the air in consequence of the lady omitting the precaution of taking off her ornaments previous to waltzing in an over-heated ball-room.

Great Britain has 531 vessels and 81,447 seamen and officers; France, 226 vessels and 50,517 men; Spain, 138 vessels and 14,648 men; Russia, 223 vessels and 30,039 men; Italy, 66 vessels and 11,880 men. The United States has 146 vessels and 8,684 men.

The leading Methodist Church in Toronto dismissed its choir because it had been singing Pinafore. Only "dismissed" them! Why didn't they kill 'em?

SPARTACUS AFTER THE QUINCY METHOD.

It had been a day of triumph in Capua. Lentulus, returning with victorious eagles, had aroused the populace with the sports of the amphitheatre to an extent hitherto unknown even in that luxurious city. A large number of people from the rural districts had been in town to watch the conflict in the arena, and to listen with awe and veneration to the infirm and decrepit jokes. The shouts of revelry had died away, and no sound was heard. The Roman soldier moved on his homeward way, the sidewalk occasionally flying up and hitting him on the back. In the green-room of the amphitheatre a little band of gladiators was assembled. The foam of conflict yet lingered on their lips, the scowl of battle yet hung upon their brows, and the large knobs on their classic profiles indicated that it had been a busy day with them. There was an embarrassing silence of about five minutes, when Spartacus, borrowing a chew of tobacco of Trifolium Aurelius, thus addressed them:

"Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen: Ye call me chief, and ye do well to call him chief who for twelve years has met in the arena every shape of man and beast that the broad empire of Rome could furnish, and has never yet lowered his arm. I do not say this to brag, however, but simply to show that I am the star-thumper of the whole outfit. If there be one among you who can say that ever in public fight or private brawl my actions did belie my words, let him stand forth and say it, and I will spread him around over the arena till the coroner will have to gather him up with a blotting paper. If there be three in all your company dare face me on the bloody sands let them come, and I will construct upon their physiognomy such cupolas and royal cornices and Corinthian capitals and entablatures, that their own mothers would pass them by in the broad light of high noon unrecognized. And yet I was not always thus, a hired butcher—the savage chief of still more savage men. My ancestors came from old Sparta, the county seat of Marcus Aurelius County, and settled among the vine-clad hills and cotton groves of Cyrilla. My early life ran quiet as the clear brook by which I sported. Aside from the gentle patter of the maternal slipper on my overalls, everything moved along with me like the silent oleaginous flow of the ordinary goose grease. My boyhood was one long, happy, summer day. We stole the Roman muskmelon, and put split sticks on the tail of the Roman dog, and life was one continuous hallelujah. When at noon I led the sheep beneath the shade and played the 'Sweet By and By' on my shepherd's flute, there was another Spartan youth, the son of a neighbor, to join me in the pastime. We led our flocks to the same pasture, and together picked the large red ants out of our indestructible sandwiches. One evening, we were all beneath the persimmon tree that shaded our humble cottage, my grand-sire, an old man, was telling of Marathon, Leuctra, and George Francis Train, and Doctor May Walker, and other great men, and how a little band of Spartans, under General Howard, had withstood the entire regular army. I did not then know what war was, but my cheek burned, I knew not why; and I thought what a glorious thing it would be to leave the reservation and go on the war-path. But my mother kissed my throbbing temples, and bade me go soak my head and think no more of those old tales and savage wars. That very night the Romans landed on our coasts. They pillaged the whole country, burned the agency buildings, demolished the ranch, rode off the stock, tore down the smoke-house, and rode their war-horses over the cucumber vines. To-day I killed a man in the arena, and, when I broke his corset clasps and looked upon him, behold! he was my friend. The same sweet smile was on his face that I had known when, in adventurous boyhood, we had bathed in the glassy lake by our Spartan home, and he had tied my shirt into 1,752 dangerous and difficult knots. He knew me, smiled some more, said 'Ta-ta,' and ascended the golden stair. I begged of the prator that I might be allowed to bear away the body, and have it packed in ice and shipped to his friends near Cyrilla, but he couldn't see it. Aye, upon my bended knees, amid the dust and blood of the arena, I begged this poor boon, and the prator answered: 'Let the carrion rot. There are no noble men but Romans and Ohio men. Let the show go on. Bring in the bobtail lion from Abyssinia.' And the assembled maids and matrons and the rabble shouted in derision, and told me to 'brace up,' and 'have some style about me,' and 'give it to us easy,' with other Roman flings which I do not now call to mind. And so must you, fellow-gladiators, die like dogs. To-morrow we are billed to appear at the Coliseum, in Rome, and reserved seats are being sold at the corner of Third and Fourth Streets for our moral and instructive performance while I am speaking to you. Ye stand here like giants, as ye are, but to-morrow some Roman Adonis with a seal-skin cap will pat your red brow, and bet his sesterces upon your blood. O Rome! Rome! Thou hast been indeed a tender nurse to me. Thou hast given to that gentle, timid shepherd-lad, who never knew a harsher tone than a flute-note, muscles of iron and a heart like the adamantine lemon-pie of the railroad lunch-room. Thou hast taught him to drive his sword through plated mail and links of rugged brass, and warm it in the palpitating gizzard of his foe, and to gaze into the glaring eyeballs of the fierce Numidian lion, even as the smooth-cheeked Roman Senator looks into the laughing eyes of the girls in the Treasury Department. And he shall pay thee back till thy rushing Tiber is red as frothing wine, and in its deepest ooze thy life-blood lies curdled. You doubtless hear the gentle murmur of my bazoo. Hark! Hear ye the lion roaring in his den? 'Tis three days since he tasted flesh, but to-morrow he will have gladiator on toast, and don't you forget it; and he will fling your vertebrae about his cage like the star pitcher of a champion nine. If ye are brutes, then stand here like fat oxen waiting for the butcher's knife. If ye are men, then arise and follow me. Strike down the warden and the turnkey, overpower the police, and cut for the tall timber. We will break through the city gate, capture the war-horse of the drunken Roman, flee to the lava-beds, and there do bloody work, as did our sires at old Thermopylae, scalp the west-bound emigrant, and make the hen-roosts around Capua look sick. If we be men, let us die like men, beneath the blue skies and by the still waters, and be buried according to Gunther, instead of being polished off by Numidian lions amid the hisses of a snide Roman populace." JIM NYE.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

Ting Ah Ling is a Chinese belle.

A woman stung is the nearest approach to perpetual motion.

Russian proverb on women's rights: If you be a cock, crow; if a hen, lay eggs.

The proof of the padding lies in the symmetrical manufacturer's bill.

The man capable of defrauding a widow would be guilty of chasing a mosquito for its fat. There are a great many capable men.

Haste makes waist, even to the young lady who hasn't time to properly lace her corsets.

"Fifteen" is a greater puzzle than "sweet sixteen," but both are gems.

The ladipoets of Vassar are very refined about their art-embroidery. When they want a fresh supply of sage-green worsted they always ask for a Henry—they consider "hank" vulgar.

A sign in front of a shoe store near the Revere House, Boston, reads, "Girls, eighty-five cents." Reduction on account of leap-year, probably.

The game of Smith was saved, as Prentice Mulford says, by Pocahontas trumping her father's club with a soft heart.

"You are yawning," said a wife to her husband. "My dear," he replied, "the husband and the wife are one, and when I'm alone I'm bored."

The girl that wants a lot of elbow room around the house is perfectly easy when seated with her young man in a buggy that — Speaking of modesty, what do you think of the young lady who blushed when she observed the naked limbs of the trees in the park?

A Toledo woman fell dead in church while the plate was going around, and before it had come to her pew. This incident teaches—now what should you say it taught?

"Don't be afraid to praise your servants when they deserve it," remarks an exchange; but the minute the husband tries that on the hired girl she has to hunt for another situation.

The wife who has a smile for her husband when he comes into the house will not drive him to a saloon to get one.

When is a woman in love like a ship? When she is attached to a buoy, or hankering after a "heavy swell."

When Mrs. Belva Lockwood, the Washington lawyer, asks a judge for a private interview, the latter, before granting the request, makes her sign a paper declaring she won't attempt to come any of this leap-year business on him. Belva is getting herself disliked.

Golden sunlight now steals over the eastern hills and laughs at the rippling waters, while a girl with a sealskin sacque sits lonely in her O'Farrell Street room and wonders why we can't have cold weather all the year.

A young lady surprised the "gentlemanly clerk" at a dry goods store by offering him fifty cents in payment for a dollar purchase. "It amounts to a dollar, if you please," said the g. c. "I know it does," was the answer, "but papa is only paying fifty cents on the dollar now."

At a crowded French country theatre a woman fell from the gallery to the pit, and was picked up by one of the spectators, who, hearing her groaning, asked her if she was much injured. "Much injured!" exclaimed the woman; "I should think I am. I have lost the best seat in the very middle of the front row."

Emma R. asks this extraordinary question: "Do you think it is right for a girl to sit on a young man's lap if she is engaged to him?" O Emma! Well, though we have had no experience in the matter referred to, we should say: If our girl and our lap, yes; if another girl and our lap, yes. But if our girl and another fellow's lap, never—and not in the Pinafore sense either.

Two gushing Boston girls, walking one day in the suburbs, found a mile-stone, forgotten in the march of improvement. One of them stooped and read the half-effaced inscription, "I. m. from Boston," and remarked: "Here is a grave, perhaps of some young girl, who wished it written on the tombstone, 'I'm from Boston.' How touching! So simple and so sufficient!"

At a fashionable church a five-year-old bit of a girl made proof of her disposition toward good deeds. About the middle of the sermon this precocious lamb took up a prayer-book and handed it to an elephant young man who sat in the pew in front, remarking as she leaned over: "The man in the night-gown says for you to be good and read the book."

"I believe in a personal devil," said Mr. Moody, at a revival meeting held in a remote Western city. "That's true, that's true—you're right there, stranger," said an old farmer, rising from his seat in his earnestness. Whereupon a calm-faced, placid-looking woman rose from the other end of the pew, took him by the ear, and led him slowly out; and the assembly knew then for the first time that the old man's mind was filled with domestic thoughts instead of the after.

The tablets of every man's memory are thick with invisible medallions printed in sympathetic ink by his reading, and needing only the right stimulus to start forth in vivid outline. The agreeable overture to the Royal Midday at the Bush Street Theatre served to conjure before our mind's eye a series of such pictures, illustrating the story of English comic opera. After half writing out an account of the vision, it seemed that the original tellers of the story told it the more freshly, and we will now let them speak: "My friend asked me (says Mr. Secretary Addison) if there would not be some danger in coming home late, in case the Mobocks should be abroad. However, says he, if Captain Sentry will make one with us, and if you will both of you call upon me about four o'clock, that we may be at the house before it is full, I will have my own coach in readiness to attend you. The Captain, who did not fail to meet me there at the appointed hour, bid me fear nothing, for that he had put on his Steenkirk sword, and the servants had, I found, provided themselves with good oaken plants to attend upon the occasion. * * * There is nothing that has more startled our English audience than the Italian recitativo. Our countrymen could not forbear laughing when they heard a lover chanting out a billet-doux, and even the super-description of a letter set to a tune. The famous blunder in an old play of 'Enter a king and two fiddlers solo' was now no longer an absurdity, when it was impossible for a lover in a desert or a princess in a closet to speak anything unaccompanied by musical instruments."

So that was the hour at which they wended to listen to Mr. Addison's Rosamond—at four P. M., lest all the good places should be taken. Why, it could hardly have been later than eight o'clock when Captain Hill attempted to abduct Mrs. Bracegirdle, as she returned home after the play. And they saw "King Henry II." singing in a full-bottomed periwig, while "Queen Eleanor" (in a hoop) proffers the dagger to "Fair Rosamond" (in patches) supping the deadly howl.

Let us have another picture. "As the curtain was not drawn up before my arrival," says Dr. Goldsmith, "I had an opportunity of observing the spectators. In the middle seats they were chiefly employed during the period of expectation in eating oranges and reading the story of the performance. Those who sat in the pit seemed to consider themselves as judges of the merit of the poet and the performers; appearing to labor under that restraint which an affectation of superior discernment generally produces. * * * Two singing women, like heralds, have begun the contest; the whole town is divided on this solemn occasion; one has the finer pipe, the other the finer manner; one has the longer waist, but the other appears more easy."

"Lo, Vincent comes—with simple grace arrayed, She laughs at paltry arts and scorns parade. Nature through her is by reflection shown, And Gay once more knows Polly for his own. Let Tommy Arne the laws of taste prescribe, And chant the praise of an Italian tribe, But never shall a truly British age Bear a wile race of emulums on the stage: Where tyrants rule and slaves with joy obey Let slavish minstrels pour thy enervate lay; To Britons far more noble pleasures spring In native notes whilst Beard and Vincent sing."

'Rah for Britons! 'Rah! And this is Gay's Beccaria's Opera in 1760—the first truly great English comic opera, apparently destined to remain unapproachable. The opposition Polities at Covent Garden and Drury Lane divided the town, and their contest was the one topic of conversation. "How am I concerned," growls the critic, "if one sings from the stomach and the other sings with a snap? I'll hear no more. Rest, rest, ye dear three clinking shillings in my pocket's bottom." It is well to be reminded that the price of admission to Covent Garden then was six bits, against 'alf a sov. to-day.

We may skip Sheridan's Dianna, as its date was only fifteen years later, and make our next visit to the great London Theatre in the best company that ever entered its walls. "I remember the waiting at the door (oh, when shall I be such an expectant again!), with the cry of nonpareils—an indispensable play-house accompaniment in those days. As near as I can recollect, the fashionable pronunciation of the theatrical fruiteresses then was: 'Chase some oranges, 'chase some numparels, 'chase a bill of the play!—chase pro chase." Lamb's friend Talfourd shall tell us of the opera. "It was sixteen years last Twelfth Night since I heard Miss Stephens, when the curtain of Covent Garden drew up on the opening scene of Love in a Village, and discovered her sitting with Miss Matthews among the honeysuckles and roses, to send forth a stream of such delicious sound as I had never fancied proceeding from human lips."

And the catastrophe in rhyme:

"Last of this dear, delightful list,
Most followed, wondered at, and missed
In Hymen's odds and evens:
Old Essex caged our nightingale,
And finished thy theatric tale,
Enchanting Kitty Stephens."

So the queen of English comic opera laid aside her property crown to put on a countess's coronet; she had sung "Oh, cease your funning" to substantial purpose; and an added meaning is acquired by the critic's remark on "the fine bird-like triumph of 'He so pleased me,'" in view of the way Miss Stephens feathered her nest; and that step, in turn, is characteristic of the third period of English comic opera.

All which may serve as overture to the Royal Midday—a comic opera in three acts, a clever comedy in construction, happy in its extravagance, and "set" with particular advantages. When Melville ("Fanchette") and Freeman ("Dom Januario") were on the stage, there were an actress and an actor there, and the business went forward with spirit and character. The costuming is picturesque and effective. "Fanchette" is a breeches-part in no offensive sense; the dress, with wide trousers something between a sailor's and a vaquero's, is contrived to drape the incongruities of female form. Miss Melville's person is too small to afford the large mannish stride of a "Macheath," for example; but admits of playing the midshipmite with a sufficient freedom and swing. The lady uses her arms, too, not quite as if they were pinned at the elbows; still, she might find some ball-tossing an improving practice. The fact is, Miss Melville has become a better actress every year since we first knew her. She always plays with spirit, clan, and judgment, and has in "Fanchette" a part that allows favorable display of those qualities, together with a vivacious pertness that is engaging.

Each new appearance of Mr. Freeman has contributed to establish his position as a comedian. He gave "Dom Januario" with just the right extravagance, without any lapse into buffoonery, or from the fine finish which has been the distinctive feature of his performance. A thoroughness characteristically German is one quality in his work separating it, by a distance that is felt, from other work which invites the contrast. There are few among our actors who would fail to improve—not by imitating Mr. Freeman, but by emulating his carefulness and pains in all little things. "Perfection is made up of trifles, but perfection itself is no trifle"—an apothegm that can not be too much insisted on with English-speaking actors; for it has been an open defect of our stage that it tolerates scamp-work and slovenliness in minor matters. Mr. Freeman shows an example of better training, and sets some native actors at a disadvantage due to mere sloth and indifference. Possibly he might be less successful with an English part than with these foreigners; but as the foreigner is a tolerably constant figure on our stage along with the plays which we translate out of his native tongue, an actor like Mr. Freeman is an acquisition in the very first line.

"Dom Domingos" (Mr. Caselli) was droll in make-up, and done with comic force; but in the spirit of a niere comic, however, with little of the intended Lusitanian caricature. All the court parts lacked national starch. Some mimicry of the grand manner would be in order, if only for "local color." As to the singing (for they did sing)—but let that pass. As to the music (for there was music)—but that is no great matter. The choruses are better than common. The rehearsing appears to have been thorough. All accessories were good. The preparation of the piece throughout showed conscience. The cast was weak in places—it served to remind one of Harold Skimpole's family: "One sings a little, but does not play; another 'plays a little, but does not sing.' We might say of the comedy, that it is royal; of the music, that it is middling; and sum up the performance as a Royal Middling."

At Platt's Hall this evening A. C. Eimer's Symphonic Mass, "Opus 24," will be rendered by the "Liederkrantz." The following talented singers have volunteered: Mrs. J. E. Tippetts, Sra. Bernardi-Serighelli, Mrs. Alexander Chisholm, Miss A. Reuter, Messrs. D. P. Hughes, W. Dieffenbacher, Charles Bach, Max Wolff, W. C. Campbell, J. Binder, and C. V. Englemann. Mrs. Hall-Pettinos will be the harpist of the evening. A grand orchestra will support the singers, conducted by the composer.

California Chapter, O. E. S., give a Grand Concert and Literary Entertainment at B'nai Brith Hall, 121 Eddy Street, Tuesday, April 13. Their programme contains the names of some of the best artists in the city, and their selections are unusually good. Dancing from ten to twelve.

The sunny spring weather, now fairly begun, ought to make it the duty of every parent to see that his or her children make the most of this especial season. The fields just outside the city are covered with flowers and are visited by the most delicious breezes. It is Nature's gala time, when earth and air and sea seem at their best. To fairly appreciate how beautiful the fields really are, steal a forenoon from business, and take a seat on the dummy of the California Street cable road, and ride out either to the cemetery or to First Avenue. Then leave the car and take to the country. Go on to the Presidio reservation, and enjoy at once the prospect and the sylvan carpet on which you tread; and give your children a chance to fill their lungs with the pure air. Then, as you return to your business in a car which does not jolt nor jar nor rumble, you will have time to thank Providence for this delightful weather, and for the enterprise which gives you such an inexpensive opportunity to taste its pleasantness.

FOR AGUE, ANEMIA, INTERMITTENT FEVER, CONSUMPTION, GENERAL DEBILITY, ETC., ETC.

RAVENNA, Mercer Co., Missouri, May, 1879.
THE FELLOWS MEDICAL MANUFACTURING CO.—GENTS:—We have used your Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites with gratifying results in our practice, and cheerfully recommend it to physicians and others as a reliable and agreeable preparation in Ague, Intermittent Fever, first and second stages of Pulmonary Consumption, or Anemia, or General Debility. We would recommend it as the best thing we know of.

J. E. CALLAWAY, M. D.
JOHN L. GRILEY, M. D.

ACTRESSES' LOVE LETTERS.

Stage Beauties Give their Experiences with the Love-sick—A Lively Chat with Nina Varian, Nellie McHenry, Stella Boniface, and Laura Don.

Modern actors and actresses are, according to late revelations, not the exact counterparts of Cupid and Venus, but rather more dangerous. They are perfect quivers of Cupid's arrows, and the more talented the actor and the more beautiful the actress the more likely is he or she to become involuntarily the catapult that projects those same arrows across the flaming art boundary of the footlights, and straight to the hearts of numerous unsuspecting victims in the audience. This is an unfortunate phase of Cupid's cussedness. Unfortunate in a double sense, for it annoys the artist and hopelessly wounds the victim. There are many cold-blooded creatures on the stage—women as well as men—cold, icy, beautiful, and only sympathetic and warming in their art. All their nature has gone out and sunk itself in the artificiality of their trade. Where other women have hearts, they boast of only vacuum. They keep an assortment of hearts and emotions stored in their wardrobe baskets and in their "make-up" boxes. Their eyes are cold and glittering. There is a vacancy there, too. They have love-lights, gleams of passion, fervent glances, and all sorts of looks stored away in their stage jewel-cases, to be inserted in their vacant orbs as the exigencies of their roles require. They have a "Lady Macbeth" heart, a "Colleen Bawn" heart, a "Juliet" heart, and carefully-treasured eye-illuminations to match. The fairest of these creatures can fire hearts, but never flames herself. Love inspired over the footlights by these gnomes of art is a conflagration lighted by a flint. The conflagration consumes only the tinder, while the fair flint from which the destructive spark was darted remains unmelting, and a never-failing magazine of sparks. All actresses are, to the public, flints that require no steel to bring forth destructive sparks. Miss Nina Varian is a fine actress; therefore she is a flint, a quiver of Cupid's arrows, an involuntary hurrier of his darts, and a very dangerous little personage to tropic youths. Acting on this lame syllogism, which he took in after a half-hour's conversation with Rev. Dr. Deems, a reporter of the New York Truth made a visiting tour among some of the prettiest and most talented actresses of the Gotham stage.

NINA VARIAN.

This lady, being the most distinguished just now as having caused two hot Brazilian boys to quarrel and engage in a duel for her sake, was first sought. When found, Miss Varian was reclining on a lounge in true Persian style, in her apartments on East Twentieth Street. Her yellow hair was bound about her shapely head with a black band of velvet, thereby reminding one of the pictures of Greek women. Miss Varian was suffering from a severe attack of pneumonia, but even then her face was pretty enough to suggest a shadow of a reason why an uncivilized, hot-headed, romantic Brazilian should wish to shoot his comrade, because the latter did not think her the best actress in the world.

"Will you be kind enough, Miss Varian, to tell me the facts, so far as you are concerned, of this silly affair?" asked the reporter.

"Well, a great deal has been said about this affair that is not true," replied the heroine of the proposed sanguinary meeting. "I knew Mr. Leao very slightly indeed, having met him only two or three times. And the other simpleton, Pocecko, or what ever his name may be, I never heard of until I saw his name in the newspapers. I did not go to the Liederkrantz ball with either of these bloodthirsty individuals. I went to the ball, but I went in company with a young lady friend and two gentlemen. The statement that I went with the Brazilians is entirely wrong."

"Do you feel that you are a heroine in consequence of this affair?"

"No, I do not! I wish they could have fought and blown out the places where their brains ought to have been."

"In that case you would have been more largely advertised than you are now."

"Well, I don't care; I don't want this kind of advertisement. I think they were two dunces. Besides, I want to know what you meant by putting such a horrid picture of me in your paper? I don't know what I ever did to deserve such a fate as that. When I looked at that picture it broke my poor heart in twain. Just to think of my wearing such a cap as that! It's too ridiculous! And then I wouldn't have a 'K' on my picture if I had it taken. Oh, anybody ought to know it was not mine."

How far Miss Varian would have carried her reproaches will never be known, for she was interrupted by a violent fit of coughing, and was compelled to stop. The reporter apologized profusely, and then asked: "Are you annoyed much with letters or other protestations of affection from love-sick boys, Miss Varian?"

"No, I receive a great many letters, but I never take any notice of them, and they consequently do not annoy me."

"Did you ever have any other duel fought about you?"

"No, sir, I did not, and I hope I will never have another."

Miss Varian seemed to be suffering so much from her cough that the reporter ended the conversation and left.

STELLA BONIFACE

was very pretty and very modest, as she apologized for her "horrid" appearance, which "horridness," so far as the reporter could see, consisted of one or two ungovernable locks and a plain wrapper of some gray stuff. The young lady's face was certainly not horrid in any respect. She admitted, with charming naivete, that she had received "some" letters of a sweetly plaintive character, but she added with some fire, "I have never paid the slightest attention to them. I considered them very impertinent, and utterly unworthy of notice."

"It may seem strange," said Miss Boniface's companion, an elderly lady, "but Miss Stella has never had a sweetheart in her life, although she is nineteen years old."

"I presume that you are speaking of Miss Boniface subjectively, and not objectively," said the reporter.

"Yes, of course, I can only speak for her," replied the lady.

The matron further stated that Miss Boniface had wept bitterly when her first love-letter was handed her, and from that day she has never got over her aversion to such epistles. They had all shared the same fate—immediate destruction upon reception—except one or two which Miss Boniface had sent to her mother. The young lady said, with much earnestness, that she hoped no one had ever fought a duel or committed suicide on her account; and if any one had ever attempted to kidnap her, she was happily ignorant of the fact.

EFFIE ELLISLER.

This lady the reporter found behind the scenes at the Madison Square Theatre. She arched her eyebrows in some surprise at the questions asked, but admitted that she received a great many letters, none of which, however, met with any other fate than immediate destruction.

"I think that such notes must be written by silly boys. If men write them with the expectation of a reply, they certainly misjudge us very much."

"Do you like to receive such letters?"

"I don't think I especially object to it; some of them are very amusing, and afford myself and friends a fine opportunity for a laugh."

"At what time in your career as an actress did you receive the largest number of such letters?"

"I have always received a great many, but I probably received the most soon after my first appearance upon the stage. I think that most ladies of the profession will tell you the same."

Miss Ellisler did not know of any man who had ever gone mad in consequence of her charms, and she did not think that she would relish the idea of causing a duel or a suicide, and she certainly had no desire to be kidnapped.

"Once, though," said the little lady, "a poor fellow fell desperately in love with me. He was a German fiddle-player in the orchestra. He wanted me to marry him; but by way of preparation for that felicitous event, he went to Europe, whence he expected to return a rich man. When he departed I was astounded upon receiving a huge Dutch clock. The poor fellow had sent it to me as a keepsake, but it was so unwieldy that I had to throw it away. But I find more admirers among the ladies than among the men. Once, when I was in New Orleans, I was summoned to the door of my room, only to find six ladies arrayed in front of it. I really think I would have been less embarrassed if they had been six men. And what do you suppose they wanted? They said that I was such a cute little thing that they wanted to kiss me; and they all did kiss me."

LAURA DON

was the next victim. She entered her parlor with the remark:

"Well, sir, you have caught me napping."

"How's that?" asked the reporter, for Miss Don seemed to be thoroughly wide awake.

"Why, I was asleep, of course; how else could I be caught napping?"

"That point aside, Miss Don, I'd like to ask you a few impertinent questions."

"All right, sir, only be careful."

"I shall observe your warning. Do you receive many letters from love-sick young men?"

"Well, yes, I do."

"What character of letters are they?"

"Decidedly 'spooney.' Some of them are extremely disgusting and ridiculous."

"What do you do with these choice epistles?"

"Oh, read them sometimes, laugh at them always, and throw them away invariably."

"Have you any at present?"

"I think not; I never keep them."

"Do you like to receive such letters?"

"Well, yes, I think I do. It is pretty good fun."

"Do you regard the reception of such letters as an evidence of popularity?"

"No, I do not think it at all an evidence of popularity."

"What is it an evidence of?"

"Well, I regard it more as an evidence of the decay of backbone in the rising generation than anything else. I think that's rather a happy expression, don't you?"

"I think it rather unique, at least."

"Please make a note of it, then."

"Are not college towns the terror of pretty actresses on account of the adolescent lovers they afford?"

"I don't think so. Students usually manifest their admiration by sending flowers, and that is what we like."

"Have you any idea that most of the men in front have a habit of regarding certain favorite actresses as ideals, and with a quaint, Platonic sort of love?"

"I don't know that I ever thought of that before, but I think that sort of affection is confined mostly to women. I receive many notes from ladies, in which they express love for me, and I often observe a sort of wild adoration among the girls who wait upon me when I go shopping."

"I think I can understand that; but this boy-love is different. Can you explain that?"

"It is natural, I think, and I like it. There is something so real and earnest in the freshness of a boy's love that pleases us women, who see so much pretended love among men of the world—men who really can love nothing but themselves. I think love ought to be like a fight between Kilkenny cats—so hard that there is nothing left of it."

"In the case of your illustration, are not the claws and fur generally left?"

"Well, now, you are going too far for me."

"Excuse me, Miss Don, but I did not come here to be imposed upon."

"Beg pardon, I assure you I did not mean it."

"Has any one ever committed suicide for you?"

"Not that I am aware of."

"Have you ever been the subject of a duel?"

"No, sir. Miss Varian holds the palm in that respect."

"Has any one ever attempted to kidnap you?"

"No, but I wish some one would. I think I'd like that."

"Has any one ever tried to shoot you because you would not love him?"

"Yes, sir; a man did do that once. And another man was going to shoot a friend of mine because she would not marry him, and she married him."

"Do you intend to treat your sanguinary friend likewise?"

"No, I find it just as much as I can do to support myself—put that 'myself' in italics, please—without encumbering myself with a man. Men don't marry actresses except when they want somebody to support them. This is true in a thousand cases out of a thousand and three."

NELLIE M'HENRY.

This charming little actress said:

"I have received many love-letters, but I have kept only one. This one was so original that I felt I must preserve it. I have had it for a long time now, and I am going to keep it to show to my baby when she grows up. I received it while playing in New Zealand; but here it is. Now, just look at that," She handed the reporter a queer white envelope, trimmed with green. Upon opening it, there appeared a sheet of light-brown paper, trimmed with a deep shade of red. Upon this extraordinary looking sheet was written the following words, entirely regardless of all rules of punctuation;

MONDAY EVENING.

O idle of my Heart oh how can I express myself, to look upon you is to love you and love you I do with my whole heart from the first time I saw you come on the stage my heart went from me unto you and my Peace of mind is good Night after night have I tossed on my pillow like a dismasted ship at sea I am in the marshes of cupid's Net and I must submit to my fate oh moans hardest of fortune to treat me thus me who never know the Meaning of the word love until I saw you and must I smother that love No poor thought I bee I will conquer or die as not other s done so and why not I what mortal man can I dare do that as wake in me a New ambition that has lain slumbering for years country Born and Bred though I be and never saw a Theatre before in hopes I have not done wrong if I have pray forgive I may be deceived for all that glitters is not gold oh light of my life love of my soul farewell dear love.

I cannot write more ore shall go Mad Yours forever with undying love.

E. H. H. G. P. Office, Christchurch.

"Now, isn't that a funny kind of letter?" asked Mrs. Webster.

"It is, indeed," replied the reporter. "What do you do you do with other letters that you receive?" "Oh, Mr. Webster and I read them sometimes and laugh at them and throw them away. Sometimes I look at them, and see what they are, and throw them away without reading them. They are very silly, but some of them are amusing."

A number of other actresses were found and related about the same experience, and all agreed that the men who write such letters are a brainless set of simpletons.

Indulgent parents who allow their children to eat heartily of high-seasoned food, rich pies, cake, etc., will have to use Hop Bitters to prevent indigestion, sleepless nights, sickness, pain, and, perhaps, death. No family is safe without them in the house.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had having placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

It is a mistake to attribute malaria and similar illnesses to the bad effects of the climate. Sir Henry Thompson, in London, in a recent letter to the Times, says: "Impure drinking water, not the climate, is the cause." Instead of spending large sums on wines and other luxuries, he counsels to invest a fraction of such expenditure on a pure natural mineral water for everyday's use; it gives safety, and its effervescence makes it extremely pleasant.

BRAIN AND MIND; or, Mental Science Considered in Accordance with the Principles of Phrenology, and in relation to Modern Physiology. By Henry S. Drayton, A. M., and James McNeill. Illustrated. Extra Cloth. One vol., 12mo., pp. 334. $1.50. New York: S. R. Wells & Co., Publishers, No. 737 Broadway.

French or Spanish spoken in three months; new method. Classes and private lessons. P. O. Box 1574.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Go to Bradley & Rulofson's, 429 Montgomery St.

Hackett & Dean, Dentists, No. 126 Kearny Street, Thurlow Block.

MORSE'S PALACE OF ART, 417 Montgomery St.

GRAND CONCERT BY THE LIEDERKRANZ
At Platt's Hall, April 10.

A. C. EIMERS "SYMPHONIC"
Mass, "under the direction of the composer. Select Soloists, Grand Chorus and Orchestra. Tickets, $1.00, admitting gentleman and lady. Additional ladies' tickets, 50 cents each. Concert to commence at 8 P. M. sharp.

THE BALDWIN THEATRE.
THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER,
R. M. EBERLE.....STAGE MANAGER.

LAST NIGHTS
Of the most successful Comedy ever produced in San Francisco,

FRENCH FLATS,
Which must be withdrawn this week in favor of the GREAT PARISIAN SUCCESS
CORALIE!
To be produced on Monday, April 12.

This (Saturday) Afternoon, April 10, positively
LAST FRENCH FLATS MATINEE!

EDWARD T. MARTIN has just received a choice stock of new designs in MENU AND DINNER CARDS; also a fine variety of WRITING PAPERS and PAPERIE in New Tints.
N. B.---Tiffany's New Harlequin Playing Cards, $2.50 per pack.
No. 5 Montgomery Street.

Apollinaris

NATURAL MINERAL WATER.

"Purity, freshness, persistent effervescence, and agreeable flavor, alone or mixed with wine or spirits."—Practitioner.

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

The British Medical Journal.

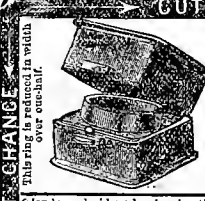

Regularly Supplied to H. R. H. the Prince of Wales.

ANNUAL SALE, EIGHT MILLION BOTTLES AND JUGS.

To secure genuineness, see that each Bottle or Jug bears the Yellow Label.

FOR SALE BY
RUHL BROTHERS,
522 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

CUT THIS OUT IT IS VALUABLE

PLAIN 18K. SOLID ROLLED GOLD RING.
IN A HANDSOME, VELVET-LINED CASE. Below we repeat the Grand Offer, which we made to the readers of this paper once before this winter, but as the time has expired, and many subscribers have not taken advantage of our first advertisement, and as we have received so many liberal orders for our other goods from those who have received the beautiful ring, we have concluded to extend the offer once more. Take advantage of it, as it will positively not appear again. A Beautiful and Valuable Gift for a Lady, Gentleman, or Child. We will forward, post-paid, to any address in the United States. One of our Heavy Plain Band Rolled Gold Rings, enclosed in a very fine Velvet-lined Case, post-paid, on receipt of only 25 three-cent postage stamps, and agree to engrave any name, initials, motto, or ornament desired on the inside of the Ring, provided you cut out this advertisement, and mail to us, with stamps, on or before the 10th day of May, 1880. We will mail you a bundle of our Catalogues at the same time we send the Ring, and feel sure it will give such satisfaction that you will oblige us by distributing them among your friends, and all us by showing them your ring. You can in this way assist us in selling other goods of standard quality, which we manufacture from new and original designs, and which we guarantee to give satisfaction.

"OUR LABOR AND FUTURE SALES OUR PROFIT!!"

Remember, the Ring we send you is a Genuine, Solid, 18 K. Rolled Gold, of medium width, and that this unprecedented offer is made only to introduce our goods and catalogues in your vicinity. Our firm is well established and reliable, manufacturing first-class goods from the precious metals. We can only send out limited number of Rings at price named, and to protect ourselves from jewelers and dealers ordering in quantities, we will insert this advertisement but only this time in this paper, hence require you to cut it out and send to us, so that we may know you are entitled to the benefit of this offer. Under no circumstances will we send more than one Ring to any person sending us stamps and this advertisement; but, after you receive it, if others are desired, we will furnish 18 K. Solid Gold Rings at prices given in our Illustrated Catalogue, varying from $4.25 to $16.50 each, according to size ordered; the larger the finger the more gold is required to make the ring, hence the difference in price. Be sure to send size of Ring, and what you wish engraved on the inside. Stamps can be sent by mail at our risk. Union Manufacturing Co., 126 S. 8th St. Philadelphia.

NOT GOOD AFTER MAY 15th 1880

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR AND MANAGER.

Every evening (Sundays excepted), also at Saturday matinee, successful production of Genée's Comic Opera, in three acts, entitled

THE ROYAL MIDDY!

Purchased from the author, and produced from his instructions.

EMELIE MELVILLE

As Fanchette,

And the following embraced in the admirable cast: Annis Montague, Lilly Post, Louise Paullin, Charles H. Turner, Harry Peakes, Max Freeman, Tom Casselli, Willie Simms, and others.

Incidental to the Comic Opera are the Royal Middies, the Living Chess Game, the Duello, the Dedicating of the Flag, the Brazilian and his servant Mungo, etc., etc.

MR. GUSTAV HINRICH.....Musical Director.

Seats may be secured two weeks in advance.

STORAGE.

FURNITURE, PIANOS, TRUNKS,
Boxes, Paintings, Mirrors, and other goods received on storage.

PARTIES LEAVING THE CITY
Are requested to call. Large, airy brick buildings, free from vermin. Elevator on Stevenson Street. Terms moderate. Money loaned on valuable goods.
J. H. MOTT & CO., 647 Market Street.

HULLED, CRUSHED, STEAM-COOKED AND DESICCATED AMERICAN

BREAKFAST CEREALS.

A. B. C. WHITE WHEAT. A. B. C. WHITE OATS.
A. B. C. BARLEY FOOD. A. B. C. MAIZE.

The most Nutritious, Palatable, and Easily Digested of all Cereal Food.

For sale by all first-class grocers. The trade supplied by JOHN T. CUTTING & CO., Sole Agents,
407 Front Street.

A. L. V. LOEWENHORST,
CHIROPODIST,

331 Kearny St., bet. Bush and Pine Sts., Room 8,

GIVES INSTANTANEOUS RELIEF
for Corns, Bunions, Ingrowing Nails, Club Nails, etc. Corns, bunions, etc., will be attended to without the use of knife, file, or acid, and without pain. Charges moderate.

$66 a week in your own town. Terms and $5 outfit free. Address H. HALLETT & CO., Portland, Maine.

SPRING STYLE HATS

NOW INTRODUCED BY

HERRMANN

THE HATTER,

336 KEARNY STREET,

Between Bush and Pine Streets.

BRANCH, 910 MARKET ST., ABOVE STOCKTON.

As regards beauty and number of styles, Herrmann still leads.

Spring Catalogues now ready. Send for copy.

WILLIAMS, DIMOND & CO.,

SHIPPING AND COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Union Building, Junction Market and Pine Streets, San Francisco.

AGENTS FOR PACIFIC MAIL S. S.
Co.; Pacific Steam Navigation Co.; The Cunard Royal Mail S. S. Co.; The Hawaiian Line; The China Traders' Insurance Co., Limited; The Marine Insurance Co. of London; The Baldwin Locomotive Works; The Glasgow Iron Co.; Nich. Ashton & Son's Salt.

C. P. SHEFFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

PACIFIC SAW MANUFACTURING CO.

17 AND 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

SAWS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

on hand and made to order. Agents for C. B. Paul's Files.

Repairing of all kinds done at short notice.

J. A. HUNTER, M. D.,
No. 321 Sutter Street, devotes Special Attention to

Catarrh, Deafness,
Bronchitis, Asthma, Consumption, and all ailments of the Throat, Lungs, and Heart.

C. BEACH.

Finest assortment of FANCY and STAPLE STATIONERY, latest tints; all the LATEST and STANDARD BOOKS.

107 MONTGOMERY STREET.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S
FRENCH, GERMAN & ENGLISH

INSTITUTE

FOR YOUNG LADIES AND CHILDREN, 922 POST ST., between Hyde and Larkin.

This well known Day and Boarding School, with Kindergarten, will reopen for the term on MONDAY, March 22, 1880.

MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

NOOK FARM.

THIS PLEASANT COUNTRY

home is now open for the accommodation of guests. The many improvements made the present season add greatly to the beauty of the grounds and the health and comfort of the guests. Everything is cheerful, healthful, and homelike.

Only three-fourths of a mile from railroad station. Two trains to and from San Francisco and Oakland daily.

For particulars address E. B. SMITH,

Rutherford, Napa County, Cal.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,

REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 325 Montgomery Street,

Odd Fellows' Hall.

SCHOOL AT DRESDEN.

MRS. AURELIA BURRAGE, LATE

Principal of the School at 850 Van Ness Avenue, has opened a School for American Girls in Dresden. Terms $50 per month for board and tuition. For particulars apply to Miss West, 1009 Sutter Street, or address Mrs. Burrage, care of Dresden Bank, Dresden, Saxony.

J. DOHERTY,

PRACTICAL

Plumber, Gas and Steam Fitter,

345 KEARNY STREET, COR. PINE,

San Francisco, Cal

Etchings and Rare Engravings.

W. K. VICKERY INVITES ATTENtion to his large collection of the above, which includes fine original Engravings from the great Paintings of Europe. Rare Portraits, either in collection or procured. A large number of fine Etchings in stock. Hours 1 to 5 o'clock.

126 KEARNY ST. Thurlow Block San Francisco.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth (8th) day of March, 1880, an assessment (No. 62) of Two ($2) Dollars per share was levied upon the capital stock of the Corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the tenth (10th) day of April, 1880, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the twenty-eighth (28th) day of April, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

Office, Room 61, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS---APRIL STYLES.

Send Stamp for catalogue, AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., April 2, 1880.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 14, of Seventy-five (75) cents per share, was declared, payable on MONDAY, April 22, 1880, at the office in this city, or at the Agency of the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, in New York. WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

$72 a week. $12 a day at home. Address TRU

THE INNER MAN.

Shall Our San Francisco Young Ladies Learn His Needs?

A most excellent lady, Mrs. J. M. Cushing, is interesting herself, and endeavoring to interest others, in the establishment of a cooking-school. The following communication from Mr. John T. Doyle expresses our opinions upon the question. Having arrived at that period of life when he lives to eat, the writer is convinced that good cooking is an art, and that education in this line would be more important and useful to those poor young women who expect to earn an honest livelihood than French, German, music, drawing, or calisthenics. The matter is commended to the readers of the Argonaut as one well worthy of consideration. Not only to poor young women, but to our lady-birds in good society, is it commended. Would it not be better if they knew more about cooking? In the event that the misfortune of poverty should overtake the accident of marriage, would not the accomplishment of knowing how to cook bread, coffee, and beefsteak be as useful as music, deportment, and dress?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT:—If there be one thing more than another on which all men agree, it is the advantage of a good dinner; and I therefore make no apology for asking a little space in your columns to direct attention to the benevolent and meritorious project of Mrs. J. M. Cushing, for the establishment of classes in our public schools for the instruction of young girls in cooking and domestic economy. The Constitution authorizes the establishment of technical schools by municipal or district authority, and surely there is no branch of technical education more important to the whole community than that which teaches how best to supply the ever recurring wants of nature. It is pretty certain that the coming generation must either live entirely in hotels, or else the man who eats a dinner will eat one of his wife's cooking. Why then should the education of our girls in this most important and practical branch of science be so utterly neglected? Why exclude it from the schools in favor of algebra, geometry, botany, etc., rarely of use to the large class who must live by their labor?

Ignorance of culinary science has made our modes of preparing food both wasteful and unwholesome, to such a degree that it is probably safe to say that one-half of the food prepared for the human stomach in California is literally thrown away. The loss from waste is great, but that from disease and shortness of life entailed by bad cooking much greater. In fact, every man of the present generation has realized the truth of the proverb, that "God sent meat, but the devil sent cooks." It is time to commence a reformation. Mrs. Cushing's project is to introduce cooking and domestic economy as branches of common-school education, as has already been done in England with great success. Preliminarily, she proposes to demonstrate the feasibility of her plan by starting a school of the sort by private subscription, and she is willing at first to take charge of it herself—a task for which she is eminently qualified. The enterprise need not involve any considerable outlay, for connected with the school would necessarily be a restaurant, at which wholesome and well-prepared meals would be furnished at such charges as would repay the outlay for provisions, fuel, etc. A very moderate sum would provide the necessary outfit and utensils, and the school would almost from the start become self-supporting.

Once successfully established, all would become partakers of its advantages, for a certificate of proficiency and grade from it would be all the reference needed for a cook, and those possessing such would command situations and wages graded according to their merit. Once successful as a private institution, it would command adoption by the local school boards.

A very few hundred dollars would initiate the enterprise; indeed, if taken up by the governing committee of any one of our city clubs, it could be started without a cent of outlay. If none of them be willing to take it up, let a small committee be organized to represent the subscribers, supervise the finances, etc. Let them hire and fit up suitable premises, and my own conviction is that, under Mrs. Cushing's management, the thing will be a demonstrated success inside of six weeks.

JOHN T. DOYLE.

At a recent party at New Rochelle, N. Y., the ladies all wore old-fashioned samplers for aprons, upon which the legend, "Polly, put the kettle on," was rudely inscribed over a freely conventionalized tea-kettle. The form of invitation was so clever that we reproduce it. The lines were enclosed in the design of a teapot. They were as follows:

"We hope on Thursday next to see
A few young friends at seven to tea,
And trust that you'll at once agree
One of our honored guests to be.
Teacups and teapots rare have we,
Which you're expected, when you see,
To praise with proper ecstasy.
The teacups all belong to 'E.'
'I' owns the teapots. So, you see,
A sort of joint affair 'twill be.
Of Oolong, Hyson, and Bohea,
Teacups and teapots, 'I' and 'E.'
Remember, then, that you're to be
On hand at seven P. M. to tea,
And share our modest little spree
On Thursday next. R. S. V. P."

Thackeray once said: "I must not question the hospitality of the friend who gives me mutton on a cold plate; but I may surely question the rectitude of his early years." The Eastern cookery editors are very much agitated over the cold-plate question. Which seems to us needless potter. Surely no host with any pretensions to culinary training ever gives one hot meat on a cold plate.

A very nice dessert is the Spanish dish Bola de Riva, prepared as follows: To one-half pound butter add one-half pound pulverized sugar, with whites and yollos of four eggs; you want three ounces of pounded almonds, and two ounces of whole almonds, chopped; mix all well together; add one pound of sifted flour. Make into balls or round forms, and bake in a greased pan.

CXXIV.—Sunday, April 11.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Consommé à la Bonne Femme.
Deviled Crab.
Calif's Head à la Tortue.
Asparagus. New Potatoes.
Roast Chicken—Currant Jelly.
Cucumber Salad.

Strawberries and Whipped Cream. Pound Cake.

Fruit-bowl of Oranges, Figs, Apples, and Bananas.
To COOK CALIF'S HEAD à la TORTUE—Take the head and split it open; wash it clean; then put it on to boil until half done. Take it up, cut in pieces; then season with salt, half a teaspoonful of cayenne, sweet marjoram, mace, nutmeg, a few cloves, three medium-sized onions, and a handful of parsley finely chopped. Put it in a pan, and pour over the liquor the head was boiled in until well covered; lay forcemeat balls over the top, and put it in the oven. When it is nearly done, thicken it with a gill of wine and flour mixed together; when it is done the pieces of the head will be tender. It may be cooked in a covered pot on the fire. The balls can be browned in the frying-pan.

TO MAKE FORCEMEAT BALLS—Take two pounds of veal and three-quarters of a pound of suet; chop them well; season with salt, cayenne, mace, nutmeg, cloves, sweet marjoram, two or three onions, a handful of parsley finely chopped, and a glass of wine; break an egg into it, and mix well together. Fry a sim in oil until not seasoned enough and more seasonings. Make into balls.

Consommé à la Bonne Femme, see Vol. III., No. 2.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

Mother and Poet.

LAURA SAVIO, OF TURIN, AFTER THE NEWS FROM GAETA, 1861.

Dead! One of them shot by the sea in the east,
And one of them shot in the west by the sea.
Dead! both my boys! When you sit at the feast,
And are wanting a great song for Italy free,
Let none look at me!

Yet I was a poetess only last year,
And good at my art, for a woman, men said;
But this woman, this, who is agonized here,
The east sea and west sea rhyme on in her head
Forever, instead.

What art can a woman be good at? Oh, vain!
What art is she good at, but hurting her breast.
With the milk-teeth of babes, and a smile at the pain?
Ah, boys, bow you hurt! you were strong as you pressed,
And I proud, by that test.

What art's for a woman? To hold on her knees
Both darlings; to feel all their arms round her throat
Cling, strangle a little; to sew by degrees
And broder the long-clothes and neat little coat;
To dream and to doat!

To teach them . . . It stings there! I made them, indeed,
Speak plain the word country. I taught them, no doubt,
That a country's a thing men should die for at need.
I prated of liberty, rights, and about
The tyrant cast out.

And when their eyes flashed . . . O my beautiful eyes! . . .
I exulted; nay, let them go forth at the wheels
Of the guns, and denied not; But then the surprise
When one sits quite alone! Then one weeps, then one kneels!
God, how the house feels!

At first happy news came—in gay letters, mailed
With my kisses—of camp-life and glory, and how
They both loved me; and, soon coming home to be spoiled,
In return would fan off every fly from my brow
With their green laurel bough.

Then was triumph at Turin. Ancona was free!
And some one came out of the cheers in the street,
With a face pale as stone, to say something to me:
My Guido was dead! I fell down at his feet,
While they cheered in the street.

I bore it; friends soothed me; my grief looked sublime
As the ransom of Italy. One boy remained
To be leaned on and walked with, recalling the time
When the first grew immortal, while both of us strained
To the height he had gained.

And letters still came, shorter, sadder, more strong,
Writ now but in one hand: I was not to faint—
One loved me for two—would he with me ere long;
And, "Viva l'Italia! he died for—our saint—
Who forbids our complaint."

My Nanni would add: He was safe, and aware
Of a presence that turned off the halls—was impressed
It was Guido himself, who knew what I could bear,
And how 'twas impossible, quite dispossessed,
To live on for the rest.

On which, without pause, up the telegraph line
Swept smoothly the next news from Gaeta:—Shot.
Tell his mother. Ah, ah, "his," "their" mother, not "mine;"
No voice says "My mother" again to me. What!
You think Guido forgot?

Are souls straight so happy that, dizzy with heaven,
They drop earth's affections, conceive not of woe?
I think not. Themselves were too lately forgiven
Through that Love and Sorrow which reconciled so
The Above and Below.

O Christ of the seven wounds, who look'dst through the dark
To the face of Thy Mother! consider, I pray,
How we common mothers stand desolate, mark
Whose sons, not being Christs, die with eyes turned away,
And no last word to say.

Both boys dead? But that's out of nature. We all
Have been patriots, yet each house must always keep one.
'Twere imbecile, heaving out roads to a wall;
And, when Italy's made, for what end is it done
If we have not a son?

Ah, ah, ah! when Gaeta's taken, what then?
When the fair wicked queen sits no more at her sport
Of the fire-balls of death, crashing souls out of men?
When the guns of Cavalli, with final retort,
Have cut the game short?

When Venice and Rome keep their new jubilee,
When your flag takes all heaven for its white, green, and red,
When you have a country from mountain to sea,
And King Victor has Italy's crown on his head,
(And I have my dead!)

What then? Do not mock me. Ah, ring your bells low,
And burn your lights faintly. My country is there,
Above the star pricked by the last peak of snow;
My Italy's THERE, with my brave civic PAIR,
To disfranchise despair!

Forgive me. Some women hear children in strength,
And bite back the cry of their pain in self-scorn;
But the birth-pangs of nations will wring us at length
Into wail such as this; and we sit on, forlorn,
When the man-child is born.

Dead! One of them shot by the sea in the east,
And one of them shot in the west by the sea.
Both, both my boys! If, in keeping the feast,
You want a great song for your Italy free,
Let none look at me! —Mrs. Browning.

Ouida has no longer the appearance of youth. She is stout and dresses neatly, is luxurious in her tastes, but is not now and never could have been pretty. She has nothing courteous nor sympathetic in her manner. To her guests she is severely polite, but prefers listening to talking. She never condescends to discuss her books with women, as she does not consider them capable of comprehending her. Ouida is not content with being thought only a clever writer; her higher ambition is to be considered a great artist, and her villa is adorned with pictures that she has painted in those hours when she has laid aside pen and paper for canvas and brush. Her paintings are much more moral than her books, but her novels are more artistic than her paintings.

THE QUESTION OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE.

Out of the very many communications sent to us, we select two as representing the sentiment of intelligent foreigners upon the question of universal suffrage, as extended to the ignorant and propertyless. In our "Americanism," we claim we are reflecting the views of the intelligent and respectable people of foreign birth who are residing among us. Alien vice and ignorance, combining with native-born demagoguery, championed by a mercenary press, is an evil that threatens the perpetuity of Republican liberty in this country.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I will confess my nationality. I was born and bred in Ireland, and am proud of that fact, and of being a subject of Great Britain, and I must add that it has been balm to my soul to hear you and others constantly complaining of the trouble and injury certain classes of my countrymen are causing in this State; for thus Americans may glean some idea of how difficult is the task of governing a country where men such as these are found in hundreds of thousands. So be more careful in abusing England for its relations to Ireland, for assuredly you have not all the idle, ignorant, and vicious Irish out here. Regarding the cause of all the trouble in San Francisco, it will surely appear to every thinking man that a free vote is the root of the evil. The vote of the best, enlightened, and influential man in the State is killed by that of a bummer who can neither read nor write, is too lazy to work, and may be bought for a glass of whisky. If the feeling in a free country is against a property qualification, there can surely be no objection to an educational one, and it would not be a great hardship to exclude all from voting who can not read and write English; and certainly it would be no hardship to compel every man, before recording his vote, to produce his poll-tax receipt. Regarding office-holding by foreigners, it would not appear that they are singular in their unfitness for official positions, as many of your own countrymen who hold like aspirations are equally illiterate, and there does not appear to be any educational test or qualification whatever for office; men are elected by means of a free vote, who are socially, morally, mentally, and educationally unfit for any civil service whatever; indeed, I have heard of a county treasurer who was said to be unable to write even his own name. He was an American, too, and in all probability was elected by an American vote. Another cause of this disturbing agitation continuing, and one which even you can not lay to the foreign element, would appear to be either loose laws or the loose administration of good ones; in either case, the fault lies with the executive government, and the remedy is in their hands, for the foreign-born portion of the population would, if properly and firmly ruled, make good and law-abiding citizens. Let me ask you if there is any other civilized country in the world in which two men like Kearney and Gannon would, after being convicted of breaking the law, and while out on bail, on appeal, be permitted to use the language they have done toward the judge who, in the performance of his sworn duty, passed sentence upon them, without receiving the severest possible penalty for contempt of court? In any other country I verily believe their bail would instantly have been recalled, and they would have had meted out to them the punishment they so richly deserve; but perhaps Denis is correct in his estimate of the situation, and can defy the laws of the United States. Should this be so, it is one of the most bitter satires on American institutions that has ever gone forth to the world.

LAL. COATEE.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Among the hundred and one causes which have produced the deplorable state of things now existing in San Francisco and throughout the State, I think there is one at least which is considerable to do with it that you have not alluded to, and it may be presumption, if not rank treason, on my part to suggest it, and that is universal suffrage. Now don't you talk of laying the axe to the root of the tree of liberty. The tree is all right in itself, but it has a lot of dead timber on it which requires lopping off, and some of its sprouts require pruning. Again, a lot of suckers and parasites have fastened on to its roots that if not removed will certainly kill it in time. I think it was Lord Brougham who told Mr. Webster that universal suffrage would never work after the country got thickly peopled. Thomas Carlyle says no country can succeed which gives Jesus Christ and Judas Iscariot the same political privileges. Madam Roland said: "Oh, Liberty, Liberty! what crimes have been committed in thy name!" And Sir Robert Walpole said, "Every man has his price." He (Sir Robert) had bought and sold men and their influences for forty years, therefore should be accepted as an authority on the subject. There being so many men who can not distinguish between liberty and license, would it not be well to limit the number as much as possible? So when you draft the new constitution for governing foreigners in their political acts just insert a clause making a property qualification essential in casting a vote. This might deprive many a worthy man, but it would deprive so many more unworthy as to far overbalance the loss. It would work well in two ways: the tax-payers, who have to foot the bills voted on, would take sufficient interest in elections to work for the best men, and it would keep non-payers away from the polls, where they have no business. Why should I have any voice in voting a tax when I pay nothing toward it? I say, a county road-tax of two dollars, and a State poll-tax of three dollars is little enough to pay for the privileges of roads and protection by the laws of the State, and should not in themselves entitle me to a political vote. Ask any of your city officers regarding the workings of primary elections, and the contemptible measures they have to adopt to gain their ends. If you will do away with primaries and universal suffrage, you will do more to purify your political atmosphere than all your theorizing for a century. In the property qualification I would also include native-born citizens, otherwise you would be offering a premium on perjury. Let the Assessor's books be the Great Register.

C. D. H.

Ladies' luncheons have recently become fashionable in New York. At an entertainment of this kind, given by a lady residing on Fifth Avenue, there were twelve tables, each prepared for six guests, with different services, complete and harmonious to the most minute particular in glass and china, with exquisitely embroidered napkins and tablecloths. The cards inscribed with the names of the guests were elaborately painted with subjects appropriate to the occasion, and mementoes of the event were placed beside the plates, such as fans, bouquet-holders, etc., of curious workmanship, such as ladies dearly love.

At Japanese dinner-tables one frequently sees fish alive in a bowl, and, on inquiry, it is discovered that the slices served at the repast have been cut from the fish in the bowl, the skin being neatly sewn after the cutting. This is done to show that the fish is fresh.

Those who have traced the problem back have ascertained that the cat was born to earth before the mouse was. The latter was loosely flung together, given a long tail, and told to git up and git or the cat would have him.

The next best thing to seeing a man sitting on the curbstone waiting for a drug-store to come along, is to watch one earnestly endeavoring to jab a letter into a fire-alarm signal-box.

Bishop Bedell is of opinion that if ministers would only speak the truth in funeral sermons the demand for such discourses would be rapidly diminished.

Real humming birds are used to ornament the black velvet necklaces and bracelets that some ladies affect.

"DOMESTIC" THE LIGHT RUNNING SEWING MACHINE.

It is PERFECT in every feature, and COMPLETE in all its details. It embodies all of the MODERN improvements that are of PROVED VALUE.

J. W. EVANS,

No. 29 POST STREET (MECHANICS' INSTITUTE BUILDING).

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

CHICKERING
PIANOS AT COST.

MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
COAL DEALERS.

Office and Yard, 14 Post Street.
Store Yard, 718 Sansome Street.
BRANCH OFFICE.

J. Middleton & Son, 419 Pine Street,
Opposite California Market.

All kinds of coal at lowest rates. Orders may be sent by telephone through any of the company's offices free.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED, DO hereby certify and declare that we have formed a partnership, under the firm name and style of the OAKLAND BAG MANUFACTURING COMPANY; that said partnership has for its object the manufacture and sale of all kinds and descriptions of jute fabrics; that its principal place of business is the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, having its works and factory in the City of Oakland, County of Alameda, State of California; that the names in full of all the members of such partnership and their places of residence are as follows, that is to say: WILLIAM SCHOLLE, residing at Number Twelve Hundred and Thirty-four Post Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California; ISRAEL CAHN, residing at Number Eleven Hundred and Twenty Post Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California; and JOSEPH BRANDENSTEIN residing in the Town of Alameda, County of Alameda, State of California. Dated March 16, 1880.

WILLIAM SCHOLLE,
ISRAEL CAHN,
J. BRANDENSTEIN.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, ss.
On this Eighteenth (18th) day of March, A. D. One Thousand Eight Hundred and Eighty, before me, James Mason, a Notary Public and for said city and county, personally appeared William Scholle, Israel Cahn, and Joseph Brandenstein, known to me to be the persons respectively named and described in, and whose names are subscribed to, the within and foregoing certificate of partnership, and they severally duly acknowledged to me that they executed the same respectively.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal the day and year in this certificate first above written.

[NOTARIAL SEAL] JAMES MASON, Notary Public.
Endorsed—Filed March 18, 1880.

By J. WHALEN, Deputy Clerk.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—ESTATE of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased. Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator, at No. 327 Pine Street, in the City of San Francisco, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California.

HENRY A. NEWTON, Adm'r of the Estate of Ebenezer C. Ledyard, Deceased.
Dated at San Francisco, March 10, 1880.
SAFFOLD & MEUX, Attorneys.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the second day of April, 1880, an assessment (No. 22) of seventy-five (75) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixth (6th) day of April, 1880, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the twenty-seventh (27th) day of May, 1880, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
JNO. CROCKETT, Secretary.

Office—Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

to $20 per day at home. Samples worth $5 free. Address STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

OFFER EXTRAORDINARY!

THE Automatic

THE ONLY LIGHT RUNNING AND NOISELESS SEWING MACHINE made. It has no Bobbins, no Shuttle, no Tension. It is sold wholly upon its merits.

We hereby offer to parties who have owned an Automatic for Six Months and are dissatisfied, a New Machine of any other make, on even exchange. No other Company dare make such an offer.

WILCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.

124 Post Street, San Francisco, and 361 Twelfth Street, Oakland.

The ARGONAUT is Printed with Ink Manufactured by

SHATTUCK & FLETCHER,

520 Commercial Street, San Francisco.

STORES AND PRIVATE RESIDENCES.

PROTECT YOUR FRONT DOORS AND CARPETS FROM THE SUN
by getting

AWNINGS

—AT—

E. DETRICK & CO.'S, NO. 123 CLAY ST.

Call and examine our NEW STYLES for 1880. TENTS and CAMPERS' OUTFITS. Tents let for the Season.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

—THE—

NEW WESTERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

MAY NUMBER NEXT FRIDAY.

CONTENTS:

FIELD SPORTS IN AUSTRALIA.....R. E. DESMOND.
THE FIRST LEGISLATURE ON THIS CONTINENT.....W. W. CRANE JR.
IN SHASTA.....CHARLES H. SHINN.
SAND. Chapter V.....J. W. GALLY.
THE PRESENT CRISIS IN SAN FRANCISCO.....C. T. HOPKINS.
THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS—A HOLIDAY IN BOSOBOSO...A. T. MARVIN.
HIGH JINKS.....ANDREW MCF. DAVIS.
REMINISCENCES OF COLONEL E. D. BAKER.....EDWARD B. JEROME.
FOR THE LAST TIME.....MAY N. HAWLEY.
ALMOST A NOVEL.....PHILIP SHIRLEY.
A DAY AT AN OLD MISSION.....MARY H. FIELD.
RUBY. Chapters III, IV.....J. H. S. BUGEIA.
THE NORTH WIND.....E. R. SILL.
THE FIRST XERXES LOAN COLLECTION.....OCTAVE THANET.
FISH IN SEASON.....W. N. LOCKINGTON.
INDIAN DANCES IN NORTHERN CALIFORNIA.....LUCY SARGEANT.
NOTE - BOOK.....

A Suggestive Picture.—The Aristocratic Impulse.—Intellectual Superiority as a Restraint.—California Prejudice and the Chinese Question.—Election-Mad.—Mr. Hopkins's Article and a Word Concerning Contributions.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.....
High-Power Microscopes.—Transmitting Colors by Telegraph.—Harnessing Electricity.—Melting Steel by Friction.—Strength of Mind and Body.—Deadening Noises in Workshops.—Making Grape Sugar in the Kitchen.—Instability of High Factory Buildings.—A New Metallic Compound.—Insanity the Measure of Civilization.—Revival after Freezing.—Diogenes's Tub.

OUTCROPPINGS

The May Number of THE CALIFORNIAN will be out next Friday, April 16. Only Twenty-five Cents.

SEE THE MAY NUMBER OF THE CALIFORNIAN!

FOR SALE BY NEWSDEALERS AND THE TRADE GENERALLY.

THE ONE PRICE

DRY GOODS HOUSE.

42, 44, and 46 Third Street.

KID GLOVES A SPECIALTY.

6-Button, first quality.....$1 75
4-Button, first quality.....1 50
3-Button, first quality.....1 40
6-Button, second quality.....1 50
4-Button, second quality.....1 25

Lace-top Lisle and Silk Gloves, from 50 cents and upwards. Our Kid Gloves are the best fitting and most durable.

PEIXOTTO & SILVERMAN,
Importers.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

H. L. DODGE.....L. H. SWEENEY.....J. E. RUGGLES

DODGE, SWEENEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS,

Wholesale Provision Dealers,

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,
Nos. 114 and 116 Market, and 11 and 13 California Sts.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.,

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR Street.
Liberal advances made on consignments.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

SHIPPING

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. San Francisco.

JOHN TAYLOR & CO.,
118 and 120 Market Street, and 15 and 17 California Street,
ASSAYERS' MATERIALS, MINE and Mill Supplies, also Druggists' Glassware.

English and American BICYCLES.
KEPT IN STOCK
And imported to order.
Prices only $5 over those in Boston.
LORING CUNNINGHAM
No. 206 Sansome Street, office of Macondray & Co., S. F.

ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE.

NOTICE.—THE TRADE AND THE Public are informed that we receive the Genuine LOUIS ROEDERER CARTE BLANCHE CHAMPAGNE direct from Mr. Louis Roederer, Reims, over his signature and Consular Invoice. Each case is marked with the side, "Macondray & Co., San Francisco," and each bottle bears the label, "Macondray & Co., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast."

MACONDRAY & CO.,
Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, CITY

and County of San Francisco, State of California, Department No. 10. In the matter of the petition of JAMES M. SHORES, an insolvent debtor. Pursuant to an order of the Hon. Charles Halsey, Judge of said Superior Court, notice is hereby given to all creditors of the said insolvent JAMES M. SHORES to be and appear before the Hon. Charles Halsey, Judge as aforesaid, in open court, at the court-room of said court, in the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on TUESDAY, the 27th day of April, A. D. 1880, at 11 o'clock A. M. of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the prayer of said insolvent should not be granted, and an assignment of his estate be made, and he be discharged from his debts and liabilities, whether perfectly or imperfectly described, or not described at all in the schedule filed herein, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided; and in the meantime all proceedings against said insolvent be stayed.

Witness my hand and the seal of said court this 22d day of March, A. D. 1880.

[SEAL] WILLIAM A. STUART, Clerk.
By JOHN H. HARNEY, Deputy Clerk.
WM. H. H. HART, Atty for Petitioner, 250 Montgomery Street.

The Argonaut.

VOL. VI. NO. 16.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 17, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

DEMOCRATIC AND REPUBLICAN IDEALS.

Liberty and Equality.

In our American politics the democratic party has idealized liberty, and the republican party equality, the two main objects sought by our form of government; and the difference between these two ideals, or their respective emphasis, constitutes the main difference between the principles of the two parties. The democratic party would have, in a general way, all kinds of liberty, and liberty to the greatest extent. The republican party would have all kinds of equality, and equality in every particular. The democratic party would have, as far as practicable, liberty from rulers, from laws, and from the central government; liberty of trade, of speech, and of the press; liberty of assembling, of arming, and even of oppressing. The republican party would have equality of individuals, of races, and of colors; equality of sections, of States, and of religions; equality of rights and of powers; equality enforced by constitutions and by laws; and equality guaranteed against both the States and the General Government. Each party has taken a term—liberty and equality respectively—and analyzed and perfected its meaning, and drawn out and clustered about it all that it implies or suggests. It is the distinction between these two ideals as thus constructed, and their clashing in the attempt to realize them in their unlimited application, that constitute the yearly issues in our politics.

The democratic party, from its standpoint of liberty, would have all liberty; while the republican party, from its standpoint of equality, would have liberty for all. The democrats have wanted liberty even to enslave, while the republicans have wanted bonds, even on the free, against slavery. The democrats considering the interests and progress of liberty to consist in the extension of its degree, and the republicans in the extension of its subjects, the former have always wanted to make men more free, while the latter have wanted to make more free men. The democrats would select a portion of the race to be made perfectly free, while the republicans would take all and make them as free as possible. The democrats, in short, want unequal liberty, while the republicans want equal restraints. The former are willing to sacrifice some of the people that the rest may be free; while the latter are willing to sacrifice some of our rights that all may have the rest. The democrats looking over the whole range of liberties, and the republicans over the whole range of men, in their ideals, the former will not sacrifice anything for all, the latter will not sacrifice anybody for anything. The democrats will not bind themselves partially for the freedom of the whole, the republicans will not bind anybody wholly for the freedom of a part.

The democratic principles, under this ruling idea of liberty, may all be summed up as personal liberty, local liberty, and business liberty; or free men, free States, and free trade. Their idea is simply to let the people alone to conduct their own affairs, of whatever kind, according to their own opinions and strength. It is the idea of a free fight and the survival of the fittest. Let all be unrestrained, they would say, to follow their own inclinations. If some get up and others go down, it is no fault of the government. If some are oppressed, or even enslaved, it is only the result of perfect freedom among the people. Men by nature are unequal, and government should not force equality. The superiority of the great should not be abridged by a mean averaging. The country is an arena where each only needs an equal chance to do as he pleases. The government's business is not to prevent one from getting the better of others, but to prevent any unfairness in the fight.

The democratic party contemplates men as working with natural powers, according to natural laws, where the results are natural results; therein differing from the republican party, which would have men work under general laws in which men are equalized, laws made by governments instead of found in nature, and enforced by sentiment instead of driven by impulse. The democratic idea is that being free you work with the powers which nature has given you. If you get above others and take advantage of them, you do it by a real prerogative of power inherent in the laws of nature; whereas under government you work with artificial laws, which give the weak an equal chance with the strong. Let there be, therefore, they would say, the least possible government to restrain nature. Liberty is the law of nature, while government is the law of men; and the democrat wants more of nature in the political state. All he asks is to be let alone, thinking it is nobody's business what he does. Every one, according to him, is his own master, nobody else having a right to say whether he interferes with others. He himself is to see to that; and the person injured is the only one to resent it, and let him resent it if he can. The democrats, accordingly, while they respect an opponent, have no patience with an interferer. Their party has, in consequence of this position, defended various manifestations of force and craft, like dueling, gaming, and questionable feats of chivalry and intimidation, as mere self-assertion, and opposed the laws that would restrain these as being an infringement upon personal liberty. They have to a great extent the idea that force carries with it the right of use, so long as it is natural force, and not the force of the government.

The democratic party, accordingly, allows less weight to moral ideas than the republican; as moral laws are general and federative, and do not comport with natural liberty. The democrats would have no inconvenient moral restraint, any more than physical restraint. Do and be what you can, they would say. Assert your superiority, if superior, and make the inferior keep his inferiority. Develop by natural selection a real aristocracy of merit, and eliminate, by the same law, the weak and unworthy, that a superior race may people and enspire our country. The democrats, in short, emphasize and insist on natural laws; the republicans, moral laws. The former say, in effect, "Let nature have full sway;" the latter, "Let morals have full sway." While, accordingly, the republican party wants the laws of morality recognized and enforced in politics, the democratic party wants the laws of nature, wealth, commerce, etc., recognized and let alone.

The democratic party embraces in its idea the differentiation of men, localities, and institutions. As men are not equal, it would not only not seek to equalize them, but would separate them and make them, if possible, more unlike; favoring the favored and impeding the unfavored. As all localities do not require the same laws and institutions, it would not seek to apply general laws to them, but adapt minute laws to each condition, leaving the State to itself and the county to itself, the people in every locality ordering their own affairs as suits them best. The democratic idea would develop the States to be great nations, and to be different from one another, each built up according to the peculiarities of its climate, situation, and resources. It would have thirty-eight nations instead of thirty-eight provinces, as different as the European States from one another; which is, after all, the law of all progress. The democratic idea would give more variety to our country than the republican, and develop more peculiarities of men's opinions and tastes. It would enlarge the number of our possibilities, and, if well directed, develop our civilization more fully. For it can not be denied that if thirty-eight peoples struggle for greatness there will be more great deeds than if one people so struggle, the greatness of each section being more fully called out by depending entirely on itself.

The republican party, on the other hand, contemplates homogeneity in our political relations, or a oneness of our characteristics. It aims at one country, one spirit, and one kind of everything. It would have all in system, making a perfect whole, and working together to a common end. The republicans do not appear to think that excessive differentiation in States, any more than in languages, is progress. As language should be the same, law should be the same in the whole country. Differentiation in the English language, by which there are different spellings and pronunciations for the same word, is imperfection rather than development; while uniformity and certainty rather indicate progress, as in the French and German languages. As, therefore, to speak elegant English everywhere and uniformly, and not to have different dialects in every locality, is the highest indication of culture, so it is in the uniformity of our institutions. Our life and habits do not require differentiation of any kind to the same extent as in Europe, or in other times. Our climate, soil, and occupations are sufficiently alike for us to have uniform government. Railroads, telegraphs, habits of travel and emigration, and quick and general diffusion of literature, are calculated to keep our nation everywhere alike. Greater areas can now be homogenized than formerly, when civilization could not so easily leap over mountains and seas, and cross wide interior plains.

If we look at the various issues which have divided the parties during the last generation, we find that they have all turned on the respective emphasizing of liberty and equality in their several applications. The democratic party, under the idea of liberty as manifest in the forms of personal liberty, local liberty, and business liberty, has maintained the right of slavery (looking to the liberty of the master), and all that it implies—the slave trade, the extension of slavery in the Territories, the reclamation of slaves from the free States, and the various necessary slave legislation and guarantees—State rights, State nullification, the right of secession, the wrong of coercion, opposition to centralization and to reconstruction by the General Government, "squatter sovereignty," "loco-focoism," and home rule generally; hostility to national banks and a protective tariff; resistance to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, arbitrary arrests, the declaration of martial law, the enforcement acts, and military interference; opposition to stringent liquor and Sunday laws, to extensive improvements and governmental enterprises, to costly education, and in general to whatever is incompatible with a conservative, as opposed to a radical or liberal government.

The republican party, on the other hand, has, in the interest of equality, taken in turn the opposite of all these positions. It has opposed the extension of slavery, favored the abolition of slavery, the emancipation of the disfranchised, equal civil rights for all, a strong central government, the Union, coercion, the war, and all that it implied; reconstruction of the South by the Central Government, the suppression of outrages, the enforcement of the constitutional amendments; national banks, tariff, severe revenue laws, great improvements, public schools, and the abolition of all religious distinctions and appropriations by the Government.

The democratic party, under its idea of liberty, would secure the free against oppression; while the republican party would secure all against the free. The republican takes pride in self-government, while the democrat takes pride in the comparative absence of government. The republican looks on himself as a ruler; the democrat looks on himself as a subject; so that while the former insists on just laws, the latter insists on no more laws than are absolutely necessary, the republican measuring his respectability by his equal authority, the democrat by his comparative immunity. The democratic idea, in its contempt for government, tends, by default, to monarchy; while the republican, in its assumption of power by the people, tends to communism. A republican never entertains the supposition of a monarchy, as being repugnant to his idea. A democrat does not care so much who rules if he be let alone. The democrat says: "Let others, if need be, have the government, so we do as we please;" the republican insists on having the government, no matter what it is. The republican regards his relation to the government as an interest to be possessed, the democrat as a burden from which to be relieved.

The democrats do not consider the elective franchise, or other exercise of power, to be any great privilege, and do not stickle for it in its theoretical and universal integrity like the republicans. Giving it to more men, or giving it to incompetent men, is only, in their eyes, conferring a bondage on those over whom they rule. "Don't give men," they would say, "more power over men;" and "Don't give more men power over men." Let this franchise be as small a power as possible, and be confined to as few as practicable—to those, at least, who had it before the war; its extension to more being more power given for government. Extending power to more is not advancing toward liberty, even if some are now excepted. Keeping persons from voting who have no vote is not depriving them of rights; it is only not subjecting the rights of others to them. On democratic principles men may be free and not vote. All that is necessary is that their liberties be not infringed by those who do vote. "Those who have power," they would say, "need not give it to others. The whites until recently had the votes. If they gave them to the negroes it was pure gratuity. When you give power to rule you have to consider not only the power you grant, but also the inability under which you put yourself; not only what others get, but also what you surrender. Giving more power to others may let them take away what you have. Giving votes to those who can not use them endangers the rights of those who now have them. Do not, therefore, give to others when you give away your own. Don't give to a part what may endanger that which all have, all privileges granted to the disabled being conceded from the empowered."

The democratic party, in combating the republican principles, have surrendered all pretensions to equality. According to them, power, like wealth, is a proper subject of acquisition. To get control of the government is no worse than to get control of land or money; and they recognize among their rights the right to keep what they have, as well as to get what is due them. The government, according to them, should protect men in their unequal privileges, or rather let them alone in them, as well as in anything else they have. We should not inquire too far back into whether power, like wealth, has been got honestly, and disturb our political, any more than our property titles. "Don't undo," they would say, "the actual state of things and unlay the foundations of government any more than of wealth or society. No matter what the early right by which we, or our ancestors, acquired our possessions, their present condition is a fact that we should recognize, without radical reconstruction or attempt at communism of power."

The democratic party says, in principle, that there are different kinds of men and different kinds of liberty; while the republican party maintains that men are the same and liberty is the same, and want no distinction in either. The democrats divide people so as to say everything good of one class and everything bad of another, and demand every liberty for the former and every disability for the latter. The republicans put all men in one class, and say they are not fit for certain liberties and are unfit for certain disabilities. The democrats would allow as many men to be free as are capable of freedom, the republicans would allow men as much freedom as all are capable of; the former restricting the number of freemen in order, to have more perfect freedom, the latter restricting the amount of freedom in order to have it universal.

Special exceptions, being a gain of so much liberty by the party privileged, are defended by the democrats; while, being a loss of so much by the rest, they are opposed by the republicans. The republicans would say: "Give to all alike;" the democrats, "Give to each what is best for him." Justice with the democrat means giving each his own; with the republican it means also determining by what right it is his. The democrat, in dealing with the different classes of men, relies on fact for his claims; the republican on principles. The democrat recognizes the actual state, the republican the ideal state, and each adjudges accordingly. The democrat is accordingly more practical, the republican more theoretical. The democrat sees the actual difficulties in equality as a practical realization; the republican sees objections to inequality as conflicting with an idea. The democratic problem is to mingle in society and be free; the republican problem to mingle in society and be just.

Equalizing, according to the democratic idea, robs the rich and burdens the poor. Making taxes equal, for example, puts heavier burdens on the poor, as does also making responsibilities equal, which should correspond to privileges. Lay the heavy responsibilities, they w on those who can bear them, and give the exceptional power to do so. It is on this principle that the democrats are opposed to poll-tax and internal revenue, which fall on all alike, and insist, instead, on direct taxation, or taxation according to the value of property or income, which falls on men in proportion to their ability to pay it. And, on the same principle, they would, in some cases, give suffrage only to the property-holder, and make property qualifications for some of the offices. Equality of privileges takes away the advantages of the great, while equality of burdens takes away the exemptions of the weak.

As the republicans oppose every inequality, whether of special privilege or special deprivation, and the democrats favor such in the interest of the liberty of the more fortunate, the aggrieved parties always come to the republicans for relief, while the aggrieved ones come to the democrats for defense. The republicans have always drawn to them the negroes, the Chinese, the female suffragists, and the philanthropists who have sought deliverance from any kind of wrong. The democrats have drawn to their ranks the slave-holders, the Southern States, the liquor-dealers, the Catholics, and the foreigners whenever they have demanded special legislation in their interest.

It is a strange spectacle that in our country foreigners, who are generally democrats, are not pleading for rights, but for privileges, and are on the side of the oppressors instead of the oppressed. Where there is any difference they are, or demand that they shall be, more favored than the natives. They demand with great boldness the offices, and have in many cities the balance of power. They must generally be consulted, as foreigners, in the political nominations; and the platforms must be formed to catch the German or Irish vote. One often can not get an office unless he is a foreigner, and feels it a misfortune that he was born an American. They frequently demand special legislation for their benefit, particularly touching whisky, beer, and the Sabbath. They ask not to have the same rights as Americans, but to have the Government change the laws specially to suit them as foreigners with different ideas.

Religious sects, more especially, demand, in like manner, and always through the democratic party, not liberty, but privileges; not equality with others, but special favors—to be free from taxation, to have their own schools supported, to get appropriations for their hospitals and asylums, and to have their peculiarities generally recognized and patronized by the government. Instead of asking toleration they ask rather to be allowed to persecute. Instead of asking to be relieved from burdens not borne by others they ask for the right to lay special burdens on others for their benefit, as to tax the people for their religious objects, or to be themselves specially released from taxation on account of their peculiar views or church relations.

The democratic party has generally some special favors to ask for some special class, and is the champion always of a part of our population or of the country; while the republican party asks always for the same laws and privileges for all our citizens and all our sections. The democrat has ever on his lips, as his special proteges, "the States," "the South," "the whites," "the Germans," "the Irish," "the Catholics," and talks of "State rights," "Southern rights," "foreigners' rights," "the church's rights," etc. The republican party, on the other hand, loudly proclaims: "No difference in sections! No difference in States! No difference in men! No difference in religion! No difference in liberties! No difference in powers!"

So the republican party has always asserted the equal participation of all men in power; while the democratic party has been willing to sacrifice the principle of equality in power for the sake of liberty from power. The republicans seem to think it a great privilege to rule, while the democrats think it a great privilege not to be ruled; so that republican freedom is largely freedom to rule, while democratic freedom is freedom from rule. And conversely, oppression to republicans consists largely in not having power to exercise, while to democrats it consists in having power exercised over you; the former wanting to get the sceptre in their own hands, and the latter wanting not to feel the sceptre.

The republicans want a people's government, while the democrats want a free government. Republicans can not endure the thought of a king or aristocracy, while democrats can not endure the thought of the power of a king or aristocracy; the former hating these classes because of their exclusiveness in rule, the latter because of their oppressiveness in rule. The democrats might consent to a monarchy if free; the republicans might consent to oppression if under a republic. Republicans are uncompromising on the form of government, democrats on the powers of government. The republicans hate monarchies because they do not recognize equal rights, the democrats because they are oppressive. An oppressive republic is as tolerable to republicans as a liberal monarchy is to democrats. The object of the republicans is mainly to get men their rights, the object of the democrats to get them their liberties. The republicans say that good government is equal power, the democrats that it is absence of restraint. The republicans accordingly want every one to have a hand in, while the democrats want every one to be let alone.

The republicans hate injustice, while the democrats hate oppression. The former, looking at the democrats' treatment of the negroes, would say: "Men must not bind others by laws;" the democrats, looking at the republicans' excess of legislation, would say: "Men must not bind themselves by laws." The republicans might consent to self-slavery, the democrats to slavery of others; the former to voluntary slavery, the latter to involuntary slavery. The republicans delight in government by the people, the democrats in government for the people. According to the republican idea, government is an equalizer; according to the democratic idea, it should have nothing to do with existing inequalities. The republicans would cure the evils of society, the democrats those of nature. The former accordingly war against monarchy, aristocracy, titles, slavery, disfranchisement, intimidation, and all sorts of social discriminations; the latter against the difficulties of race and section, and the inhospitalities of soil and climate. The republican says: "Society is unequal; remedy it." The democrat says: "Nature is unequal; adjust yourself to it."

The democratic party has always put much stress upon the constitution, as circumscribing the power of the Government and guaranteeing the liberties of the people. The republican party has cared less for the Constitution, as being only one among several bodies of laws made by the people in their supreme capacity to legislate. The republicans consider the Constitution as giving power, the democrats as restraining power. The former say that it constitutes, the latter that it limits. The republicans are accordingly ever trying to stretch its authorizations, the democrats to narrow its restraints; the former looking into it for authority, the latter for prohibition.

The republican says the government secures liberty, while the democrat says that it allows liberty; the former looking at government as an exercise of power, the latter as a protection from power. The democrat would have the government bound and men free, and the republicans would have the government free and men bound. The democrats say: "Let men do as they please;" the republicans: "Let the government do as it pleases;" the former caring more for liberty, and the latter more for power.

The republicans seem to think their mission to be to protect men from lawlessness; the democrats seem to think theirs to be to protect men from laws. The republicans in the campaigns complain of intimidation, fraud, ku-klux, white leagues, red-shirts, roughs, mobs, etc.—all illegal powers. The democrats complain of Federal bayonets, Federal courts, Federal supervisors, United States interference, and other legal agencies. The republicans complain of personal wrongs, the democrats of government wrongs; the former moving against the people when they do not do right, the latter against the government when it errs.

The democrat does not believe, like the republican, in any progress in government, and the word does not appear on his lips, but conservatism rather. Progress would be more government, whereas the democrat wants less. Government, he thinks, was most perfect at first, when there was least of it. All advancement from that simplicity is deterioration. The most perfect state was the primitive condition of mankind, without government. All government is a degeneracy. We should have the least government that is possible for the ends of happiness. Government, moreover, is negative. All progress and good of whatever kind are in other things. As all government is a concession, there should be no more of it than is necessary. Wise men will not let more of their powers go out of their hands than they must, and we should never concede more than we get in return. The laws should stop where the advantages cease. Men are free without government. Government should leave them so. Laws should be made so that they do not interfere with liberty. They never give liberty. Democrats are accordingly conservative. This is, first, because, as we have said, there is no progress in government; secondly, because change implies much exercise and activity of governmental functions, whereas there should be the least possible; and thirdly, because all gain in these changes is against men—one class against another—which the government should not regulate.

The object of government, according to the republicans, is to bring about the public good; according to the democrats, to let each bring about his own good. The democratic idea is to have each work for himself, the republican to have them all work together. The democratic tendency is to build up great private interests, the republican to build up great public interests. The former would give us great families, estates, residences, etc.; the latter would give us great capitol, custom-houses, and public works generally—things which all use, and which aggrandize the government rather than the individual. Democrats enjoy more their own, the republicans enjoy things in common. The republicans want all men to be moderately happy and wealthy, without any great difference. The democrats want an aristocracy in land and money, as in the South before the war, and unlike the republican life of New England. The republican States and cities accordingly show great improvement, fine school-houses, railroads, and general signs of prosperity. The democratic show low taxes, municipalities out of debt, quaint old buildings, dilapidated court-houses, and broken-down roads and bridges.

The democrats are more for economy, the republicans for improvement. The democrats are for economy because taking money is infringing on liberty. They would spend the least that is possible, and then only for the necessary, leaving luxury and art to the individual. The republicans are more for expense, because it aggrandizes the whole, building up that which is for all—public property. The democrats when in power are more apt to steal; the republicans more apt to be extravagant. The democrats steal because they think they have about as much right as the public to its funds (which they think are wrongly taken from the people in the first place), and because there is an enjoyable air of liberty about a thief. The republican, accordingly, gives us an expensive administration, the democrat a corrupt administration. But if a democrat will steal for himself, he will not steal so much for the public. When a democrat is restrained from stealing it is because it is taking (mediatedly) from other men. When a republican is restrained from stealing, it is because it is taking (directly) from the public treasury. Good democrats don't like to steal because it is interfering with private rights, good republicans because it is interfering with public rights.

The republicans are strong in politics, taking their principal pride and stock in them; the democrats are strong rather in the laws, and are apt to study and pride themselves in them; because politics are more public and laws more private, and because, further, the laws recognize the State as their sovereign, and politics usually the nation. The republicans are accordingly much for legislation, and the democrats for litigation. The greatest politicians are apt to be found among the republicans, the greatest lawyers among the democrats.

The republicans are, on the same principle, more selfish as a nation, while the democrats are more selfish as individuals. The republicans are in favor of a tariff, and of the exclusion of foreign ways and foreign goods, with a view to build up the country. They are illiberal in their interpretation of the laws of nations, and try to get every advantage for the United States. They give little place to religion and religious characters, as such, in the government, making them submit to the common laws for all.

The republican party in general regards the whole, the democratic party a part of our country and people. Our government, according to the republican ideal, is for all, or the whole, rather than a part; and is, therefore, general rather than special. The republicans put the chief emphasis on that which is for all—the Federal Government. They recognize that the more government we have which is for the whole—the federal—the more guarantees we have of equality, and the equality of all; for by so much all are regarded alike, that being the effect of general legislation. The republicans are therefore for centralization, and would have enough laws for the whole country to leave no room for the States or municipalities to create distinctions or allow differences of rights. The Federal instead of the State governments should characterize us as a people, and determine our political status in all essentials.

The republican loves and prides himself on the whole—the nation, the Union, the people. The democrat loves and prides himself on the parts—the States, the whites, the Irish, the Germans, the Catholics—and is opposed to other parts, as the negroes, the Yankees, the Chinese. The republican party would have everything for all, and nothing for any. It knows only wholes: the whole country, the whole people, the whole laws. It would have no legislation for whites, or foreigners, or Catholics, or any class whatever.

The democratic party is sectional because of its pride in local independence; the republican is national because of its pride in universal inter-dependence. The democratic ideals are, accordingly, independence, individuality, and personal responsibility; the republicans are unity, solidity, greatness. The republican says "the Nation," "the Country," "the Union," "America;" the democrat says "home," "fire-side," "neighborhood," "the State," "the South." The democratic ideal is individual—the single; the republican is generic—the whole. The democratic party emphasizes man, the republican, men.

The republican wants the liberty of the whole, the democrat the liberty of the individual. The republican says: "Anything that all do each should submit to;" the democrat says: "All should do nothing which anybody does not want." The republican does not, therefore, hesitate to put any restraint on others which the majority are willing to bear themselves. The democrat would not put any restraint on the minority which the minority object to.

The democrat tries to destroy the country to save its parts, and fought for slavery to save liberty. The States and the whites are about all that they ever cared for, having never loved the nation or the whole people.

A democrat is a Virginian or Kentuckian. A republican is an American—never a Massachusettser or Michigander. The democratic State names are heroic, as Virginian and Carolinian. The republican State names are rather burlesque, as Hoosier and Buckeye. A democrat's country is Virginia or Louisiana; a republican's country is the United States.

The republicans are more for greatness, because greatness is for the whole. They want a great country, for which they need all its parts, and all the legislation subserved under the General Government. The democrats care less for greatness and the measures therefor. They are opposed to tariff, because it is an inconvenience of the parts for the benefit of the whole, and a restraint on liberty for the sake of greatness. Tariff is for the aggrandizement of the whole, and is, therefore, opposed in the interest of the parts. The democrats would consent to a tariff if it were between the States. For the same reason they are in favor of State banks, and a different currency in each State; while the republicans are for national banks, and one currency for all the Union.

The democrats don't want men to do anything as a whole. They dread contemplating nations and armies in action. They would rather have men differentiate for action, and strike out in smaller numbers toward individual ends. The republicans, on the other hand, want to see men act as a whole, and the greatest power of the world exercised. They want the combined force of mankind in national or international undertakings, having more confidence in the whole; while the democrats have more confidence in the parts. The democrats would be passive in government, the republicans would be active, contemplating the use of great power.

The republican party makes the whole responsible for what every one does; the democratic party rather makes every one responsible for what the whole does. The latter allows no conscience to the whole, but only to the individual. According to the republican idea, the government was responsible for slavery. According to the democratic, the slave-holders alone were responsible, and the rest of the people might have reposed in innocence. The republican has a national conscience, the democrat a State and personal conscience. The republican thinks he is responsible for what is done in any part of the country; the democrat thinks he is innocent of what is done outside of his State.

The republican has accordingly been trying to put souls and consciences in corporations, and to make them do right under moral penalties on all the individuals. He would have them feel moral responsibility as well as men. Republicans, accordingly, fear national sins and injustice, as well as personal, and have the national fast and thanksgiving days, which are hardly observed in democratic sections. They also pride themselves in national virtue, and in deeds done by the nation at large, as the freeing of the slaves. Much of a republican's virtue is held in the whole. A republican, besides his own goodness, has part of that of the American people.

The democrat is more bigoted, the republican more liberal. The democrat thinks for himself alone, and there is not that compromise necessary in his opinions that there is where men are averaged in a general opinion, as in the equality of republicanism. The democrat is, accordingly, intolerant; while the republican is tolerant. Democracy has much of the exclusiveness of a select class which it so long fostered in the South.

The republicans delighting in a great country, and the democrats in a free country, the republicans are apt to boast, while the democrats are apt to complain. The former think of the future and their better condition in prospect; the latter think of the past and their irksomeness under actual restraints. The former have great hope, the latter almost despair. The republicans have unlimited confidence in one form of government, and are more patriotic; the democrats are ever foreboding danger, and making unfavorable comparisons with the European monarchies. The republicans anticipate progress, the democrats anticipate degeneracy.

AUSTIN BIERBOWER.

THE CURATE OF CUCUGNAN.

Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Alphonse Daudet.

The Abbé Martin was Curate of Cucugnan. Kind-hearted, good as gold, he had a father's love for his Cucugnais; if they had given him a little more satisfaction, Cucugnan would have been to him a paradise on earth. But alas! spiders spun their webs in his confessional, and on Easter Sunday the holy bread remained untouched in the sacred vase. The good priest's heart was tortured, and he prayed God continually that he might not die before bringing back to the fold his whole flock.

Now you shall see that his prayers were heard. One Sunday, after reading the gospel, Monsieur Martin ascended the pulpit.

"My brethren," said he, "believe me if you will: the other night I found myself—I, a miserable sinner—at the gates of paradise. I knocked; Saint Peter opened the door.

"Ah! it is you, my good Monsieur Martin," said he; "what can I do for you?"

"Good Saint Peter, you who keep the Book and the Key, tell me (if I am not too curious) how many Cucugnais you have in paradise?"

"I can refuse you nothing, Monsieur Martin; be seated—we will see."

"And Saint Peter took his big book, opened it, and put on his spectacles:

"Let us see: Cucugnan, did you say? Cu—cu—Cucugnan. Here we are. Cucugnan. My dear Monsieur Martin, the page is quite white. Not a soul—no more Cucugnais here than there are fish-bones in a turkey."

"What! None here from Cucugnan? Not one? Impossible! Look again, please."

"Nobody, reverend sir. Look for yourself, if you think I am jesting."

"And I, miserable I! with clasped hands, cried for pardon. Then said Saint Peter:

"My dear Monsieur Martin, don't put yourself in such a state; it may do you harm. After all, it is not your fault. Don't you see, your Cucugnais must doubtless endure their short quarantine in purgatory."

"Ah! for pity's sake, great Saint Peter! let me at least see them—see and console them."

"Willingly, my friend. Here, quick, put on these sandals, for the roads are not good. There, that's right. Now go on straight before you, always straight ahead. Do you see way down there where the road turns? You will find a silver door, at your right hand, ornamented with black crosses. Knock, and they will open to you. Adieu! Take care of yourself, and keep a stout heart."

"And I went on and on. What a path! I tremble to think of it. A narrow way, full of brambles, shining black beetles, and hissing serpents, led me to the silver door.

"Who knocks?" said a hoarse voice.

"The Curate of Cucugnan."

"Of what?"

"Of Cucugnan."

"Ah! Come in."

"I entered. A tall, beautiful angel, with wings dark as night, with garments shining as the day, and with a diamond key hanging from his belt, was writing in a large book—larger than Saint Peter's.

"Well, what do you want and what do you ask for?" said the angel.

"Beautiful angel of God, I want to know—I am very curious, perhaps—but have you any Cucugnais here?"

"Any?"

"Any Cucugnais; any people from Cucugnan. I am their pastor."

"Ah! Father Martin, is it not?"

"At your service, Sir Angel."

"You say Cucugnan?"

"And the angel opens his big book, wetting his finger to turn the leaves.

"Cucugnan," said he, heaving a long sigh; "Monsieur Martin, we've no one in purgatory from Cucugnan."

"Heavens! no one here from Cucugnan? Great heavens! Where are they then?"

"Ah! holy man, they are in paradise. Where the devil do you suppose they are?"

"But I've just come from paradise."

"You've just come from there! Well?"

"Well, they are not there! Ah! good mother of angels!"

"What could you expect, my dear sir? if they are neither in paradise nor in purgatory, there is no help for it, they are —"

"Holy cross! is it possible? Can it be that Saint Peter has told me a falsehood? However, I have not heard the cock crow! Ah! poor me! How can I go to paradise, if my Cucugnais are not there?"

"Listen, my poor Monsieur Martin, since you are determined, cost what it may, to be sure of all this and to see with your own eyes, take this path, go straight ahead, running if you know how to run. Once there, you will know all. 'Tis the hand of God."

"And the angel shut the door.

"It was a long path, strewn with red-hot coals. I reeled like a drunkard; stumbled at each step; I was dripping with perspiration, and panting with thirst. But, thanks to the sandals which good Saint Peter had lent me, I did not burn my feet. After much stumbling and tribulation, I saw at my left hand a door—no, a portal, an enormous portal, wide open, like the mouth of a great oven. Oh! my children, what a spectacle! No one asks your name there—no register—they go in just as you, my brethren, go into the tavern on Sundays.

"Great beads of perspiration stood on my brow, and yet I shivered with cold. My hair stood on end. The air had a burned smell, like roasted flesh—somewhat like the odor spread about in our Cucugnan, when Eloy, the blacksmith, burns the hoof of an old donkey, in order to shoe it. I lost my breath in the sickening, stifling atmosphere. I could hear a horrible clamor of sighs, howls, and groans.

"A horned demon called out: 'Are you coming in, you?' at the same time giving me a prick with his pitchfork.

"I? I am not coming in. I am one of God's people!"

"You are one of God's people? Then what do you want here?"

"I come—ah! don't speak to me, I can scarcely stand—I come—I come from a distance—humbly to ask you—if—if by chance—you might not have here—anybody—anybody from Cucugnan?"

"Ah! fire of God! why make yourself out such a fool, as if you did not know that all Cucugnan is here. Here, you blackbird, look and see how we treat your famous Cucugnais!"

"And I saw, in the midst of a frightful whirlpool of flames, Long Coq-Galine—you all knew him, my brethren—Coq-Galine, who got drunk so often, and beat his poor Clairon. I saw Catarinet—that little vagabond, with her nose in the air—you remember her well enough. But let that pass—I've said enough. I saw Pascal Doigt-de-Paix, who used to make his oil with the olives of M. Julien. I saw Babet the gleaner, who, in order to have her own sheaf made up quickly, took here and there a handful from other gleaners. I saw Maître Crapasi, who oiled the wheel of his barrow so well; and Dauphine, who sold his well-water so dear; and Tortillard, who, when he met me carrying the host, went on his way, removing neither cap nor pipe, as though he had met a dog; and I saw Coulan, with his Zette, and Jacques, and Pierre, and Toni."

White with fear, the audience groaned, as they recognized—this one a father, that one a mother, brother, or sister.

"You see, my brethren," continued the curate, "you see, this can not continue. I have charge of your souls, and I must, I will save you from the abyss into which you are about to fall headlong. To-morrow I shall begin the work, no later than to-morrow; and there'll be no lack of work. This is how I shall perform it. To be well done, all must be done in order. We'll proceed in rows, as they do at Jonquières when they dance. To-morrow, Monday, I will confess the old men and women. That won't be much. Tuesday, the children. I shall soon get through with them. Wednesday, the young men and women. That may be a long affair. Thursday, the men. We will cut them short. Friday, the women. I'll say: 'No wandering from the subject.' Saturday, the miller—a whole day is not too much for him alone. And if by Sunday we have finished, we'll have reason to be thankful."

"You see, my children, when the wheat is ripe it must be cut; when the wine is drawn, it must be drunk. We've dirty linen enough—the question now is to wash it, and may it be well washed. C'est la grâce que je vous souhaite. Amen."

What was said was done. They worked hard. Ever since that memorable Sunday the air is perfumed for ten leagues around by the virtues of Cucugnan.

And the good pastor, Monsieur Martin, dreamed the other night that he was climbing the starry way to the city of God, followed by his whole flock, in a splendid procession, surrounded by lighted candles, clouds of incense, and choir-boys chanting the Te Deum.

So ends the story of the Curate of Cucugnan.

MRS. H. M. HITCHCOCK.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880.

It is indubitable that the girl's ideal marriage has of late years greatly changed; and the change has been produced in part by what she sees, and in part by what she reads.

We entertain no doubt that the female novelists who have followed in the wake of the late George Lawrence have materially modified the ideal of a suitable lover as entertained by many of their sex. Ouida, Miss Broughton, Miss Annie Thomas, and others have accustomed them to ferocious lovers—but we will not waste our time in repeating a description of the physical peculiarities of the Adonis of the period, according to the standard of the female three-volume novel. Everybody knows the sort of hero—half Ajax, half Paris—of their monotonous pages. Grown-up people may smile at such absurdities, but girls are very impressionable, and when once they have adopted an ideal it is not easy to expel it from their minds. The person hardly exists in real life; the nearest approach to it being any and every unprincipled man who is prepared to make "fierce love" to any fool he meets. Obviously this is not a condition of things favorable to marriage, for while it makes girls more prompt, and indeed, eager, to flirt, it indisposes them to appreciate attentions of a more delicate and more practical kind. So much for the change produced in the ideals of women by what they read. The transformation is completed by what they see. While silly novels tell them that a lover, to be worth anything, must rail against heaven and bite the grass with his teeth, the whole arrangements of society keep daily telling them that a husband is no good at all unless he has a great deal of money.

Young Fred, a bashful yet persistent swain, was very much in love with Mary Jane. One night she told him, in her tenderest tone, "It is not good for man to be alone." Said Fred: "Just so, you darling little elf; I've often thought of that same thing myself." Then said the lass, while Fred was all agog, "You ought to buy yourself a terrier-dog."

The first Chinaman who went to Atlanta, Georgia, to settle, met with a rousing reception. Twelve colored washerwomen chased him out of town with broomsticks and mop-handles, and their hubbies threaten to "shute him, suah," if he ever comes out of the swamp.

The man who wishes to break off the habit of smoking should postpone the lighting of his first cigar five minutes each day. In this way the hour for beginning to smoke will be gradually put off until after he has gone to bed and got to sleep.

Lives of grocery-men remind us
They can make their starch half lime,
And with sugar wholly blind us,
Putting sand in all the time.

Greek brigands are modest, excessively modest, in fact. They only ask $75,000 ransom for a young wife, and thousands of husbands never skirmish around to pick up even that much money.

Club life is increasing in popularity in Chicago, and all the clubs of the city are reported to be in a flourishing condition.

THE SISTERS OF ST. JOSEPH.

In a recent journey to Tucson, the writer visited the novitiates' convent of the Sisters of St. Joseph. It lies across the Valley of the Santa Cruz. The building—a spacious adobe—is enclosed by an adobe wall; and if you get upon the top of the wall you may look over the adjoining country. The convent is one-story, and has attached to it what will be in time a beautiful garden. In company with an old resident of the country and a friend of the lady nuns, I rang the convent bell; and oh! such a pretty girl came to the convent door—such great, charming, swimming, black, and gorgeous eyes, such a complexion of rose and lily, such a form, such an everything that goes to the make-up of a splendid woman! And in a year she will take the black veil; she will close the convent door between herself and the world; she will become the bride of Christ, and her duties will be to attend the sick and relieve the distressed; she becomes a soldier, subject to orders; she will renounce the world and consecrate herself to doing good, till gathered in by the black reaper; the convent bell shall toll her requiem, and solemn sisters in black chant her funeral dirge, and over her worn-out, mouldering form a plain marble slab will bear, not the name her mother bore, but the one she took at enlistment and put upon the roll-call of her service.

Inside the convent I met the courteous, cheerful welcome of an elder and a younger sister. Their novitiate had passed. They had taken upon themselves the vows, and seized the handle of the plow, from whence they may not look back, except with sin. Intelligent, gifted, beautiful women, away out her in the wilderness. Slowly growing up beside this convent, stone by stone, as fast as funds come in, there is being built a hospital for the sick. And in that hospital, worn and weary and dying, some of the adventurous, driving, prosperous business men and miners, adventurers, and prospectors, whom we found in the country buoyant with life and hope and health, will lay themselves down to die, and these good women will tend them with a mother's care and a sister's love. The lady superior, Sister Teresa, I did not see.

I do not love Catholic priests over much (this is not personal to Bishop Salpointe or Father Antonio); monks who shave their heads, wear sandals, and ropes around their waists; who consecrate themselves to God, and pray and sleep in the selfish desire to save their own souls, I do not love at all. I fancy they are lousy, and I know they take snuff; they are idle, and beg. I have seen them in Spain and Italy, and have always had a strong and almost unconquerable desire to kick them. But for the working sisters of the Catholic Church I have respect. They must, I think, be good women, for "they go about doing good." We never hear anything bad of them. Scandal attaches not to them; they are not selfish or mercenary; and if they are somewhat superstitious, they relieve the suffering, they minister to the sick, they feed the hungry, they clothe the naked, and they do all those things which distinguish the truly pious and devout. I recognize their virtues, their bravery in confronting death when the fiend of the epidemic rages; their self-denial, their industry, their womanly goodness. There is no danger that I shall make the pretty sister of the convent gate vain by this notice, nor the other sisters by reciting my admiration of their virtues, for they never will see the Argonaut; it is not a good convent paper, and has no circulation in pious cloisters; besides, when I offered to send it donative to the Convent of St. Joseph, the good sisters, with gentle smiles and in tones of sweetest sweetness, thanked me no. They did not care to have any newspapers. They had never heard of the Argonaut, nor even the Monitor. The last news the sisters had heard was the murder of Father D'Arbo and the priests of St. Sulpice, by the Commune in Paris. They never see a newspaper, and yet are happy. It must be a luxury to live where there are none. I sometimes wish I was a nun, shut out from newspapers and politics, with a faith that has strength enough to trust in God.

The following sentiment doubtless has an application here—though possibly not among our "best people." In the vicissitudes of life many excellent people, through no fault of their own, find themselves occupying a lower social position than the one to which they were born, and are sometimes looked down upon by foolish people who have slowly ascended to a worldly eminence which they do not grace. In illustration of this the following story may not be without point or interest. A lady of culture and refinement, whose husband had dishonored himself, but not her, found herself reduced to the position of a saleswoman in a retail store; and while she was attending to her new duties one day, a former neighbor entered. The last mentioned did not recognize the first by word or motion, although she bought of her old acquaintance quite a large bill of goods. As she turned from the counter to go out, however, she said: "Send the goods to the house this afternoon." The polite but significant answer to this piece of impertinence was: "Excuse me, madam, but I know neither your name nor address; will you please give it to me?"

Rufus Hatch ought to look out for his tenor singers. At Christ Church, New York, on Easter Sunday, the clergyman announced that the offertory would be applied to reducing the debt on the church. During the singing of the music, while the collection was being taken up, the tenor, who was a German, had a solo, in which occurred the words, "And the dead shall be raised." He succeeded in electrifying the congregation by giving out at the top of his voice, "Und ze debt shall be raised in ze twinging ov an eye."

A Maine man, who didn't care two shakes of a lamb's tail about the newspapers, rode fourteen miles through a fierce snow-storm to get a copy of a weekly that spoke of him as a "prominent citizen."

Eugenie's necklace—pearls the size of marrowfat peas, emeralds till you can't sleep, and no end of diamonds—is for sale. Here is a chance for some Leadville chap to give his girl a neat present.

As soon as a man gets perfectly familiar with his name he writes it so nobody can possibly read it.

AN OPEN LETTER.

To the Members of the Charter Convention of San Francisco.

GENTLEMEN: This memorial respectfully shows that the "Consolidation Act," under which this city has been governed for twenty-three years, is a solecism among American institutions, inconsistent in principle with the new State Constitution, is weak, exceedingly complicated, and expensive, and is for these reasons unfit to be taken as a basis for a new charter.

First—It is a solecism among American institutions because it has almost entirely deprived the people of the right of local self-government, and because it has not only failed to preserve the fundamental separation of the three powers of government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial—but has mixed up these powers in a most incongruous and peculiar manner. Remembering the circumstances under which it was drawn up by that somewhat morbid and pessimistic thinker, the late Horace Hawes, it is evident that its fundamental principle was that nobody was to be trusted to do anything. The people of the city, especially after the five years of corruption preceding the Vigilance Committee of 1856, were, in Hawes's opinion, unfit for self-government. Any Mayor they might elect would necessarily abuse his power, so he left that officer without any power to abuse. In fact, he is neither pilot nor master, but only the man in the chains who heaves the lead. Any Board of Supervisors must necessarily form rings, and legislate for private instead of public interests; therefore the legislative power was almost wholly relegated to Sacramento, where the city delegation could sell out their constituents away from home observation and criticism, while the Supervisors were enabled to get even by juggling out contracts among their friends at home. And so the indexes of our State laws show, since 1860, not less than twelve hundred topics on which the State Legislature has made laws on the strictly local affairs of San Francisco; while the city's charter authorizes the Supervisors merely to complete the gaps due to legislative lack of omniscience by prescribing such police regulations as how dogs are to be killed, licenses collected, and garbage disposed of. But to compensate for the lack of legislative power, the supreme executive function is granted, not to the Mayor, but to the Finance Committee of the Board of Supervisors. The remainder of that function is scattered among a dozen different officials, who are not responsible to any common head, and whose powers sometimes conflict one with another. The Mayor is a mere ornament, with no more power in nearly all matters pertaining to the execution of ordinances than any other citizen has, viz., of complaining to the courts of the dereliction of officers—a duty which is also confided to the Finance Committee of the Board. The Mayor, indeed, has his veto, as usual, but he has no command over the police force, no control over the Chief of Police, the Fire Department, the Street Commissioner, the Boards of Health or of Education, or the Treasury; nor can he be held responsible for his administration when really he has very little to administer, even in the preservation of the peace.

Again, the executive duties of Police Commissioner were by the charter assigned to the judiciary in the person of the Police Judge, and the executive task of counting the city's cash to the County Judge. Judicial functions were devolved upon the County Clerk in deciding upon applications for enrollment of voters and the issuance of certificates of citizenship. According to a decision of Judge Dwinelle in the Spring Valley case, some three years ago, the Board of Supervisors are vested with judicial functions in the duty of auditing demands against the city, and this, to a degree, rendering the office of Auditor merely clerical in effect. The Boards of Health and Education, like the Board of Supervisors, are each both executive and legislative in their structure, there being no check upon their acts, except where the expenditure of money is concerned, and not always then.

Again, the lines where the State government ends and the city government begins are almost obliterated; for the appointment of officers and commissioners, their duties, their accountability, the mode of paying their salaries, etc., are so completely mixed up that a long and careful study of twenty-three years' legislation is required in order to trace the source of power, the duties and functions of each officer. The McClure Charter is open to the same criticism on this point. Now the adoption of the new Constitution has settled the right of the people of cities, counties, and towns to local self-government (Art. XI., Sec. 6, and Art. IV., Sec. 25), and has therefore knocked the bottom out of the main principle of the present charter—that the State shall do the legislation for the city. The new Constitution has also reaffirmed the old American principle of the total separation of the three powers of government (Art. III., Sec. 1), and though that section limits this separation to the State government, can any better assignment of powers be now devised, after a century of experience in favor of the old principle?

Second—But I have said that the present charter is weak. This weakness has been evident enough in the legislative department, where it has been deemed necessary so to tie up the hands of the Supervisors that an enabling act had to be passed by the Legislature before any action out of the usual routine could be had, be the emergency never so pressing. But it has been preëminently apparent in the executive department. Says "Publius," in No. LXIX. of the Federalist:

"Energy in the executive is a leading character in the definition of good government. It is essential to the steady administration of the laws, to the protection of property against those irregular and high-handed combinations which sometimes interrupt the ordinary course of justice, to the security of liberty against the assaults of ambition, of faction, and of anarchy. . . . A feeble executive implies a feeble execution of the government. A feeble execution is but another phrase for a bad execution; and a government ill executed, whatever it may be in theory, must be in practice a bad government. . . . But one of the weightiest objections to a plurality in the executive is that it tends to conceal faults and destroy responsibility."

No one who has been brought into close contact with our circumlocution offices in the City Hall can fail to perceive how our hydra-headed executive has for years past found out "how not to do it," and, like the cuttle-fish, escapes detection and conviction in the black cloud of uncertainty emanated from its own organism. Take a few examples: The Board of Supervisors has long ago enacted ordinances forbidding bill-posting or advertisement-painting on walls, fences, etc., without the consent of the owner; limiting the loads of drays and trucks to five tons, and requiring five-inch tires to such vehicles; forbidding the washing of vehicles during the hours of daylight in the public streets, or wheeled vehicles to be left in the street more than one hour of daylight when not in use; requiring all horses to be hitched, and all drays to have their wheels locked while standing in the streets; all horses found unhitched to be forthwith taken to the pound; forbidding public mendicancy, and the public exhibition of deformity or monstrosity, and sending all beggars and cripples to jail or to the almshouse; prohibiting houses of ill-fame, and visiting the same; prohibiting lotteries, raffles, and gambling; the obstruction of street railroads and their cars; depositing refuse in the streets; assemblages of more than three persons under twenty-one years of age on the streets after eight o'clock P. M.; the obstruction of streets or sidewalks with goods or other material more than one hour at a time; preventing contractors using more than one-third the width of a street while erecting buildings; requiring hitching-posts to be erected in front of every building; and prescribing in detail how buildings within the fire-limits shall be constructed.

Now, how many of these ordinances have been enforced? Nay, has there ever been any systematic attempt to enforce any of them? Is not every one of them violated daily with perfect impunity?—some of them by all classes of people? If the cause of this negligence be investigated, we shall find it in the division of the executive power between the Mayor, the Chief of Police, the Street Commissioner, the Fire Wardens, and the Finance Committee of the Board of Supervisors, none of whom appoints the other, or is responsible for his acts or neglects, and none of whose duties in the premises are sufficiently defined by law to fix responsibility upon him or them only. In fact, there is no automatic action of any executive power, the motive to all movement being newspaper clamor (as in the case of raids on gambling-houses), or the complaint of an aggrieved citizen. But as most citizens are unwilling to incur the trouble and personal hostility consequent upon filing a complaint against a neighbor, the motive is seldom supplied. Hence the non-execution of the ordinances, except spasmodically under the lash of the press or the stimulus of neighborhood quarrels.

Again, in what well-governed city would Kearney and his associates have been allowed, for more than two years, to utter publicly and on the Sabbath their weekly tirades of obscenity and sedition? Is it necessary to remind any thoughtful citizen that, under a strong city government, the legislative body would have promptly enacted and the executive would have at once enforced ordinances saving the city from the untold loss, depreciation of property, withdrawal of capital, enforced idleness of operatives, and contumely abroad, all due to the unheard-of toleration for so long a time of that most insufferable of nuisances?

Another element of weakness in the present charter, likewise in the McClure Charter, is the multitude of elective offices. To begin with, it is utterly impossible, when fifty to seventy names are presented on one ticket, for anything like due discrimination to be used, either in nominating or voting for candidates. Hence, many good citizens, knowing nothing of the persons nominated, do not vote at all, for if they do, how do they know they will not injure the community instead of benefiting it? So, therefore, unfit men are always elected to some of the offices, however wise may be the selection of a few prominent names. Thus, for twenty years after 1856, there was no difficulty in securing a good citizen for Mayor, though our people did not seem to be aware that their solicitude about that office was due to its traditional importance in other cities, rather than to its actual impotence under our peculiar charter. We have had such men as Burr, Teschemacher, Selby, Otis, and Alvord in that office, but to what good, with its powers merely nominal and its patronage nothing? And against these, how many unfit men have we elected to the minor offices in the city government? If at future elections only the Mayor, the two Boards of Councilmen, and the Judges were to be chosen, it being enacted that all other officers were to be filled by appointment of the Mayor, by and with the advice and consent of the Upper House of the Council, does it not stand to reason that far better nominations would be made; and if so made, the voters would nearly all turn out to secure their election? And if it were enacted in the charter that all appointed officers were liable to be removed summarily by the Mayor for any cause other than political, either with or without the concurrence of the Upper House of the Council, would not the responsibility of such officers be vastly increased over the present system, which requires a long and tedious process of litigation in the courts to remove a dishonest incumbent?

Now Secs. 4356 et seq. of the Political Code of this State sketch the outlines of a frame of city government that are well worthy of a prominent place in the discussions of your honorable body. Sec. 4356 provides that:

"Every city has legislative, executive, and judicial power. Its legislative power is vested in a Common Council, its executive power in a Mayor and his subordinate officers, and its judicial power in a police court."

Sec. 4386 gives the Mayor

"Power to nominate, and with the consent of the Common Council to appoint all non-elective officers of the city provided for by the Common Council, including Assessor, Collector of Revenue, City Attorney, Secretary of the Council and City Treasurer; also to suspend, and with the consent of the Common Council remove any non-elected officer, stating in the suspension or removal the cause thereof; also to cause the ordinances of the city to be executed, and to supervise the discharge of official duty by all subordinate officers," etc.

In the powers granted to the Council we find here a full and free charter to legislate on local matters, restricted only by the general inhibition "to make by-laws and ordinances not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States or of this State." The new Constitution also embodies this last idea, in restricting the State Legislature from all future meddling in the local affairs of cities, counties, and towns. (Art. IV., Sec. 25.) It also provides that Sheriffs, as well as nearly if not quite all the officers of municipal corporations, may be "appointed or elected." Why not take advantage of these sanctions in that instrument to make a change in our time-honored but most faulty system by substituting appointment for election in all the minor offices provided in the new charter?

Supposing, then, that only the Mayor, the Common Council, and the Judges are elected, and all other officers be appointed by the Mayor, with the consent of the Upper House of the Council, why not follow the provisions of the Federal Constitution and laws in making the heads of departments members of the Mayor's Cabinet, by whose advice he should be required to act? The need of a Board of Public Works has been heretofore vigorously agitated. Why should not the Mayor, Street Commissioner, City Engineer, City Attorney, and Auditor constitute such a Board, to which should be committed the charge of all the city property, the park, City Hall, school-houses and sites, the public squares, streets, sewers, etc.? Ah! all the present Commissions, or let the Commissioners be appointed by the Mayor and report to him, as a department of the Board of Public Works. Let the Board project new works when required, and submit their suggestions, with estimates of cost, to the Council, whose appropriation for the expense must precede the execution. All contracts should be let by the Board of Public Works. Separate the present functions of the Board of Education (who especially should be appointed, not elected), so as to confine their labors wholly to the intellectual and moral government of the schools, and the examination and appointment of teachers. Leave the Board of Public Works to build and repair the school-houses, on special appropriations to be made by the Council.

The Police Commissioners and Chief of Police should be appointed, just as army officers are by the President of the United States; and, like the President, the Mayor should be commander-in-chief of the armed force of the city—at least of the police. The Fire Commissioners should likewise be appointed. The Mayor should hold his office for four years, should have a salary of $10,000 per annum, and should be forbidden to serve in any other public capacity while in that office. He should, of course, be liable to impeachment for any malfeasance in office.

I have no desire to push these general suggestions into all their details, nor to forestall the entire work of so able a body as your own, as was attempted by one or two ambitious framers of State constitutions not elected to perform that duty. All I wish to urge now, before your work has been mapped out, is the error of taking the present charter for its basis, and of awaiting criticism until so late a period that it will be useless so far as fundamental principles are concerned. Our recent experience in the State Constitution shows that the mass of voters will not be deterred from affirming a new charter by its faults, but will vote for anything, however vicious, that secures a change from the existing order of things. Believing that a strong executive is the crying need in our city government, and far more necessary in the metropolis—where the unruly element always congregates and conspires—than in the autonomy of the State; believing that the city government should be so strong, so compact, yet elastic, as to put an end forever to the necessity for organizations of citizens to enforce law and order; and confident that by a wise incorporation of the above suggestions into the charter a better selection of officers, a more thorough system of checks and guards, more simplicity, more distinct responsibility, better discipline, far better protection of life, liberty, and property, a more efficient school system, and greater economy in the city's expenditures, will result, than the present charter has ever secured to our people, I respectfully submit these thoughts to your consideration. A PIONEER.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 15, 1880.

The Inner Man.

"No one can be wise on an empty stomach."—GEORGE ELIOT.

The following clever travesty of one of Scott's best-known passages comes at first hand from a rural correspondent—who knows whereof she writes:

Breathes there a man with soul so dead
He loves not new-baked gingerbread?
Who, stepping through the kitchen door,
On baking-day, sees goodly store
Of fragrant, unmer-shadowed cake,
And—half-unconscious—does not break
A ragged chunk? Ah, toothsome bliss!
He is a churl who knows not this.
For him, no practiced dexter twist
Shall limp, incipient doughnuts twist;
Or stir, to coax his gourmand taste,
Dreamy meringue and flaky paste.
Though he may live on Nob Hill's tip,
And boid his gold with miser's grip—
Though he may own the whole long list
Of vintner's hoard, by cobwebs kissed—
May dine from Sévres, drive a "cart,"
And sit on "decorative art"—
Despite his gastronomic books,
Despite his white-capped Gallic cooks,
The wretch, concentrated in his pride,
Shall live and eat—unsatisfied.
And when kind Providence—or gout—
Shall snuff his farthing rushlight out,
The stern recorder of the skies
Against the tombstone's gilded lies
(Counting the virtues of the dead)
Shall write: "He loved not ginger-bread!"

CXXV.—Sunday, April 18.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Vegetable Soup.
Stewed Trout.
Brains with White Sauce, served in Paper Cases.
Green Peas, Broiled Tomatoes.
Roast Veal, New Potatoes.
Salad à la Russe.
Banana Ice Cream, Cakes, Fruits, Almonds, and Raisins.

To STEW TROUT OR ROCK COD.—Rub the fish with salt, black pepper, and a little cayenne on the inside; put it in an oval stew-pan. To a fish that weighs three pounds, put half a pint of water; when it is about half done season well with salt, pepper, and a little mace; rub two ounces of butter in a large tablespoonful of flour, with a little parsley and thyme; stir in this fishy California or canned oysters. Serve with the gravy in the dish. White wine may be used instead of water. It requires about forty minutes to cook.

To MAKE SALAD A LA Russe.—One boiled carrot, one boiled turnip, two boiled potatoes, one-third of a head of fresh celery, one boiled beet, four olives, four anchovies, yolk of one egg, one tablespoonful of vinegar, one tablespoonful of Tanagen vinegar, one teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of black, and a little cayenne, pepper. Put the yolk of the egg in a bowl, drop upon it olive oil drop by drop, beating to a cream as the oil is poured in. Stir in the vinegar and the Tanagen vinegar, and season with the pepper and salt. Cut the carrot, turnip, potato, and celery into small dice, arrange these in pyramidal form upon a flat platter, and pour over this the mayonnaise dressing. Cut the boiled beet with a round vegetable cutter, and place the pieces around the dish, lapping one over the other. At each corner place one of the olives, around each of which must be twisted one of the anchovies.

AN UNCOMMON VISITOR.

A Tale of the Unreal and the Unideal.

Reading my Bulletin I naturally fell asleep, the paper on my lap. When I woke a shiver was playing at pitch-and-toss with my bones, as if I were the skeleton of an Arctic discoverer. The fire in my grate had burned itself to death, and the Bulletin, with the news all read off it, could not keep my legs warm. My lamp was burning with a steady, mechanical evenness and studied regularity, determined to do its exact duty and decline all responsibility for what was about to occur. My dog on the hearth-rug embraced his nose with his paws, as if he loved it, but kept his eyes resolutely shut, although it was easy to see that he was wide awake and apprehensive, for his muscles twitched uneasily and his tail had thoughtfully taken cover beneath him as he lay. The very shadows on the walls appeared to have assumed attitudes of expectation and terror. I felt that at the lifting of a finger or the creak of a chair they would be off. It was plain enough that something was about to happen.

There suddenly appeared between me and a broad space of papered wall the delicate outline of a human figure—a man's form, traced, apparently, in the air. The diaphanous texture of this aerial silhouette was shown by the barely perceptible obscuring of the figures on the wall-paper behind it. It had a watery consistency like that of a diluted moonbeam that has percolated through a jelly-fish. You must imagine a man from whom, and from whose clothing, all the solids and coloring matter have been extracted, leaving only the colorless fluids. Altogether, this was a most uncommon person. I did not consciously observe at the time, but remembered, later, that something in the vague outlines of this apparition suggested the Irish nationality, an age somewhere between thirty and forty, the profession of a bar-keeper, and a residence in San Francisco. The thing was beardless.

"Good-evening," I said, without rising. "You appear to have grown thin; I hope you are well."

"I am thin, that's a fact," was the reply, in faint, far-away, and altogether unreal tones—the very disembodied ghost of speech; "but that story about me is a good deal thinner than I am. Oh, incalculably thinner!" And this pellucid phantom laughed like a loon practicing ventriloquism in a distant marsh.

"What is the story, Mr. —? I beg your pardon: your face is familiar, but I can't remember names."

"Oh, no matter," it replied, with indifference.

"Of course," said I, reflectively, "of course a story is no matter; and, when it comes to that, you are none yourself, apparently. But what did I understand you to say your name was?"

"There has been a good deal of talk about my name lately—more talk than you would hear at a Methodist camp-meeting. I was never so famous before in all my life, and I've lived a longish time for a feller that has exposed himself as much as I have. In the last week or two I've been in the halls of legislation, and in the newspapers, and on people's tongues, until I'm just delighted, I am!"

This transparent and insubstantial figure—this preposterously attenuated simulacrum of a human form—was actually dancing with gratified vanity. It leaped into the air, glided across the pictures on the wall, skipped about the room, fading out of sight in one place and becoming visible at another, and finally, in the exuberance of its glee, passed from one side of the table to the other without leaping, stooping, or going round.

I got mad. I swore all the oaths I knew, and made many valuable additions to the vocabulary of malediction. Some of the oaths I then invented and set going are so sweet upon the tongue that they will live as long as the language. Others have to be diluted with ten times their quantity of prayer before they can safely be sworn: they would corrode the teeth; they would lift off the top of the head; the recoil would double up the swearer like a nut-cracker. Contemplating myself now as the source of that broad river of profanity, I am amazed at my capacity and proud of my versatility. My visitor was not visibly affected, however, and when I had run dry—when, in calling him a "wholly ghosted miraele," I had, as it were, discharged the farewell shot in my locker, the rascal had seated himself in a chair, and was thoughtfully passing his intangible limbs through the back and arms of it.

"Excuse me," he said, "but when I meet a man like you, who doesn't appear to love me any, it is a consolation to reflect that the girl in the song cares for me, me, and I care for her. She is not set against me by the fact that whenever there is a fatal railway accident I am to blame. Perhaps she compassionates me because of my wounds, for in nearly every duel I am hurt. You find these pretty hard riddles, I guess, don't you—you don't seem to get the hang o' what I'm saying, maybe. Well, as the proverb hath it, what is everybody's business is my business, so I'll just explain. Listen. I am the man that tried to bribe Senator Kane."

I had fallen half-asleep under his enigmas of speech, but at this startling revelation I unclosed my eyes and fixed them full upon him as he sat smirking. I saw—Nobody. That was his name.

TILL EULENSPIEGLE.

SACRAMENTO, April 14, 1880.

Dr. Samuel Johnson was a dear lover of tea, and drank it freely. On a certain occasion he chanced to be taking tea in company where was present a woman who not only held the fragrant herb in holy horror, but who believed it to be poison. She sat near the doctor, and beheld him receive his sixth cup. She had borne it thus far in silence, but when she saw the good man about to empty another cup, after having drank five of them, she felt it her duty to speak, which she did, feelingly and emphatically:

"My dear Doctor Johnson, do you know what you are doing? Do you know that you are drinking poison? If you are given to that habit, you may be sure it is killing you."

The burly doctor looked at her, first in amazement and then quizzically, with the waiting cup suspended. With a reverent nod he replied:

"Madam, I thank you for your concern in my welfare, but on my account you need not be alarmed. I have been many, many years at this work, and if, as you say, it is killing me, it must be an easy death to die. Let me hope that your exit may be as vigorously healthful and as calmly placid!"

SOCIETY CORRESPONDENCE.

MY DEAR ARGONAUT:—On Saturday last, Mrs. Shillaber gave a dejeuner to Mrs. LeBreton, which was followed by a kettle-drum in the afternoon, from three to six. At the dejeuner all ages known to women were represented, from the stately dowager to the modest maiden. On the veranda at the rear of the house, opening upon the garden, were some small tables, accommodating four married ladies each. In the centre was the bride's table, at which were seated Mrs. LeBreton, Mrs. McKinstry, Mrs. Taylor, and Mrs. Hooker. In the parlor was a table, exquisitely adorned with a bed of rosebuds two feet wide, which extended its entire length, and hence denominated the "rose-bud table," a fanciful appellation, which applied to the flowers, but not to the maidens surrounding them, for to my discerning eye they presented more the appearance of last roses of summer than the first buds of spring. The ladies remained at table until three o'clock, when those invited to the kettle-drum began to assemble. The gentlemen were slow in making their appearance, and the arrival of each individual was hailed with visible demonstrations of joy. I felt no flutterings, however, though the hostess was kind enough to class me with the so-called rose-buds. One of the prettiest features of the afternoon entertainment was a large and exquisite tea-kettle, composed of violets and red-and-white carnations, which rested on a large drum, but not, as a spiteful contemporary suggests, the colossal one of the May Festival—that drum was indeed a terror, but the one of which I speak was the centre of a brilliant group of admiring ladies. The costumes, though very handsome, were many of them not de rigueur, as the ladies wore no bonnets, and on such occasions only that solicited by the hostess should appear without them. I hope this criticism will not be so distasteful to my own sex as my strictures upon the dress-coat in daylight proved to be to the lords of creation. Between five and six the entertainment came to a close. Tuesday evening, Mrs. Crocker gave a small reception in honor of the return of Colonel Crocker from his Eastern tour. The inauguration of Governor Perkins has given us a new crop of colonels, whom I do not doubt are capable of creating a greater havoc in the female heart than on "the tented field." To-day Mrs. Crocker gives a kettle-drum, to which I am going in my bonnet, and on the 27th a reception, from eight to eleven in the evening. Since my last, Colonel J. Henley Smith, with a company of fair recruits, has returned to our welcoming arms. I hope to meet them all at the Crocker reception. ADA VEN.

From Our Sacramento Correspondent.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—Another crowd; another swell dress affair; another rush for cabriages; another Governor's reception at the Pavilion! This time very much more select, very much less crowded, and very much more order prevailing throughout, very much less of the "fire-and-fall-back" business. The Pavilion lacks but one thing to make it a fine place in which to give a party, and that is a floor. One night as well canvas the sidewalk and try to dance on it as that old Pavilion floor. It's perfectly barbarous, and tires one more than a six-days' walking-match. The Governor shook hands cordially and patiently until dancing began. Grand march at ten P. M.; and such a bevy of bright eyes, smiling lips, beautiful toilets, some décolletée, and twinkling feet. What a rare panorama a ball-room is! Every face is sure to look pleasant, no matter what disagreeable thoughts it may mask. Every one is sure to be on his very prettiest behavior, and to have on the very best of dry-goods their several purses admit of. Every movement is grace, and every action polite. The music sounds, the lights flash, and it all goes whisking before your dazzled eyes; old, yet ever new. As to who were there, we can't begin to tell you. Imagine all the first, second, and third ton of Sac. (You know there are three classes of ton—the very wealthy, we suppose, come first; then the people in comfortable circumstances, who dress well and entertain moderately, second ton; then the third ton are the literary people, the people of more than moderate education, the artists, the musicians, the people who frequent libraries, the school-teachers, the professors—many whose dresses are turned, whose coats are shiny, but still reckoned quite ton.) This makes us remember an old school-day rhyme:

"First the worst, second the same,
Last the best of all the game!"

Friday our Legislature adjourns, and how are we going to exist in this dull burg without Braunhart, and Tyler, and Kane; with all the rest of those musical far-reaching voices stilled in our capitol's halls? What'll the newspapers do without the legislative column to publish? Where will the gushing youth, so deeply interested in the legislation of their State, congregate now? Unquestionably the capital will simply vegetate, not live, after this august body's departure. And before they leave, Mrs. Gallatin entertains, where many will probably attend. Mr. Chas. F. Houghton, who sought an Eastern bride, receives his friends April 14th, at the residence of his father, General Houghton, in Oakland. Afterward, we believe, the young couple make their home in Sacramento. BETSY AND I.

Buttercup Supposes a Case.

Suppose two children aged three, a boy and girl; both equally given to mud-pies and other infantile pursuits. They are sent to the same school until twelve; the girl, nine times out of ten, helping her brother through difficult exercises, and by her patience and perseverance attaining more general excellence in their mutual studies than he. At twelve they are separated, and educated according to the present prevailing systems. At eighteen the boy is expected to have attained tolerable proficiency in Latin and the rudiments of Greek; to speak and write English correctly; to be thoroughly grounded in the essentials of mathematics; to know something of history, and the elements of chemistry; and in acquiring these to have established the foundation for the study of a profession, to which he devotes the years from eighteen to twenty-five. The girl, in the meantime, has been learning much the same things, with the exception of Greek and Latin, replaced by French and German. At eighteen she is supposed to have finished her education, during the acquirement of which she is expected to have become a moderately proficient musician and an accomplished linguist; to have imbibed (how, I do not know) the principles of domestic economy; to have become a thoroughly efficient seamstress, and able to clothe herself, by the manipulations of her own deft fingers, with the glory of Solomon; to be able to serve with neatness and dispatch a dinner fit to please the palate of an epicure; to be, in at least a degree, accomplished in the arts of brush and pencil; to be a woman of the world in ease of manner and conversation, and to be posted on topics of daily occurrence. All this when she has scarcely reached the age when men and women begin to think. And by the time her brother has completed the course of his studies, and entered upon his first trial in the arena of professional life, she has become wife and mother, the managing head of a household. It is all wrong, this cramming of girls' brains, however strong, with too many indigestible and unsuitable stimulants. No boy is expected to be at the same time his own tailor and lawyer, hatter and physician, cook and doctor of divinity. Yet the impossible extremes in which women are expected to be perfected at the unripe age of twenty are quite as incongruous as any of these would be. I am tired of hearing the slurs and slights on woman's incompetency, and I would like to know one single young man whose brains would stand the strain of this unnatural system of educational forcing, and, with the distractions of society-ridden homes to retard them, would be as really brilliant as our ordinary girls.

BUTTERCUP.

The Californian for May contains seventeen articles, exclusive of the departments. Of the latter, the "Note Book" and "Science and Industry" appear for the first time. Perhaps the most readable paper in the number is a story entitled "The First Xerxes Loan Collection," written by Octave Thanet, whose recent paper in Lippincott's, touching the industrial condition of England, attracted such flattering attention East. One or two of the articles seem scarcely seasonable; but the number, as a whole, is clearly in the direction of progress.

How mad it would make a cannibal to go hunting and kill nothing but Alexander Stephens.

WHAT OUR GIRLS ARE DOING.

A young lady in North Carolina had an awfully romantic wedding. He loved and she loved, but the old man objected. They prepared to elope, and while the young man was waiting outside at night for her to dress, the old man saw him and shot him in the arm. The young girl didn't wait to dress, but slipped down stairs and ran away in her night-gown.

One of the inmates of the Boston Old Ladies' Home appealed to the matron with a complaint against her roommate. "She threatened to bite me," was the accusation. "Well, let her do it," was the reply of the matron. "She can't hurt you; she hasn't a tooth in her head."

A handkerchief has caused a deadly strife between two maidens in a Rochester factory. They worshiped the same idol—a beautiful young man with a dapper cane and a bright smile. One of them flourished a silk handkerchief bearing his initials in the other's face. It was enough. The jealous rival had taffy, ice-cream, and many delicate attentions, but no silk handkerchief. So she slapped her antagonist's face, and was in return banged just above the bang on her beautiful brow. Then there was a little hair-pulling, and one of the girls rushed to the police office and swore out a warrant. Before the ink was dry she rushed in again and withdrew the warrant, saying she did not want to get her name in the newspapers.

A young lady who read that "it is luck to pick up a horse-shoe," happened in a blacksmith-shop the other day and picked up one. The surprising suddenness and piercing shriek with which she dropped it showed that it was not lucky. The blacksmith had just made the shoe, and it was as hot as a blast furnace.

Mrs. Sackett, of Downsville, Delaware, got mad and slammed her door to, and a gun standing behind it fell to the floor, discharging its contents into her leg, and making a wound which necessitated amputation. Moral—Always shut a door softly, as though there were sickness in the family. Never get mad when the door is open. Look out for the gun when the bell rings.

A young Maine farmer married a highly-cultured Boston girl, who didn't know the first thing about housekeeping, but had devoted her life to the study of geology and mineralogy; and when he took her home, instead of attending to household duties, she went roaming about the farm with a sledge-hammer, and soon discovered on her hubby's land a gold mine worth forty thousand dollars.

A Vassar College girl writes to Puck as follows concerning the Presidential candidates:

VASSAR COLLEGE, April 2, 1880.

Sweet Puck: I will let you into a great secret. All of us girls, the other night, talked about the coming Presidential election; and you must know we decided on two such dear, dear candidates. They are Anna Dickinson, who will make a quite too awfully lovely President, because she is severe and so like a man; but our ideal Vice-President is darling Whitelaw Reid. He is such an elegant young gentleman, and delivers, oh, such beautiful poetical orations at Lotus Club dinners. I do think it a shame that we young ladies are not permitted to vote. I am quite sure we are more cultured than Tammany Hall politicians, who are allowed to vote so much. Lovingly yours,

MAMIE AUGUSTINE SMITH, Sophomore.

P. S.—I shall look out so anxiously for the next number of Puck, to see if you will print this letter. I half hope that you won't. The very thought puts me in a flutter. But if you do print it, please don't say anything unkind. I really couldn't bear that. M. A. S.

P. P. S.—Perhaps you had better send me the letter back. M. A. S.

P. P. P. S.—On second consideration, you can do as you like. M. A. S.

The Countess Panine, lady-in-waiting to the Empress of Russia, has been requested to resign and to travel abroad. She is of a romantic turn, and sometimes received guests of whose character she was not fully aware. Among these was a young student, who, warned that the police were about to search his rooms, fled to her house with his papers, and, being pursued to her room, hid the papers under her pillow. The police discovered them and arrested him.

According to London Truth, even the young ladies are becoming infected with the overcharged political atmosphere. One of its writers says: "I was detailed off the other evening to take a young lady down to dinner. During the soup, she favored me with her views on the Eastern question; as she consumed her fish, she settled the Afghan question; as she dallied with the entrées she exhaustively explained the land question, and at dessert she informed me that the dream of her youthful and virgin soul was to be the wife of Mr. Gladstone. I asked her whether she contemplated converting to her political views that eminent man in a series of certain lectures? 'No,' she answered, 'I want to marry him that I might punish him for all his wicked conduct by running away with Lord Beaconsfield.'"

"Has your husband shown any encouraging signs of growth in the fear of the Lord?" asked a clergyman of a New England woman as they shared a social cup of tea. "Well," said the woman, "I kinder think he has, for I lately noticed that he never goes out on the Lord's day without a shot-gun."

Mrs. Lincoln says Charles Sumner made matrimonial proposals to her not long after her husband's death; and Mr. Sumner is not alive to deny it.

A Leadville boarding-house keeper, a few days since, traded his wife to a cook in exchange for a mine. All the parties seem perfectly satisfied with the arrangement.

Adelina Patti is getting fat, and commenced growing a mustache. She has shaved the public enough, and now they advise her to tackle herself on opposition.

ABOUT WINES.

It is charged against Scotland that it is preëminently a nation of whisky-drinkers, and with a good foundation in truth. Any stranger visiting Edinburgh or Glasgow for a few days, especially if Sunday intervene, can hardly help being astonished at the universal consumption of that particular form of stimulant. Go where you will, to hotel or inn, mansion or cottage, the whisky is ever there present. The consumption is enormous. Yet a century and a half ago the Scotch people were equally remarkable for their consumption of the light red wines of France. When the wine-laden ships arrived, a thriving business was done by many a peddler of claret, who, after mounting his barrel on a sort of truck or wheelbarrow, disposed of its contents in the public streets, much in the way that milk is supplied at the present day. Looking back to that period, with the help of anecdotes and gossip, we may see the great-great grandmothers of the present race, jug in hand, providing a supply of the favorite stimulant for the requirements of the day or the week. Then, the disgusting drunkenness of the present time was all but unknown. Yet a change in the public policy of Great Britain soon put an end to their old-established habits of wine-drinking, and forced on the people the necessity of taking their stimulant in some form of malt spirit; and thus whisky became a power of evil in that land, as from the same cause did gin and beer in England.

One may ask, How and why? The policy of Great Britain at that period, was to cripple the commerce of France by all means in her power, especially in the direction of one of its greatest industries; and so the Methuen Treaty—now expired by effluxion of time—was made with Portugal, by which the French wines were excluded in view of the repressive nature of the tariff placed upon them, and the comparatively easy terms on which the wines of Portugal were admitted. These were both heavy and expensive; and thus port wine became the favorite luxury of the wealthy, while the middle and lower classes were thrown on their own resources to obtain a stimulant within their narrow means. Gin and rum soon took the place of cheap light wine side by side with beer and porter; and the effect continued to be deplorable, till, on the expiration of that treaty, Mr. Gladstone, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, effected the repeal of the sumptuary law which excluded the French produce. One consequence of this has been the rapid return of the English to the light, wholesome wines of the world. For, besides bread and flesh meat, the instinct of man leads him to seek for something that can, for a time at least, lighten the burden of care and intensify the sense of enjoyment of life; and, the world over, it is found in one form or another of alcohol.

Thirty years ago there was a loud outcry about the great evils which are said to arise from the use of ardent spirits among the European races settled in North America. After much discussion, these led to strenuous efforts by the benevolent to check the use of alcoholic drinks, and to the passing of the Maine State Liquor Law, for the purpose of effectually repressing it. But the statements of over-zealous champions of total abstinence have not been borne out by chemical and physiological researches. The present purpose, however, is not to write a dissertation on alcohols, as such, but to state some facts touching the most interesting and least harmful of beverages containing alcohol—wines, especially when pure and unsophisticated.

Pure wine, the fermented juice of the vine (vitis vinifera), is a very different thing from fruit syrup, or other beverages prepared from fruit. It is a very compound fluid. Among its principal constituents, such as are always present in it, are water, spirit of wine, tannic acid, tartaric acid, phosphoric acid, racemic acid, malic acid, sugar, an oxide of iron, and potash, with generally a trace of lime. These are the principal but by no means the only constituents of pure wine. The bouquet, as it is called, is a true æther, formed by the action of the acids on the alcohol in a nascent state, and the flavoring principle of the grape, from which each distinctive bouquet is derived. A glass of genuine wine contains a varying quantity, generally about one-fifth of its bulk or a little more, of proof-spirit, and four-fifths water, when not fortified.

This proof-spirit, however, in the case of wine, differs widely from so much distilled spirit and water in its action on the human system; for in wine it is not a mere mixture, but a combination, and it stands in chemical relations with the tannic and tartaric acids and the iron. Tannic acid is an astringent and tonic; while tartaric acid, combined with potash and iron, has its own beneficial action on the human economy. It is pretty evident, then, that pure wine must be gradually digested before it can enter into the general circulation; and from the above it appears more to resemble the nicely adjusted prescription of a physician than aught else. And we may justly consider it a prescription from the greatest of all physicians, intended not alone as a restorative or alterative of the deranged functions of the body, but one intended also to promote the well-being of the healthy frame.

So far concerning pure wine—not the hot, brandied stuff commonly supplied to northern countries, both the United States and England, with its absolute alcohol ranging from 18 to 25 per cent.—which alcohol, besides that produced naturally by fermentation, is not wine-spirit, but other, obtained either from grain, sugar, or beet-root. Moreover, this added spirit never completely becomes incorporated with the wine. Hence the headiness of fortified wines.

During the past few months a searching investigation into the foreign wines imported in bulk into this State has been going on, by a competent analyst of wines, who has devoted a considerable portion of a lifetime to this branch of science; and his report will, when published, throw much light on the character of the foreign produce.

This much is known already, that the ports are fortified to an unnecessary extent; that the sherries, with hardly an exception, are trade parcels, robbed of several of their natural good properties, sulphured, some seasoned with alum, and all fortified to a degree which ought to render them unfit for consumption except in the smallest quantities. It will be remembered that about a year ago the keepers of a grand saloon were prosecuted for retailing a sherry in which the analyst had found as much as 2 grains per 1,000 of absolute sulphuric acid; and though none have hitherto proved so bad as this, yet some go as high as 1.620 per 1,000; at the same time the tannic acid had been almost completely removed by matters used in the clarification. How to account for the consumption by the people of San Francisco of stuff like this can be understood only on the assumption that the public taste is utterly perverted. The general average of over forty-eight samples of sherry taken promiscuously amounted to the monstrous strength of 20.406 per cent. absolute alcohol; the highest being 23.425, and the lowest 16.80. Thirty-five samples of port similarly taken yielded 19.60. a. a. What wonder, then, that such wines are heady, heating, and intoxicating?

Several years ago, the British Commissioners of Customs caused an exhaustive investigation to be made into the wines of France, by their officer, Mr. J. B. Keen, the head of the distillation department, London, whose report has been published. Of the red wines of 30 departments he determined 331, and found the general average to be only 20.810 British proof—equal to 11.891 absolute alcohol.

The general average of 112 samples from Italy.	12.40	absolute alcohol
" " " 67 from the Zollverein.	11.1045	" "
" " " 41 Austrian Empire.	12.0857	" "
" " " 18 Australia.	14.059	" "
" " " 26 North California	12.350	" "

Thus it will be seen that the wines of Sonoma, St. Helena, and Yolo County rank with those of Italy, Austria, and Hungary, and are more generous than those of France and the Zollverein. Those grown at Fresno, and in the southern portions of the State, approach the strongest pure port and sherry.

Within the last few days there has been issued from the University of California, College of Agriculture, a supplement to the biennial report of the Board of Regents, section six of which contains an interesting and valuable article on "California Wines," by Professor Eugene W. Hilgard, professor of agriculture and botany. He attributes the depression which the wine interest had to sustain until a comparatively recent date, "chiefly to the hasty putting upon the market of immature and indifferently made wines;" and accounts for the returning prosperity, in a great measure, by "the steady improvement in the qualities of the wines marketed—such improvement being partly due to the introduction of grape varieties better adapted than the Mission grape to the production of wines suited to the taste of wine-drinking nations, partly to a real improvement in the methods of treatment, and their better adaptation to the peculiarities of California-grown grapes. Doubtless much remains to be done, especially in the latter respect, before the best possible results are produced; for heretofore the vintners of each of the five wine-growing nations represented in California have followed their native habits and methods of treatment—the outgrowth of the experience of each country under its peculiar circumstances of climate, soil, temperature, etc. It is rather to be wondered at that so much good wine has, even thus, been produced in California as to overcome the prejudice engendered by the first crude products marketed, and on account of which most of the California wines have heretofore been sold under foreign labels."

Again he continues: "I have heretofore suggested that this peculiarity—the want of acid in the Mission grape—might in a measure be modified by not allowing the Mission grape as 'dead ripe' as is now usually done. This would tend to increase the acid at the expense of the sugar, which is in excess at best, thus producing the excessive headiness for which the California wines are thus far noted. The vintners object to this course on the ground of the European precedent, according to which every additional day of sun is accounted so much gain to the quality of the wine. But what is true in the cloudy climate of Europe is not, therefore, necessarily true in sunny California."

All this is replete with sound sense. And he continues: "Again, it has been the practice to put on the market, under the names of port, sherry, etc., wines whose only resemblance to their prototypes consists in a superficial resemblance of color, sweetness, and alcoholic strength, but lacking both the body and flavor of the originals. It should be distinctly understood that the production of these wines is dependent both on the peculiarities of the countries and localities where their prime materials grow, and upon definite processes of manufacture, without which their character can not be reproduced. Especially as regards port, the defects of the California practice are very clearly set forth in the treatise of Doctor Bleasdale, published in the Official Report of the Thirtieth Mechanics' Exhibition, 1878. There is especially one point of radical importance, namely, the thorough aeration of the must by the treading process, which evidently exerts a decisive influence upon the product. The aeration can, of course, be effected otherwise than by treading, but without it neither port nor sherry is likely to be produced anywhere, and the labeling of weak imitations with their names can but depress the public estimate of California wines."

The above practical observations, the result of the professor's studies of wines, should be laid to heart by the vintners who wish to see their wines rise to the perfection to which they have a right to aspire. One of the most important points to be more fully studied by California wine-makers is the proper blending of the several grape varieties in the must, as well as subsequently in the cask. The objections sometimes made to this process are, of course, a pure matter of sentiment, and, as such, are scarcely ever taken into account by intelligent wine-makers—who are well aware that even the best grape will rarely produce a palatable wine unless intelligently treated, and that, with few exceptions, the best wines in the world are judiciously made blends, whether of different grape varieties, or of the product of vineyards differing in the peculiarities they impart to the product.

It follows from the above considerations that wine-making, like any other technical process of manufacture, requires special training. Hence, the establishment of large wineries, conducted by persons specially qualified, would tend to improve the quality of wines, as against the practice of establishing a costly plant for each small vineyard, whose proprietor is not versed in the difficult art of wine-making. It is in reality just as absurd for every vineyard proprietor to become his own wine-treater, in the present state of knowledge in these new countries of that delicate art, as it would be for a grazier, or a butcher, or a woolen manufacturer to spend his time and money on utilizing hoofs and horns, and conducting chemical experiments on the after products of the remains of dead cattle, instead of attending to breeding, rearing, and feeding.

RATHER MIXED.

She was visiting my step-mother—or, rather, my—well, she was visiting my father's wife (I'm safe there). Now, my step-daughter—there! you see how I'm mixed. Let me commence anew. Let X. represent my father; then Mrs. X. will represent my father's wife.

She was visiting Mrs. X. The blonde beauty of my—Mrs. X.—I hate insipidity!—paled into utter insignificance before her warmth of coloring. Evidently of Spanish descent, with purple-black hair in thick coils around her shapely head. She was not too young—about thirty-nine, I should judge. I hate immaturity. She had a splendid figure, calling to mind, in its languid grace, the temporary repression of the quiescent tiger. (I don't exactly like that trope; it's too suggestive of scratching, and family broils. You can take sleeping volcano, or ice-bomb torrent, or anything else of that kind you choose.) Her glowing color, and, above all, her eyes—"dusky wells of passion"—made her, to my mind, the most magnificent woman I had ever met.

As I said, I was much impressed with her from the first. I may have shown it. At any rate, there was considerable whispering going on between Mr. and Mrs. X. and their guest, and Mrs. X. kept giggling spasmodically all the evening—I hate giggling! She introduced the new-comer to me rather indistinctly, and giggled in an absurd manner whenever I addressed her as "Mrs. Murtha," which I understood to be her name.

I am a practical man. I intended to marry the lady, and pursued our acquaintance with a view to the accomplishment of my purpose. And I must say Mrs. X. aided me to the best of her ability, throwing us in each other's society as much as possible, and behaving, generally, in a very desirable manner—with the exception of her giggle, which seemed to have become chronic. I remember one evening in particular, when my father had to request her to leave the room if she could not control herself better. And the cause of her laughter was simply my asking her if Mrs. Murtha's first name was "Marie," as I had heard Mrs. X. call her "Ma" several times, and I knew of no other name of which that could be a contraction. She said "yes;" and, on my remarking that her familiar appellation for her friend placed the accent on the wrong syllable, and so spoiled one of the most musical of names, she gave occasion for the reproof of which I have spoken. I found, on addressing Mrs. Murtha as "Marie," that Mrs. X.'s statement was absolutely false.

At last I told her what I feel confident she knew long before, and she consented to be my wife. She demurred, however, to my desire that the ceremony should take place on Christmas eve, pleading the shortness of the time and my lack of proper acquaintance with her; but I overruled her objections with unanswerable logic—at least I think it was logic. I know I felt as if I should go mad at a longer delay—and we were married just as daylight faded into dark on the twenty-fourth of December.

To say that I was happy is like calling Niagara "nice." I was in an ecstatic glow of bliss, that seemed to separate me from the rest of humanity; perhaps I needed some severe shock to bring back my ordinary self-possession. For some reason my father decided to omit our usual Christmas festivities, and dining en famille, the great dining-hall, used only on state occasions, seemed immeasurably large. Not all the radiance of glass and silver in the centre could light up the sombre corners, where little imps seemed to mock our laughter with oddly repeated echoes.

The only way in which my father showed his age was in his persistent observance of certain customs of his youth, of which common sense would dictate the abolition.

Everything went on as usual until the cloth was removed for dessert, and then I heard my father address my wife several times as "Murtha," evidently to her discomfort, for every time he did so she colored and glanced apprehensively at me.

I took no notice of it at first, presuming that he had made a mistake, or that our '36 port had been too strong for him; but as he repeated it, evidently to provoke some observation from me, I said:

"With all due respect for your age, sir, I consider your witticism, if it is intended as such, lacks both point and delicacy. The lady's name is not Murtha."

"I am aware of it, my so—respected sir," he replied. Then he added with great distinctness: "I called the lady mother, not Murtha, because she has the honor to be the maternal ancestress of my beloved wife."

I looked at Mrs. X.; she was struggling helplessly with one of her infernal giggles. I knew the meaning of them now—she had entrapped me into marrying—

"Great glory!" I exclaimed, starting from my chair in desperation as the complication began to unfold itself to my mind, "I have married my grandmother!" And all the little devils in the corners took the words and mockingly tossed them back and forth: "Married grandmother, mother, other, er;" and then, starting up again from the embrasure behind me with renewed emphasis, "Grandmother, mother, other," till I was nearly frantic.

I got over it after a while; in fact, on looking at my wife, who was in tears, and hearing her broken expressions of sorrow for the deception to which my father and her daughter had persuaded her to be a party (to this day they persist that I deceived myself, and that as she was distinctly introduced as "my mother," the existence of a slight deafness, which I have always denied, is an established fact), I forgot everything except how much I loved her. And when I clasped her in my arms, and her glorious hair, loosened from the comb, swept my face and fell in ebony richness almost to the ground, I vowed that I would have married her, and been glad to do it, if she were my great-great-grandmother.

And speaking of hair brings me back to my starting point. What is making me grow prematurely old is indecision! You see I have settled to my satisfaction that, in the line of succession, my father is my son-in-law; his wife, my step-mother and step-daughter; my wife, his mother-in-law and daughter-in-law; but am I—will some one help me to decide?—can it be possible that I am my own grand-father?

And when the near future shall bring the children—Good heavens!

FANNIE M. PUGH.

OAKLAND, April, 1880.

HER INVENTIVE GENIUS.

The New York Times's yarn regarding Mr. Dodge's chicken-ranch was read by a New England lady residing in North Carolina, and she too planned a colored trap for the ebony poultry-snatchers. Miss Towner, the lady in question, was of the school-teaching species. She went to North Carolina soon after the civil war, and took charge of the Jonesville district-school. She was between forty and fifty, and her reputation for fearlessness and decision of character in connection with the kitchen poker made her a terror to tramps and evil-doers generally. While she could not be said to be actually popular, she was not disliked by the Jonesville people, except, of course, by the poorer class of negroes, to whom she gave food and tracts, and who naturally regarded her as a hard and unfeeling person. The pleasant little cottage in which Miss Towner lived alone, without even a servant, had a small yard attached to it which seemed eminently adapted to chicken culture. Miss Towner had made several attempts to keep chickens, but the magnetism of the colored element was altogether too strong, and she had definitely abandoned the undertaking when she read of the Massachusetts man's trap. It was clear to her that whatever could be done by a good-for-nothing man could be done far better by an intelligent woman, and accordingly she resolved to stock her empty chicken-house, and to set a new and original trap. After much thought, she hit upon the plan of a noose-trap. She procured a long rope, which she passed through a pulley placed on the limb of a tree near the chicken-house. To one end of the rope was attached a weight of two hundred pounds, and to the other end a noose, and the weight was so arranged that a slight pull on the noose would cause it to shoot into the air, dragging with it the unfortunate colored man whose unlawful foot had entered it. One afternoon she received a supply of chickens, which she placed in the chicken-house, making no effort to conceal the fact from the colored public. Just before dark she set her trap, and repeatedly tested it by poking the noose with a stick. Every time the noose was poked the weight fell, and the stick was caught and hoisted some ten feet clear of the ground. Confident that the trap would prove a success, she reset it and went back to her house. About nine o'clock that evening she fancied that she heard a noise in the yard, and it occurred to her that some one might be prowling about the chicken-house. She therefore laid aside her copy of Jonathan Edwards on the Will, took up the poker, and crept stealthily into the yard. It was a bright moonlight night, but no one was visible, and, after making sure that her chickens were all safe, she was about to return to her reading, when she accidentally stepped within the fatal noose. The trap did credit to her inventive genius. The noose caught her by both ankles, and in an instant she found herself swinging with her head just clear of the ground. With great presence of mind she put her hands on the ground, and thus in some measure relieved her ankles of the strain of her entire weight. It was, however, impossible for her to release herself, and it was with difficulty that she could either breathe or see. There was clearly nothing to be done but to wait until some early chicken-stealer should arrive, and to appeal to him for aid. Miss Towner did not have long to wait. By half-past nine Mr. Hannibal Blue approached the yard on chickens bent, but of an unfortunately timorous mind. When he came in sight of the mysterious and appalling spectacle presented by Miss Towner, he remarked, "Golly!" in accents of great terror, and fled away, convinced that he had seen a ghost, while Miss Towner, with a voice stifled with emotion and flannel, in vain besought him to come back. Meeting a dozen of his fellow-citizens, who were on their way to the chicken-house, Mr. Blue explained that he had been driven away by a peculiarly frightful ghost, dressed entirely in white and holding both its arms upright above its head. He could not, however, induce his friends to share his fears, and, strong in the consciousness of numbers, they pursued their way to Miss Towner's yard. At the first sight of the alleged ghost, they were undeniably alarmed; but, finding that it did not attack them, they gained courage and drew nearer. In time they recognized Miss Towner's voice, and were able to comprehend that she had been hoist by her own petard—that is to say, noose. Some men, in like circumstances, would have left the unhappy chicken proprietor to pass the night in misery. Not so did these kindly colored men. They first carefully removed all the chickens, and then investigated the contents of the kitchen larder and the smoke-house. Having thus done their whole duty, they explained to Miss Towner that they would send her a colored lady to release her within the next half-hour, and then bade her a respectful farewell, confident that in the circumstances she could not identify her benefactors. They kept their word, and before eleven o'clock Mrs. Dinah Washington arrived, and lowered Miss Towner carefully to the ground, uninjured, except by a few slight bruises, and a somewhat excessive tendency of blood to the head. This teaches the value of the newspaper press as a disseminator of useful knowledge, and conveys besides a useful and affecting moral.

A clerk was discharged, and asked the reason "You are too awful slow about everything," said his employer. "You do me an injustice," responded the clerk. "There is one thing I am not slow about." "I should like to hear you name it," sneered the proprietor. "Well," said the clerk, slowly, "nobody can get tired as quick as I can."

The Rev. Joseph Cook says of the "gem puzzle," according to the Boston Post: "It is the natural offspring of a pathogenic and perspicacious perspicacity, and during the protoplasmic stage its inventor should have been percolated insuperably through the innate particles of a barn door."

A doctor attending a punster, who was very ill, apologized for being late one day by saying that he had to stop to see a man who had fallen down a well. "Did he kick the bucket, doctor?" groaned the punster.

A child being asked what were the three great feasts of the Jews, promptly, and not unnaturally, replied: "Break-fast, dinner, and supper."

INTAGLIOS.

To-Morrow.

What name doth joy most borrow
When life is fair?

"To-morrow."

What name doth best fit sorrow
In young despair?

"To-morrow."—George Eliot.

At Last.

Will the day ever come, I wonder,
When I shall be glad to know
That my hands shall be folded under
The next white fall of the snow?
To know that when next the clover
Wooeth the wandering bee,
Its crimson tide will drift over
All that is left of me? —Julia C. R. Dorr.

After Heine

"Es liegt der herze Sommer,"

My little Love, the summer
Is hot upo' thy cheek,
And in thy heart the winter
Is white and chill and bleak.

Ah, that will change, my lassie,
When in my arms thou art;
Thy cheek be pale as winter,
And summer burn thy heart.
—Joe Warren Chapman.

Death's Blunder.

The carved doors were open;
The sexton tolled the bell;
And the light from the Gothic windows
Like shattered rainbows fell.
As through the porch of a splendid church
Crept little beggar Nell.

Low shrinking in the shadow,
Beside the pulpit stair,
She saw a little casket
Brought to the house of prayer;
And a sorrowing band of the rich and grand
Gather in silence there.

She heard the mournful music;
She heard the preacher say:
"The Lord, who gave your treasure,
Hath taken her away.
Be sure, my friends, for the wisest ends
God worketh. Let us pray!"

A ragged child stole forward,
While every head was bowed;
Through fragrant, snow-white flowers
She saw a snow-white shroud,
And golden hair, and a face most fair;
And she knelt, and wept aloud.

Forth from among the mourners
Came the father of the dead;
He raised the little beggar,
And, wonderingly, said:
"What strange child weeps for her who sleeps
With lilies round her head?"

"Why, Death has made a blunder;
'Twas me he meant!" she cried.
"I asked him; for there's no one
To grieve if I had died;
And there seems to be no room for me,
Though they say the world is wide."

"Nay! Death has made no blunder.
God means my heart shall be Made sore enough by sorrow
To feel for one like thee.
It is His will that thou shouldst fill
Her place. Child, come with me."

How many friendless orphans
By him are clothed and fed!
In soothing others' sorrow
His own is comforted;
And Christ, the Lord, as his reward,
Will yet give back his dead.
—Helen Angèle Goodwin.

The Old Mill.

Here from the brow of the hill I look,
Through a lattice of boughs and leaves,
On the old gray mill with its gambrel roof,
And the moss on its rotting eaves.
I hear the clatter that jars its walls,
And the rushing water's sound,
And I see the black floats rise and fall
As the wheel goes slowly round.

I rode there often when I was young,
With my grist on the horse before,
And talked with Nelly, the miller's girl,
As I waited my turn at the door.
And while she tossed her ringlets brown,
And flirted and chatted so free,
The wheel might stop, or the wheel might go,
It was all the same to me.

'Tis twenty years since last I stood
On the spot where I stand to-day,
And Nelly is wed, and the miller's dead,
And the mill and I are gray.
But both, till we fall into ruin and wreck,
To our fortune of toil are bound;
And the man goes, and the stream flows,
And the wheel moves slowly round.
—Thomas Dunn English.

The Token.

No gleam of banners on the far-off hills;
No glittering-crested herald, riding swift,
To show through dreary clouds the golden rift,
And speak to waiting souls a word that fills
The measure of each need, to heal all ills,
And from sad hearts the weary weight to lift;
No trumpet to prelude the royal gift;
No strong, sure voice, which through the darkness thrills.

Yet lo! the token! from the wintry earth
Upspringing, mute and white! a lowly leaf
To bear the message of the world's new birth
And flash a smile o'er all its furrowed grief!
One blossom, with its promise from the skies:
"I conquered death; ye, too, some day shall rise."
—Jennie Harrison.

THROUGH FRENCH LORGNETTES.

Alfred de Vigny: A woman is always a child.

Madame de Sartory: Words are the key of the heart.

Madame d'Epinau: The trade of woman is very hard.

Madame Swetchine: Repentance is accepted remorse.

Ségur: Men make the laws, women make the customs.

Madame Desbordes Valmore: Nothing is so near love as pity.

Ach. Poincelot: The greatest merit of many husbands is their wives.

Madame d'Aulnay: Love, like fear, makes us believe everything.

Adrien Dupuy: In love, to give a portrait is to promise the original.

Madame Woilley: Grief counts the minutes; happiness forgets them.

Fontinell: To be able to please is already a great advance toward persuading.

Sanial Dubarg: The more a woman is idle the more is her heart occupied.

Lemontez: The abuse of books kills the health and the modesty of women.

Mademoiselle de Scudéry: A jealous man always finds more than he looks for.

Madame de Coigny: A coquette who takes a lover is a sovereign who abdicates.

Nicole: Ugliness and beauty depend upon the caprice and the imagination of men.

Madame de Genlis: Ugliness, after virtue, is the best guardian of a young woman.

Mademoiselle de Scudéry: One of the noblest effects of love is to produce liberality.

Madame Staal Delaunay: Liberty is incompatible with love. A lover is always a slave.

Cardan: Wine and women are the teachers of all the sins, if they are not the authors.

E. Young: Pretensions to youth always give to a woman a few more years than she really has.

Rochefoucauld: The pleasure of love is in loving. We are happier in the passion we feel than in that we inspire.

Idem: We always like those who admire us; we do not always like those whom we admire.

Madame de Sartory: No conversation is more tiresome than that of a lover who has nothing to desire and nothing to fear.

Louis Desnoyers: We blame inconstancy in women, but only when we are the victim. We find it charming if we are the object.

Montaigne: It happens as with cages: the birds without despair to get in, and those within despair of getting out—that is marriage.

Suard: No woman speaks of women without thinking a little of herself, and never thinks of herself without thinking a good deal of others.

Ninon de l'Enclos: Women detest a jealous man whom they do not love, but it angers them when a man whom they do love is not jealous.

Alfred de Musset: The woman who really wishes to refuse contents herself with saying no. She who explains wants to be convinced.

Rochebrun: When you talk to women, you must choose between lying and displeasing them. There is no middle course, unless you say nothing.

Louis Desnoyers: Women who love are always afraid they are not loved. Women who do not love always flatter themselves that they are loved.

Balzac: The winter's frost must rend the burr of the nut before the fruit is seen. So adversity tempers the human heart to discover its real worth.

Dumas, fils: Poor Madame de —! Chatting with her the other day, she brought all my youth back to me; but, alas! she did not bring back hers!

Adolph Ricard: To marry when you are sixty a beautiful girl of twenty-five is to imitate those silly creatures who buy books simply for the pleasure of their friends.

Daudet: With women, marked, irregular noses signify far more talent than with men; and, except in the case of a few, beauty must always sacrifice something to genius.

Anon: A wife no more believes in business which takes her husband away from her than a manager believes in the sickness of an actress, or a publisher in that of

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served at 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1880.

There is something to us exceedingly picturesque in the politics of England at the present time. Politics in England is the struggle of statesmen upon questions of national principle, upon appeal to the intelligent part of an intelligent people, and not, as in America, a struggle for spoils, into the contest for which enter the selfish and vulgar wrangles of an hundred thousand small officials and place-holders, and five hundred thousand more who hope to fill their positions. In the triumph of Gladstone over Beaconsfield, in the change of Parliament and the transfer of the royal confidence from the Tory to the Liberal party, only some fifty men lose or gain office. The Premier, the Cabinet, the Viceroy of India, of Ireland, and Canada, and a few of those in highest authority, step down and out; but the great machinery of state moves smoothly along. All the lesser servants of the crown maintain their positions, undisturbed by the tempest that rages in official circles far above them, and are left to the freedom of their individual opinions in casting their votes for members of the Parliament of the realm. In England, there is a qualification attached to the privilege of the elective franchise. It is a gift to be gained by intelligence, thrift, and economy, and to be preserved by sobriety, honesty, and good conduct. If it comes with birth and inheritance, it can not be maintained after being dragged through prison and pauper-house. England esteems her elective privilege as too sacred to be conferred as a matter of course upon the ignorant and pauper immigrant of every other nation that seeks her shores.

The history of Disraeli is a romance—one of those romances of real life that exceed all the imaginative paintings of fiction. It would be a bold story-writer that would have chosen his hero from a proscribed race, and that seventy years ago, when the prejudices of Europe denied to its sons and daughters not only social position and political privileges, but subjected them to the indignities of personal confinement and exclusion from official position; and through an eventful career to have made the "despised Jew" three times Premier of England—three times the first gentleman of the realm—ranking next to the royal family and the royal princes in the ceremonials and pageants of state. Upon him have been heaped wealth and honors, offices and titles of nobility, enabling him at court and in the presence of his Queen to outblaze his peers with his jewels of the royal Order of the Garter, and to bear upon his arm the noblest beauty of the court. Lord Beaconsfield has kept his administration in harmony with his gorgeous career; he has maintained abroad the prestige of the English name; he has given to his Queen an imperial diadem. His career has been one of brilliant surprises; his diplomacy one of pyrotechnics. His last adjournment of Parliament, so entirely unexpected, was a fit ending to a political career that did everything for effect. It is almost a pity that this distinguished and eminent man should have the palsied hand of age laid so heavily upon him that he has no reasonable prospect of recouping from his unexpected defeat. Disraeli is seventy-five years old.

The career of Gladstone has been more English, but none the less adventurous and bold. The son of a knight, formerly a Tory, filling office nearly all his life—he is only four years the junior of Lord Beaconsfield—once and for six years Premier of England, he has been since his loss of office the leader in Parliament and in the country of the opposition to the government. Bold, aggressive, uncompromising, brilliant in parliamentary debate and on the hustings, an untiring student and writer, he has finally driven the Tory party to the wall, and comes back to the administration with a decisive parliamentary majority after an open and hard-fought contest. There was something especially magnificent in his offering himself as a candidate for Parliament in the heart of Midlothian—in bearding the great ducal lord of Scotland on his own broad domain—in challenging the son of his Grace to single combat on his own acres for the parliamentary representation. Gladstone's triumph is one of advanced and liberal sentiments, is a step forward in the direction of a people's government, is an unwelcome defeat to the titled, landed, and establishment class, and is understood to be far from pleasurable to her Majesty the Queen, and the princes of birth and marriage-beds, who live upon crown lands and pensions from the royal treasury. Assuredly the politics of England are picturesque.

The San Francisco Monitor calls attention to an article in the New York Catholic Herald, strongly opposing General Grant for his Des Moines speech, and general liberal or anti-Catholic spirit. As we do not advocate the renomination of General Grant for a third term, perhaps the Monitor, the Herald, the Catholic press, and the Catholic politicians generally, will be disposed to heed our suggestion and listen to our advice. It is this—the less said about General Grant's anti-Catholicism and liberality, the less likely he will be to be both nominated and elected. Our advice to the Romanists, both clergy and laity, is not to stir this question. General Grant did not mention the word "Catholic" in his Des Moines speech; he did object to any other than secular education at the expense of the public, and did not approve any interference with the system of free common-school education by any ecclesiastical authority. If this question should be made the issue at the next Presidential election, it would sweep the nation like a whirlwind, and wash it like a cloud-burst. Hence we advise all Catholics or Protestants, who do not want, and are not prepared, to brook the infernal devil and fight the tempest such an issue would be sure to provoke, to go slow on this question. Let it rest. It will come soon enough, and make trouble enough when it does come. Don't let us elect Grant with it this time.

Since the "whoop-up" in Pennsylvania, and the "corner" in New York, and a paroxysmal flutter through those negro commonwealths that will cast no Republican electoral vote, General Grant's candidacy has made but little progress. He has lost the prestige of a "boom," and now occupies the defiant attitude of seeking the nomination at the hands of the machine. Illinois—which was boastfully claimed by his friends as for him, and as the pivotal State around which all other results would cluster—has had four county conventions—Knox, Kane, Sangamon, and one other; result, thirty for Blaine, and eleven for Grant. The opposition to the candidacy of General Grant is composed of two elements—the one a principle, the other a memory. All over the United States, and in every precinct, hamlet, town, and city, there are sincere, earnest, honest, and patriotic men who think a third term of the Presidential office is a violation of the unwritten constitution of the nation, and a violation of its most honored tradition. All over the nation are good Republicans who remember the kind of men that stood around the Republican throne when General Grant was President. They fear, and they have a right to fear, that its approach will be barred against them by the same greedy, dishonest, and clamorous gang if he is re-elected.

The archives of the Washington departments undoubtedly contain many very stupid and ridiculous papers, but we doubt if, in all the vaults of all those marble piles, could be found any official document in which stupidity and cheek were more strongly shown, or more harmoniously blended, than in the report which has been made to the Postmaster-General by the committee of his subordinates whom he appointed to look into the matter of letter-carrying by express companies on the Pacific Coast. The fame of these three or four official gentlemen, who, sitting down in a snug room in a Washington bureau, propose to sweep away by a department edict one of the most important facilities for communication—in some places the only facility—enjoyed by the people of the Pacific Coast, has not yet reached this westernmost part of the Union with sufficient distinctness to enable us to say what manner of men they are. But, unless they are perfect types of the department Dogberry—barnacles of the sort which grow around large Government offices, and which, in their British species, have been well characterized and ridiculed by Dickens—we can not believe that they have ever read the reports which the telegrams to the Associated Press tell us they have signed; for certainly no man of ordinary perceptions, who had not been fossilized by long routine of red-tape tying, and had gradually come to look upon the whole fifty millions of American people as existing but to conform to departmental regulations, would, in sober earnest and in his natural senses, have proposed to interfere with the habits and wishes of a large part of the nation for the trivial reasons which in this report are given. The facts of the case are simply these: That the express company of Wells, Fargo & Co.,—which, since the early days of California, has been the great common carrier of this coast, and which has its agents in every city, village, and mining camp from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific, and from Puget Sound to the Mexican boundary line—has for all these years been in the habit of carrying for the public letters enclosed in Government stamped envelopes, and on which postage is thus paid without any return service by the post. There is nothing secret, or underhand, or contraband about this business. On the contrary, it is in full accordance with and expressly permitted by the postal law; though that law, unfortunately, contains a provision which, technically interpreted, gives the Postmaster-General authority to prohibit it, should he care to exercise such an arbitrary power. It in no wise interferes with the operations of the post-office, nor creates any injurious competition with the mails. No one is in any way compelled to send his letters by express, if he prefers to send them by mail. On the contrary, anyone can send his letters through the mail for three cents a half-ounce, while if he wants to send them by express he must pay, not merely three cents a half-ounce to the Government, but the express charge in addition. And now it is proposed by these three or four Washington post-office functionaries to absolutely prohibit this letter-carrying. The thing is preposterous. The hotel-keeper, who prepares food and spreads a cover for his guests, has a right to demand that the guest shall pay for the regular meals, whether he eats them or not; but what would we say if, not content with this, he were to insist that the guest should be prohibited from eating or drinking except at his table? There are two very emphatic old English words which would be applied to such an individual, and they are two words which must occur to whoever thinks in the vernacular as he reads the report in which Mr. Key is asked to do what a long succession of Postmasters-General have never thought of doing, and to prohibit the people of the Pacific Coast from sending letters by express, even though they pay full Government postage, and may want them carried to places, or at times, where or when there is no mail.

The sublime cheek of this proposal, which exhibits, as lofty a disregard of the wishes and interests of the people as any edict ever promulgated in the name of a Bourbon or Romanoff, is only equaled by the "reasons" for which it is urged upon the Postmaster-General, and which range from the transparently false to the utterly absurd. For it is transparently false to urge that the letter-carrying of Wells, Fargo & Co. results in any diminution of the postal revenues, when the patent fact is that all its letter-franks are printed on stamped envelopes issued by the Government, and sold at a price proportioned to the Government stamp; for, this being the case, the express company can not carry letters for insufficient postage without lessening their own revenues. And it is utterly absurd to say that there is a loss to the Government because Wells, Fargo & Co. send their own communications by their own agents without the payment of postage, for they could, and undoubtedly would, do this even if they were not permitted to carry letters for the general public. And again, it is transparently false to urge that there can be any loss or inconvenience—instead of an obvious economy and convenience—resulting from the fact that in many little places the agent of Wells, Fargo & Co. and the postmaster is often the same person, just as he is often, also, the hotel-keeper, grocer, druggist, dry-goods merchant, newspaper and telegraph agent; while the very climax of absurdity is reached when it is gravely proposed as a good and sufficient reason for the arbitrary interference of the department, and the suppression of a great public convenience, that Wells, Fargo & Co. have letter-boxes, and that people sometimes put letters in these boxes that they intend to put in the post-office boxes! Shades of the late lamented fool-killer! We have heard of people who, under the influence of a liquid probably not unknown in Washington, put their boots in bed and threw themselves on the floor, but we never heard of anybody who proposed for this reason to abolish either beds or boots. We have heard of the newly-enfranchised freedmen of South Carolina putting their ballots into hollow trees, but the veriest carpet-bagger never on this account suggested the cutting down of the trees. We have heard of people who insisted on trying to stuff letters into fire-alarm boxes, but we never yet heard that anybody wanted on this account the fire-alarm system suppressed. Yet these paternal bureaucrats at Washington give this as a reason why the benighted people of the Pacific Coast should be denied the privilege of sending letters by express when they want to. We believe Postmaster-General Key has too much sense to pay any attention to such recommendations as those of this report. Let him stuff the thing in a pigeon-hole, and let the people of the Pacific Coast get their letters carried as they choose, so long as they pay the Government its dues. They know very little about us in Washington, anyhow, and the less paternal government of this sort they give us, the better in the long run both for them and for us.

To adjust water rates so that the Spring Valley Company may receive a fair and adequate remuneration upon its outlay, and at the same time that its collection may not discriminate against individuals or classes, is a plain duty. That the company should not receive an exorbitant interest upon a fictitious capital is recognized by every honest citizen. That it should not collect for current expenses for repairs more money than it costs to run the institution and keep it in repair is also right. That the city as a municipal government, and for all its varied uses, should not have water for nothing, is also recognized. That seventeen thousand consumers should pay for all the water used for the health, safety, comfort, and protection of three hundred thousand, is an apparent wrong that needs no other argument than its bare statement. The city pays three hundred thousand dollars for gas to light its streets, and this expenditure is recognized as a legitimate municipal charge. It is for the safety, comfort, and police protection of all the people. The same argument in reference to franchises, and the privileges of using the streets, is based upon the same facts as control the water company. If gas is a comfort, water is indispensable. If gas is a luxury, water is a necessity. The writer of this article fails to see why general property should be taxed for the one and not for the other; why the man who consumes gas in his dwelling should not pay for the gas used in street-lamps and public buildings, upon the same principle that the private water-consumer is compelled to pay for the water drunk at the Lotta Fountain, or used to extinguish fires, flush sewers, and sprinkle the public parks. If any scheme is to be devised by means of which rates are not to be reduced to the private consumers, in event of the imposition of a general tax, then, of course, there should be no concession by the Board of Supervisors. But when the amount which the company is allowed to collect as an annual charge is fixed and is reasonable, then it would seem as though there should be no difficulty in so apportioning it that it should be equitable and just, and set equally upon all interests and all property. There are considerations, also, broader than these. We demand manufactories for the advancement of our city, to give employment to laborers; and nearly every workshop and factory uses more or less of water. To measure this water by the gallon, and charge for it at the same rates as for a bathing-tub, is to make it impossible for manufacturing to exist. This question of water supply and water rates is to this city an important question, and one that ought to be considered without passion or prejudice by the press, with fairness by the Supervisors, and with liberality by the company.

Beer-vat Steinman is on the warpath again. He thinks he can frighten the town once more by advising drilling. He will reach a climax by and by in setting up a few rusty muskets in the rear of some dingy hall. The thing to be done with this noisy demagogue is to hale him up for vagrancy. If he can not show that he has some visible means of support he should be sent to work on the county roads.

The foregoing is an editorial of Wednesday's Bulletin, and it is the best editorial that that journal has ever printed concerning the Sand-lot rebellion. "Beer-vat Steinman" is good. This is the colossal Dutchman who carries the Sand-lot banner: "Labor or bread." The same vigorous editorial comment against Kearney, Wellock, Gannon, Kalloch, and the other male and female vagabonds and street-walkers of the Sand-lot, would have contributed to squelch the whole vile business, and to have strangled it at its birth. We congratulate the Bulletin upon the valor it displays in coming to the funeral and kicking the corpse.

The New York Times altogether misunderstands popular opinion upon this coast in reference to Chinese immigration. We mean intelligent public opinion; and this great, leading, and influential journal does us, our State and our people, a most cruel wrong by thus persistently misrepresenting us. If, when a band of rioters imperiled the safety of New York, burned an orphan asylum, and set at defiance the law, the London journals had declared that the people of New York were barbarians—that plunder, murder, arson, and riot were the normal condition of that city—it could not have done that people greater injustice than the New York Times is now doing our people. The Chinese Commission has not been ungraciously received. The appointment of Mr. John F. Swift is accepted as all we had a right to expect or demand. We recognize this as a national question, concerning the whole country, involving commercial and other questions. The Commission is entirely acceptable to this coast. The Times is culpable in its ignorance, or criminal in its malice, when it says of Mr. Swift: "This gentleman represents the most extreme views of the anti-Chinese party, stopping only just a little short of the brutality of the men of the Sand-lots." Mr. Swift represents no such sentiment, but the very reverse. He represents that class of citizens which is just, humane, and generous; which recognizes the binding force of an international treaty, and which would—with arms, if necessary, as against the mob—defend the Chinese in all their rights under the law. Mr. John F. Swift is a gentleman, a lawyer, a man of high culture, a broad-minded, able, representative man; and though everybody upon the coast would have been glad had he been appointed Minister Plenipotentiary, they feel that they are well represented upon the Commission, and are grateful to the President and the Secretary of State for Mr. Swift's appointment.

An important interest is growing up on our coast that has up to the present time challenged very little public attention. From time to time, ever since the gold discovery, we have heard of oil prospects, oil discoveries, and oil wells. In nearly every one of our mountain ranges we find evidences of oil. Some two or three years ago oil wells were sunk in Santa Barbara, Ventura, and Los Angeles counties.

There is an oil station on the Southern Pacific Railroad, where oil is conducted in pipes from eight miles away. This oil was found to be expensive in its mode of rectifying. It made the best of lubricating oil, but for burning purposes could not compete with Pennsylvania oils. This property, formerly belonging to Messrs. Taylor, Bryant, MacDonald, and others, is now owned by Tevis, Felton, and others; Scofield & Tevis succeeding to Mr. Taylor's oil business in San Francisco. The same parties have been engaged in boring for oil in the Santa Cruz Mountains, and we believe successfully. As good a quality of oil has been brought to the surface as the Pennsylvania oils, although we believe no flowing wells have been found. Owners of oil-farms in the Santa Cruz Mountains and elsewhere will do well not to make hasty disposition of their property, nor embarrass themselves with long leases. If the owner of an oil-farm will either work the property himself, or lease it upon condition of active working by the lessee upon a share of the product, the oil business of California need not go into the hands of monopolists. We hope to see our people derive a large revenue from this oil development, and we hope in its infancy it may not be monopolized by capitalists, hence this word of caution to the owners of farms with oil prospects.

Two mysteries, obscure and dense,
All men are trying to clear:
Who tried to buy Kane's influence?
And who took Whitaker's ear?
Alas, the times are out of joint
From Sacramento to West Point!

Forbear, forbear, ye can not trace
These two dark criminals out;
A motive's wanting in each case,
As clear to the dismal doubt:
Who'd have the bigger's ear for naught?
Who'd use Kane's influence if bought?

A young man named Eldredge has cropped out as a rising phrenologist, bidding fair, says an enthusiastic contemporary, "to win a reputation second to that of no man in the country." We have this to say to that young man: There is no such science as phrenology. No man in this or any country has a "reputation," among men of wisdom and knowledge, for reading character by the shape of the head. The practicing phrenologist, like the "spirit medium," begins by deceiving others, and ends by deceiving himself. Turn it up, young man, turn it up. Nothing in it—nothing but just dead loads of money.

We are pleased to observe that a local contemporary has had the frank courage to point out the one weak spot in Lord Beaconsfield's policy—the joint in his armor through which the spear of political disaster invaded his official vitals: Lord Beaconsfield does not read the newspapers. This is indeed a grave mistake; how can he know what he ought to do if he will not let the editors tell him? We are reminded of a little story. An eccentric man who had complained a good deal about his hard luck, and been advised by prosperous friends to endure it as heroically as they did, conceived the notion of satirizing fortune by teaching it to a jackass. When what was left of that creature had become letter-perfect in Christian resignation the humorist harnessed it to a light wagon, led it into the street, and gave a public exhibition of that cardinal virtue. He belabored it sinfully, but it did not stir; he bit its ears, and it sweetly smiled; when prodded with a pitchfork it shut its eyes and snored. It brayed for him who despitely used it. Then gathered all the man's dear friends, each vociferating an infallible plan for moving a balky jackass. They were not all foolish; under other circumstances, perhaps, the advice to "unhang him from the hitchin'-post" would have worked like a charm.

We haven't clearly thought out the application of the foregoing anecdote, but we've a general notion that our contemporary is like a jackass.

A San Franciscanese bridal party recently chartered a steamer, and making a merry visit to Stockton visited the Lunatic Asylum

With glad surprise, by wond'ring eyes
The building was inspected;
"See what the State," said the groom, elate,
"For you, my love, erected."
"Nay," said the bride, "your tender pride
Has seriously misled you:
They'd placed each stone before 'twas known
That I'd agreed to wed you."

Never again will there be as formidable a bolt as that of 1872, when Sumner, Trumbull, Schurz, Fenton, Greeley, Brown, Chase, Davis, and Fixley rebelled, and raised the cry of "anything to beat Grant," and we all know that was a fizzle.—Black-and-Tan.

In the event of General Grant's nomination for a third term, the formidable bolt of 1872 will compare with the rebellion of 1880 as the zephyr compares to the storm—as the fall of dew to the cloud-burst—as the Sand-lot insurrection to the great civil war that shook the very foundations of our government, and imperiled the safety of the republic. The conditions then and now must be considered—the principles that controlled that election, and the one that is to come. To the number of honorable names which opposed General Grant's second election will be added other and more powerful ones. Many journals, of highest respectability and widest circulation, that then supported him, are now opposing and will continue to oppose him. Then the question was a personal one, confined to those who believed that his first term had not been a success; to these will be added a vast number of people who think his second term was a greater failure than his first; and to these again, that other large and influential class of electors who are opposed to a third term upon principle, and who would look upon his election as the violation of a tradition as sacred as any written provision of the organic law. Let it be remembered that there was not then a solid Democratic South, and a divided Republican North; that Greeley was a Republican, and could not and did not unite the Democracy, either North or South; that there then existed questions of reconstruction and finance that do not exist now. The correspondent of the Chronicle may think there will not be much of a shower in the event of Grant's nomination, but it looks to us as though it would be enough of a deluge to drown all the dogs that are now yelping at General Grant's heels for official crumbs.

Last week, forty cavalymen and twenty-five Apache scouts passed through Phoenix, Arizona, from Fort McDowell, bound for the Gila, to investigate the charges against the Papagoes of stealing cattle from the settlers.

If the foregoing is reliable, then it is probable that another Indian war has been organized in Arizona for the benefit of the Indian ring. This time it is the Apaches who are the allies and scouts of the Government, and it is the Papagoes who are to be the victims of the white thieves' terrible vengeance. If we understand the history of these tribes and their relations to the surrounding communities, the case is this: The Papagoes are, and for two hundred years have been, peaceful, Christianized Indians, living by agricultural industries, tilling their own lands, raising stock, making pottery, weaving baskets, and are an industrious, self-supporting, quiet people. All this time they have been at peace with the whites and at war with the Apaches. For two hundred years, and more, the Apaches have been at war with the whites, and are a thieving, cowardly race of assassins—stealing and raiding upon white and Indian alike. The Papagoes have been compelled to fight them in self-defense. In a late trip to Arizona, we visited two Papago villages, and saw these people herding their cattle, tilling the soil, and working at their industries. They have fixed habitations, where they raise crops, year after year, within the same fenced enclosures. We are writing without any knowledge of facts concerning this raid of soldiers and Apache scouts, but we will venture to guess that it is a villainous and wicked scheme, growing out of the greed of a band of political thieves, Arizona loafers, and Indian-ring bandits at Washington. We shall see.

Enter Bridget, with her hands on her hips. "Faith, mum, I shall have to ax ye more wages. Stocks is gone so low that a pore gurl like me is ruint intirely." "Well, Bridget, you know it is always a pleasure to me to pay my servants more money, but if the necessities of life are as cheap as you say, I think I ought rather to cut you down a trifle. With Con. Imperial at forty cents and Lady Bryan at fifteen, you really ought to be able to load up at very little expense." "Indade, mum, that's thrue of ye, but consider the assessments." "I shall consider nothing of the kind. Your position here enables you to buy the stocks, but it does not compel you to pay the assessments. Be reasonable, return to the kitchen, and when stocks become expensive again I will add five dollars a month to your wages, and we will resume, generally, the style of living to which you have been accustomed." Head of the House (sotto voce).—"Smart woman, that! Only she doesn't happen to know that I'm short on the whole list, and a boom in the market would be rattlesnakes and blue lightning!"

The local dailies relate that an unknown woman jumped into the bay recently. There are seventeen reasons why an unknown woman should not jump into the bay. One of these is sufficient. We are a fastidious people, and yet we like crab salad. Naturally we wish to know the pedigree—or, at least, the approximate pedigree—of the crustacean pabulum.

One of our best known operators has a pretty daughter who is a bit of a hoiden. Brokers and bondholders are notorious for talking shop, and our operator is no exception to the rule. Of course Miss Tomboy has imbibed the jargon of the street, and of course she knows how to use her tongue. The other night, at dinner, the young lady spilled a goblet of water all over herself. The head of the family framed a stern rebuke, promptly checked by the chit with this explanation: "Oh, let up, pa, I was merely watering your stock."

If De Lesseps is only seventy-five years old it must have been quite early in life that he invented the Monroe Doctrine. Young man, it is never too soon to sow the seeds of political good, and never too late to reap the harvest of glory.

It is at this season of the year that, visiting your cousin in the country, and falling over a calf in the grass, the sociable and gentlemanly cow wants to shake horns with you by way of saying: "Don't mention it."

THE RÉMUSAT MEMOIRS.

Surfeited as we have been with histories of the First Empire, biographies of Napoleon, and personal reminiscences of his times, these memoirs have a peculiar interest of their own. They contain many anecdotes of court life not to be found in history, which present to us in a new light the characters of the principal actors of that time. Madame de Rémusat was evidently both contemplative and observing; and while she judges with severity some of the people among whom she was thrown, her work bears the stamp of truth, and a desire to be just. On the other hand, she is most lenient to those whom we have been accustomed to regard with doubtful eyes. Hortense she represents as little less than an angel, bearing her many persecutions with the air of a martyr. We had always known that Louis was a brute, but, according to Madame de Rémusat, if his wife was what posterity believes her to have been, it is only a wonder that she was not worse.

The most disagreeable feature of the book is its ruthless treatment of the ideal Josephine, who, probably on account of her misfortunes, has always been represented by historians and biographers as a woman of remarkable character, inviolable principles—in short, the exact opposite of the ordinary woman. Madame de Rémusat, however, lived with her from the time of Napoleon's elevation to the consulship to the day of the empress's death at Malmaison. It would be strange, therefore, if she had failed to make a remarkably correct estimate of her character. As Josephine was warmly attached to her we may conclude that madame was naturally inclined to judge her impartially.

The Duchesse d'Abrantes, on the other hand, detested Josephine, and, in her memoirs, never lost an opportunity to say something spiteful. Her opinions, therefore, have been generally attributed to ill-will and jealousy, and no value has been set upon them. She would, of course, never acknowledge that Josephine was pretty. Madame de Rémusat, on the other hand, describes Josephine as she has always been represented—a very pretty woman; and, indeed, there is no trace of spitefulness or jealousy toward any one in her memoirs. She acknowledges that Josephine had many amiable qualities, great kindness of heart, and extreme placability of disposition. But we are forced to believe that she had little stability of character, less principle, and less intellect; that her impulses, though good, were evanescent; that she was utterly incapable of any lasting impression, and that her ruling passion was vanity. It is a pity that these memoirs do not cover another year, and give an account of Josephine's conduct during and after the divorce. Madame de Rémusat went with her into obscurity, and could, by the personal details which she would thus have been enabled to give, have explained the seeming inconsistencies between her Josephine and the Josephine of history, who bore her misfortunes with such character and fortitude. Her wrongs have heretofore presented her to posterity as a saint and a martyr, and many will think it a pity to destroy the delusion.

Both Madame de Rémusat and her husband occupied posts near the imperial couple, and both seemed to have made a study of the emperor's character. Our author acknowledges that at first she was completely fascinated by him, and was disposed to look upon each of his acts as of little less than divine inspiration. Like the majority of her contemporaries, she regarded him as a man created by providence to save France. The successive phases of the decline of her affection are carefully delineated; and although she ends by disliking him thoroughly, there is an evident determination to be just in her estimate of him. She attributes the greater amount of his success to his thorough knowledge of human nature, and ability to convert it to his own ends. The more subservient a man was, the more favor he found at the imperial court. Implicit and unquestioning obedience was demanded from all. Duroc is an excellent example of the state of subjection to which officers and courtiers were reduced. Madame de Rémusat maintains that, though Napoleon was a perfect master of the science of war, he still preferred peace, and was driven into the opposite extreme; not at first by ambition, but by the necessity of keeping the minds of his subjects occupied, that they might not observe too closely the tyranny of his government.

One can forgive faults, no matter how great they may be, but not weaknesses, which provoke ridicule. It is enough to say that the Napoleon of the Rémusat memoirs is a mass of inconsistencies, a mixture of greatness and littleness, natural kindness of heart, and an utter unscrupulousness that spared neither friend nor foe when any end was to be gained. His letters to Eugene are masterpieces of sentiment, and upon reading them it would be hard to attribute to him a feeling that was not noble and elevated, still less a policy which neither stopped at honor nor anything else.

In one respect our author seems to me unjust. She reproaches Bonaparte for the agony he inflicted on wives and mothers by means of his wars, and attributes the hatred he inspired largely to this fact. But why? Tears are shed after every battle. Might not the same thing be said of every sovereign who leads his subjects to war? No matter what the motive, the result is always the same. I think it is the average of belief that Napoleon was one of the greatest men the world has ever known, but neither is any one prepared to deny Madame de Rémusat's assertion that he made many mistakes. Could he have read these memoirs by anticipation, he might have adopted another and wiser policy, and might have died in the Tuileries.

Although the numerous and well-told anecdotes of court life form one of the most attractive features of the book, the latter is far from being a mere collection of domestic gossip. Madame de Rémusat displays a minute knowledge of State affairs which would be surprising were it not known that the women of the First Empire interested themselves almost as largely in politics as did the men. Some portions of the book, however, read more as if written by a man than by a woman; and it is quite probable that her husband's memory and rhetoric were brought into play as well as her own. It is difficult at times to get over the idea that a large portion of the memoirs are quotations from a higher authority. However, we may conclude that she looked at the principal events of her times through the same lens as did her contemporaries. The story of the trials of Georges Cadoudal, Moreau, Pichegru, and others, and of the state of public feeling at the time, is well told, and displays both thought and observation. The account of her own state of mind, and that of the other inmates of the palace, after the murder of the Duc d'Enghien, is interesting. Her condition was truly pitiable; but her distress was not for the unfortunate Bourbon, but for the tarnished reputation of her master. The world, that shuddered at Napoleon's crime, and that looked with amazement at the seeming indifference of the court, knew nothing of the conflicting emotions with which that court was torn. Outsiders knew nothing of the sleepless nights, the constant interceding with Napoleon, the anxious listening for every footstep, and the hoping against hope until all was over. It was the first mistake of Napoleon's policy, and one which he expiated at St. Helena.

Of the other members of Bonaparte's family, our author says little, and that little is not much to their credit. The women, in particular, seem to have had all the weaknesses of human nature in an exaggerated degree, and vanity seems to have been their predominant characteristic. She touches but lightly upon Jerome's marriage with Elizabeth Patterson, for which we are truly thankful, as the subject is worn threadbare. It is amusing to contrast the absolute indifference with which she alludes to it with the interest which it occasions in America at the present day.

Madame de Rémusat's memory must have been extraordinary, or else she draws largely upon her imagination in regard to Napoleon's conversations. In spite of a former assertion that his mode of talking was disconnected, abrupt, and ungrammatical, she gives us page after page of his interrupted, polished conversations. He must either have had a remarkably easy and lucid flow of language, or else, in spite of her prejudice, his biographer has embellished his remarks for the benefit of posterity.

The memoirs have been characterized as indecent, but that is a sweeping assertion. The greater amount of freedom in manners, speech, and writing of that time must be taken into consideration, and when they are compared with those of Fouché and the Duchesse d'Abrantes, there is little fault to be found with them. There is too much about herself in them, however, and a good deal that her admiring grandson would have done well to suppress. It is incredible that any woman of twenty-two years of age, and who lived in the centre of the court of the First Empire, could have been so surprisingly innocent. While her husband was ill, she spent a month in camp; and, being the only available woman, was honored by a good deal of Napoleon's society. In spite of her having lived in the world for some years, and although she acknowledges that the emperor indulged in the fatherly habit of pulling her ears and kissing her, she was overcome with surprise when Josephine, who was jealous of every woman whom Napoleon looked at, greeted her coldly upon her return. We can only conclude that she was singularly unattractive, or a man of Napoleon's well-known gallantry would have been likely to have himself given her some idea of what she might expect when she returned.

It seems to me, also, that she talks too much about her love for her husband and her own virtue. That is always suspicious. In every incident she manages to be a prominent figure, and never by any accident allows Madame de Rémusat to be placed in the background of these memoirs. That is inconsistent. She should have taken it for granted that posterity would have preferred that she should have made herself a means, not an end, and that her own adventures, trials, and tribulations would be of little interest to any one but her descendants.

Probably the glimpse which these memoirs give of Talleyrand's character will excite as much attention as anything else. We are glad to learn that that astute, diplomatic individual had some natural feeling; and we sympathize with, while we can not help laughing at, his domestic infelicities. His powers of self-repression were wonderful, and he seems to have been the only man who really influenced Napoleon. His conversations with M. de Rémusat are interesting, and he appears to have had more good qualities than are generally placed to his credit.

The last chapter of the second volume contains short and by no means satisfactory sketches of Chateaubriand and Madame de Staël. The severity of her judgment in regard to the former, her son acknowledges, was owing to the great author's want of appreciation of her own fascinations and talents. She did not know Madame de Staël personally, but measured her by Talleyrand's opinion and by her books, which were not sufficiently prosy to suit Madame de Rémusat's taste.

Taking them as a whole, however, the memoirs are above the ordinary run in point of interest, and, although disconnected and rambling at times, are, in the main, well written and well told. Although they have destroyed many of our illusions, we ought not to regret their publication, for they have certainly afforded us amusement, and—I think—profit.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1880.

F. A. G.

T. W. Higginson denies the right of anybody to assume that women, as women, are either angels or imbeciles. Whatever profession they enter they will bring to it, as men do, a great variety of temperaments and characters. A well-known physician once told me, he says, that when women began to practice medicine he supposed that all women practitioners would be just alike; but he soon found, to his amazement, that they varied just as much as men did; some were stronger in theory than in practice, others stronger in practice than in theory; and so on with all other characteristics. It will be the same with all occupations. In the few instances where women have been associated with men on an entire equality and on a large scale, thus far—as, for instance, in the Society of Friends and in the old anti-slavery societies—it has never turned out that they introduced any kind of element that was not useful and valuable, on the whole.

A scientist says: "The skulls of the African negroes are dolichocephalic, mesocephalic, prognathous, platyrrhine, and mesosome, while the Adamese are brachycephalic, microcephalic, mesognathous, mesorhine, and megaseme." We have frequently noticed this, but don't suppose there is any cure for it. All the niggers we know are similarly afflicted.

Instead of saying an officer shot a dog, an exchange says he "peppered the pup with his pop."

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

Little Breeches.

I don't go much on religion,
I never ain't had no show;
But I've got a middlin' tight grip, sir,
On the handful o' things I know.
I don't pan out on the prophets,
And free will, and that sort of thing—
But I b'lieve in God and the angels
Ever sence one night last spring.

I came into town with some turnips,
And my little Gabe came along—
No four-year-old in the country
Could beat him for pretty and strong;
Peart and chipper and sassy,
Always ready to swear and fight,
And I'd larnt him to chaw terbacker
Jest to keep his milk-teeth white.

The snow came down like a blanket
As I passed by Taggart's store;
I went in for a jug of molasses,
And left the team at the door.
They scared at something, and started,
I heard one little squall,
And hell-to-split over the prairie
Went team, Little Breeches, and all!

Hell-to-split over the prairie!
I was almost froze with skeer;
But we roused up some torches,
And sarched for 'em far and near.
At last we struck hosses and wagon,
Snowed under a soft white mound,
Upset, dead beat—but of little Gabe
No hide nor hair was found.

And here all hope soured on me
Of my fellow-critters' aid,
I jest flopped down on my marrow-bones,
Crotch-deep in the snow, and prayed.

By this, the torches was played out,
And me and Isrul Parr
Went off for some wood to a sheepfold,
That he said was somewhar thar.

We found it at last, and a little shed
Where they shut up the lambs at night.
We looked and seen them huddled thar,
So warm and sleepy and white;
And Thar sot Little Breeches, and chirped,
As peart as ever you see:
"I want a chaw of terbacker,
And that's what's the matter of me."

How did he git thar? Angels.
He could never have walked in that storm.
They jest scooped down and toted him
To whar it was safe and warm.
And I think that saving a little child,
And bringing him to his own,
Is a derned sight better business
Than loafing around the throne.—John Hay.

The Whistler.

"You have heard," said a youth to his sweetheart, who stood
While he sat on a corn-sheaf, at daylight's decline—
"You have heard of the Danish boy's whistle of wood:
I wish that the Danish boy's whistle were mine."

"And what would you do with it? Tell me," she said,
While an arch smile played over her beautiful face.
"I would blow it," he answered, "and then my fair maid
Would fly to my side and would there take her place."

"Is that all you wish for? Why, that may be yours Without any magic!" the fair maiden cried:
"A favor so slight one's good-nature secures;"
And she playfully seated herself by his side.

"I would blow it again," said the youth, "and the charm
Would work so that not even modesty's check
Would be able to keep from my neck your white arm."
She smiled, and she laid her white arm round his neck.

"Yet once more I would blow; and the music divine
Would bring me a third time an exquisite bliss—
You would lay your fair cheek to this brown one of mine;
And your lips stealing past it would give me a kiss."

The maiden laughed out in her innocent glee—
"What a fool of yourself with the whistle you'd make!
For only consider how silly 'twould be
To sit there and whistle for what you might take."
—Anon.

A Dream of the South Wind.

O fresh, how fresh and fair!
Through the crystal gulf of air,
The fairy South Wind floateth on her subtle wings of balm;
And the green earth, lapped in bliss,
To the magic of that kiss
Seems yearning upward fondly through the golden-crested calm.

From the distant tropic strand,
Where the billows, bright and bland,
Go creeping, curling round the palms with sweet, faint undertone,
From its fields of purpling flowers,
Still wet with fragrant showers,
The happy South Wind, lingering, sweeps the royal blooms of June.

All heavenly fancies rise
On the perfume of her sighs,
Which steep the inmost spirit in a languor rare and fine,
And a peace more pure than sleep's
Unto dim, half-conscious deeps
Transports me, lulled and dreaming, on its twilight tides divine.

Those dreams! ah me! the splendor,
So mystic, pure, and tender,
Wherewith, like soft heat-lightnings, they gird their meaning round,
And those waters! calling, calling,
With a nameless charm enthralling,
Like the ghost of music melting on a rainbow-spray of sound.

Touch, touch me not, nor wake me,
Lest grosser thoughts o'ertake me,
From earth receding faintly with her dreary dins and jars—
What viewless arms caress me?
What whispered voices bless me,
With welcomes dropping dew-like from the weird and wondrous stars?

Alas! dim, dim and dimmer
Grows the preternatural glimmer
Of that trance the South Wind brought me on her subtle wings of balm,
For, behold! its spirit fleeth,
And its fairy murmur dieth,
And the silence closing round me is a dull and soulless calm!

—Paul H. Hayne.

THE FOUR DREAMS.

A Curious Little Story Written by Zola before he Became Famous.

I.

The evening shades were falling over a deserted battlefield. The victory was won, and four soldiers, camped in a lonely corner, were enjoying a tardy meal, seated on the grass in front of a large fire, before which a few slices of lamb were cooking. The red light cast a strange shadow around, and the pale flicker revealed many sleeping their last sleep. The soldiers were laughing boisterously, scarce noticing the glazed eyes fixed on them. The day's work had been severe, and the living were resting, not knowing what the morrow might bring. Death and night were spreading their wings over the blood-stained earth, where terror and silence were standing side by side.

Their feast ended, Gneuss began to sing. His deep voice sounded hoarse as it fell on the desolate and mournful air. The song, so joyous on his lips, echoed but a sob. Astonished at the strange accents, he began singing with redoubled ardor; when a piercing cry, issuing from the shadows, disturbed the little group.

Gneuss was silent, and, with a troubled expression, said to Elberg:

"Go see which corpse is awakening."

Elberg went, armed with a sword and a lighted torch. His companions could just perceive the outline of his form as he bent over the dead, but he soon disappeared.

"Clerian," said Gneuss, after a silence, "the wolves are about to-night. Go look for our friend."

And Clerian went, and was in turn soon lost in the darkness. Gneuss and Flem, tired of waiting for the return of the wanderers, rolled themselves in their cloaks and lay down by the smoldering embers. Their eyes were just closing, when the same dreadful cry rent the air. Flem rose, walked silently to the spot from whence issued the sound, and was soon lost in the gloom.

Gneuss sprang to his feet, terrified at the sight of the black gulf where the agonized gurgle rang. He threw a few dried leaves on the burning logs, hoping that the brightness would dissipate his fears. The flame rose, shedding its light in a ghastly red circle on the ground. In this circle the shrubs looked unreal, and the dead seemed roused by invisible hands.

Gneuss's terror increased; he shook the lighted branches and stamped out the flames. As the thick shadows fell around him once more, he shuddered, fearing to be again overtaken by the death-shout. He could not rest. He sat down, then rose again to call his companions, but the sound of his own voice made him shrink, and fear that it had attracted the attention of the surrounding corpses.

Suddenly the moon appeared, and Gneuss trembled to see it shedding its pale beams over the battlefield. Night no more concealed its horrors. The plain, strewn with dead and dying, seemed to extend under the shroud of white light, and this light seemed to give an unearthly touch to the scene. Gneuss, now thoroughly roused, wondered whether he could ascend the mountain and extinguish the pale night torch. In his excitement he thought the dead must rise and speak to him, now that they could see him so plainly. Their perfect calm was terrible; and, expecting every moment to be overtaken by some dreadful catastrophe, he closed his eyes. But, as he was standing there, a strange heat touched his left heel. He stooped, and saw a thin rivulet of blood flowing past his feet, leaping over the stones, and causing a gay murmur. It came out of the shade, meandered in the light of the pale moonbeams, then fled and returned to the darkness, like a snake in its tortuous windings. Gneuss could not remove his eyes from the tide of flowing blood. He saw it swelling slowly and visibly getting larger; the rivulet became a peaceful stream that a child could have easily leaped over; the stream became an ever-increasing torrent, bursting over the ground and throwing up a red foam on all sides; the torrent became an immense flowing river.

The river was ever carrying away the dead, but a cold shiver ran over him as he saw that it was supplied by the blood running from their wounds.

Gneuss kept moving backward from the ever-increasing tide; he could no longer distinguish the opposite bank, and the valley was changed into a lake.

Suddenly he was stopped in his course; a cluster of rocks impeded his flight. He soon felt the waves leaping round his knees, and the dead drifting on, insulting him in their course, each one of their wounds becoming a blood-stained mouth to scoff at his fears. The dreaded sea, ever increasing, now touched his waist. He made a final effort by clinging to the cracks in the rocks; but alas! the rocks gave way, and the tide covered his shoulders. The moon, pale and sad, watched this sea where her rays were not reflected. The light floated heavenward; this immense sheet of shadowy and clamorous blood seemed to be the entrance to some great abyss. The waves, ever ascending, touched and covered with their red foam the lips of the tortured Gneuss.

II.

At dawn, Elberg returned. He woke Gneuss, whom he found sleeping, with his head pillowed on a stone.

"Friend," said he, "I was lost in the shrubs, and sitting down to rest at the foot of a tree, sleep overtook me, and my soul was troubled by strange visions, the remembrance of which disturbs my waking thoughts."

"The world was in its infancy; the sky was one eternal smile. Earth, a virgin still, was basking in May's rich sunbeams; each blade of grass was ripening and surpassing in beauty the finest oaks; the trees were bursting into gorgeous leaves and fruits totally unknown to me. The sap was ever flowing through earth's deep veins, and in its abundance drifted into the recesses of rocks and gave them life."

"The horizon rose, calm and smiling, in the distance. Nature, waking from its sleep, as a child, knelt and thanked God for His light; it spread out its arms toward heaven to give praise for its songs and perfumes, so graceful and so sweet that my mind was overwhelmed with the divine impression. Earth, gentle and prosperous, engendered without pain. Fruit-trees sprang out of every corner, the roads were hedged with fields of ripe corn, where to-day plains of thistles and thorns would rise. The air was not laden with the weight of human sorrow. God was alone working for His children.

"Man, like the birds, fed on food sent by God, gathering fruit on his way, drinking the water from the cooling spring and sleeping under a shelter of leaves, whose lips seemed to shudder at the sight of flesh, not knowing the taste of blood, relishing only the dew-sprinkled and sun-ripened fruits."

"So man remained innocent, and his very innocence anointed him king over all living things. Earth had assumed a new touch of purity, and was cradled in supreme peace. Birds fled no more at the sight of man to far-stretching forests; all God's creatures lived together under one supreme law—goodness."

"I was walking with them, enjoying their perfect nature, and feeling myself growing stronger and better under their united influence. I felt the delicious breeze so pure after the laden breath of earth."

"As the angel of my dream watched beside me, my eyes strayed to a forest. I saw two men following a narrow, shady path. The younger took the lead, singing gayly, and smiling at the beauty all around; now and again he turned to smile upon his companion, and the smile made me guess that they were brothers. But the lips and eyes of his companion did not respond; he followed the youth with a look of hatred, and hastened his step to keep up with him."

"I saw him cut down a branch and make it into a rough club; then he hastened his step, fearing to lose sight of his victim, and hiding his weapon behind him. The young man, who had been resting, rose at his approach, and kissed him on the forehead in welcome."

"They set out once again on their walk. The day was drawing to a close. The youth hurried on, as he perceived in the distance the sun gradually sinking behind a hill. The man thought the youth was trying to escape, and lifted his club. His young brother turned with a happy speech on his lips; the club felled him to the ground, crushing his face, from whence gushed a stream of blood."

"The first blade of grass it touched shuddered, and shook the drop upon its mother earth; earth trembled and was startled; a great cry of repugnance was wrung from its breast, and the sand in the road turned into a foaming red current."

"The scream from the wounded youth seemed to scatter God's creatures far and wide; they fled into the deep and dark places, the strong attacking the weak. I saw them in the gloom, polishing their hooks and sharpening their claws. The great work of the brigandage of creation had begun."

"Then the eternal tide passed before me. The sparrow flew at the swallow; the swallow in its turn seized the gnat; the gnat sucked the blood from the corpse. From the worm to the lion was one great insurrection. Nature, touched at this sight, was convulsed. The pure lines of the horizon were effaced, the dawn and sunset gave forth blood-stained clouds, the rippling of the waters seemed one prolonged sob, and the leaves of the trees fell faded to the ground ere they bloomed."

III.

Scarcely had Elberg finished his tale when Clerian appeared, and, seating himself between his two companions, said to him:

"I know not whether what I saw was a reality or a dream, the vision was so like the truth, and the truth so like a vision."

"My steps led me along a road that encompassed the earth; it was studded with towns, and crowds followed its course. A stream of red froth flowed onward, and my feet were soon blood-stained. Careworn, I wandered on amid the mass of human beings, increasing as we went, and cruel sights met my gaze. Fathers offering their daughters in sacrifice to some avenging god, the fair heads bent under the touch of steel, and tainting at death's kiss. Trembling maidens seeking death to escape from hateful kisses, the tomb alone shrouding the virginity. Women dying under passionate caresses, one crying bitterly on the brink of the river that had carried away her love; another killed in her lover's embrace; the blow was a death knell to him, and, locked in each other's arms, they soared heavenward."

"Men vainly seeking liberty and peace that were unattainable here below. Everywhere footprints of kings were marked with a crimson blot: one walking in the road stained by his brother's blood; another enjoying his crown at the cost of his subjects' lives; and still another wading in God's blood; and the people, standing back and letting him pass on, would say: 'A king has passed this way.'"

"Priests massacred their victims, and, open-mouthed over their bleeding entrails, pretended to read therein heaven's secrets. Swords were hidden under their priestly robes, as they preached warfare in the name of God, and, at the sound of their voices, each man turned to slay his neighbor, thinking thereby to glorify his Maker. The intoxicated mass of human beings was hurrying hither and thither, a crushed and seething crowd, brandishing their naked weapons without mercy and felling innocent souls to the ground. A craving for massacre fell on the raging populace. Their cry rang furiously on the still night air, until the last drop of blood was trampled from out the seething wounds, and men cursed their victims for dying so quickly."

"Earth drank unceasingly of the blood-red stream, and seemed insatiable and glutted over the dregs."

"I hurried on, wishing to lose sight of my fallen brothers, but the road lay dark and interminable before me, while the crimson tide drifted ever onward. Darkness increased around me until I could see the barren plains, the forsaken rocks, the mountains towering to the skies, the valleys becoming great gulfs, the stones turning into hillocks, and the furrows into yawning abysses."

"No sign of life was there, no green thing visible; nothing but rocks, desolate rocks, whose summits, barely touched by the wavering light, made the gloom appear more terrible in this valley where the road led, and where my footsteps echoed in the deathly silence."

"A sharp turn brought me to a ghastly sight. Four mountains, leaning heavily forward, formed a basin. Their sides, straight and stiff, like the walls of a cyclopean city, formed in their centre an immense well, and this well, where the stream terminated, gradually increased the thick and tranquil sea that rested so peacefully in its bed of rocks, giving a purple hue to the clouds."

"I knew that this abyss must receive the blood of the murdered; that drops from each wound had gone to swell the surge of this flowing sea."

"Stop," said Gneuss, "the torrent I saw this night went to feed that cursed lake."

"Struck with terror," continued Clerian, "I stepped to the brink, and saw that the tide nearly reached to the summit of the rocks. A voice from the abyss spoke to me: 'The river is ever increasing, and will continue until it reaches the utmost heights; then it will overflow into the plains, the mountains will give way, and tired earth will soon be covered and flooded. New-born babies will be drowned in their fathers' blood.'"

"The day is at hand, friend," said Gneuss; "the waves were high last night."

IV.

The sun had risen ere Clerian had finished his tale. The trumpet was sounding to rally the scattered troops.

The three soldiers arose, and, shouldering their weapons, moved away, casting a last, lingering look at the fire—when Flem appeared, foot-sore and travel-stained.

"Friends," said he, "I know not whence I come, so rapid has been my flight. Long hours did I wander, till the noise of my footsteps rocked me gently, and I fell into a strange and restless sleep, never slackening my speed till I came to a lonely hill. The sun poured down upon it and scorched the ground, while I hurried on to attain the summit."

"As I fled, a man appeared, toiling up the path; a crown of thorns was on his head, a heavy burden on his back, drops of blood were standing on his forehead, and his tottering steps could scarcely reach their goal."

"I grieved to see his agony, and I waited for him. He was carrying a cross; and I saw by his crown and purple robes that he was a king, and I despised him, and rejoiced over his sufferings."

"Soldiers followed him, hurrying his faltering steps. At last, when they came to a stand-still on the highest pinnacle of the mountain, they divested him of his garments and nailed him to the cursed tree. The victim smiled sadly as he stretched out his hands and crossed his feet ready for the murderous deed. He turned his face heavenward; tears flowed slowly down his cheeks—tears which he felt not, and which were lost in the resigned smile on his lips."

"The cross was soon erected, and then the weight of the martyr's body enlarged the wounds and broke his bones until he shuddered again and again, and sought strength from above."

"The sight riveted me to the spot, and as I looked I said: 'That man is no king.'"

"Then, in my great pity, I cried to the soldiers to kill him."

"A linnet perched on the cross was singing a sad strain, that caught my ear and made me think of the weeping virgin."

"Blood is feeding the flame," said the linnet, "blood colors the flowers, blood shades the clouds. I alighted on the earth and my claws were stained, and as I touched the trees my wings grew crimson."

"I met a just man and followed him, and having bathed in a pure spring, I thought to find rest on his shoulder from the wickedness of earth."

"My only song to-day is a sob on Golgotha's Heights for one who carried me safely through many dangers. He came to purify, and he is doing it with the crimson tide from his own wounds."

"Oh, Jesus! I cry, when shall I find Thy brother to take me under his sheltering wings? Ah! when shall Thy son come to wash my wings in Thy sprinkled blood?"

"The victim listened to the linnet's song. Death was hovering over him, but his look was one of gentle reproach, a serene and hopeful smile passed over his face."

"Then, with an unearthly shout, he gave up the ghost; his head sank, the linnet fled, the sky darkened, and the earth trembled."

"I still ran on and on in my sleep; dawn had come, the valley awoke, smiling under the morning mists. The rain of the preceding evening gave a fresh touch to the green leaves, but the road was still hedged with the thorns that had impeded my course the night before. The same hard stones stopped my way as the snakes hissed out their warning note. The just man's blood had flowed in vain for the world."

"The linnet passed on its way, telling its tale as it went:

"In vain have I sought a cleansing stream to wash my blood-stained wings. Look at earth! it is no better for the sacrifice, and I have only to record the burden of one more murder."

V.

The clarion now rang loudly.

"Friends," said Gneuss, "we are driving a wicked trade; our sleep is disturbed by the phantoms of those we have slain. My rest, like yours, was disturbed by a ghastly nightmare; I have been massacring for thirty years, and am tired of it. Let us leave our brothers, and go into the country together and till the ground. I know of a valley where the plows are idle for want of hands."

"Such is our wish," replied his companions.

The soldiers buried their weapons, bathed themselves in the cooling stream, and, arm in arm, they started on their new road.

Jonathan and Paddy were riding together one day, when they came in sight of an old gallows. They suggested to the American the idea of being witty at the expense of his Irish companion. "You see that, I calculate," said he, "and now where would you be if the gallows had its due?" "Riding alone," coolly replied Paddy.

"Can a man's attention be riveted with copper rivets?" asks the Cincinnati Commercial. It can, if the rivets are sharpened and put where he will sit upon them.

Thackeray once said: "When I was a boy I wanted some taffy; it was a shilling; I hadn't one. When I was a man I had a shilling, but I didn't want any taffy."

When the Emperor of Russia is now asked in his dining-hall he declines, remarking: "I am n

BALDWIN THEATRE.—Coralie has a gamey flavor. We are not concerned about a matter of taste like this. There are people who prefer their mutton "high." In pre-railroad days, within the memory of men yet living, Vienna ate its oysters "touched." There are Chinese delicacies that can be prepared only from added eggs. We should keck at this cookery. Our attitude toward its votaries is one of moral elevation, very like that toward the poodle-dramatics of which Coralie is an example, whence we take a bird's-eye view of "those Frenchmen." They depict themselves in these plays, and we examine them with something of that large tolerance in which a mastiff might examine the curly coterie—dimly detecting the irony of such little creatures getting into love or a passion.

This matter suggests a political reflection. Some years ago, the French press fell to yelping at England. Punch made a picture of Napoleon (le petit) standing on the yonder shore of the Channel, working one of those toy-poodles which squeak. It would not have occurred to Punch to caricature poor Spain, or even Naples, by that toy. King Bomba was bad enough—Queen Isabella horrid enough; Bomba might have been figured with a toy cannon in his hand—Isabella with her mannikin of a husband in a pint-pot, emitting pronunciamientos. In each case, contempt would have been expressed for the antagonist's weakness; in the actual case, contempt was expressed for his strength. And, so long as Englishmen and Germans witness such self-drawn portraits of the Frenchman as abound on his stage, the feeling that inspired Punch's picture will endure. A wise French government might do a worse thing than suppress the national literary poodle.

However, as to Coralie, it is to be noted that the play is not a rank specimen of its kind. Usually in this business we are gratified with the representation of a Magdalen—the college of this name is pronounced "Maudlen," which seems a preferable location. Usually, then, we are presented with a Maudlen going through her repentances, or harrowing up in some other wise her immortal part, before our eyes. To this sort of performance the objections are: (1) Maudlens do not repent; (2) they do not harrow worth a cent; (3) their immortal part, however stirred, gives forth an ill savor. These are faults of gravity. A form of cancer is exhibited to us which does not exist in nature; and a cancer is no more than a sore, anyhow. The theatrical manager appeals to us as the companion of boyhood used to do: "Give me a hite of your apple, and I'll show you my sore toe." The appeal was not unsuccessful then, and that boy was father to a man.

Now, in Coralie we are spared this sort of exhibition. It is a cicatrix only that is exposed to our vision: we infer, but are not called on to inspect, the previous condition of the spot. We are not introduced to the operating-room to see the patient; we meet her after she has left the institution. The difference is enormous, and is in the favor of the new play. It is understood that "Coralie" has been awfully naughty, but all that was ages ago, and the interest we are invited to feel is not in her, but in her grown-up son. The title of the play expresses its true inwardness. It is called not Coralie, but Le Fils de Coralie. His fortunes are its theme. Her personality is intruded only as an accident of his career, and in all our dealings with her on the stage she appears only as the mother—plotting, harried, doubling, hunted, playing off tricks and wiles within a narrowing circle, to avert from her son the consequences of her own career. In all this there is no sentimental wish-wash to make you ill. There is nothing but what is natural, sound, and affecting—barring only the nature of the fatality which is pursuing the woman; this, being of a vile sort, sends forth its occasional whiffs of noisomeness.

The structure of the play (three acts) exacts high praise. A more dramatic thing in its each step of development has not appeared in a long time. Its plot is deeply interesting, and it is untwisted without a knot, or hitch, or the dropping of one round of the thread. As a piece of dramatic work, these three acts are masterly. But with the third act the play reaches a climax; the fourth is an anti-climax, and spoils it. It would be hard to tell how to change it for the better. The difficulty is inherent—the material on hand at the end of Act III. is awfully intractable. The real difficulty is to get properly rid both of "Coralie" and "Captain Daniel," without some tragedy, which the play in its present shape is not strong enough to bear; for as to "Daniel's" setting down to the domestic veal, it is ridiculous. "Edith" were drawn as a coquet made to play with "Daniel," a fitting way to kill him off could be contrived. We can not but think that somehow a superior play will be wrought out of this; these first three acts are too fine to be lost. The present conclusion of the play is impotent; that in the original is not only impotent, but also intolerably poodle.

The performance at Baldwin's is very fine. While Jeffreys-Lewis's success as "Coralie" is quite a triumph, the fact must not be lost sight of how much it is contributed to and grows out of the excellent acting of both the old men—"Godefroy" (Jennings) and "Beauchamp" (Bradley). This is a thing too much confused in distributing the merit among the different parts in plays. The most familiar instance, perhaps, is that of the two "Surfaces." The applause falls to "Charles," while the real fine play falls to "Joseph." The effectiveness of "Charles's" part, for which the actor gets the credit, depends on the way it is led up to and prepared for by that of "Joseph's," which a better actor is apt to get no credit for.

Speaking generally, the triumph of your dramatic hero is founded on the goodness of the acting by the dramatic rogue—his foil. However, this suggestion is offered here, not to dim the burnish of Jeffreys-Lewis's "Coralie," but to help the understanding to a due appreciation of the two old men. In "Godefroy's" scene with "Captain Daniel," when he demands release of his daughter's engagement, the quiet insistence of the broken old gentleman was quite perfect, and laid open the way to the fine episode between mother and son immediately succeeding. In the scene of drawing up the marriage settlement, "Beauchamp's" formal regularity up to the moment it dawns on him: "Something wrong here!" and the tension under which he pursues the clue, lent all needed effect to the action of the play.

Neither of those parts, of course, in the way of the depth of emotion or strength of acting, comes into competition or comparison with that of "Coralie." From the moment of her appearance on the stage, she becomes, by dint both of superior acting and her place in the play, the central object of interest. We do not propose to follow her through the part. Her entrance, toward the close of the first act, starts a round of applause, due solely to the effectiveness of her appearance. Her ensuing scenes with "Montjoie" are acted for all they are worth. The attempt to cajole him at first is a scurvy bit on the author's part—stupid; in the attempt to threaten, the dialogue is not up, in point of strength, to that of the situation, and hence, perhaps, there is no alternative but to rant it. But "Coralie's" scene with her son, in the third act, is 'way-up—strong at all points, and played for the full strength of the hand. In this, the climax of the play, Jeffreys-Lewis is well and effectively supported by Mr. O'Neill. Beyond this point, it is superfluous to pursue the theme, for here the play properly ends.

Of "Edith" (third costume), a lady was overheard to observe: "How much Carey has improved in her dressing." The bearings of this remark lie in the application of it.

"Has it stopped raining yet?" "Don't know. Guess we've had 'bout nuff." The above is a fair sample of the current street conversation anent our "beautiful weather"—beautiful from a farmer's standpoint. Of course the visiting granger is jubilant, and the visiting merchant from the Cohos District puts his hands a little deeper into his plethoric pocket, sighing for new methods to help him get rid of his hard-earned "pile"—in the line of attractions for his purchasing constituency. But while the visiting rural has been happy in the rain that has made them dream of the green and flower-brightened environs of their distant homes, we have looked down upon dreary streets, have picked our various disconsolate ways across slushy crossings, have peered through rain-pelted windows at the ashen sky, but nothing—except the welcome puff of earthquake, complimentary to Professor Proctor—has happened to break the monotony of "long, long, dreary days," that have made up the week just passed. And yet, within a half-hour's delightful ride of our busiest streets, the thrice-lovely verdure of a hundred rain-drenched slopes is leaping into the spring atmosphere and waiting for the spring sunshine. "That is gush," some one says. Perhaps it is, for this is the gush season. The sunshine is only just behind the clouds, we know, and the cloud-curtains can not be drawn much longer. Ah, but in the meantime half of us are wheezing with colds, aunt has the neuralgia in her dexter cheek, and uncle the g—the inflammatory rheumatism—in his sinister great toe; and the toddling two-year-old is growing daily pale and thin and fretful, for lack of sunshine and the air of all-out-doors.

Be still, sad heart, and cease pining;
Under the cloud is the sun still shining.

To-morrow, or the next day after, or next week surely, there will come warm April days—real April days, as drenched with sunlight as these days are with rain—and then, hurrah for an outing! We will jump upon the dummy and we'll all take a ride—uncle and auntie and little blue-eyes. We will go out on the California Street cars, and steam extension to the jumping-off place, ever so far, into the country, and then we'll go to the Presidio Common, and find wild flowers that shall match the baby's eyes to a dot, and queer little blush-blossoms that shall make us think of somebody's cheeks, and we will ramble and romp and fill our lungs to our hearts' content. It is enough to look forward to this—at least almost enough—to make us forget the rain and wind; and then, besides, we are so royally sure the California Street Road will have our carriage ready whenever we want it.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Forgotten Something.

Kitty and Alan were two little chicks,
They ran after a robin with two little sticks.
Said Kitty to Alan: "Of course we shall fail;
We've entirely forgotten the salt for his tail."

Entirely Seasonable.

I'll winter night fair Isabel;
I'll spring upon my knees and tell
No girl is hand summer than she,
And that she autumn marry me.

A Put Up Job.

He raseeled with that old front gate,
But couldn't move it—not a peg;
And when he tried to climb the fence,
The dog would catch him by the leg.
She watched him through the shutter slats
(She didn't want him to come up),
And softly murmured when he left:
"God bless the old gate and the pup."

Kill Him! Kill Him!

He married a maiden named Eva,
And said that he never would leave her.
"Do you really mean never?"
"Well," said he, "hardly Eva."

The Old Huascar.

There was an Old Man of Peru,
Who got himself into a stew
Of domestic concern,
Which did cruelly burn
This bald-head of Ancient Peru.

You Bet Your Life.

A clothes-line is a harmless thing,
When stretched from pole to pole,
Until you start across the yard
And step into a hole.
Then, as you make a forward lunge,
It stops you, so to speak,
And throws you down and jerks you to
The middle of neck's tweak.

A Leap-Year Idyl.

The pallid snow was drifted deep
When Nellie came prepared to leap.
She let her plump dimensions drape
Into her sweetheart's maiden lap.
And sighing prayed him give her hope,
And kneeling begged him with her slope.
Then held him in her fervent grip,
And smacked him on his downy lip.
* * * * *
But lest we into secrets drop,
These thrilling details will we lop.
Suffice to say a priestly troop
Soon after tied the bridal loop.

The Correct Thing.

Adown the street, with flying feet,
She tripped with high-toned flutter;
An orange peel caressed her heel,
And she anchored in the gutter!
With smothered swear the maiden fair
Arose from 'mid the boulders,
But oh! such luck! her panier stuck
Right up betwixt her shoulders.

"Fifteen two, Fifteen Four."

There was a young lady had legs
Resembling liberty poles;
She wanted to rent them for cribbage pegs,
But they couldn't find deep enough holes.

Where is Winnie?

Winnie was impatient, and her fire was getting low,
